It's unclear what impact, if any, Bush's investigation would have on prices that are near or at $3 a gallon or more. Asked if Bush had any reason to suspect market manipulation, White House press secretary Scott McClellan responded, "Well, gas prices are high right now, and that's why you want to make sure there's not."

The administration sent letters Tuesday to state attorneys general urging them to vigorously enforce state law "against any anticompetitive, anticonsumer conduct in the petroleum industry."

"Consumers around the nation have expressed concerns about what they have perceived as anticompetitive or otherwise unfair conduct by the world's major oil companies," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Federal Trade Commission Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras. Their letter said federal agencies had substantially increased efforts to monitor, detect and prevent any violations of the law.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., urged Bush in a letter Monday to order a federal investigation into any gasoline price gouging or market speculation.

"There is no silver bullet," Frist said Tuesday on ABC's "Good Morning America," but "we need to make sure that any efforts at price-gouging be addressed and addressed aggressively." Meanwhile, Frist said, consumers should take steps to conserve gasoline — drive at slower speeds, tune up car engines for maximum efficiency and carpool.

Former Bruins star's foundation gives millions to Tufts Medical

BOSTON—Former Boston Bruins star Cam Neely's foundation has given $7 million to Tufts-New England Medical Center, giving a boost to a financially challenged hospital.

The Cam Neely Foundation donated $2 million for a pediatric-bone marrow transplant facility, and $5 million worth of improvements to the hospital's neurosurgery program. Neely's foundation already had created and funded at Tufts the Neely House, a residential floor for cancer patients that resembles a comfortable hotel.

"We don't think the hospital, and the cancer center especially, gets the recognition it deserves," Neely said.

The hospital last year posted its first surpluses after losing $54 million during the prior two years.

Work has yet to start on the pediatric bone marrow center, which will be built at the medical center's Floating Hospital for Children. It will include facilities for families to remain close to their children during inpatient treatment.

The neurosurgery center improvements, which are largely completed, will be named after his father, Michael Neely, who died of brain cancer. Cam Neely's mother also died of cancer.

Neely's foundation has collected about $13 million since its creation in 1997.

A right-winger for the Bruins, Neely retired from hockey in 1996 and was inducted into the National Hockey League Hall of Fame last year.

Bad batch of drugs kills at least nine in Philadelphia

By Geoff Mulvihill
Associated Press

CAMDEN, N.J.—After Ellen Krips' cousin died of an overdose of extremely potent drugs last week, the heroin addict's first thought was not how she could avoid the bad junk.

It was more like: I have to get some of that stuff.

A bad batch of drugs for sale on the streets of Philadelphia and southern New Jersey has killed at least nine heroin users over the past two weeks. And while authorities are warning people to stay away from the stuff, they are afraid some junkies are drawing the wrong lesson.

Like Krips, 32, they are intrigued by the possibility of a powerful new high.

Investigators are trying to determine exactly what is in the stuff, which is being sold as heroin under such names as "Flatline" and "Capone." Since Friday, about 70 people have been hospitalized.

Tests done in one community show that what was sold as heroin was mostly fentanyl, a drug 80 times more powerful than morphine. It is used to treat chronic pain and as anesthesia for open-heart surgery. No heroin was in the batch.

Medical experts say fentanyl, which has been harming Chicago-area addicts for a few months and has shown up mixed with heroin in Cleveland and elsewhere this year, can cause breathing problems and make users feel as if they are suffocating.

William Gamble, 40, said he was sickened last week. Hours after a state trooper warned him that "Flatline" was dangerous, Gamble bought three $10 doses of "Capone." He, his wife and another man shot up in an abandoned house. The men passed out quickly, but both survived and were not hospitalized. His wife was not affected.

Warnings from police, counselors and news outlets have had the opposite effect on some addicts.

"If I tell someone I OD'd, they're coming to find that bag," said Gamble, who goes through seven or eight bags of heroin a day.

Authorities arrested 11 heroin users in Camden last week in an effort to track the drugs back to the dealers and their suppliers. By Tuesday, those dealers had not been found.

Some public health officials estimate that 10,000 people in the Philadelphia area are addicted to heroin. With major airports and seaports nearby, Philadelphia, New Jersey and New York dealers are known to sell heroin in highly pure forms.

Johnny "J.B." Brown, a drug counselor who cruises the streets of this impoverished city in an RV, offering HIV tests and other services for drug users and prostitutes, has been trying to warn users.

"You being careful out there? You know, there's some bad dope," Brown said Monday as a steady stream of drug users approached for snacks, condoms and bleach kits to clean their needles.

All of them said they have heard about the killer drugs. But they said stuff so strong that it kills is impossible to resist. And even if they wanted to avoid the bad stuff, they might not be able to, since it is never clear which bag might contain fentanyl or some other deadly substance.

"It's like Russian roulette," said addict Michelle Galante, 28, of Swedesboro, "just like any drug."

Al-Qaida leader mocks U.S. forces in video recording

By Salah Nasrawi
Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — In a rare video posted Tuesday on the Internet, al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi swore allegiance to Osama bin Laden and said any government formed in Iraq would be merely a "stooge."

He also mocked the U.S. military in Iraq for what he called suicides, drug-taking and mutinies, and he warned that "worse" attacks were to come.

The video, released just days after Iraq named a new prime minister and a high-profile audiotape from bin Laden appeared on Arab TV, seemed a deliberate attempt by al-Zarqawi to claim the spotlight again following months of taking a lower profile.

It also came just one day after a triple bombing at a resort in Egypt that killed at least 24 people, including 21 Egyptians and three foreigners.

The video was believed the first to show al-Zarqawi's face. The bearded, black-clothed terrorist leader, thought to be about 40, was in a flat desert landscape, dotted with scrub brush as if after a spring rain, that looked startlingly like Iraq's western Anbar province.

The footage showed him and about two dozen insurgents, masked and dressed in black uniforms, undergoing combat training.

In another scene, al-Zarqawi was filmed inside, sitting with his lieutenants and Anbar's insurgent commander, according to a caption in the video. The men, sitting on traditional Arab cushions and mats, could be seen discussing strategy over a large map spread on the ground.

"Any government which is formed in Iraq now — whether by Shiites or Zionist Kurds, or those who are dubbed Sunnis — would only be a stooge," al-Zarqawi said in the video. "They are a poisoned dagger in the heart of the Muslim nation."

It has been just days since Iraq named a new prime minister and made progress toward forming a new government. In that sense, the video could be an attempt by the terrorist leader to raise his visibility at a time when U.S. officials are hailing the Iraqi political process as a setback to the insurgents.

Al-Zarqawi also claimed the U.S. military was overwhelmed in Iraq.

"Why don't you tell people that your soldiers are committing suicide, taking drugs and hallucination pills to make them sleep?" he asked, directing his words to President Bush.

"By God, your dreams will be defeated by our blood and by our bodies. What is coming is even worse," he said.

The U.S. military in Iraq said it would have no immediate comment.

A U.S. counterterrorism official, who spoke on condition of anonymity in compliance with office policy, said intelligence officials are conducting a technical analysis to determine the tape's authenticity. The official said it appears to be al-Zarqawi.

Al-Zarqawi has done numerous audio tapes, including one in January, but this is his first video in some time, perhaps several years, the official said, adding that he appears to be healthy. Producing a video, rather than a voice recording, is thought to increase the risk to the speaker.

His message indicates the video was made in part to display unity among the foreign fighters in Iraq, and bring more members into the organization, the official said.

The video was posted on a Web site that al-Zarqawi's group and others have used to post Internet messages. Al-Zarqawi previously has made statements only through audiotapes posted on the Web, although photos of him obtained by the U.S. government have been widely circulated.

In one part of the video, al-Zarqawi sat dressed in black and with a black skullcap on his head, with an ammunition vest hung from his neck and an automatic rifle propped against the wall to his right. The black flag of his group, al-Qaida in Iraq, was superimposed on the screen.

In the video, al-Zarqawi also accused the West and the United States of waging a "crusader" war against Islam but said Muslim holy warriors were standing firm.

"When the enemy entered into Iraq, their aim was to control the area and support the Zionist state," al-Zarqawi said. "But here we have been fighting them for the last three years."

He also mentioned Jerusalem, saying that while fighters are in Iraq, "our eyes are on Jerusalem, which cannot be regained without a guiding Quran and a triumphant sword."

And he repeated his allegiance to bin Laden, calling him his emir or prince.

"Our emir, sheik Osama bin Laden, has offered you a truce, which was good for you if you had accepted. But you turned it down, because of your arrogance," al-Zarqawi said, referring to an offer al-Qaida's chief made two years ago to cease attacks on Europe if the U.S. would withdraw from Iraq and Afghanistan.

The bin Laden tape that was played on Arab television Sunday encouraged Muslims to support his group in its war with the West.

Al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian, has claimed responsibility for some of the most high-profile suicide bombings in Iraq, and also for a score of other attacks including hotel bombings in November in Jordan.

But in recent months, al-Zarqawi had sharply lowered his profile, halting his group's Internet claims and joining a clearinghouse group of other radical groups. Some other radical leaders had said he had been shunted aside and told to lower his profile.

In January, al-Zarqawi's group said in a Web statement that it had joined five other Iraqi insurgent groups to form the Mujahedeen Shura Council, or Consultative Council of Holy Warriors. Since then, al-Zarqawi's group had stopped issuing its own statements, a sharp contrast to its previous frequent postings, and al-Zarqawi had not issued a Web audiotape since January.

In the video posted Tuesday, the logo of the Shura Council appeared on the screen as al-Zarqawi spoke, even as the black flag of his specific group, al-Qaida in Iraq, appeared in the corner.

Among other attacks he has been blamed for, U.S officials believe al-Zarqawi personally beheaded American businessman Nicholas Berg, whose savage killing was shown on a videotape distributed by al-Qaida in Iraq in May 2004.

It was the first of a series of videotaped decapitations of Westerners in Iraq, which ended after widespread complaints from Muslims who were sympathetic to the insurgency but objected to the video beheadings.

Some experts have long cautioned, however, that al-Zarqawi's role may have been exaggerated and that some of the attacks claimed by his group — or that U.S. and Iraqi officials blamed on him — may have been carried out by others.

Iraq's insurgency has always been made up of several disparate groups, and some of them, including Ansar al-Sunnah Army and the Islamic Army of Iraq, have been nearly as violent as al-Zarqawi's al-Qaida in Iraq.

What good granola-loving people recognize

John Gruenenfelder

Gather 'round, fellow students, and in honor of Earth Day, I'll tell you a tale of impending environmental crisis, scientific study and government and public action. The place: Tucson, a large city in southern Arizona situated in the middle of the Sonoran Desert.

The problem: the metro area's nearly 1 million residents subsist entirely on groundwater supplies. The solution: a grand canal, the Central Arizona Project, to divert vast quantities of the Colorado River to the interior of Arizona.

Re-engineering the environment has always been a popular human pastime, and, overall, this project has been a success, pitfalls notwithstanding. However, just because it is a success now doesn't mean that environmentalists weren't extremely angry, or that the local government didn't botch more than one aspect. As with nearly any problem society faces, the solution is in the middle and is reached only through compromise.

Redirecting all that water had some serious environmental consequences. At the same time, you can only pump water from 30 meters below ground for so long before you a) run out of water, and b) watch the city slowly sink as the ground subsides. So, now the city has a new supply of water.

But this water doesn't taste as good as the old groundwater. Tough, drink it. But, it's coming out brown. Oh, I'm sorry. You've encountered Major Municipal Blunder number one, mea culpa.

So, we arrive at the revised solution to the water problem. Rather than spend the money and fix the problem, some of the water is mixed in with fresh ground water and delivered to customers while the rest is recharged into the aquifer in a well-intentioned but environmentally dubious scheme.

The point of this narrative is that the two sides of serving the public and protecting the environment are not always diametrically opposed. As with this canal, sometimes the compromise favored preservation, and other times, the compromise favored the needs of the public.

In the end, the solution was not perfect, but it was accomplished. The scale of this effort is also important. The need for a canal was known some 60 years ago and built over the course of 20 years beginning in the 1970s with a truly staggering cost. Despite the water conservation efforts of the city, which I think are pretty well-done, at least compared to Phoenix, people had to bite the bullet and build it.

Now, fast forward about 10 years to the present and 3,000 miles to the east. Society, indeed the whole planet, is facing a rapidly growing problem. At this point, almost everyone knows about global warming and, hopefully, most of us have caught on that the problem is real and immediate.

This problem didn't start in Massachusetts, of course, nor has the solution. But a small piece of that solution is trying to erect itself off the shore in Nantucket Sound. The Cape Wind project intends to build a series of wind power generators six miles out into the Atlantic.

As the days pass, though, that outcome seems ever more unlikely. In what the rest of the country sees as a major case of NIMBY (Not In My Back Yard) anger, many people have come out against the project. Specifically, there's Gov. Romney, Sen. Kennedy, Robert Kennedy Jr., a whole mess of people in Congress and more than a few residents along the Cape.

The shenanigans of Congress have been particularly shameful. Romney can't veto the wind project because it is in federal waters, but Congress is too spineless to actually take a stand. In a truly bizarre move, they have added a provision to a bill to specifically grant Romney the power to block the project.

Anyway, not unlike a canal snaking across the desert, this wind farm needs to be built. It is not the be-all, end-all solution, but it is a start. Like that canal, there are environmental issues to contend with, which must be balanced with public need.

The shenanigans of Congress have been particularly shameful. Romney can't veto the wind project because it is in federal waters, but Congress is too spineless to actually take a stand.

I definitely count myself as a friend of the environment. I recycle like crazy and I've been riding public buses since I left high school. Heck, I even drive a scooter instead of a car, and yet, I also support the wind farm, nuclear power and giant canals. Part of helping the environment means finding that delicate compromise between human activity and preservation.

Quietly waiting for that magic solution that solves the problem with no impact on the environment and zero pollution is waiting for something that will never occur. Rational environmentalists, like the good granola-loving people from the Sierra Club, recognize this. They also support the wind farm.

Even the cofounder of Greenpeace, Patrick Moore, is touting the benefits of nuclear power. I'm sure he hasn't forgotten about the potential pitfalls of such a power source, but when the problem becomes pressing it's time for compromise.

It would be grand if we could extract all of our power from the sun, but we can't. We also can't keep using coal, gas and oil. We must all recognize the need to act now. The future may show that a particular solution didn't work out very well, but at least history will show that we made an attempt.

UMass Idol vs. American Idol

Rebecca Paskievich

Oddly enough, I sing everywhere "but" the shower. When I say sing it's not just a light serenading; I belt out songs. I even do the Mariah/Christina hand motion (up and down seizure-like finger twitching included). I sing in my dorm room, while running, on my way to class, in the dining halls and my favorite: in my car. A few weeks ago, at the Taste of UMass, I added another spot to my list: the Mullins Center.

When my friends saw the advertisement for UMass Idol they encouraged me to sign up. The next thing I knew, I was standing amongst 15 other University of Massachusetts students, nervously awaiting my time on stage. I have never done anything like this — besides in high school when I got conned by my teammates into singing the pre-game national anthem (which I shakily sang ... from underneath the bleachers).

I was voted "Most Likely to Be a Pop Star" by my high school class. I was in neither the school plays nor the annual Karaoke Night competition, but my teammates knew my affinity to belt out songs on bus rides, my friends knew how I just start up a tune randomly and others saw me out on the weekends when I was less reserved about singing in front of a crowd.

I am generally a self-assured person, but before this performance I was a nervous wreck. Others seemed professional as they hummed to their iPods and did voice exercises. I stumbled in circles, praying I wouldn't forget the words. I didn't think twice about that superlative until I got on stage and was overcome with confidence.

I don't remember the kids who went before I did because my heart was pounding so loud it overpowered their voices. As soon as the DJ called my name, I plastered on a smile and headed up the stairs, careful not to trip. The crowd in front of the stage was a bit intimidating, but added an element of excitement. I spotted my friends as I began to sing "How Do I Live" by LeAnn Rimes. I let loose and began to have fun; I figured, when will I get to do this again anytime soon?

I am absolutely hooked on the real American Idol show. I don't have a particular person I want to win but I do have my favorites. I'm glad that Ace got voted off last week. He thought he was 10 times better looking than he really is (and that he could sing 10 times better than he really can).

Taylor's dancing is getting old; Chris's weekly rock-outs are repetitive; Kelly's lack of singing skills will soon overpower her cutesy personality; Kathryn has a beautiful voice but not much character; and Paris has a spunk that makes her stand out.

Discovering that one contestant, Elliot, is deaf in one ear, has diabetes and a sick mother makes him one of my favorites (besides his amazing vocals). Taylor's dancing is getting old; Chris's weekly rock-outs are repetitive; Kelly's lack of singing skills will soon overpower her cutesy personality; Kathryn has a beautiful voice but not much character; and Paris has a spunk that makes her stand out. It's tough to tell who will be the next American Idol, but the show is entertaining, nonetheless.

I can imagine how much fun the contestants are having, just from my three minutes at UMass Idol. I had a blast and felt like a semi-celebrity; people kept coming up to me saying I sang great. I soaked up those 10 minutes of fame. I kind of kept track of others' scores but soon left, figuring I didn't have a shot at winning.

I got back to Patterson still high from the rush I got from being in front of so many people. I also was kicking myself for things I wish I had done differently during my performance. Then my friend called, asking where the heck I was ... I had won third place. I yelled "What?" and rushed out the door. As I jogged back, it seemed like every other person said, "You won third." I tried to be friendly but knew I looked like a neurotic sprinter in a black lace tank top.

I ended up catching the radio people and got my prize money. I was still bummed out because I would have rather had the glory of getting back on stage. I was excited about winning third because entering was such a spontaneous decision.

The Taste of UMass performance inspired me to try out for Southwest Week Idol. I went to the audition and ended up getting chosen as one of the 10 contenders on May 2. This competition seems more intense, but I'm excited for the challenge.

No matter what your hidden talent is, don't be afraid to be exposed. You may be surprised at how you fare against competition. You're not bound to your hairbrush and mirror forever; break out and show off. I'm not sure if I am "Most Likely to Become a Pop Star" but I am most likely to have an amazing time pretending.

Breaking the silence around Israel

Mike Sances

It is a season of reflection for graduating seniors, a time to catalog both our greatest achievements and our deepest regrets. As to the former, I consider this column a tremendous accomplishment if, after the four semesters I have been writing it, readers have learned absolutely nothing about me personally. The opinion page of a newspaper, in my opinion, is no place for celebrity journalism. This is the public sphere. What matters here is the content of a writer's ideas, not the person espousing them.

It is a principle found seriously wanting in mainstream discussion on Israel and Palestine, a subject that I regret I am only now addressing. My classmates might remember when the issue of the Middle East was a hot issue on these pages, and on our campus. Those times are long gone. My failure — our failure — to address this issue, and to continue the discussion started by former students, has been shameful and pathetic.

When I was a first-year student, there was apparently a serious campaign underway by UMass students to divest, or pull all the University's investments, from Israel in protest of the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. While I do not recall seeing any divestment actions firsthand, the campaign was evidently so well-coordinated that I was visited one day by some canvassers, asking me to sign a counter-divestment petition.

I didn't know much about Israel and Palestine at the time, and my geography was terrible, but there was something about the idea of a tank in a refugee camp that struck me as fundamentally unjust. I debated the canvassers for about 30 seconds before saying goodbye.

As time went on, it was hard not to notice the grim arithmetic. The press does a terrible job covering the conflict, particularly in providing the necessary context and history, but from time to time the number of civilians killed gets a brief footnote. According to B'Tselem, an Israeli human rights group, 3,367 Palestinians were killed by Israeli security forces in the Occupied Territories, 58 in Israel, between 2000 and April 10 of this year. 690 of those killed in the Territories were minors. Over the same period, 456 Israeli civilians were killed by Palestinians in Israel, 233 in the Territories. Palestinians killed 80 Israeli minors in Israel, and 39 in the Territories (btselem.org).

Ratios aside, the blood of the Palestinians is on all our hands. As noted in a recent paper by two political scientists, Steven Walt of Harvard and John Mearsheimer of the University of Chicago, Israel "has been the largest annual recipient of direct economic and military assistance [from the United States] since 1976, and is the largest recipient in total since World War II, to the tune of well over $140 billion (in 2004 dollars)."

The press does a terrible job covering the conflict, particularly in providing the necessary context and history, but from time to time the number of civilians killed gets a brief footnote.

The Walt and Mearsheimer paper has come under fire for its attack on "the Israel lobby" in the United States, whom they accuse of hijacking American foreign policy and perverting "the national interest." Self-described "realists," the two academics see no reason why the benevolent United States would support the brutal Israeli occupation. I humbly recommend they look harder, specifically at the region's vast energy reserves, and the U.S. government's longstanding commitment to crushing independent political movements wherever they arise.

Returning to the facts on the ground, the so-called disengagement from Gaza last fall was anything but. Plans to expand Israeli settlements in the West Bank were announced just as former Prime Minister Ariel Sharon broached the subject of a pull-out. Furthermore, Israel's separation wall extends across the 1967 borders. In July 2004, the International Court of Justice condemned the construction of the wall as illegal, on the grounds that it protects 80 percent of the illegal settlements in the West Bank.

Meanwhile, B'Tselem now refers to the Gaza Strip as "one big prison." In an unpublished opinion piece written in September, scholar Norman Finkelstein writes that, according to a B'Tselem report, "Israel will continue to maintain absolute control over Gaza's land borders, coastline and airspace, and the Israeli army will continue to operate in Gaza."

Israel's continued harassment of Gaza includes the shelling of civilian areas, what B'Tselem in December called the creation of a "death zone," in "a flagrant breach of International Humanitarian Law."

It is important to keep these facts in mind when the international community demands that Hamas, the democratically elected government of the Palestinian people, must "renounce violence" and respect the security of Israel. It is enlightening to think how many times you hear about the security of the Palestinians, or that the Israeli government should renounce violence.

Or think how many times the media have referred to Sharon as a "terrorist" (zero), even though an Israeli government investigation deemed him "personally responsible" for the massacres at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in Lebanon in 1982. The BBC commemorated the twentieth anniversary of the massacres in 2002, describing them as a "three-day orgy of rape and slaughter that left hundreds, possibly thousands, of innocent civilians dead in what is considered the bloodiest single incident of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

We are approaching the 40th anniversary of the occupation, and the future looks even bleaker than the past. It is past time for UMass students to stop thinking only about themselves, and to start engaging with issues that have nothing to do with economic self-interest, but everything to do with moral culpability. If we do not, the future of our own society is in doubt, while the annihilation of the Palestinians is all but assured.

'If only reality were so rosy'

Andrew Freeman

Two weeks ago, the UMass Republican Club unveiled their social welfare program. Their April 13 rally praised the organization they believed could best serve America's citizens: Wal-Mart. I was part of the crowd that gathered to listen to their presentation.

Several points were made in defense of the company. First, Wal-Mart, by providing goods at cheap prices, saves students money. Secondly, it donated more than $200 million to charity last year, including millions of dollars for Hurricane Katrina relief efforts. Ed Cutting, a graduate student and candidate for student trustee, decried the "trust-fund liberals" of Amherst, who made sure that poor people subsidize the rich.

This argument was particularly ironic given that the Walton family, owners of Wal-Mart, is the richest family in the world. One of the final speakers called the founder of Wal-Mart (Sam Walton) a patriot, and suggested that our school's mascot be named Sam Walton the Minuteman in his honor.

Many of the people that I talked to at the rally were incredulous that UMass students would rally in support of Wal-Mart. A large group of students protested the event, and their heckling forced the speakers to yell over the tumult. To those of us who oppose Wal-Mart, the idea that anyone would want to defend it seems extraordinary.

In many ways, Wal-Mart violates the ideals that Republicans claim to stand for. The company is a scourge of rural America, destroying small businesses that cannot compete with it. It breaks immigration law, paying an $11 million settlement to the government last year to settle charges that its cleaning crews were knowingly staffed by illegal immigrants, according to CBS News. If Wal-Mart were a country, it would be China's eighth largest trading partner, according to Newsweek, as its drive to lower costs pushes it to do business with Chinese suppliers.

One of the final speakers called the founder of Wal-Mart (Sam Walton) a patriot, and suggested that our school's mascot be named Sam Walton the Minuteman in his honor.

So why did the Republican club hold the rally? Was it just an expression in favor of "consumer choice," as the organizers claimed? Was this just an effort to counter liberal groups on campus? I believe the reason is that Wal-Mart represents the economic program of the Republican Party.

Wal-Mart is the foremost symbol of the free market, its excesses and faults, as well as its promises. The company offers us a wide range of goods, the convenience of finding nearly everything in one store and, most importantly, it provides goods at low prices. This last point is what supporters of the business focus on.

To keep prices down and profits up, Wal-Mart engages in brazen and often illegal practices, from hiring illegal immigrants to firing workers that try to organize a union. Workers are exploited in all ways, from having to work through breaks to being locked in at night. As a result of all its misdeeds, Wal-Mart is sued more than any institution in this country except the federal government.

Wal-Mart, by virtue of its size and the success of its business model, exercises a huge influence on the economy. Specifically, it pushes down the prices of products, but it also pushes down wages. Businesses, whether they compete with the retailer or do business with it, are compelled to reduce salaries or move overseas so that they can match Wal-Mart's standards.

Wal-Mart and its supporters insist that the company makes the country a better place by providing consumers with low-priced products. This increases the purchasing power of citizens, and improves their standards of living. Throw in tax cuts, and you have the conservative vision of America: with no hindrance from the government, corporations make us wealthier and happier.

If only reality were so rosy. Wages for many people have not risen: according to the Economic Policy Institute, real earnings for service and blue collar workers had not increased by 2005, despite four years of economic recovery. We could say that these people benefit from Wal-Mart's low prices, but it sells mostly consumer products: it doesn't sell cars, housing or health insurance. Wal-Mart, both directly and indirectly, pushes wages down while not affecting the price of the most expensive goods.

Wal-Mart is not a model company, and no amount of public relations will change that. The company's strategy has been to wrap itself in the American flag, to make charitable donations and then loudly proclaim them and to seek political allies. In 2004, it distributed over $1 million in political contributions, with 85 percent of the funds going to the Republican Party, unsurprisingly. Wal-Mart has proven adept at defending itself — it hardly needs the support of UMass students. If anything, we ought to be opposing it.

What it's like not getting any chicks

Michael Toomey

The average 18-year-old male existence is inherently disappointing. Even considering the wide range of culture, social class and sub-groupings, being at the cusp of manhood rarely joins hands with fulfillment. Despite our divisive mockery of other types of boys, we tend to be united by several universal truths.

First and foremost is our preoccupation with the opposite sex, which influences strange behaviors seemingly counterproductive to the generalized goal of having intimate (personal, romantic, sexual) interaction with an unspecified member of the opposite sex. These aforementioned practices are connected by a focus/concentration on another male, intended to send a message to surrounding females.

Examples of this include, but are not limited to: wrestling and tomfoolery, public putdowns of male competition, variations of posturing (affecting a swagger, a stoic scowl, becoming muscular to intimidate other males) and using sports players to convey their desired masculinity. As it stands, this is probably somewhat ingrained in the biology of human men, but ultimately gets in the way of getting what we so desire. The glaring flaw in this odd mechanism is it operates on male conceptions of masculinity, when a more effective approach would be to model our behavior in accordance with female views.

Unfortunately for the young dude, this ineffectual mode of relating to girls is not the only obstacle keeping us away from them. Most young men are still majorly dependent on their parents for financial support, housing and general care. Even the college student is usually attending an institution because of his parents' funding.

Why am I specifically referencing young males as being economically unstable when, logically, this plight would apply to all young people? Due largely to longstanding social norms (probably biologically based at some level), there are widely accepted roles that come into play in male/female interaction. Where women are domestically oriented, men tend to be provisionally oriented.

Consequently, these roles are vitally important when taking a look at how the two sexes mingle. Girls in their late teens are able to more successfully play their role by dating older guys, who have more security and more potential to provide for them. Men of the same age find many peers of the opposite sex scooped away by guys who drive cars and legally buy beer. We usually have little ability to become more provisional until we take the necessary life steps.

Certainly a good number of 18-year-old boys have cars and or steady jobs, but very few of them can offer more than an awkward tryst in a room plastered with Jenna Jameson and Mustang posters, with his parents watching "America's Funniest Videos" in the next room. Oddly enough, there aren't many girls to whom this is the ideal setting for romance.

Certainly a good number of 18-year-old boys have cars and or steady jobs, but very few of them can offer more than an awkward tryst in a room plastered with Jenna Jameson and Mustang posters, with his parents watching "America's Funniest Videos" in the next room.

While I would blame the mentioned topics on most of the deprivation of the young dude, there is another key factor that makes it near impossible for us to score. A huge social issue that ties into this epidemic dry spell is the construction of a male versus female identity. I acknowledge that all cultures have their own way of doing this, but in taking the perspective of an "Americanized" world (for better or worse), we can generalize the trend based on what's going on here.

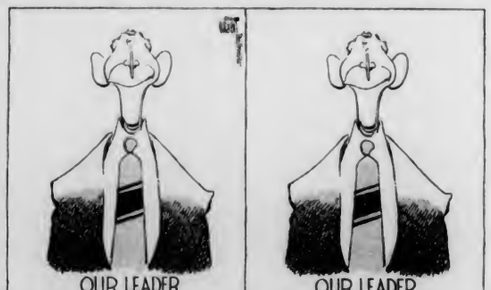
From birth, when no physical distinction between sexes can be made, the role of gender begins. You are a girl because you're wrapped in a pink blanket or a boy because you're bundled up blue. Our society dictates (through tradition) that until a distinction can be made, we'll have to make one. People often have great fun dressing up their children in all sorts of very odd apparel, and the end result is most often adorable, but rarely will a parent ignore the importance of imposing a packaged sexual identity.

A boy might have a dopey shirt with a train on it while a girl's shirt would have a caricatured dew-eyed puppy. I could go into detail about the gradual succession of gender stereotypes, but there's really little need. The point is symbolized by the shirts. A train represents man's dominance over nature, an immensely powerful machine that conquers the land and gets things done with exactness and speed.

Men are to be powerful, dominant and we could say harsh. On the other side, the puppy is demure, dependent, warm, vulnerable and endearing. From this, girls learn to identify themselves as delicate purveyors of love and caring, needy of your support, protection and heart. I'm not questioning the ramifications of this, but merely noting its universality in today's world.

Very rarely do we learn to behave as our impulse dictates, but rather to what normal dictates. To use the cliché of the boy and the Barbie, the majority of boys are informed that a Barbie is a girl's toy, and that a sword would be much more suiting to him.

Now what does this all have to do with late adolescents having difficulty with the opposite sex? The pertinence is that from each respective perspective, the other side is distinctly different, almost alien to our ways of relating. Most of our platonic friends are of the same sex because we have a similar set of values we can understand and project. Our culture has made us grow apart from each other, which is why it's so difficult to come back together.



Cosmopolitan suggests tips on "How to Snag Any Man You Want," while Maxim magazine gives the requisite info on how to "Conquer Her Sex Fears." When the gestalt of both articles is "Help — We don't have a clue what's going on," the editors of these popular magazines should reconcile and create a publication that gives pointers on how to relate to people as people.

However, this is not going to happen anytime soon, which leads me to heap some blame on Cosmopolitan for perpetuating the male to female foreignness that makes it hard for anyone to get together, let alone the already troubled teenaged boy.

But really, is it so bad? Is being 18 and spending each weekend venting latent sexuality by playing frenetic games of air hockey with your equally frustrated buddy a bad experience? Would I trade my hard-fought, nail-biting victories to sit at Friday's with a pretty girl discussing her spilled Frappacino at the mall today over a basket of onion rings?

The short answer is "hell no." Although, I wouldn't mind falling in love with a girl who gave me stiff competition at the air hockey table or was an attractive fan of my impassioned playing. I'm fairly comfortable in doing my thing. I'd like to think if we all followed our hearts and ourselves, we'd find each other a little more smoothly.

Innocent man in Bulgarian jail

Tyler Ingham

By now we have all heard about Jill Carroll and her wrongful captivity; however, how many of you have heard the name Michael Shields? My guess is somewhere between zero and two. Like Carroll, Shields is being held in a foreign land against his will. The kicker here is that he is being imprisoned for a crime he did not commit. Unlike Carroll, Shields wasn't just simply captured in the night as a political prisoner, but rather, he fell victim to being in the wrong place at the wrong time.

Shields was staying in a Bulgarian hostel after just traveling to Istanbul, Turkey to lay witness to Liverpool F.C. performing one of the greatest comebacks in sports history against A.C. Milan. Liverpool had been trailing 3-0 at the half, only to draw level in the 66th minute and go on to win the match in a penalty shootout. It was the high point of his life, but little did he know that it was about to turn into a nightmare.

On May 30, 2005 Shields was arrested in connection to the attempted murder of Martin Georgiev, a local bartender. Georgiev had been assaulted behind the bar the previous evening with a paving slab. Shields was forced to don a blank white shirt that resembled what the assailant had worn the previous night and go into a line-up. The problem was that Shields did not even bring a white shirt matching the description with him on his holiday.

Here he was pointed out by locals as the man who attacked Georgiev. The only problem is, the man who did commit the crime and stood in the same line-up as Shields lied about his whereabouts the previous evening.

Despite resounding evidence from Shields' friends, who had accompanied him on the trip, that he was sleeping soundly in his bed the night the attack took place, the Bulgarian court went ahead and arraigned him. On June 1 Graham Sankey, a fellow Liverpool native, flew home and was overheard saying that he "had won the lottery."

They are afraid that if they let Shields go, that it will make their Courts look weak in the eyes of the world and their own citizens.

Fast forward to July 6. Shields says that he knows who committed the crime, yet refuses to divulge Sankey's name to Bulgarian authorities.

On July 21 Shields' trial began, and two days into the trial Sankey admits to committing the offense; however, he refuses to travel to Bulgaria. The judge, unfazed by this new evidence, ruled it inadmissible, citing that they already have the real suspect in custody.

The trial lasted less than five days, and Shields was sentenced to 15 years in prison. Overcome with grief, Sankey sent a signed confession of his crime to the Bulgarian Courts. The courts announced they had no interest in hearing Mr. Sankey's testimony.

Despite numerous appeals, Shields is still sitting in his cell as we speak for a crime that he did not have any involvement with. The Bulgarian Courts have made it resoundingly clear that they don't care that he did not commit the crime, so long as someone pays the price for it. They are afraid that if they let Shields go, that it will make their Courts look weak in the eyes of the world and their own citizens.

Also, Graham Sankey has come forward once again, this time retracting his previous confession. Why, you ask? He was going to be banned from attending football matches in Liverpool. He would rather let an innocent man stay in jail for 15 years than not be able to attend a derby clash between Liverpool and Everton.

All Shields has left is his final appeal, which was submitted March 21. In this appeal, no new evidence can be brought to light. It firmly rests on whether or not the procedure of the first trial was flawed in some way, and then the Supreme Court can order a retrial. Now all he has left is to wait for the Court's response. If this appeal is rejected, he will be forced to spend the next 15 years, the prime of his life, behind bars for something he had no part in.

Thus, I implore all of you to do whatever you can to help Michael Shields and his family during these tough times. If you can, make a donation to help pay for the growing legal bills that are accumulating due to the countless appeals, or write to the Bulgarian Supreme Court urging them to release Shields.

If you cannot do either of those, just simply pray for him and his family, and keep them in your thoughts. The very fact that Shields is still behind bars shows the lack of ethics in our world today. An innocent man can be sentenced for 15 years in prison while the criminals are allowed to walk freely amongst us.

Whenever we speak of wrongdoings such as these, we think of underdeveloped nations and those riddled with war and poverty, but never fully developed European countries. Just remember Shields when you're part of the Kop "You'll Never Walk Alone."

Argentina in a nutshell

World Perspectives
Asif Khan

It's always hard leaving places and people, especially people you became really good friends with and places you grew to love immensely and had great experiences in. With the amount of travel and moving around I do, I find myself saying a lot of goodbyes to a lot of people and cities. It's hard, but one gets used to it and starts looking forward to the next experience and what life has in store in the future.

As my last two weeks in Buenos Aires, Argentina start, I find it will be quite hard to leave this city, too. I came here confused, looking for direction and a new start, and this city gave me all of that and more. I made a lot of good friends, too, and we definitely lived life here like the Portenos do (Porteno being the name for a Buenos Aires native). The best thing I learned after living here is passion for life and how to live it to its fullest with the least amount of regrets.

Argentina has had more than its share of ups and downs. Soon after the Spaniards arrived, the colony started having problems with the crown in Spain and became the rebel South American colony. It was one of the first to break off from the crown and establish its independence. It became an immensely proud and hardworking nation, establishing itself as one of the richest countries in the world because of its superior meat and agricultural products.

During the 20th century, Argentina produced many icons like Ernesto "Che" Guevara, Evita Peron, Carlos Gardel (one of the pioneers of tango), soccer superstar Diego Maradona and many others.

In the 1970s, the Guerra Sucia (or Dirty War) started between the ruling military and leftists and other opponents of the brutal regime. Between 10,000 to 30,000 people "disappeared" and are yet to be found. Until this day, one can see "missing" posters of these people, and for three decades, people have marched every Thursday outside Plaza de Mayo in Buenos Aires. After the 1980s, the country went back to civilian rule and started to pick up the pieces. The recovered pretty well, until 2001, when the economy crashed and many people lost all that they had in terms of property, savings and jobs.

The Argentinian peso, which used to be equal to a U.S. dollar, went down massively and today stands at three pesos to a dollar. This makes prices really afford able for travelers and Argentina a very attractive tourist destination, which has contributed in the recovery of the Argentine economy.

Today, walking around here you notice this amazing pride coupled with humbleness and sensitivity in Argentines. They all love to dress well and stylishly, with poodles and Chihuahas.

They never stop for pedestrians, which is very hard to get used to after having lived in Massachusetts for three years. They make the best steak in the world and carry off the usually horrid mullet pretty well. They also have their own pronunciations and have made Spanish even sexier by substituting the "y" sound in "yo" with a "j" sound, which also replaces the "ll" in paella and calle. You will have to hear it to understand it.

Football (soccer for Americans) is an obsession here like none other. When the two biggest rival teams, La Boca and River Plate, play, the whole country stops. When one of them wins, the festivities make the Yankee-Red Sox competition pale in comparison.

The cultural diversity and tolerance I have witnessed here has also been wonderful. There are obviously a lot of beautiful cathedrals and churches, as it is a majority Catholic country. But there are also Jewish temples and some beautiful mosques. There are barrios, or neighborhoods, of Armenians, Chinese, Koreans, Lebanese and Bolivians with authentic food and other products from those countries.

This plays into politics, as well, aside from electing a woman, Isabel Peron, as president, Argentina has also elected a Muslim as its head of state in the past. Many Jews are also active in politics. Gay marriage is legal here and homosexual people enjoy a pretty good amount of social and political freedom.

This was just a brief insight into this amazing country that has so much to offer and has been through so much. I could not have made a better choice of country to learn Spanish in. The icing on the cake is that I have the Argentine accent now in Spanish, which is the most dramatic and arguably also the sexiest.

Battle of the Sexes: the war continues on the UMass campus

Lovers Only

Hannah Drake

As Rob and I continue the battle for the truth about college dating, this week we've decided to criticize our own sexes. After all, it's easy to complain about the other sex. But that never got anything accomplished.

She says:

Okay girls, I'm going to have to say that the Ugg boots fashion trend just makes me say, "ugh." I specially with a miniskirt. What, were you not sure if it was going to be warm or cold out, so it somehow made sense to mix warm and cold weather clothing? Do you think your feet look sexy ten sizes bigger than they are? Other things: Big sunglasses are cute, but so are leather pants. And only rockstars can wear leather pants, just like only celebrities can wear big sunglasses that make them look like bugs.

Now on to the "everyone-dye-your-hair-blonde" trend. Girls, guys like all different types of girls — yes, blondes are immediately seen as more sexy, but I think that's because most playboy models and porn stars are blonde. If you want a guy to take you more seriously than as a possible fling, it's better to enhance your natural beauty as much as possible. Highlights are fine and all the rest of it, but don't go with the trends just because it's a trend. Then again, if you feel like you're a blonde trapped with brunette genes, I suppose bleaching your hair out would be a good idea because it's a reflection of your true self.

As far as how we tend to act in relationships, here's some (rather controversial) advice. First I'll talk about the major decision: to have sex, or not to have sex? I don't think it will do anyone any good to hold out if you think it's more likely to get the guy into a relationship with you. To paraphrase the writers of "Sex and the City," a guy can just as easily stop talking to you after the first date as after the tenth. Us girls may be able to fake orgasms, but guys can fake whole relationships. Have sex when you're ready, and if you don't want to, don't. Grab your clothes and walk out of the room if he's not hearing you say no. It's your body.

Also, the whole, "what's wrong?" "Nothing" game is childish. If you're upset with your guy, and he cares enough to ask what's wrong, tell him. If he doesn't like the answer, that's his problem — he asked. If you don't want to talk about it just then, simply say that.

He says:

While it would be great from my standpoint to hear Hannah continue to rip on the female species, there are issues with guys and how we act. Not to say that I am not guilty of some of these things, but to avoid being labeled as a hypocrite, just realize that these are just my observations.

The thing that sets me off the most is the new fad of the "John Gotti" hair cut. You know the one, where it looks like a jet engine has taken off of the guys chin? Maybe one of two kids who are real Italians in your crew can pull it off, but when I see whole bars full of these ridiculous looking kids, I realize that my odds to get a girl have just increased. And your friend — the pale white, full of freckles, redheaded afro kid — please get him to stop attempting the Gotti look.

Next in line; I still see it everyday: the pink collared shirt. Guys, apparently our masculinity has finally left and we are all just a bunch of estrogen-filled pretty boys. Have we really gotten away from the primal color system where blue was for boys and pink was for girls? If pink ribbons in your John Gotti hair became the new fad, would you follow that too?

And along those same lines, why do you pop the collar on your pink polo; or any polo for that matter? It's getting to be near summertime so your neck can't be that cold, and if it is, you might as well wear a scarf since that's not nearly as emasculating as the pink polo you've got on.

The next topic might be a little touchy. As a guy, I've lied and I will lie in the future. Look guys, I'm not saying you have to stop lying to girls, what I'm suggesting is that when you're caught in the lie by the girl, give it up. Concede the victory to the girl and realize that your lie was just not good enough. If you don't know by now, if a girl knows something, she knows it, no matter what you try to say to tap dance your way out of it. So go ahead and create that initial lie if you have to, but from there, just realize you're playing the odds and if the girl wins, game over.

The final thing that's worth noting: guys, when you're out trying to pick up a girl at a bar or party, realize when she's shooting you down. More often then not, there's often a fictitious line waiting for each girl and each guy is just waiting for his opportunity to cut the line and hit on her. When you're an hour into "talking to her" and she doesn't really care, get out of the way so the rest of us can have our shot. It's only fair, dude; go change into a non-pink shirt, put the collar down, put a hat on — your odds will increase.

So there you have it. And I know many guys will agree with what I wrote, and that as a girl, I definitely agree with what Rob wrote. The bottom line is, everyone needs to stop trying to be someone or something they're not. And once again, guys should give up lying, because quite frankly, most of you aren't that good at it.

Bruce Springsteen has a new CD and a whole new sound

By DAVID HINCKLEY
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

ASBURY PARK, N.J.— A few dozen yards from the deserted Asbury Park boardwalk, where a cold April wind is fighting a warm April sun, Bruce Springsteen steps to the microphone inside an empty Convention Hall and blasts into "This Hard Land," a classic Springsteen tale of desolation meeting defiance.

"Hey there mister
Can you tell me what happened
To the seeds I've sown ..."

"This Hard Land" isn't a new song. It was bumped off his 1984 "Born in the USA" album and spent a decade on bootlegs before he released it in 1995.

Whatever its history, the song has never sounded like this.

The opening has a country lilt, reinforced when the banjo, fiddles and pedal steel kick in. But it's not exactly a country song. It's more like something out of a Saturday night dance party.

"Once the solos start," he tells the band near the end, "we gotta give it up to the rhythm."

His band can do that, even though it's very different from his E Street Band. This is a 17-piece outfit full of strings and horns. It does include familiar faces like Soozie Tyrell and Springsteen's wife, Patti Scialfa, who also play a big role in working out the vocal harmonies.

Its musical mission is country, folk, gospel, bluegrass, activist anthems, New Orleans jazz, old-style ballads, a touch of blues and whatever else peeks in. After rehearsal and between a few bites of takeout, Springsteen says it's basically "all the beats and styles I don't use with E Street, which is my rock band."

He's doing this now, some suggest, because he has to.

"Bruce makes records that reflect the time in America in which he makes them," says Meg Griffin, a longtime NYC radio host now at Sirius Satellite. "An artist who does not travel new roads experiences creative death, and like all the great ones from Van Gogh to Hendrix, Bruce has the courage to explore his soul."

He also does it because he can.

"I have no rules left," says Springsteen, matter of factly. "I don't have to get on the radio. It's wide open for me. The singer-songwriters I admire — Dylan, Neil Young, Woody Guthrie — move forward all the time."

As does he — a rocker who stepped away for 1982's dark and brilliant "Nebraska," 1995's stark "Ghost of Tom Joad" and 2005's pensive "Devils & Dust."

This time it's "We Shall Overcome: The Seeger Sessions," which features 13 songs recorded by, among many others, Pete Seeger.

Some are well-known, like the spiritual "Oh Mary Don't You Weep" and the folk ballad "John Henry," but Springsteen says familiarity wasn't his criterion.

"I looked for characters I knew," he says. "I'd say, OK, in 'Erie Canal,' I know that guy. I know this guy. I heard 'Oh Mary' and I thought, I wrote like that in 'Promised Land.'"

Several songs have spiritual themes, he notes, "and I've written a lot of religious music."

In the folk tradition, he also added touches of his own to traditional songs. The merchant seaman's lament "Pay Me My Money Down" is now a wild workout that includes the line:

"I wish that I was Mr. Gates
They'd haul my money in in crates ..."

So "The Seeger Sessions" is no exercise in musicology. It's personal. "It returns me to some of the music I was doing when I started recording," he says. "My second album had an accordion, a tuba, jazz sounds, circus sounds. When we streamlined E Street into more of a rock band, we did less of that. So it's an area I like getting back to."

He's also taking it on the road, with rehearsal shows through Wednesday at Convention Hall, then three weeks in Europe. Back home, he starts in Boston on May 27.

"This show is going to be fun," he says, because the record was already fun. "We did it in three days, all live, no overdubs."

That's a big step for a notorious perfectionist.

"The sense of raggedness in this music is important," says Springsteen. "You want to keep the raunchiness of the characters, because they were raunchy. They lived in a raunchy time.

"Part of this music is the wide elbow room you feel inside it. I sometimes tell the band, 'If this gets any better, it'll be worse.'"

Another part of his mission now is figuring out which of his own songs fit the tour's rhythm.

"Cadillac Ranch" requires little reworking, but "Open All Night" has become a foot-stomper and "Johnny 99" is now a funk number. Then there's "Adam Raised a Cain."

"It's bluegrass, like from 40 years ago," says Springsteen. "Those guys loved biblical and religious imagery, and they could easily have done 'Adam.'"

The broader challenge, he says, is that "unlike E Street, this band has no previous material. My 30 years of previous songs, we're not playing any of that. I have this long-standing arsenal and all of it is gone."

He laughs. He likes this. Not all of his fans agree.

"I just have no interest," says Mark Ashkinos, a fan since the '70s. "I'm a rocker. When he rocks with 'Where the Bands Are' or 'Mary's Place,' I'll pay attention again."

Springsteen says he will be back — at some point.

"I love playing with E Street," he says. "I always will. I have a bookful of new songs sitting there to play with E Street."

But not yet. "I have a very good and really sizable core audience that's adventurous," he says. "It's not as large as the audience with E Street, but it's a good size and I'm interested in taking them on an adventure."

In Europe, that's a go: Fans snapped up every ticket in minutes. Back home, there may be some hesitation, as this week's Asbury Park shows were not his usual instant sellouts.

He seems confident word will soon get out that these shows are just a plain good old time.

"There will be no seats on the floor," he says. "It's rowdy music. I'm hoping my rock fans will respond to that part."

Vanderslice rides over to the Iron Horse

By NICK RALSTON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Almost any self-proclaimed fan of indie music is familiar with John Vanderslice in some way; they just might not know it. Not only has Vanderslice been releasing albums at an exhausting pace — five since the year 2000 — he runs his own recording studio, Tiny Telephone, in California. With his studio and his production work, Vanderslice has kindly brought indie music fans amazing records from Okkervil River, Spoon and the commercial breakthrough of the collective Death Cab For Cutie. And while these bands have been rapidly becoming everything from critical favorites, cult heroes, and, in the case of the latter, major-label, prime-time superstars, Vanderslice has been content to toil away with main collaborator Scott Solter making some of the best records in recent memory.

Of course Vanderslice has seen his share of success; his latest release, 2005's "Pixel Revolt" was ranked on many a year-end best-of list and he's found himself touring the world as an opener to bigger acts and a headliner of intimate clubs. His latest tour will take him and his band to the Iron Horse in Northampton. While Vanderslice is known for his studio wizardry — any fans of the bands he has worked with are surely aware of trademark Vanderslice tricks and styles — he still very much shines in a live setting. While his band has keyboards and Moogs as part of their set-up, Vanderslice has always been an analog advocate and, as such, his songs thrive even when reduced to a relatively traditional live rock set up.

Using the dreamy soundscapes and often-simple, always-effective chord progressions that characterize bands like Death Cab, Vanderslice builds upon a formula that he helped to create by keeping things fresh and original. And while many of his indie counterparts stick with fairly straightforward boy-meets-girl, boy-gets-heart-broken lyrics, Vanderslice draws not only from his personal life but from friends, family, movies and current events. "Pixel Revolt," in particular, finds Vanderslice confronting issues, most notably 9/11 and the war in Iraq, head on with a unique, storyteller's flair.

Vanderslice's performance at the Iron Horse tonight is the perfect chance to catch one of the more exciting songwriters around in a small club setting, and is an opportunity not to be missed.

John Vanderslice will be performing tonight at the Iron Horse.

Hernandez spills sexist views

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

My first thought upon hearing Keith Hernandez was in trouble was that he was doing drugs again.

OK, that was a cheap shot. It's been two decades since the former All-Star first baseman came clean about his cocaine use, and there is no evidence he's been smoking anything lately.

Still, there has got to be something to explain what came out of his mouth Saturday night in San Diego.

Apparently "Just For Men" isn't just a hair dye that Hernandez endorses. It's his way of looking at life.

You know, the stuff made by men just for men?

It turns out that Hernandez is a real believer.

In case you missed it, Hernandez was helping broadcast a Mets-Padres game when he tried to turn the gender equity clock back to the days when he was paid to play rather than talk.

The object of his ire: a 33-year-old woman who makes her living as a member of the Padres' training staff.

Kelly Calabrese, San Diego's full-time massage therapist, caught the attention of Hernandez when she high-fived Mike Piazza after he hit a home run. But it wasn't Calabrese slapping hands with Piazza that offended Hernandez the most.

It was that she dared enter some sacred male-only zone.

"Who is the girl in the dugout, with the long hair?" Hernandez said. "What's going on here? You have got to be kidding me. Only player personnel in the dugout."

Hernandez should have stopped there. But there was more.

"I won't say that women belong in the kitchen, but they don't belong in the dugout," he said.

And that last one came after he found out that she's Padres player personnel, after all.

Nice, Keith.

Twenty years past your prime, 20 years behind the times.

Sure, you probably already knew that women have the right to vote, and may have even seen some drive their own cars to games. But did you know that they can be doctors, CEOs and, yes, even get involved in baseball?

There's even one who is a senator from New York and is an early favorite to run for president.

But enough about them. You've apparently always had a way with women.

After all, didn't you once date Elaine on an episode of "Seinfeld?"

"You know I am only teasing. I love you gals out there — always have," Hernandez said by way of addendum to the kitchen comment, chuckling as he inserted his foot even deeper into his mouth.

Across New York City, old guard male chauvinists had to be cheering. They probably hadn't heard stuff this good on television since Archie Bunker lived with Edith in Queens.

The sad thing is that, like Hernandez, they don't realize that this is 2006, not 1986. Like Hernandez, they don't understand that there are roles for women in sports beyond the ones played by the blondes who hang out in the players' parking lot.

Men aren't the only ones who want to be involved in sports anymore, just like women aren't the only ones who dye their hair anymore. Since the Mets won the World Series 20 years ago, an entire new generation of women have grown up watching, playing and even running games.

Women are being paid to play basketball, and women are acting as role models for young soccer players. There are aspiring women umpires, a woman who is the assistant general manager of the Los Angeles Dodgers, and even women in the broadcast booth.

The fact that there is a woman in the Padres' dugout shouldn't be a shocker. Thousands, perhaps millions, of young girls occupy dugouts while playing softball, and some even share them with boys while playing Little League baseball.

If Hernandez had opened his eyes he might have noticed some of them. Then maybe he wouldn't have been caught so off guard when he saw a woman standing amid the soggy sunflower shells that litter every major league dugout.

Former baseball player Keith Hernandez revealed his sexist views in a broadcast of a San Diego Padres game.

Padres manager Bruce Bochy is in that dugout almost every day. Unlike Hernandez in the broadcast booth up above, he gets it.

"I didn't think gender was even an issue anymore," Bochy said.

To her credit, Calabrese didn't just shrug it off as a boys-will-be-boys moment. That would have been the easy way out, but this called for some outrage.

"It amazes me that somebody of that caliber that has obviously played the game before and is in front of an audience of millions of people would say something like that," she said. "He not only discredited me as a person, but he discredited women."

Hernandez said later he was sorry if he offended anyone, and the network that employs him, SportsNet New York, said he had been reprimanded.

It was a token slap on the wrist, but Hernandez is probably being punished enough. He's the one, after all, who comes out of this looking like a sexist moron.

Hernandez may have a tough time hanging onto that "Just For Men" endorsement.

That's because real men don't act like that anymore.

Duke lax scandal shows ugly side of revered university

ers come in all shapes and sizes. Education and economic status don't necessarily provide a proper prediction for social behavior. This rape scandal — which occurred at one of the most revered universities in the United States — validates that.

Duke's shiny reputation was a façade — one that has been ruthlessly shattered. The media has built Duke's reputation into the be-all and end-all of universities. Not only does it require a lofty grade point average to attend, it also has a high-profile basketball team that annually contends for the national title.

However, Duke is just like anywhere else: There are bright, dumb, arrogant, humble, affable and disruptive people all mashed together — some behave and some don't.

Finnerty had his problems. He was arrested with two high-school classmates last November for beating up some recent college graduates, according to the Newsweek report. Finnerty and his two counterparts reportedly harassed their victims, calling them "gay."

He seems to be a troubled individual. But on paper, Finnerty probably looked like the ideal citizen.

He probably had a solid GPA. His neighbors and teachers maintain that Finnerty and Seligmann are "exemplary young men," according to the Newsweek report.

When the Duke admissions board looked over Finnerty's application, all signs probably pointed to letting him in. From what it sounds like, Finnerty suffered from a deep-rooted sense of entitlement and invincibility. It likely stemmed from authority figures (Finnerty's parents are multi-millionaires) and was perpetuated by a lacrosse culture that either allowed or ignored the developing atmosphere within the program.

It doesn't matter what is on paper. A kid could have the best resume in the country, but it doesn't make him/her a good citizen. That is something intangible that is hard to articulate. Duke is a haven for the smart and the rich, and no matter how feverishly parents and faculty deny it, money and smarts don't make for social intelligence and common sense.

The Duke athletic department has some explaining to do. Maybe it didn't know how high the corruption went, or how many hot-shot lacrosse players were involved. But this scandal is a public relations firestorm, and it might be a while before this blows over. Rape allegations and racial slurs won't be attractive to rich alumni and potential Blue Devils.

Let this be a lesson for all of us: to not let the fog of naiveté cloud our vision and lead us away from logic — that A's and credentials never tell the full story, even if you attend Duke University.

Durham on damage control after scandal

By Tim Whitmire
Associated Press

DURHAM, N.C. — Wherever reporters gather to cover the Duke rape case, it's a good bet Rosemarie Kitchin is nearby.

In the past two weeks, the director of media relations for the Durham Convention & Visitors Bureau showed up at a prayer service in front of Duke Chapel; on the courthouse steps as defense lawyers criticized the district attorney; and inside the courtroom where a player made his first appearance before a judge.

Celebrated two decades ago for its rundown Southern charm in the Kevin Costner baseball movie "Bull Durham," Durham has been dissected since allegations surfaced last month that members of Duke University's lacrosse team raped a stripper at a party.

Race relations, income levels, economic development, the relationship between Duke and the city — all have been examined in a search for an explanation for the scandal.

It is Kitchin's job to stick up for the Bull City in that debate.

And so she follows the reporters with an armful of bright red portfolios stuffed with promotional material about the city of 200,000. She hands out fliers or a business card, and offers reporters food from local restaurants and caterers.

"We knew we had to be on the street," said Reyn Bowman, president and chief executive of the convention and visitors bureau. "We had to be in touch with the media. Our job was to move quickly, and Rosemarie did that."

Durham has long been regarded in North Carolina as the bad apple of the Triangle, as the cities of Raleigh, Durham and Chapel Hill are known. Raleigh is seen as the clean, if bland, state capital, while Chapel Hill is the bucolic university town. But Durham is viewed as troubled and crime-ridden, a rundown factory and tobacco town with ells. Duke in its midst.

After a black stripper told police she was raped by white members of the Duke lacrosse team at an off-campus party, reporters descended on Durham to cover the case and the later indictment of two players.

Bowman and Kitchin said their aim is not to put a positive spin on the story, but to provide an accurate context for national depictions of their city, which has not gotten this much screen time since "Bull Durham" in 1988.

"When a frenzy hits like this, people are looking for contrasts, so the temptation is to slightly overemphasize the contrasts," Bowman said. "Durham has a bit of an image problem within a 50-mile radius anyway. That often contaminates the national coverage."

Durham officials are frustrated when writers describe Durham's population as poor and black. The city is about 46 percent white and 44 percent black, while the median household income is $41,160, or just under the national average.

The "rundown factory town" image irks as well, given that the county is home to Research Triangle Park, a collection of pharmaceutical companies and other high-technology businesses that include GlaxoSmithKline and IBM.

Kitchin said she was shocked to see a TV story show an under-construction condominium development to illustrate the reporter's point that Durham "has seen better times."

"Is the glass half-empty, or is it half-full?" she said. "He's showing huge renovation projects as though they're slums."

Bowman said a national poll conducted last week for the bureau by the firm Opinion Research Corp. showed little effect on Durham's image from the Duke case.

Asked whether they had seen, read or heard any news about Durham in the past two weeks, 28 percent of those surveyed said yes, and 63 percent said no. Asked whether their image of Durham had changed, 5 percent said it had improved, 6 percent said it had worsened and 64 percent said it was the same.

Bowman and Kitchin said they will continue their longstanding effort to improve Durham's image. For years, their bureau has urged local media outlets to dateline stories about Research Triangle Park from Durham, and to note Duke's location in Durham in stories about the university.

Kitchin's portfolio includes a handout on "25 Common Misperceptions about Durham and the reality behind them." Among the myths the handout mentions: "Race relations in Durham are hostile"; "Durham thinks of itself as the 'red-headed stepchild' of the Triangle"; and "Duke town/gown relationships are poor."

Prior case rehashed after rape allegations

A harassment case against Duke lacrosse player Collin Finnerty was reopened after he was accused of the rape of a stripper at a Duke lacrosse party.

By Heather Greenfield
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A Duke University lacrosse player charged with raping a stripper in North Carolina was ordered Tuesday to stand trial in Washington on an unrelated assault charge from last fall.

The assault charge against Collin Finnerty, 19, could have been dismissed if he completed 25 hours of community service and stayed out of trouble, but a Washington judge decided his arrest in the rape case violated that agreement.

Finnerty and two friends are accused of punching a man after he told them to "stop calling him gay and other derogatory names," according to court documents.

Finnerty remains free pending a July 10 trial in the Washington case. He could get up to six months in jail and a fine of up to $1,000 if convicted of simple assault.

Judge John Bayly also set a 9 p.m. curfew, ordered him to report by phone to court officials every Friday, and required that he stay away from places that sell alcohol.

Finnerty nodded when the judge asked if he understood. A family priest stood a few feet behind him in the courtroom.

"This incident has been grossly mischaracterized," said attorney Steven J. McCool, who is representing Finnerty, of Garden City, N.Y., in the Georgetown case. McCool said the media have unfairly portrayed the incident as a hate crime. He did not elaborate.

Finnerty and Duke teammate Reade Seligmann, 20, were indicted on rape and kidnapping charges last week. A 27-year-old stripper who had been hired to perform at a lacrosse team party March 13 told police three men raped her in a bathroom of the off-campus house. District Attorney Mike Nifong has said he expects to charge a third person soon.

Defense attorneys say time-stamped photos, phone records and a taxi driver's testimony show Seligmann could not have been there when the rape is alleged to have occurred.

Nifong said Tuesday he has no plans to present charges in the lacrosse case to the grand jury at his next opportunity, which comes on Monday — the day before he stands for election in the May 2 Democratic primary.

"Even I would think that would look political," said Nifong, who was appointed district attorney last year.

A Gorilla Thrilla'

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Gregg Cannella had already prepared his concession speech.

The life of the 2006 season was flashing before the players' eyes. But no one cared to blink.

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (9-3, 4-2 D.A.C.) was on the verge of losing its second game in four days, trailing 6-4 to Fairfield (5-7, 3-3 D.A.C.) and playing defense with goalie Doc Schneider roaming away from the net.

But following a forced turnover, a miraculous three-goal spurt in 29 seconds and Doc's orderly save with three seconds left, the Minutemen were able to walk off the turf as 7-6 winners yesterday after one of the most improbable finishes that Garber Field had ever seen.

"I believe in our guys, but I wasn't sure that we were going to pull that one out," Cannella admitted.

Junior midfielder Brian Jacovina scored the first goal of UM's late-game comeback. It cut the lead to 6-5 with 1:03 left in regulation.

Fairfield	6

With just 90 seconds left in regulation, defenseman Jack Reid and long-stick midfielder Dan Whipple undressed Greg Downing – Fairfield's leading scorer – of the ball behind the UMass cage.

After Brian Jacovina was awarded a free clear, the UMass junior middie steamed downfield, dodged to the right side and beat Fairfield goalie Michael Kruger with a high shot to trim the margin to 6-5 with 1:03 to play.

"They were shutting off [UMass attackman Sean] Morris so that left the whole right side open, which is great because I'm a righty," Jacovina said. "I just tried to get it on the cage. I didn't have much of an angle, but luckily it snuck in there."

Jake Deane won the ensuing face-off, which was picked up by Jacovina, who led yet another offensive charge into the zone. This time working from the left side, Jacovina circled back towards the middle and found Morris with a pass near the top of the box. Morris ripped off a laser that punctuated the back of the net and tied the game at 6-6 with 50 seconds to play.

For Morris, who still managed to score two goals and pick up an assist, it was one of the very few times he was able to gain any semblance of free space on the afternoon, and he tied the game for the first time since it was knotted at 2 in the second quarter.

"[Jacovina] was making a play to the net, and they doubled him and my guy just totally lost me," Morris said. "I cut up top, and Brian has great vision of the field and was able to hit me. I just put it on the cage. I wasn't trying to hit a corner or anything, and it went in."

Deane got right back to work and won his second consecutive face-off, this time to Reid on the left wing. Reid worked the ball down to Rory Pedrick, who quickly found Deane hanging out by the left post, and Deane dumped the ball over Kruger's head to give UMass its first and only lead of the game at 7-6 with 34 seconds left on the clock.

"I love those situations," Deane said. "Down by two with two minutes left, I live for that kind of stuff. It was a great win for us. It was the most emotional win for me here at UMass."

"He is the pulse of our team," Morris said of Deane, one of three UMass senior captains. "He is the heart and soul of our team, and he deserved that goal. There was nobody else on the team I would rather see score there."

But the Minutemen still weren't done. Pedrick took a pushing penalty 15 seconds later, and the Stags had an opportunity to force overtime. Josh Thornton's shot from straight ahead, however, didn't have enough to beat Schneider with a mere three ticks showing on the scoreboard.

"I saw it pretty cleanly," Schneider said. "It was actually a little bit clustered [in front of the net], but it cleared up and I just made the save."

"I think we learned a lesson about sticking together to the very end and believing in our leaders and believing in the guys who believe in each other," Cannella said. "That is the lesson that you learn: always stick together until the end whether you win or lose. That is what a team is all about."

Lacrosse scandal shows that schools have much to hide

Rob Greenfield

Most Americans envision Duke University as an idyllic and euphoric place. Students get A's and grow up to change the world. Jobs on Wall Street and bottomless bank accounts await the Duke grads.

But wealth doesn't guarantee civility and intellect doesn't always make room for social responsibility. Now it's there for everyone to see.

Last week, two Duke lacrosse players, Reade Seligmann and Collin Finnerty, were indicted and charged with first-degree forcible rape, sexual offense and kidnapping, according to a Newsweek Magazine report published last week entitled, "What happened at Duke?"

The article exposes the behind-the-scenes life of the Duke men's lacrosse team — from strippers to keg parties and racism.

The lacrosse team tore through the first part of its season and was ranked No. 2 in the nation when, on March 13, the team decided to celebrate.

Players called an escort service for strippers; 31-year-old Kim Roberts and the 27-year-old alleged rape victim who, by law, could not be named in the Newsweek report, arrived at the lacrosse captains' apartment just before midnight on March 13.

Newsweek's Susannah Meadows and Evan Thomas reported that, by 12:03 a.m., the party had turned sour after one of the players made an inappropriate comment about sexual toys; at 12:37 a.m., neighbors saw the alleged victim stumbling to her car bleeding from the ankle.

Roberts and the neighbors claim some members of the team hurled racial epithets: "Roberts says that the boys called her a 'n*r.' The neighbors heard one of the boys yell, 'Hey bh, thank your grandpa for my nice cotton shirt,'" Meadows and Thomas reported in Newsweek.

It was also reported that the Duke lacrosse players "have been known to kick in doors and urinate out windows."

There is a lesson to be learned here.

This was just one case of thugs getting caught for egregious violations of moral code and law at a prestigious university. These violations can happen anywhere — no matter how high the IQs are, or what economic and social background students hail from.

UM suffers 7-6 loss at historic Boston ballpark

Late game rally falls short in Beanpot consolation game

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Despite having the bases loaded with no outs in the ninth inning, the Massachusetts baseball team (9-19, 7-8 Atlantic 10) couldn't cap a late-game rally to come from behind and take the Beanpot Tournament consolation game from Northeastern. The Huskies (19-15, 12-6 CAA) held on for a 7-6 victory yesterday at Fenway Park in Boston.

The Minutemen will be back on the diamond today when they take on Boston College in Chestnut Hill. Game time is scheduled for 3 p.m.

UMass entered the bottom of the final inning trailing 7-5. Freshman Jim MacDonald drew a lead off walk to start things. Then Joe Cotone's bloop fly ball to short right field dropped in for a base hit despite the diving effort from Huskies second baseman Brian Nutting.

With men on first and second, junior Travis Munsey stepped to the plate. The leftfielder beat out a bunt that slowly rolled down the third baseline to load the bases with no outs in the inning. That quickly changed after senior Derrick Durepo hit a tailor-made double-play grounder to shortstop that was converted by the Huskies. MacDonald scored on the play to cut the lead to one run, but the Minutemen were down to their final out.

Next to the plate was third baseman Ryan Franczek. The sophomore was already enjoying a successful day at the dish. In his three previous plate appearances he went 2-for-3 with a walk, a stolen base and three runs scored. His laser single down the leftfield line in the third extended his hitting streak to a team-high 11 games.

With Cotone representing the tying run on third base, the stage was set for Franczek to be the hero. After running the count to two balls and one strike, he ripped a line drive to centerfield, but Chris Limanuele was there to make the catch and end the game. The Maroon and White's comeback fell short with the tying run just 90 feet away.

UMass coach Mike Stone commented after the game that the excitement of playing in Fenway Park may have gotten to his team.

"We were a little distracted at the plate early with being here [at Fenway Park]," he said. "We just have to bear down and focus more on winning the ballgame as opposed to playing at Fenway. The team that [settles down] the quickest gets comfortable and usually wins the ballgame."

After two innings, the Huskies were ahead of the Minutemen and starter Mike Dicato, 4-1. The freshman got Josh Porter to ground to second before hitting Jeff Maher with a pitch and allowing back-to-back hits with Arman Sidhu's single and Caleb Ginsberg's double. With one run already in, Alex Fox fouled out for the second out of the inning. Dicato then gave up consecutive walks to Emanuele and Nutting to load the bases.

The No. 3 hitter, Mike Tamsin, was next to the plate. His double to leftfield drove in two, with Nutting trying to make it three from first base. Munsey collected the ball against the Green Monster and fired the throw to the cut-off man Shortstop Lou Proietti then relayed the ball to home plate to gun down Nutting and end the inning.

Northeastern	7

Despite the pressures of his first collegiate start being at Fenway Park, Dicato settled down after the second to keep the Minutemen in the game. In his final 2.2 innings of work, the freshman allowed just one hit and no runs. Afterwards he commented on pitching in a big-league park.

"It was an experience like nothing else," Dicato said. "I think I did alright. I have a lot of room for improvement. I have to throw more strikes the next time out and just take it from there."

The Minutemen tied the score in the fifth when two passed balls and an Adam Tempesta sacrifice fly allowed two runs to cross the plate. Reliever Tom Cote couldn't hold on, however, and the Huskies retook the lead in the seventh and never looked back.

"I think we win the ballgame if we're able to get out of those two innings [the second and seventh]," Stone said. "Unfortunately, we didn't put ourselves in the position to win the ballgame."

Franczek extends hitting streak to 11 games

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Fenway Park has seen its share of hitting streaks in its history. And now, UMass third baseman Ryan Franczek can add his name to the list of players who have continued their great hitting in front of the Green Monster.

The sophomore extended his hitting streak to a career-high 11 games yesterday afternoon in a 7-6 loss to Northeastern in the consolation game of the 17th annual Beanpot Tournament at Fenway Park. Franczek ripped a line drive up the middle in the bottom of the third inning to record a one-out single, which extended his hit streak to 11 consecutive games.

Franczek added the spark to UMass's offense yesterday, as he finished the game 2-for-4 with three runs scored and a walk. The Minutemen were trying to spark a comeback in the bottom of the ninth when Franczek came to the plate with two outs and the tying runner on third. He stroked a hard line drive to deep center, but it was not hard enough to make him the hero.

The 11-game hitting streak marks the longest among any UMass player in 2006, and he thanked his supporting cast for that honorable feat.

"It feels great," Franczek said. "I'm starting to swing the bat a little bit better now. The team's swinging better too. So, once the team starts hitting better, it's easier for me to hit it too."

Franczek is hitting .337 with a team-high 23 runs scored, three triples and 20 RBIs on the year, second among the Minutemen. He has posted an impressive .440 on-base percentage, and has hit safely in 23 of 25 games this season.

While there is a potential for much self-pressure during a hitting streak, Franczek knows better than to take his mind off of his usual routine.

"I just go up there with the same approach every time," Franczek said. "I just try to hit the ball hard up the middle, and good things will happen."

UMass coach Mike Stone knows that the game is not about hitting streaks, it's about winning. And having a player of Franczek's caliber patrolling the hot corner and batting in the leadoff spot certainly cannot be a bad thing.

"He's a guy that you want to have at the plate," Stone said. "He's one of the guys that we want to have at the plate when the game's on the line. He's a good player. He's really matured. He's improved so much. He works hard. He's got a great attitude. And he's done a great job at third base for us.

"He's a guy that could hit first, second, third, anywhere really," Stone continued. "We feel comfortable where we are with our lineup right now, so, he's a good leadoff man."

Franczek also contributed with his defense in yesterday's loss. Northeastern's Mike Tasmin ripped a bases-loaded double down the left field line in the top of the second inning, which scored only two runs, thanks to the UMass third baseman. Franczek made a beautiful relay throw home to gun down the Huskies' Brian Nutting and end the inning without any further damage.

"I just wanted to get rid of it as quick as I could," Franczek said. "I knew the guy was going, so I just wanted to get rid of it as soon as possible."

Hitting streaks are a special individual accomplishment, but for this Chicopee native and member of Red Sox Nation, doing it on Yawkey Way makes it that much better.

"It's unbelievable," Franczek said about playing at Fenway Park. "I've always been a Red Sox fan, and come here to watch a couple games. To be able to play on their field is amazing."

Farewell Frat Row?

Greek members say they're getting evicted from homes

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Two fraternity presidents and one sorority president claim that their houses and two other Greek residences will be sold to the University of Massachusetts soon, putting the future of "Frat Row" in jeopardy.

The three presidents, Ben Levine of Alpha Epsilon Pi, Long Tran of Pi Delta Psi, and Teavy Moeung of the Sigma Psi Zeta sorority say that in early April they were each told by Susan Haynes, who manages all three houses, that they will have to move out because UMass will own the residences soon. The three presidents agree that an offer purposed by UMass officials was accepted by the company that owns the territory.

"We're homeless," said Levine. "[Negotiations] escalated to the point where the deal was agreed to."

Despite assumptions by the three presidents, neither the University, nor the company that owns the property, Alpha Tau Gamma, Inc. (ATG Inc.), has confirmed whether or not a deal was reached.

The properties, which are currently on sale and owned by ATG Inc., are located at 375, 387, 389, 395, and 401 North Pleasant St. The houses located at 389 and 401 North Pleasant St. are both operating fraternities, while the house located at 387 North Pleasant St. is a sorority. The other two locations, 375 and 395 North Pleasant St., are not currently operating under Greek Life and are vacant.

"The last offer was made over a year ago, and at the moment, [ATG Inc.] is still very interested in that offer," said Joyce Hatch, vice chancellor for Administration and Finance. Hatch says that the University doesn't do the actual negotiating, but rather puts out an offer and the Department of Capitol Asset Management (DCAM) negotiates on UMass' behalf. No one at DCAM was available for comment.

ATG Inc. treasurer James Mulcahy says that negotiations between his company and the University have been ongoing since January of 2003.

"There's a lot of talk, and that's all it is,"

SCERA alloted huge increase in SGA funding

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

Registered Student Organizations within the University of Massachusetts received a cumulative increase of 25 percent in the Student Government Association's Ways and Means committee proposal for the 2007 fiscal year budget.

"The amount of funding given to RSOs was higher than it's ever been," said Shawn Robinson, chair of the Ways and Means committee.

The cumulative amount of funds set to be allotted to RSOs was increased by $81,324 from last year's budget, totaling $324,997.

The budget, which also increased budgets for agencies and student governance bodies and included allotments for 20 new RSOs, will be voted on by senators May 3.

The largest increase went toward the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) group. SCERA's budget jumped from $58,941 in 2006 to $195,085 for 2007.

$95,000 will go towards implementing the new "Student Bridges" program, which will offer mentoring and tutoring for disadvantaged middle school students in Holyoke.

Club sports, which were funded in the past by the administration, were given significant increases in the committees' 2007 budget proposal.

"Club sports are incredibly expensive," said Robinson. "Coaches, equipment and paying to use the Mullins Center combine to cost students a lot of money. So we've granted increases to reduce the cost of individual students who participate in them."

Nearly every club sport was given an increased budget, including the wrestling team, which saw an increase of $3,450 from 2006.

While Robinson was excited that the committee could increase funding for student organizations around campus, he admitted that the increased funding would likely cause a hike in the cost of the annual $81 student activities fee that is paid by every student.

"With this budget, we will need to increase the student activities fee [by] five to 10 dollars in the next two years," said Robinson. "We can either raise the cost of the fee, or students can pay five to 10 dollars to get into the spring concert."

The budget also granted an increase in funds towards the production of the annual spring concert.

"In order to ensure a quality concert next year, University Productions and Concerts were granted a $19,000 increase," said Robinson.

Agencies are set to see a cumulative increase of 18 percent, increasing their total budget $155,535 from last year's total.

UVC-TV was one of the agencies that saw an $11,662 increase from last year's allotment, totaling $63,490. Robinson attributed the increase to the station's need to update their broadcasting service to digital service in order to meet new Federal Communications Committee regulations.

The craft center agency was granted an increase in

Maintenance worker killed in car accident

Maintenance workers at the University of Massachusetts have nothing but good words to say about a fellow employee who was killed in a car crash on Sunday.

Leevine "Mac" McCray, 47, of 567 West St. in Amherst, died after his car smashed into a tree on Route 9 in Belchertown, according to police.

Police responded around 1:35 a.m. on Federal St. between the two entrances to Old Amherst Road.

According to the Daily Hampshire Gazette, police said McCray's Ford Explorer hit a tree, flew into the air and then rolled onto the ground. McCray was apparently thrown from the vehicle.

The accident is still under investigation by police and speed may have been a factor, police said.

One of McCray's coworkers, Melinda Nielsen, said that when she heard the news, "it was like getting punched in the face."

"He had a very positive attitude," Nielsen said. "You could always turn to Mac for a cheery mood."

McCray worked as a maintainer at U Mass for the past five and a half years, and worked at the Prince dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area for the past three and a half years.

Nielsen says that working in Prince, a racially mixed dorm, was representative of McCray's character because he got along well with others.

"You have to have good people skills and respect people's differences," she said. "That was Mac."

Coworker Albert Spady will miss Mac, but believes he is in a better place. "The troubles that life do bring ... that's over for him," Spady said. "He's in peace."

The wake will be held at the Douglas Funeral Home on North Pleasant St. today from 4 to 7 p.m. The funeral will begin at the Douglas Funeral Home on Friday at 10 a.m. and the burial will take place at the South Amherst Cemetery.

Leevine McCray's wake will be held today in downtown Amherst.

2 dorms lose running water this weekend

Water service could be shut off to four buildings this Saturday due to construction on the University of Massachusetts campus.

According to UMass Communications Manager for Facilities and Campus Planning Jim Hunt, the Hamlin and Knowlton dormitories in the Northeast Residential Area and the Hasbrouck and Arnold academic buildings will be without running water during the shut down.

The shut down will start at 6 a.m. and could last until 4 p.m., but Hunt says there is a good chance service will be turned back on before then.

"We regret any inconvenience this may cause. Notice has already been provided to building and residence hall administrators, and we're asking them to notify all residents and make appropriate plans and preparations," Hunt wrote in a press release.

Closing arguments begin today in Johnston trial

NORTHAMPTON — Bryan R. Johnston never showed signs of acute mental illness during his time at Bridgewater State Hospital, according to a psychologist who testified in court yesterday.

The doctor made his comments in the last day of the trial. Closing arguments begin today.

Dr. John Leonard Peebles, a forensic psychologist, was responsible for interviewing and evaluating Johnston after he was admitted to the hospital. He was also in close contact with those who interacted with Johnston on a daily basis.

Johnston, 24, who has admitted to shooting University of Massachusetts student David E. Sullivan, is pleading not guilty by reason of insanity.

Johnston was first admitted for suicidal impulses and his claim that he would not tell others when he had the urge to hurt himself. Upon his arrival at Bridgewater, however, Johnston claimed that he was not suicidal.

Peebles' initial report regarding Johnston said that, due to limited information, he was having a difficult time diagnosing Johnstons' mental state. He noted that Johnston showed no sign of delusions while he was being interviewed by Peebles and that there was no indication of an acute phase of mental illness.

Peebles noted under questioning from

Marketing students showcase Fusion on campus

By Holly Seabury
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts' Advanced Promotional Strategy students held the "Mass Fusion" event Tuesday on the Campus Center lawn. While the business students ran the event and promoted Ford's new vehicle, the Fusion, UMass faculty and students stopped by continuously to enjoy games and raffles, the great weather, and of course, the free food.

The Mass Fusion event promoted three new Fusions, which were available to anyone who wished to take a look around or even sit down and get the feel of the vehicle.

"I couldn't get over that new car smell," said student Max Kaplan.

Several game and raffle stations were set up, such as "The Unforgettable Fusion," where contestants raced against each other to pin photos of the new features of the Fusion onto a larger photo of a car missing the features.

Another station was the "Fusion Foto," in which a participant fills out a questionnaire and has his or her picture taken with the new car for a chance to win a prize.

Other games included "Spin the Rims," where one could spin the new rims of a Fusion to try and get a painted arrow to land on the appropriate spots to spell "Fusion." A remote-control car race was also very popular; contestants raced against each other for a chance to win prizes.

Lazer 99.3 FM provided music during the event and had a gaming station of its own, the much-admired "Air-Money Grab!" Participants took turns entering a booth to try and catch fake money as it blew around them, while being blindfolded. If anyone caught a certain type of dollar, it could be used to buy a prize on the table, including tee shirts, Dunkin Donut gift certificates and CDs, among other things.

Also, the Army had a station at the event with information for joining and a football throwing game, where contestants threw a football through a hole for a number of different prizes, such as Army water bottles, key chains and tee shirts.

After competing in the games to win raffle tickets for a number of prizes, including Red Sox tickets, those attending the Mass Fusion event were able to enjoy a free hamburger or hotdog and the music of Lazer 99.3.

"I came with a few friends and had a good time," said sophomore Steve Fagioli, a business major at UMass. "It was nice to see a good turnout here."

The students in the Isenberg School of Management's Advanced Promotional Strategy course promoted the Fusion during this event, as well as last weekend, with their Fusion Free Ride Program. For this program, the students offered rides from 7 p.m. to 2 a.m. in the Fusion from Thursday through Saturday nights, in hopes to not only promote the vehicle and offer sober rides to weekend partiers, but to create awareness for their marketing campaign.

Hoping to gain the most successful marketing campaign for the Fusion, students in the course will have the chance to win a first place prize of a Scholastic Achievement Award of $3,000.

Students in the course are competing against four other New England business schools — Bentley College, the University of Southern Maine, and the University of New Hampshire — to develop the most successful marketing campaign for the Fusion. They will pitch their campaign to Ford, the New England Ford Dealers and JWT in hopes to win the competition.

Alumni sports journalists converge on UMass

By Piotr Butkiewicz
Collegian Correspondent

Successful University of Massachusetts alumni with careers in sports media shared advice and answered questions last Thursday with a crowd of about 60 at the University of Massachusetts' Campus Center Bluewall.

The event, entitled "UMass SportsNight: Tales and Tips from Careers in Sports Media," was part of the journalism department's Program Lecture Series in Broadcast and Media, which invited accomplished journalists to speak with students about their careers.

The featured panel consisted of Elliot Kalb ('83), author of "Who's Better and Who's Best in Baseball?," Dan Wetzel ('94), sports columnist and co-author of "Glory Road," Wendy Nix ('97), sportscaster for WHDH-TV 7 NEWS in Boston, Matt Sacco ('04), manager for Sunshine Sports and Entertainment of Fort Lauderdale, and event moderator Matt Vautour ('96), sports writer for the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

After brief introductions, the event opened up into a lively question and answer session so that students could pick panelists' brains. Over an hour of discussion covered topics like the role of women in sports media, how to cover controversial topics, the impact of Internet journalism in sports media, ethical decisions, facing rejection and discouragement and taking advantage of opportunities while in school.

"While you're here, do as much as you can," said Wetzel. "If you're aggressive and want to have fun, you can."

Other advice focused on the skills and qualities needed to succeed in establishing a career, such as having a passion for the job. "If you love what you do, then you won't mind doing it," said Sacco, who admitted that the journalist's life can be stressful and hectic.

"Since graduating [in '04], I've worked four full-time jobs, three part-time jobs, and have lived in four cities," he said. "So if you're looking for stability, there it is." Matt Vautour pointed out that "you use a lot of the same skills to get a job as you use to keep a job."

He seemed very pleased to describe his nine years as sports writer with the Gazette, saying that "it doesn't feel like work."

The panel collectively stressed the importance of perseverance for young jour-

Study on forests yields surprsising results

By Melissa D'Amico
Collegian Staff

Appearance is important when managing the nation's forests, according to a recently published report by landscape architect Robert L. Ryan of the University of Massachusetts.

Ryan's review of the social science of fuels management examines how aesthetics influence the public's perception of forests, and suggests managers can gain greater support for their projects if they take these perceptions into account.

"Aesthetics matter," Ryan said. "People judge ecological health by what they see — if it looks ugly, they consider it to be bad management.

"Hopefully, this study will help open the eyes of managers to the aesthetic concerns of the public," he said.

Following a series of devastating forest fires in the 1980s, the reduction of fuels that feed fires, such as grass, ground litter, shrubs and trees, became an important element of forest management. However, as managers began to reduce these fuels, they were faced with opposition from the public and environmentalists. This opposition was a result of the visual impact of practices like salvage logging and extensive thinning, Ryan said.

"Harvesting trees to create firebreaks, prescribed burns — these practices are often perceived as contrary to the health of the forest because visually, they don't look good," Ryan said.

Although Ryan does not suggest that aesthetics should be more important than safety in forest management, he says that managers who plan projects that are visually sensitive to public perception will face less opposition.

Public perception can have an affect on legislation and approval for practices that improve the quality of the forest. Ryan hopes his work will enable the public to "articulate their concerns over forest management," such as clear cutting, which may be considered unattractive.

"The public is passionate about the scenic beauty of its national forests and, as such, can be powerful advocates for forest protection and preservation," Ryan said.

Management practices that maintain the visual beauty of a forest become more important as managers must address uses other than timber, such as hiking, camping, and wildlife habitats.

Through his research, Ryan has found that the public has a general consensus as to what they consider scenic. Large, mature trees and open structures are desirable, while downed wood and dense vegetation with poor visibility at eye level are not, Ryan said.

There are several steps managers can take to create some sensitivity to aesthetics. Management teams should not only consist of geologists and ecologists, but landscape architects and other design professionals as well. Also, the landscape being worked on should be divided into smaller management zones, plans for which should incorporate both management goals and aesthetics.

Sites for firebreaks — gaps in vegetation that are expected to slow the spread of wildfires — should be chosen carefully.

Input from the public should be accepted and integrated during management projects. Areas should be managed more sensitively if a favorite swimming hole or fishing spot falls within the area, Ryan said.

Communicating the purpose of management activities to the public is crucial, Ryan said. The use of signs and brochures that explain management practices can aid the public's understanding and increase acceptance.

Acceptance and appreciation for management practices can best be increased by having the public involved in all stages of management, Ryan said. Volunteers can aid in activities such as clearing brush and assisting with tree thinning.

Ryan's report is part of a series initiated by the U.S. Forest Service on fuels planning, and incorporates the studies of numerous researchers completed over the last 30 years. Also working on this report was research assistant Mark Wamsley, an MLA graduate student from UMass.

Rally against Wal-Mart held at UMass

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts chapter of the Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) held a press conference in front of the UMass Student Union on Wednesday to celebrate the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection's (DEP) decision to block the construction of a Wal-Mart Super Center in Hadley and to announce the start of a new campaign goal to fight over-development along Route 9.

Much of the conference was devoted to the recent ruling against the proposed construction of the new Wal-Mart by the DEP and to the local grassroots movements against any further Wal-Mart expansion in the Pioneer Valley. Members of MassPIRG, along with local coalition groups, including the Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development and the StopSprawlmart.org campaign, took turns speaking out against the Wal-Mart corporation and over-development in the area.

Nick Seamon, proprietor of the Black Sheep Restaurant and Deli in Amherst, spoke first, accusing Wal-Mart and the growing corporate sprawl on Route 9 of hurting local businesses.

"In the last 30 years, the mall, Wal-Mart and everyone else sucked the life out of the downtown. Amherst was a much more crowded, diverse and vital business community," Seamon said as he addressed the crowd.

Seamon also implored the audience to find alternatives to Wal-Mart in local businesses. "Just to stop [Wal-Mart] from building this store and to put a 'shop locally' bumper sticker on your car does not do enough," he said.

Aron Goldman, executive director of StopSprawlmart.org, spoke out against the spread of strip malls throughout the Pioneer Valley. Goldman cited numerous problems he believes over-development will cause, including the loss of wetlands and farmland, the increase in traffic along Route 9 and the potential public safety concerns any further traffic congestion might cause. A new Wal-Mart SuperCenter and future corporate sprawl, according to Goldman, would only add to the problems.

"Our only option is mobilization and activism," he said. "If we do nothing, Wal-Mart will come."

Goldman also addressed arguments for Wal-Mart that cite the potential tax revenue Hadley would receive as a result of having the proposed Wal-Mart SuperCenter in town. He pointed out that if the Wal-Mart business model were to fail, the revenue generated from taxes would disappear just as quickly.

"It's better to have 10 businesses in 50,000 square feet than one business in 500,000 square feet," Goldman said, "If one of them goes out of business you have all those others. You have diversity and there is strength in that."

The proposed Wal-Mart, according to a prepared MassPIRG statement, would have been located in the Hampshire Mall and would have "necessitated the destruction of hundreds of thousands of square feet of wetlands."

It was the possible destruction of these wetlands that prompted the recent DEP decision to block the Wal-Mart expansion.

According to MassPIRG Campaign Coordinator Mike Peisse, much of the new campaign to stop sprawl, including the possible construction of a Lowe's Home Improvement and Home Depot in Hadley, would focus around environmental issues.

"We take a mostly environmental approach," he said. "Because that's how we can legally stop them."

To meet the new campaign goal of halting corporate sprawl in the Pioneer Valley, MassPIRG is planning on canvassing for upcoming Hadley Planning Board meetings and educating local residents on the issues that surround over-development. MassPIRG also plans to gather signatures for petitions to send to the Massachusetts Environmental Protection Act Office during the 30-day comment period following the filing of Wal-Mart's Environmental Impact Report.

"What MassPIRG is doing," said Peisse, "is putting pressure on Wal-Mart."

Members of Stopsprawlmart.org, Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development and MassPIRG held a rally yesterday at the Student Union against the Wal-Mart corporation and its proposed expansion for a store in Hadley.

defense attorney Alexander Nappan that it was possible that Johnston's mental illness was a type that could go through stages and that the fact that he did not witness an "acute," or obvious, phase of mental illness did not mean that Johnston was sane.

The jury was released early so that the defense and prosecution could spend the remainder of the day analyzing the more than 100 pieces of evidence in preparation for the trial's closing remarks. Judge Bertha D. Howie's day in court after he collides with flight crew

BOSTON (AP) — Pop singer Howie Day won't face any jail time for his rowdy behavior on a Boston-bound American Airlines flight in December.

Day, 25, on Wednesday was ordered to serve one year of pretrial probation on a charge of interfering with a flight crew for his behavior on a Dec. 21 flight from Dallas to Boston.

Day, who is from Brewer, Maine, was returning home for the holidays on American Airlines Flight 2250 when prosecutors say he became verbally abusive to the flight crew.

As conditions of his probation, Day must write letters of apology to American Airlines, as well as the passengers, captain and an attendant aboard the flight. He must also complete an alcohol counseling program, said David Procopio, a spokesman for Suffolk District Attorney Dan Conley.

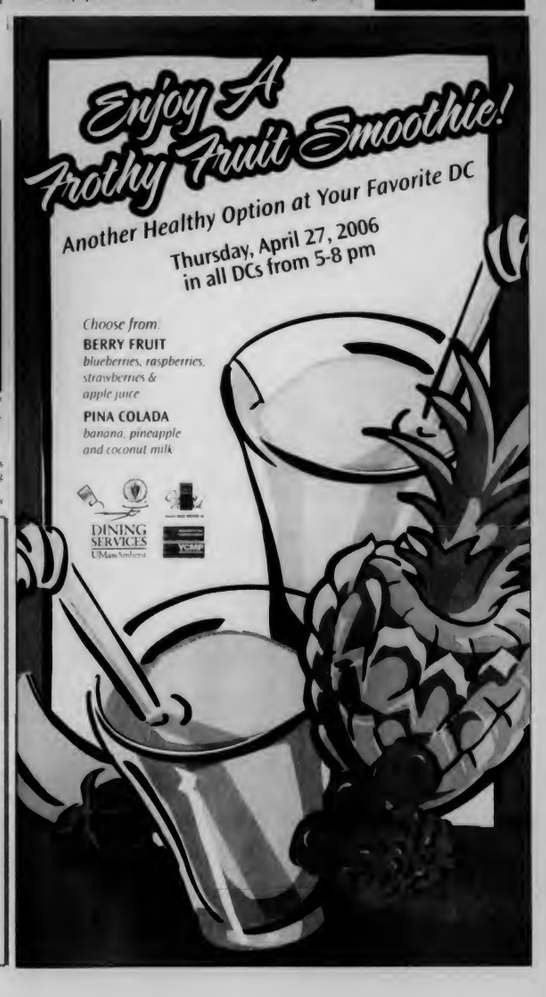
Day's attorney, Paul V. Kelly, said Day became intoxicated after he took a sleeping pill to help him fall asleep aboard the flight, then had a couple of alcoholic drinks.

He disputes disputed prosecutors' description of what happened on the plane, saying it was "inaccurate and overblown."

COURTESY CONCERTNETWORK.COM

Howie Day faced a judge in a Boston courtroom yesterday because he allegedly interfered with a flight crew in December.

Prosecutors said he smoked a cigarette, kicked the backs of chairs and was verbally abusive to the flight crew. Kelly said he did not smoke and had a loud altercation with a passenger, not the flight crew.



If Day complies with the conditions of the probation, the charge of interfering with a flight crew will be dismissed.

Money withheld from Iraq for U.S. issues

By Andrew Taylor
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted Wednesday to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead increase security on the nation's borders and give the Coast Guard new boats and helicopters.

Senators also ignored a White House veto threat and overwhelmingly voted against cutting a $106.5 billion measure funding Iraq, further hurricane relief for the Gulf Coast and a slew of add-ons opposed by fiscal conservatives and Bush.

And in a nail-biting 49-48 vote that tested lawmakers' loyalties, senators voted with Mississippi's powerful GOP delegation to keep alive a controversial $700 million project to relocate a rail line along the Mississippi coast so the state can build a new east-west highway.

The project has become a cause celebre among conservative activists, who say it's a boondoggle. Lawmakers were clearly torn between voting for it or offending Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, R-Miss.

"I just don't think it's an emergency and I don't think taxpayers ought to be paying for it," said Tom Coburn, R-Okla., who led the effort to kill the project. Generally speaking, more senior senators supported Cochran, regardless of party loyalties.

On border security, the Senate voted 59-39 for a plan to cut Bush's Iraq request by $1.9 billion to pay for new aircraft, patrol boats and other vehicles, as well as border checkpoints and a fence along the Mexico border crossing near San Diego.

While the border security funds had broad support, Democrats and Republicans argued over whether the cuts to Pentagon war spending would harm troops in Iraq. The cuts, sought by Judd Gregg, R-N.H., would trim Bush's request for the war by almost 3 percent, but he doesn't specify how.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., said Gregg's cuts would "take money from troop pay, body armor and even the joint improvised explosive device defeat fund. Now that is a false choice and it is a wrong choice."

Gregg argued that the cuts eventually would come from other parts of the massive Pentagon budget rather than U.S. forces in Iraq.

"To come down here and allege that these funds are going to come out of the needs of the people on the front lines in Iraq or Afghanistan is pure poppycock," he said.

An amendment by Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada to add the border security funds but not tap the Pentagon for them failed by a 54-44 vote.

The Senate voted by a veto-proof 72-26 margin to kill an attempt by conservatives to cut the overall bill back to Bush's request — just a day after the White House issued a toughly worded promise to veto the $106.5 billion bill unless it is cut back to below $95 billion.

But 35 Senate Republicans signed a letter promising to sustain a veto in the unlikely event it would come to that, increasing pressure on headstrong appropriators to hew to Bush's demands during House-Senate talks next month.

"The Appropriations Committee in the Senate is out of control, out of control on spending," said John Ensign, R-Nev.

Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, R-Ill. — the key architect of the bill — is unhappy with the veto threat and easily beat back a move by Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., to kill $12 billion in add-ons, such as $4 billion in farm aid, $1.1 billion for Gulf Coast fisheries and the much-criticized Mississippi rail line relocation.

Mississippi GOP Gov. Haley Barbour came to Capitol Hill on Wednesday to lobby for the rail relocation project. The rail line, owned by CSX Transportation, has been rebuilt with insurance proceeds at a cost of nearly $300 million.

Bush insists that total spending in the bill be capped at his $92.2 billion request for Iraq and hurricane relief, though he is willing to accept $2.3 billion in the bill to prevent an outbreak of avian flu.

Gregg chairs the Appropriations Homeland Security subcommittee. His border security plan focuses on the capital needs of the Border Patrol and the Coast Guard, including new planes, helicopters, ships and communications equipment.

Gregg said his plan would "give the people who are defending us on our borders, the border security agents, the Custom agents, the Coast Guard, the tools they need to do their job right — the unmanned vehicles, the cars, the helicopters which are a critical part of our fight in the war on terrorism. It has to be done now."

The underlying bill contains $67.6 billion for Pentagon war operations and $27.1 billion for hurricane relief, including grants to states to build and repair housing and $2.1 billion for levees and flood control projects. The funding for hurricane relief exceeds Bush's request by $7.4 billion.

Live from the White House: Fox's Tony Snow gets Press Secretary job

By Jennifer Loven
Associated Press

Fox News Channel commentator Tony Snow was appointed as Press Secretary to President Bush. The announcement was made yesterday.

WASHINGTON — President Bush gave his presidency a facelift Wednesday, tapping a smooth-talking, telegenic conservative commentator as the new White House press secretary.

The appointment of Fox News pundit Tony Snow as Bush's third chief spokesman was intended in part to help improve the White House's frayed relationship with the press corps. Bush paired the announcement of his choice with some friendly jabs at reporters, and a serving of respect for their craft.

"Tony already knows most of you, and he's agreed to take the job anyway," the president said, Snow laughing at his side in the briefing room where he will start holding court in about two weeks. "He understands like I understand that the press is vital to our democracy."

Snow, a 50-year-old Ohio native, plans to take over from current press secretary Scott McClellan the week of May 8. He will hold off conducting the daily press briefings for several days while the two overlap.

The choice of Snow was also part of a White House effort — under the leadership of new chief of staff Joshua Bolten and with Bush at his lowest-ever approval ratings — to reach out to conservatives who made up the base of support for Bush's two presidential victories but have been disaffected by government spending and other issues.

Democrats, though, seized on remarks and writings Snow has produced in nearly 25 years in the media that have been critical of Bush, and often provocative. Snow held several print journalism positions, mostly working for newspaper opinion pages, and lately has been the host of the "Tony Snow Show" on Fox News Radio and "Weekend Live with Tony Snow" on the Fox News Channel.

Though usually aggressively supportive of the president as a GOP pundit, Snow has also shown a confrontational side. In a syndicated column, for instance, Snow has called the president "something of an embarrassment," a leader who has "lost control of the federal budget," the architect of a "listless domestic policy" and a man who has "a habit of singing from the political correctness hymnal."

The Democratic National Committee said Snow's appointment means "truth still snowed in" in the Bush administration.

The White House — led by Bush — said Snow's candor and colorful talk will be an asset, not a liability.

I asked him about those comments and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy,' the president said. 'I like his perspective. I like the perspective he brings to the table, and I think you're going to find him fair.'

Since the first reports from the media in the late 1800s to work in the White House, radio liked a reporter as a speechwriting position and spokesman for a press secretary briefly. Neither has had both responsibilities.

Before I'm out, I want to work with you," Snow told reporters. "We've got a lot to do, issues ahead and lots of people and interesting things that all of us are going to be covering together."

Snow had delayed a decision about taking the job to consult with his family.

He and his wife have three young children — and his doctors — he had his colon removed last year and underwent six months of chemotherapy after being diagnosed with cancer. But his detailed on-air deliberations over recent days raised eyebrows among White House staff who are normally tightlipped and loath to run afoul of Bush's dislike for any public airing of internal thinking.

Bush seemed unaffected. He concluded his introduction of Snow by calling him "buddy."

Iran's leader warns against U.S. attacks

By Nasser Karimi
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran's supreme leader warned the United States on Wednesday that his nation would hit back twice as hard if America attacked its nuclear sites.

Even as if threatened to ravage U.S. global interests, Iran sent its top nuclear official to Vienna, Austria, for talks with the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog agency ahead of a Friday Security Council deadline for Tehran to halt its uranium enrichment activities.

"The Americans should know that if they invade Iran, their interests around the world would be harmed," supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei told workers gathered ahead of May Day, the international workers' holiday, state television reported.

"Iran will respond twofold to any attack," Khamenei said.

The United States repeatedly has said it has no plans to attack Iran but all options remain on the table as it pursues a diplomatic solution to Iran's insistence on enriching uranium — a process that can produce fuel for generators or fissile material for nuclear bombs.

Britain on Wednesday ruled out military force against Iran. "This is not Iraq. Nobody is talking about military action," Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said in a speech in London.

But Straw said how the world deals with the standoff over Tehran's nuclear program will be a test for the relevance of international diplomacy.

The Security Council has given Iran until Friday to suspend enrichment. If it does not, the council is likely to consider punitive measures against the Islamic republic.

Iran has rejected Ohio Senator's appeal to suspend uranium enrichment, calling the demand illegal. Although it has cooperated with the International Atomic Energy Agency, which is preparing a report on Iran's activities for the Security Council.

In Vienna, Iran's envoy, while skeptical of any proposals that Aghazadeh was carrying, said they were unlikely to alter the negative tone of the IAEA report to the Security Council. Still, one of his diplomats who demanded anonymity because he was not supposed to be discussing the confidential talks said the two sides agreed on a second round of talks in the evening after an afternoon meeting attended by IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei.

The chief U.S. delegate to the IAEA, Gregory L. Schulte, has said he expects a negative report from ElBaradei.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad shrugged off the possibility of the council penalizing Iran.

"The enemies cannot impose their wrong decision against us under cover of the Security Council and the IAEA," Ahmadinejad said, according to state television.

Ahmadinejad said Iran remained committed to negotiations.

"We are ready to cooperate [the nuclear program] for those that it has not been directed at military purposes for the past two and

The United States has asked for the Security Council to meet May 9 to discuss Iran as required by the report.

While the IAEA has found no "smoking gun" proving Iran wants nuclear arms, a series of IAEA reports have revealed worrying clandestine activities such as plutonium processing and documents including drawings of how to mold weapons-grade uranium metal into the shape of a warhead.

Iran deepened international concerns by announcing April 11 that it had enriched uranium with 164 centrifuges. It has informed the IAEA that it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges in the last quarter of 2006 and later 54,000 centrifuges for large-scale enrichment of uranium.

While tens of thousands of centrifuges need to be running in "cascades" for a full-fledged enrichment programs, experts estimate that Iran could produce enough nuclear material for one bomb if it had at least 1,000 centrifuges working for over a year.

On Tuesday, Iran issued its toughest warning on the issue. Nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said that if the Security Council imposes sanctions, Iran would stop cooperating with the IAEA and conceal its nuclear activities.

"If you take harsh measures, we will hide this program. If you use the language of force, you should not expect us to act transparently," Larijani said.

Iran appears to be drawing strength for its defiance from the evident reluctance of Russia and China to endorse sanctions. The two powers hold vetoes on the Security Council.

"We see no alternative to the negotiations process," Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said Tuesday. China has repeatedly urged all parties to show flexibility and pursue a peaceful settlement.

order to restore their kiln, an oven designed for hardening, burning or drying substances like clay, and to offer pottery making again.

"Area governments are generally unfunded due to inactivity," said Robinson. "Area governors are just a few steps away from someone's dorm, a lot closer than the SGA office. We hope this funding shows a new sense of commitment for area governments."

Robinson stated that despite going slightly over budget, the proposal itself was a success.

"This is something that the committee and I spent over 100 hours creating," said Robinson. "We began this process early, holding budgeting workshops in December, and we felt that these workshops were extremely beneficial to RSOs, helping them gain a better understanding of how to develop a budget."

The senate, which, in Speaker Sean Bliss' absence, was presided by Associate Speaker Maxine Dube, also voted to allocate $5,582.72 to the Southwest Area Government towards funds for their production of "Southwest week."

Nurse steals drugs from elderly patients

WORCESTER (AP) — A nurse has admitted he stole prescription painkillers from nursing home patients for his own use then meticulously replaced them with Tylenol and vitamins, federal prosecutors said Wednesday.

Michael Paul Smith, 39, of Holden, is charged with tampering with consumer products with reckless disregard for the risk of danger of death or bodily injury to another, a federal charge that carries a possible sentence of up to 10 years in prison.

Smith told authorities that he stole oxycodone and morphine by separating the cardboard backing on blistercards using tweezers, prosecutors said. He removed the pills, replaced them with either vitamins or Tylenol, then re-glued the backing, according to an affidavit filed in court by Frank Lombardo, a special agent for the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

UMass won't comment on frat housing said Mulcahy, who was hesitant to verify whether or not the University's offer was accepted by ATG Inc.

Michael Wiseman, director of the Office of Greek Affairs at UMass, also would not confirm a deal and Haynes declined to comment on the situation. The Massachusetts Hampshire County Registry of Deeds has no listing of any property sale of the fraternities and sorority, which means no purchase of the land has been finalized.

Both Moeung, who is the Sigma Psi Zeta president, and Levine say that it was made obvious to them that their houses will be sold to UMass, and that letters were sent to them from lawyers representing ATG Inc. confirming the details of the deal.

"We got the letter from their lawyers saying that we have to move out, because [Sigma Psi Zeta] is being sold," said Moeung. "[Haynes] told us we have to pack up by June 30, and that's when we have to move out."

According to Levine, Tran and Moeung, the letter from the ATG Inc. representatives and Haynes' comments are the only sources that have confirmed the completion of the real estate deal. Alpha Epsilon Pi's inspections, which were scheduled for April 10, are now cancelled because the brothers are currently looking for a new location to live.

"It's kind of frustrating because Susan [Haynes] told us [about the deal], but we haven't had official word from the school," said Tran. "We feel like no one really cares about us. They didn't even offer us any alternatives, so basically, we're lost."

John Caruso takes a break from house sitting at the former Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity house yesterday.

The lack of communication by the University and the late emergence of this potential situation have left the members of the fraternities and the sorority without many living options for next semester. Many of Levine's brothers had already cancelled their on-campus housing for the Fall 2006 semester prior to the news, leaving few choices for where they could live.

While Tran will be graduating in May and Moeung will be spending the upcoming semester abroad in Australia, other members of the Greek community felt deserted on hearing about the possible circumstances.

"Me and 30 of my best friends [are] stranded for next semester," said Levine. "The University never called them and gave them other options."

Talk between ATG Inc. and UMass has been ongoing for over three years, and in March of 2003 the five properties were posted on ebay.com after UMass officials did not make an offer. Town of Amherst records show that all five properties are assessed at a combined total of $2,045,000.

On July 13, 2005, UMass suspended two fraternities for safety violations — including fire, health and building violations — one of which was Sigma Alpha Mu of 395 North Pleasant St. Since that suspension, the house has been vacant.

"Right now, Frat Row's dead," said Tran. "I can't say that I disagree with the University, just because their arguments are legitimate. That's the entrance to the school; all of the houses are beat up and it just looks bad. I guess they want to appeal to the parents, because tuition is going up so much, they have to sell as much as possible."

nalists. None of them had stable work in the first few years after graduating. They faced rejection regularly, but had to face it with resolve.

"There is a light at the end of the tunnel," Sacco said. "But the only way to get there is to drive the car yourself."

"You definitely get that panicky feeling sometimes," Nix said. "But it's good because it keeps you honest and motivated."

The event generated many questions and enthusiasm from students.

"It was great to see how they got started," said 18-year-old Domenic Poli, freshman journalism major and Massachusetts Daily Collegian sports writer "To know that they worked hard, but were once kids like us, it makes you feel like success is not out of reach."

The panelists were impressed with the quality of questions and discussion. Some, like organizer Shawn deJong and panelist Wendy Nix, said they were pleased at the fairly equal number of males and females in the audience.

The night ended with a Red Sox trivia game and a raffle for four Red Sox bleacher tickets. The event was organized and run by a student committee and professor B.J. Roche of the journalism department, and funded by David ('79) and Teena Kantor.

Women have it so much easier

From childbirth to clothing, girls are the better sex to be. There is no doubt that they have advantages that men only wish they could have.

Gilad Skolnick

A population that is admired, worshipped and loved. Many open doors for these people; take them out for some fine dining and think of other ways to please them. About half of Americans constitute this lucky privileged class, and you too can be one of them, all you need is to lack a Y chromosome.

It's taken me a while to accept it, that women have it so much easier in our world than men. Many of us are in denial; we have been raised and brainwashed to believe that the Y chromosome-laden gender has it easier, but they are misguided. Sure, maybe we can urinate while standing and can get away more easily with certain bodily noises, but it just doesn't even out. I myself am more than happy being born a male, but that doesn't mean that I am not aware of the difficulties that come with my gender.

For one, females get to have the purse. Males get to have deep pockets. Having to find a way to arrange keys, a cell phone, wallet, digital camera and eye drops in my pockets is a daily pain. It is followed by the constant worry that every time I sit down, things may fall out of these said pockets, cause discomfort from sitting with tons of awkwardly shaped things stuffed in them and the terrible hassle of getting these things out.

Females, on the other hand, are able to easily and comfortably put all these items into their purses, in and out with ease. But we don't complain, rather we accept it.

Having to shave one's legs and armpits might look like a chore, but it is nothing compared to having to shave one's face. Many jobs won't hire men who look scruffy or have facial hair, and the face is a far more sensitive place to put a blade to than the legs, as you can imagine. It's easier to get cuts on the face, and an electric shaver can be quite annoying to use at times. Furthermore, many females take a break from shaving in the winter months; men can't do such a thing.

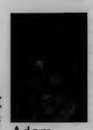
It gets worse, though. When it gets very hot out in the summer, it is frowned upon when a male takes off his shirt in class or wears short shorts. On the other hand, women are permitted, and even encouraged, to wear tank tops and short shorts. This allows them to have less on and cool off faster. When one has to dress formally, men must don a suffocating suit and shoes while women can have a dress and open-toed shoes. We suffer in the heat constantly.

Their wardrobes are infinitely more diverse, their color selection is wider and they have far more room to exercise their creativity. Men are forced, on the other hand, to travel to specific men's stores and are limited to the same few color choices. Furthermore, men have to get suits tailored while women are able to go to virtually any store and have any size imaginable right in front of them.

The dating scene is perhaps one of the best examples of the challenges men must go through. Men have to do all the asking out. That is, they must face a shower of rejections. It's tough. When going out on dates, men pay for the meal, while women just sit back, relax and get treated over and over again. In bars, women get to deal with constant offers of free drinks, as well.

Additionally, given their longer hair in general, women are given the opportunity to engage in the relaxing and therapeutic exercise of brushing one's hair for longer than men.

Not to mention that women get to go through the joys of creating life through childbirth. Plus women don't collapse in excruciating pain every time their groin gets hit by a ball or a foot. Women on average also live longer, and don't get speeding tickets as often when they're pulled over.



Additionally, women tend to not have as short tempers, are more flexible and often reasonable, possibly due to all the therapeutic hair brushing.

I am not saying that there is anything wrong with our society; I am just saying that women should admit that they have it easier, and we should all be aware of that. One day there might be equality, but until that day, women must live with many privileges that men only dream of having.

A better world

Adam McGillen

College students today spend a majority of their time on MySpace or Facebook, idly wasting away precious time. When they're not studying, they're looking at mind-numbing photos their friends have posted, trying to remember what they were thinking at that party or enjoying the fact that they managed to get the shocker out in time for the flash.

Rather than spending all of our time surfing the net, we need to learn to take a step out into the world. The World of Warcraft, that is. A tantalizing artificial world that delivers everything you have ever needed to make something out of your trivial life of homework, class and finals. While many students wiz their spare time away on friend networks, the few and the proud students who live in the world of Azeroth take wizzing to the next level: wizardry, casting spells and defeating the mighty enemies they encounter on their epic quests.

People today are disenchanted with the tainted reality of the world around them. No one takes a walk outside without their headphones in to drown out the sounds of the breeze and the birds — or the never-ending construction on campus.

And why shouldn't they ignore nature? Going outside offers nothing but noise and air pollution, and if you idle too long outside you are likely to get skin cancer. The sun may be scientifically proven to make you happier, but, like cigarettes, it is a brief happiness that only leads to terminal illness.

The solution to this problem is simple: lock your door and ignore the shouts of "you loser" (or "you hoser" if your floor mates hail from the great nation of Canada) and allow yourself to be whisked away on the Gryphons of Ironforge. Soon you will find yourself in the beauty of nature at its finest, untouched by the Industrial Revolution and still inhabited by Elves, Dwarves and Orcs.

World of Warcraft is not so much a game as it is a way of life, a purpose for existence, a reason to drop out of college (though I don't encourage it because you'll need to get a job so you can pay for your account). For those who love the brew and would rather spend their weekend at a good party, you are probably unaware of the ability to drink yourself legally blind in World of Warcraft. In fact, almost every month, the makers of the game create a new holiday, giving players a reason to get so smashed they can't even wield their +5 spirit War-Hammer of Destiny effectively.

The sun may be scientifically proven to make you happier, but, like cigarettes, it is a brief happiness that only leads to terminal illness.

Getting drunk and fighting beasts is not the only reason to play, though. It's an exercise in transcendentalism — escaping the chains of our world and creating a much more spiritual existence that is in tune with nature, though that nature may just be pixels joined together.

New England was hailed for its transcendentalist movement, and it's time we all took a page out of Thoreau's book. Everyone should sit down and admire the World of Warcraft, take in its sites, maybe even set up camp for a couple years next to Stendel's Pond in Westfall and record all the sites and sounds in your quest log. Develop diverse relationships with peoples of different races, like the Undead, Tauren, Dwarves and even the tiny but big-hearted exiles of Gnomeregan.

A regular day in Azeroth goes something like this: you come out of the inn, well rested and ready for a long day of questing and conquering the enemies of your allies. You grab some friends, make a party, walk around town and talk to the ever happy citizens. There is no shortage of jobs, and people are always willing to give you some money and a couple of nice items if you help them out.

Once you've gathered a good load of work to do, you set out into the wilderness to collect wood, kill off some of the invading population of unfriendly monsters, or even just go hunting for the ingredients of a nice pie a young lady has promised to cook for you. You return to town and are praised for your strength and incredible abilities; appreciation is so overflowing, it could make grown men weep.

World of Warcraft is not just another world, it is a better world. Everyone is more content — happier to be alive. Death isn't an issue; there is always a friendly Paladin nearby willing to revive you quickly. There are no immigration laws; people can travel the world freely as long as they've got enough gold and silver coins. War is no mystery; there is no question of the purpose because battles are fought with the clear-cut divide of good versus evil. There are no weapons of mass destruction to look for or cover up, because they just don't exist.

Next time you step out of your dorm into the rain, only to be splashed by an oily puddle as a bus drives by, fumes pouring out of the exhaust as the sound of a jet's engines slices the air above you, think of all that awaits you in the world of Azeroth, and realize that dreams really can come true.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CAN YOU HEAR ME NOW?

The art of conversation is a concept with many meanings. It can mean the ability to engage in entertaining discourse, to speak clearly or to effectively express your feelings, and to engage another person's interest. Basic to this art is knowing when is the proper time to converse.

It has become obvious that this understanding is not there among some of my classmates, who seem to think that class is the perfect time to catch up on the day's gossip. Attendance, in general, is hard for a professor to maintain and a student to adhere to, so why, I ask, do you actually come if you're only going to make it harder for us all?

Essential to any college experience is classroom information gathering, and I find it impossible to do so when the people behind me are clearly discussing last night's drinking escapade. The only information gathering I receive is that which will not be graded.

Contrary to popular belief, stage whispers effectively reach every corner and every ear in the room. Once I started thinking about this phenomenon, I began to realize why people come to class only to talk about the most random dribble.

Lecture provides some kind of rare inspiration. Without the catalytic environment of a classroom, complete with a professor lecturing about calculus or economics, one could not find the right words to recount their wild, and probably uninteresting, adventures.

Possibly, the soothing voice of that economics professor talking about supply and demand graphs makes you so happy you just cannot contain your verbal elation, and it spills out of your mouth like an overactive salivary gland. Unfortunately, all that seems to come out is something along the lines of I saw Jane Doe (the names have been changed to protect the innocent), and I just love that sweater of hers. The colors are great, and only was I able to remember that by sitting here, in this lecture hall.

I haven't been able, yet, to make a scientific assessment as to how an economist speaking could lead to the need to talk about sweaters, cars or hot chicks (a favorite among those emotionally overcharged men). I wonder, though, what we students who actually like to go to class to learn can do about this. Maybe a public humiliation is in order. Something to the effect of collective glaring, some pointing, maybe a student or two standing and throwing things at them.

Possibly, another solution could be a dunce hat that just drops out of the ceiling onto the student's unsuspecting head, with the words "shut up" playing over some anonymous loud speaker — although it's probably economically impossible to rig every classroom with these devices at a severely under-funded public university.

I doubt we will be able to end classroom talk forever, but if you are one of those talkers (and I would hope you know who you are), we don't pay thousands and thousands of dollars a year to hear you chat about what you're going to do after class or who Facebooked you this morning. All I ask is that you engage in some personal reflection — you know the kind I mean — the kind where your lips don't move.

UMass student

BACK FROM NEW ORLEANS

After a week spent volunteering in New Orleans, I left overcome with two feelings: one, of outrage at the convergence of racism, classism and capitalism preventing a just rebuilding process; and two, of distress at the way my college delicately skirts challenging these forms of oppression.

I journeyed to New Orleans from Selma, Ala. with 165 other students, many of whom were African-American and attended historically black colleges and some who attended historically white ones, including Columbia and NYU. As a group, we constituted the week-two participants in a month-long initiative organized by the group Katrina on the Ground to bring students together with survivors to assist in the rebuilding process.

In New Orleans, coordinators from the People's Hurricane Relief Fund and Oversight Coalition integrated us into the work they had been doing since Katrina hit to provide and advocate for a just relief and a just return for New Orleanians. Each night, we slept on cots between the pews of the historic St. Augustine's Parish, the oldest Black Catholic Church in the United States.

We arrived just days before the official closing of the parish by the Archdiocese of New Orleans (citing lack of funding) and joined the parishioners in their fight to keep their parish and its many ministries, including a food pantry and clothing drive, open.

While the need for just and comprehensive passages of return for Katrina survivors is ever-present, it appeared to me that city, state and federal officials have placed more resources in the further displacement and, in regards to New Orleans residents, disenfranchisement of Katrina survivors.

For instance, prior to Hurricane Katrina, blacks, Latinos and a small Vietnamese population inhabited Village Square, a small neighborhood in the overwhelmingly white parish of St. Bernard's. Lynn Dean, a white St. Bernard Parish resident of over 50 years and member of his parish's governing council, is the sole vocal opponent of his council's decision to demolish Village Square.

As I said at the start of this piece, I returned home to Harlem with my senses sharpened to the injurious way endemic forms of oppressions continue to infiltrate people's lives. My thoughts drifted to Amherst and the colorful catalogues, diversity orientations, special diversity weekends and other diversity initiatives common on campus.

I asked myself, was Amherst really working to reenergize its efforts to take on the various forms of oppression that serve as stumbling blocks to any true progress or, was the school, like other colleges and universities, operating behind a façade?

Instead of circumventing the work needed to eradicate institutionalized forms of oppression, college administration, faculty and students must confront the systems of power and privilege that we as individuals and together as an institution foster. In doing so, we will leave this college better equipped to deal with the world's inability to eradicate — let alone open dialogue about — race, sex, class etc.

I believe educational institutions have a certain responsibility to taking up this cause in a more than half-hearted way because of their self-imposed charge to prepare their students for the world. What I would suggest as one way for Amherst to reintegrate itself into the politics of this country would be to institutionalize an anti-oppression curriculum, such as the in-service learning program that I participated in over Spring Break. As students we might leave, willing or at least able to, as our motto advises, give light to the world.

Jeff Bridges coaches 'Stick It' to victory

That's a lot of legs: Bridges plays gymnastic Coach Burt Vickerman in director Jessica Bendinger's new team spirit comedy.

By Hanh Nguyen
ZapIt.com

LOS ANGELES — You just can't help listening to the wisdom of Jeff Bridges, whether he's playing uber-slacker The Dude in "The Big Lebowski" or a has-been gymnastics coach in his latest film "Stick It."

The four-time Oscar-nominated actor stars as Coach Vickerman, a former gymnast permanently sidelined by an injury he received executing a risky element. He sweet-talks ambitious mothers to finance what he promises are future Olympians. In practice, however, he doesn't push the girls to excellence, but only emphasizes safe and rather boring routines.

At first Bridges thought he'd model Vickerman after legendary UCLA basketball coach John Wooden, who had coached his brother, actor Beau Bridges, in college. "Beau showed me John Wooden's pyramid of success," says Bridges. "He approached basketball as a metaphor for how you live. The coach I play is not quite as enlightened as Wooden. He's got some con man in him."

Instead, Bridges attended a Nationals gymnastics meet in order to research his character.

"I must have looked pretty peculiar, all these girls doing these amazing things, and I'm videoing the coaches — their hands, how they move their feet," he says. "'[There are] some coaches who probably never stepped foot in a gym in their lives. A lot of these guys weren't even gymnasts. Bela Karolyi was probably the most famous of them all and ... he was a boxer. Of course, there were some coaches that were very fit and trim and looked like they could get up there and do the tricks themselves, so I took bits and pieces and made my character a bit of that."

In the film, Haley (Missy Peregrym) is a juvenile delinquent and former gymnast who left her team in the lurch unexpectedly at the World Championship meet two years ago. After her most recent run-in with the law, she's forced to make restitution by attending the Vickerman Gymnastics Academy, where she and her coach must learn to work through their demons and find middle ground between cautious and risky routines.

Bridges played a coach in real life, helping Peregrym with her scenes by introducing a different way of running lines.

"One time he said to me, 'Okay, I want to go over the lines but ... get your point across without using the words on the page,'" recalls Peregrym. "That was the best excrcise I have ever done because you immediately internalize. It's about how you're feeling ... it just makes it that much more real."

Missy Peregrym, left, and Jeff Bridges star in the movie "Stick It" which debuts in theaters nationwide on Friday.

Bridges quickly became a sought-after mentor and even father figure on set, giving director Jessica Bendinger advice on the script, sharing tunes on his iPod with actress Maddy Curley or serenading a weeping Nikki Soohoo, who plays gymnast Wei Wei, until she felt better. Bridges took this parental role in stride.

"The fact that I have daughters really helped me a lot," he explains. "I didn't really have to think about it. It's something that came with the package. It's almost like a reflex action. A girl that age and she starts to cry, I'll make sure to play guitar."

"Stick It" tumbles into theaters nationwide on Friday.

Pulitzer honor for jazz pianist step in right direction

By Howard Reich
Chicago Tribune

Revered by musicians but largely overlooked or misunderstood by the general public, Thelonious Sphere Monk never achieved a fraction of the acclaim routinely lavished on other visionaries of American music, such as Duke Ellington or Scott Joplin or George Gershwin.

But last week, in a surprise development, Monk — the dissonant, angular jazz pianist who died in 1982 at age 64 — received a rare honor also given posthumously to those three American masters: a Pulitzer Prize Special Citation.

The award, which was announced April 17 and will be presented in May in New York, acknowledges Monk for "a body of distinguished and innovative musical composition that has had a significant and enduring impact on the evolution of jazz."

That may be an understatement.

Monk's music flourishes in jazz clubs, concert halls, music schools, culture festivals and wherever else the world's greatest musicians sit down to play, teach and illuminate listeners. Compositions such as "'Round Midnight," "Straight, No Chaser," "Blue Monk," "In Walked Bud," "Well You Needn't" and dozens more have become integral to our understanding of the art of jazz, as essential to its vocabulary as the grand suites of Ellington or the beguiling, hauntingly lyrical ragtime compositions of Joplin.

The only question is why it took so long.

"Monk should have gotten the prize in his lifetime," says Harvard University professor and Pulitzer board chairman Henry Louis Gates Jr.

"But the Pulitzer Prize was defined so narrowly and parochially — to cover just American classical and neoclassical music — that geniuses like Monk were overlooked.

"And this was an attempt to redress that omission."

The move represents the latest effort by the Pulitzer board to extend the honor beyond the insular world of classical-music composition, which held a stranglehold on the prize since its inception, in 1943.

In 1965, when a Pulitzer jury recommended that Ellington receive a Special Citation, the board declined, prompting jurors Winthrop Sargeant and Ronald Eyer to resign.

"I'm hardly surprised that my kind of music is still without, let us say, official honor at home," Ellington later told writer Nat Hentoff in a New York Times magazine piece titled "This Cat Needs No Pulitzer Prize."

"Most Americans," continued Ellington, "still take it for granted that European music — classical music, if you will — is the only really respectable kind. I remember, for example, that when Franklin Roosevelt died, practically no American music was played on the air in tribute to him. ... By and large, then as now, jazz was like the kind of man you wouldn't want your daughter to associate with."

Though the Pulitzer board made an initial step in the right direction by giving Joplin the posthumous honor in 1976, the year of America's bicentennial, the board quickly reverted to the status quo. A sign reading "for classical musicians only" may as well have been posted on the boardroom door.

It wasn't until 1997 that the board finally broke with tradition, giving Wynton Marsalis the first Pulitzer Prize in Music for a jazz composition, for his epic suite "Blood on the Fields" (this writer served on the jury that recommended Marsalis for the prize). Moreover, the board revised the definition and entry requirements for the Pulitzer Prize in Music, allowing for improvised, non-composed works to be considered.

If the Special Citations given posthumously to Gershwin in the centennial year of his birth (1998) and Ellington in the centennial of his (1999) represented attempts to liberate the Pulitzer Prize from the classical-music monopoly, the Monk award goes a significant step further.

For while Gershwin and Ellington enjoyed vast cultural recognition during their lifetimes, Monk spent much — perhaps most — of his career outside the musical mainstream. Even after attaining a degree of celebrity in the late 1950s and '60s, he often was regarded as eccentric at best, crazy at worst.

"I often tell people that my dad died somewhat disappointed, in that he really didn't feel like people got it," says drummer Thelonious Monk Jr., the composer's son and chairman of the board of trustees of the Thelonious Monk Institute of Jazz.

"It's kind of ironic, because now he's considered a pillar of jazz, but throughout his career, he was not that at all. He was always outside the box."

There's no secret to Seacrest's big success

Offers thrown at infamous 'Idol' host from all angles

By Aaron Barnhart
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Here's one thing you and I have in common with Ryan Seacrest: None of us knows whatever happened to Brian Dunkleman.

"I haven't spoken to Brian since the last episode we did together in Season 1 of 'American Idol,'" Seacrest said recently of his former sidekick.

Like a discarded booster rocket, Dunkleman fell away as "Idol" soared into the stratosphere. Four years later, the 31-year-old Seacrest is captain of the ship, having developed into a megahost, a species I thought had gone away when three TV channels became 300 and radio fragmented into a boutique mall.

With each triumphant season — "Idol" is now the No. 1 show in TV and its audience is growing — more offers are thrown at Seacrest's feet. Apparently he takes all of them.

Behind the scenes he is building an empire that reminds many industry watchers of the rise of another pop music host, Dick Clark. On the radio, meantime, Seacrest has stepped into the shoes of Casey Kasem as host of "American Top 40" and legendary L.A. DJ Rick Dees.

Seacrest also fills in for Larry King regularly on CNN. And this week E! aired the first in a series of Barbara Walters-like interviews that Seacrest will conduct with celebrities in their homes. ("Eva Longoria: The Interview with Ryan Seacrest" re-airs at 5 p.m. EDT Thursday on E!)

About the only old-school broadcast great I can't seem to tie Seacrest to is Regis Philbin. But then, as Philbin would say, he's only one man ... a man who has come a long way since hosting the NBC "Saturday Night Movie" six years ago.

"I have a lot that I want to do," the Atlanta native told TV critics at January's press conference. "I'm fulfilled now with the hosting and talent aspect of my career. I'm not fulfilled with the production aspect of my career."

Full and filled would certainly describe the hosting aspect. Two years ago Seacrest took over one of the most revered jobs in radio, the morning drive program on KIIS-FM in Los Angeles that had been hosted for more than two decades by Dees.

Five hours of morning radio is the gig that seems to inspire awe in industry types and ordinary folk alike. Earlier this month freshly ousted "Idol" contestant Bucky Covington called in to "The Ryan Seacrest Show," and the host asked the country boy (who sounded on the radio like Boomhauer from the TV show "King of the Hill") what had surprised him most about his time in L.A.

"You," Covington gushed. "Nobody has any idea how many hours you put in your job."

Actually we do know how many hours he puts into his job, thanks to an intrepid Boston Herald reporter who detailed a recent day in the life of Seacrest. It begins shortly after 4 a.m., an hour before his KIIS-FM show goes on the air, and continues late mornings at E! where Seacrest works on "E! News Daily" and other programs he produces and hosts for the channel.

His day ends either at (a) CBS Television City, where "Idol" is taped; (b) the studios of "American Top 40," the radio countdown show he took over in 2004; (c) the L.A. bureau of CNN, whenever King needs a sub; (d) wherever he is when he's developing his fashion line or; (e) home, which will soon be the $11.5 million Hollywood Hills manse Seacrest reportedly took off Kevin Costner's hands.

Why he takes all the work is a mystery. Why he gets the work isn't.

First, as he proved during that debut season of "American Idol," Seacrest is one steady Eddie. He told a reporter in 2003 that he saw his role on the show to provide "emotional support" for the contestants.

Fox didn't think that was enough. The network wanted to bring back Dunkleman, but he walked away (recently he told The Associated Press he had found the show too "cruel" for his blood). In Season 2, Fox tried pairing Seacrest with "special correspondent" Kristen Holt before eventually seeing the light.

Dunkleman failed to grasp that "Idol," and most such programs, need an unusual talent at the center, part lion tamer (for managing the oversized egos of the judges), part mayor (for managing the fragile egos of the talent). Jeff Probst understood that in the early seasons of CBS' "Survivor" and worked his way up from a peripheral role on the show to bona fide TV star. I also notice that bossy Nancy O'Dell is no longer host of "Nashville Star," the country music version of "Idol," and her place has been taken by the warm, supportive Wynonna.

The other reason Seacrest is in demand is that he brings order and decorum to what could easily be televised chaos. That was never more apparent than in his transformation of E!'s red carpet specials this winter.

"American Idol" made Seacrest famous; now the megahost is climbing the pop culture latter by diving into radio and other TV ventures.

E!'s carpet had been red with embarrassment for years, from the tawdry fashion pronouncements of Joan Rivers to Star Jones' fawning interviews with her celeb pals to, most recently, an incident just days after Seacrest signed with E! when designer/interviewer Isaac Mizrahi grabbed actress Scarlett Johansson's breast.

On Oscar night, though, it was a different E!. Longtime fans may lament the dialing-down of the channel's schlock quotient, but the Oscar red carpet was clearly more professional under Seacrest. Mizrahi behaved himself ("I'm not going to talk about body parts anymore, or underwear, I've been warned," he said during the telecast). Seacrest was unflappable, directing traffic, and he kept the show moving at a faster clip than usual while tossing off his quota of innocuous comments.

"It almost depresses me her skin is so perfect," he sighed as he gazed at starlet Jessica Alba.

Comments like those, unfortunately, have become grist for an unseemly gossip game being played by people who are really interested in what team Seacrest plays for. The thinking, such as it may be, is that Seacrest should be ogling someone like Alba, not making girlie comments about her skin.

Jay Leno told this joke recently on the "Tonight Show": "The rumor is that Teri Hatcher is dating Ryan Seacrest in an attempt to get George Clooney's attention. Oddly enough, Ryan is dating Teri for the exact same reason."

For his part, Seacrest said it goes with the territory.

"I love it," he told reporters in January. "If you're uncomfortable being the butt of the joke, then you're taking yourself in those roles too seriously. I've fortunately gotten to a place or always been in a place where I laugh at myself, too."

Growing up, Seacrest said, his American idol was Dick Clark, who used his "Bandstand" to build a production factory that specialized in churning out low-cost, high-appeal shows like "Bloopers" and "The $20,000 Pyramid," theme restaurants and much more.

Seacrest said he "had sat with Dick Clark years ago and asked him what his advice was, and asked him what he did to get to where he was."

So it was both touching and appropriate that Seacrest would work side by side with Clark, clearly addled by the effects of a stroke, in putting on this year's "Dick Clark's New Year's Rockin' Eve." At the end, Clark turned to his co-host Seacrest, hugged him and gave him a kiss on the cheek.

"It was a special moment personally and professionally," Seacrest recalled.

Philly meets Detroit and gets funky with R&B tribute album

By Rob Watson
Knight Ridder Newspapers

PHILADELPHIA — It wasn't hard to tell it was another special moment, as camera flashes lit up the recording studio. It was Bunny Sigler and he was shining, again.

The 65-year-old singer and producer had grabbed Honey Bobby Eli's guitar, and started laying down licks to a song he helped compose, the O'Jays' "When the World's at Peace."

"Oh, man," said Eli, grinning, "that's some swampy funk." Sigma Sound engineer Gene Leone nodded.

"I didn't even know he could play, but I've heard him sing opera before — he's a bad dude," funkmaster George Clinton would say later.

For connoisseurs of Philly soul, the scene last week at the Studio, on the third floor of a warehouse in Philadelphia's Old City neighborhood, was like an R&B version of a winning fantasy football team. And pulling it together has been the dream of Phil Hurtt, the award-winning Philly International producer.

Since January, Hurtt's new label, Soul Renaissance Records, has been recording "A Soulful Tale of Two Cities," with Philly artists, songwriters, and producers performing songs from Detroit's Motown era, and Detroit artists re-creating The Sound of Philadelphia.

With a June 6 release date for the album, there's no stopping them now.

"It was really about the people whom I had always considered masters but weren't getting the recognition I thought they deserved," said Hurtt, 64, who has 11 gold and platinum records under his belt, including the Spinners' "I'll Be Around," which he penned with his high school classmate Thom Bell.

"Take Bunny, for example. I had worked with Bunny writing stuff back in the '70s, and even today he can flat-out blow 99.9 percent of the artists off the stage. We have the tracks to back it up," Hurtt said.

That might be an understatement. Not only does Sigler sing a version of the Marvin Gaye-Tammi Terrell classic "Ain't Nothing Like the Real Thing," but Hurtt — who started out singing doo-wop with his older brother in the '50s — takes on the Temptations' "Girl's Alright With Me."

Other artists representing Philly include Jean Carn, singing Stevie Wonder's "Higher Ground;" Blue Magic's Ted Mills, doing "Shop Around"; and the Delfonics' William "Poogie" Hart, crooning "Just Ask the Lonely."

All these Detroit standards are being remade in Philly and produced by Hurtt and Eli, backed by members of MFSB, Kenny Gamble and Leon Huff's Philly International house band during the '70s.

In Detroit, the sessions are being produced by Motown hitmaker Lamont Dozier and Clay McMurray, and backed by the Funk Brothers.

"For the most part, the Motown sound had more of a happiness to it," said Patricia Cosby, widow of the late Motown composer and session man Hank Cosby. "Where with the Philly sound, if you weren't in love, you were going to fall in love before the song was over."

When Hurtt was putting together Soulful Tales, Eli was an obvious pick. He wasn't just an original member of MFSB, and a producer of such R&B chart-toppers as Major Harris' Grammy-winning "Love Won't Let Me Wait." No, Hurtt and Eli go way back, much further than their days at Gamble and Huff's Philly International label.

"I called Bobby Eli first. Bobby and I went to high school together along with Thom Bell," said Hurtt. "I had to play it cool at first. I didn't want the idea to get out because if it did the majors would have stolen it, signed all the big names, and these guys wouldn't have gotten their due."

Playing it cool meant teasing Eli with a series of "what-if" meetings — as in, what if we could get so-and-so to record that song?

"One day, a couple of years ago, Phil called me up and said he had a great idea but he didn't want to divulge anything because if he told me he didn't think I would be able to sleep," said Eli. "Once I finally realized what we were talking about I almost fell out. I wondered why no one had thought about this before."

Tapping backers from years of running his own gospel label, Hurtt also wanted to make sure that the label could cover the recording expenses, so that the musicians weren't victimized, as some had been in the past.

"The average age of the participants in this project is 62 — they shouldn't have to worry about any of that stuff," he said.

For Sigler, who had been doing occasional club dates, the experience has been more than he expected when he was contacted by Hurtt last year.

"I was supposed to do two songs and wound up doing four, maybe five, and then working on the whole thing," said Sigler. "It's kept me busier than I have been in years, and we are in a groove now that's like back in the day."

Phil Hurtt, George Clinton and Bunny Sigler harmonize before beginning a studio recording in Philadelphia earlier this month.

The groove is like "back in the day" in Detroit, as well. In those sessions, Freda Payne covered the Stylistics' "Betcha by Golly, Wow"; Bobby Taylor of the Vancouvers did the Harold Melvin and the Blue Notes classic "If You Don't Know Me by Now"; and Dozier sang Billy Paul's "Me and Mrs. Jones" and Teddy Pendergrass' "Close the Door."

Dozier said the last thing he wanted to do was change how these songs made people feel when they first took over the airwaves and slow-drag time on the dance floor.

"Billy Paul's song is hard to beat," said Dozier. "I made it my own with a couple of little things, but I wasn't really going to fool with his thing. I ain't crazy."

Another voice that will throw listeners for a loop is one they've probably heard, but not like this. Detroit native George Clinton heard about the "Soulful Tales" project only three weeks ago. In Philadelphia for an event at Temple University, he stopped in the studio Monday to record "Love Won't Let Me Wait." Then he fell under the same spell as the other performers: He wanted to do more.

So — in between reminiscing, and taking part in extraordinary impromptu doo-wop sessions with Hurtt and Sigler — Clinton covered the Soul Survivors' "Expressway to Your Heart" and "When the World's at Peace."

"It was fun to go back in the day like that, and eventually more [musicians] are going to be down with this," Clinton said. "This is going to be big, man, and even radio is going to have some fun with this thing."

Coachella lineup underwhelming

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

Jan. 31: The Coachella Valley Music & Arts Festival, arguably the nation's finest festival and one of the most influential showcases of new and veteran cutting-edge artists, announces its hotly anticipated seventh lineup.

"Hotly" is an understatement, actually. Speculation had been rampant all month, partly fueled by a fake poster, widely circulated on the Internet, indicating a much-rumored Smashing Pumpkins reunion would top one of the weekend's two bills.

Would that indeed occur? Would, say, the Red Hot Chili Peppers make another stop at the two-stages-three-tents gathering to promote a coming double album? Or what about those fearless freaks the Flaming Lips — might they return and concoct something even crazier than Wayne Coyne's famous walk-atop-the-crowd-inside-a-bubble-ball stunt?

No, no and no.

And no to the Strokes, the Arcade Fire, the White Stripes and Jack White's new Raconteurs project.

Instead, prog-metal giant Tool, the first repeat headliner, having preceded Rage Against the Machine at the end of the first Coachella in October 1999, would now close out the 2006 edition, scheduled for next weekend at the Empire Polo Field in Indio. Topping Day 1: Depeche Mode, the beloved electro-pop outfit which had very recently sold out several shows at various Southern California venues.

Thus, many Coachella regulars exhaled a sigh of slight disappointment.

Where, some wondered, was the big reunion act — a Pixies or Stooges or Gang of Four? Where was the major headliner to match Coldplay and Nine Inch Nails in 2005 or — the quadruple threat many contend cannot be beat — Radiohead ("the Pink Floyd of this generation," says Coachella organizer Paul Tollett), the Pixies, the Flaming Lips and the Cure in 2004?

But then it got worse.

Feb. 1: Bonnaroo Music and Arts Festival announces its hotly anticipated lineup. Since 2002, the larger, arguably more eclectic three-day festival has been staged annually before 80,000 people (almost twice as many as attend Coachella) on 700 acres of farmland in Manchester, Tenn., just outside of Nashville.

Some acts were expected: Grateful Dead mainstay Phil Lesh; Oysterhead, featuring former Phisher Trey Anastasio, Police drummer Stewart Copeland and Primus bassist Les Claypool; and improvisational bands like Moe and Rusted Root. The sort of acts, in other words, that established Bonnaroo's reputation as a void-filler in the jam-band scene.

Yet in recent years the event has wildly expanded its roster to include more rootsy rock legends — the coming incarnation, June 16-18, spotlights Elvis Costello, Tom Petty and Bonnie Raitt — and edgier fare from outside the mainstream.

This year, for instance, Coachella scored rapper Common, Hasidic reggae star Matisyahu, breakout acts Clap Your Hands Say Yeah and the Magic Numbers and late-blooming critics' favorites like My Morning Jacket and Cat Power.

Bonnaroo has all of them as well. Plus Bright Eyes. And Death Cab for Cutie, Sonic Youth and the Streets. And Ben Folds and the Dresden Dolls.

And Beck — who hasn't properly played Coachella since '99.

And Radiohead, in its only state-side date announced so far this year.

"That Bonnaroo lineup is just creepy, it's so good," says surfer-turned-songwriter Donavon Frankenreiter, who last year played Coachella and this year appears at Bonnaroo. "It's like Woodstock, but, like, times a million."

Thus, a whole lot of Coachella regulars have had to ask themselves: "Well, if I can only go to one festival this year ...?"

Tollett, the Goldenvoice concert promoter who hatched Coachella as an American response to similar long-running English festivals like Glastonbury and Reading, is well aware that some people think Bonnaroo has Coachella beat this time out.

"That fake poster really hurt us," he admits. "That made it harder to announce our lineup when people were expecting that one. And you hate to be in the position of trying to explain why the bands you picked are better than what people were hoping.

"But, then, you gotta look at those expectations and realize that people trust this show a lot and think they deserve to have a good lineup. I'd rather have people be invested in the concept and be critical than not care at all."

'Akeelah' co-stars on parenting

By Rebecca Louie
New York Daily News

Angela Bassett plays Tanya, the single mother of a spelling bee contestant in "Akeelah and the Bee."

As a child, Angela Bassett listened to her mama.

A single mother and once nurse's aide, Betty Bassett ruled her Florida roost with a litany of laws: Hit the stoop when the street lamps come on. No friends in the house if I'm not there. Get your work done and then you can play. Go to college. College, college, college.

And when she scolded about grades, she passed her child wisdom that would stick for a lifetime.

"She told me, 'Get A's and B's, don't bring me a C,'" remembers Bassett, who plays a single mom in the spelling contest drama "Akeelah and the Bee." "'I don't have average children.'

"That sunk into my spirit and it was like, I'm not average. I'm not mediocre, and I shouldn't settle for that. All my years, it's followed me and impacts the decisions I make."

In "Akeelah," the way-above-average actress channels her mother's stern strategies as her character Tanya struggles to manage her inner-city household. When her 11-year-old daughter, Akeelah (Keke Palmer), trains for a spelling bee without her knowledge, Tanya is torn between nurturing Akeelah's talent and teaching her obedience.

Bassett reunites with Laurence Fishburne, her co-star in the Tina Turner biopic "What's Love Got to Do With It." Fishburne plays Dr. Larabee, a spelling coach haunted by tragedies in his past.

The film, which culminates at the Scripps National Spelling Bee in Washington, D.C., explores issues of parenting, community and self-esteem. It opens Friday.

Reflecting on her own upbringing gave Bassett great inspiration for her role.

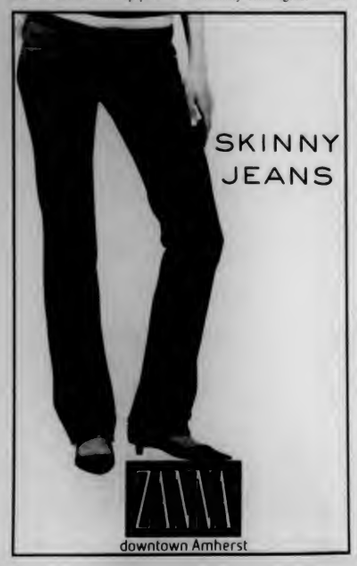
"I always thought my mom was pulling my coattail or just really rough on my sister and I," says Bassett, 47. "I understood later that there is a lot of pressure when you are single and got two girls growing up and you're trying to keep them protected and safe."

Bassett recalls the story of how her mother annulled a marriage just seven days after her abusive husband flew into a rage, fractured her nose and put her in the hospital. The man then proceeded to threaten to beat Angela, who was only in the ninth grade.

"My mother protected me," she says. "I was like, 'Oh, now I have to move. No more allowance.' But her actions showed me that you don't put up with certain things. You want as much of the positive in there for your children and as little of the negative as possible."

Protecting the young has, of late, become a tantamount concern of Bassett's. In January, she and husband Courtney B. Vance had twins Bronwyn Golden and Slater Josiah via a surrogate mom. Insisting on the best for her babies, she has found that it's difficult to find the proper care for little ones.

During her search for a nanny, one candidate was "very emotionally immature," remembers the new parent. "She talked all this great game about what it takes to raise twins and they will go through a jealousy phase and blah blah blah. Then when I turned my back, she put her finger in my baby's mouth. She said she was trying to see if she was hungry. I was like, 'WHAT?'



"I should have put my finger in that woman's mouth right then and there and said, 'How do you like it?'"

The real-life father to Langston, 19, and Montana, 14, Fishburne says the most important element in parenting a teen is unconditional love.

"That's it, love, period," says Fishburne, also a producer on "Akeelah." "At that age, everything is changing, hormones are raging, the body is changing and the mind is developing. The larger world becomes a concern, and [teenagers] wonder how one is going to move through it. Love is paramount."

However, the 45-year-old actor, who recently won the ShoWest Distinguished Decade of Achievement in Film Award, acknowledges that knowing what to do with that love is essential.

"What I continue to learn as a parent is to be mindful of the fact that I am responsible for being the parent that my children need me to be, and not necessarily the parent I want to be," he says. "We are our children's first teachers."

Look back on last year's wins

As fate would have it, UMass and Syracuse would meet yet again – just two weeks and a day later – on Garber Field in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

The Minutemen again held a sizeable, but not comfortable, fourth-quarter lead. But the Orange erased the 14-11 deficit with a 4-1 run that tied things up at 15 with 3:06 to play.

Morris went to work a couple minutes later, though, and scored one of the most famous goals in the college lacrosse world in 2005. From the right side of the cage, Morris backed in and forced his way through a crowd of defenders, turned around and quickly slung a low shot that beat goalie Jay Pfeifer with 72 seconds remaining.

It was a goal that landed him on SportsCenter's Top-10 Plays of the Week and one that Jack Reid will never forget, along with a couple other things from the pair of games.

"Zywicki's Canadian flip, which is a somersault in American terms, and Morris' shot was a big memory because he just willed the ball into the back of the net. There were a lot of big defensive plays that I will always remember, but no one really remembers defensive plays," Reid recalled with a laugh.

Zywicki, who scored six goals and added an assist in the May 15 matchup, was the last Minuteman to hold the ball that day and flung it high into the air to celebrate the historic victory.

"You get out there, especially in the playoff game, and no one gives you a chance to win because of Syracuse's streak and such," UMass coach Greg Cannella remembered. "You score a couple goals, you make a couple saves and you just feel the team starting to believe in themselves. I can remember that on the sideline in the first quarter."

Current senior captain Jake Deane echoed Cannella's comments.

"Those were two huge victories," Deane said. "They meant a lot to us because a lot of people doubted us in our second win. They only thought we could beat them the first time but didn't think we could beat them the second time."

Morris, however, resounded the confidence his teammates had within the locker room, saying the only reason the two wins were looked upon so highly were because of the "Syracuse lacrosse" brand name against another northern school without the same level of national respect.

"Those were two big wins for us, but we were the better team all year and we showed it," Morris said. "To be honest, we weren't surprised that we beat them last year. We expected it. I didn't feel like it was David and Goliath."

The aftermath of the two victories is obvious. It will help Cannella down the road from a recruiting standpoint since the playoff game was on national television, and it increased the UMass marketability to the everyday sports fan.

"With more media attention on lacrosse and with more visibility since that playoff game was on national television, it touched out to a lot of different places in the country," Cannella said. "People watched UMass do well. And anytime you watch a team do well, if you're a young kid, you go, 'Wow, look at that. They beat Syracuse, and Syracuse is such a great team. UMass must be a really great team, too.' You hope that helps you in recruiting a little bit."

Another byproduct of those two victories will be the hunger the Orange will display this time around. The sentiments will change, and on Saturday it will be Syracuse thirsting to shift the weight of the series.

"We're preparing for that," Deane said. "We don't mind the bull's eye. We know they're going to come after us and give it everything they've got. We've got to fight back and leave everything out on the field, and hopefully good things will happen."

Those comments resemble the attitude of this UMass team as a whole. They understand what happened last year but don't want to harp on it. They celebrated their 2005 accomplishments but know that won't get them anywhere in 2006. They love that they beat Syracuse twice in 15 days but still realize the two teams still start at 0-0 on Saturday afternoon.

It's almost time to write another chapter.

Junior midfielder Sam Moody and UMass will look to repeat last year's success against Syracuse on Saturday.

UM 'refuses to lose'

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

It's been 10 years since the phrase "Refuse to Lose" was used with any regularity in Amherst, but the motto made famous by John Calipari's basketball team in the 1990s could very well be used to describe the way the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team played in Tuesday's 7-6 come-from-behind win over Fairfield.

While the Minutemen aren't about to adopt any catchphrases, UMass coach Greg Cannella believes that his players have developed a mental toughness.

"It's more of an 'I'm never going to quit' attitude. You have to love seeing that out of your group — particularly in your leaders, because a lot of younger guys will follow that," Cannella said.

UMass' leaders played a huge role in the comeback, during which the Maroon and White scored three goals in the final 1:03 to erase a two-goal deficit and escape with a win.

Seniors Brian Jacovina, Sean Morris and Jake Deane scored the three clutch goals, while fellow senior Jack Reid picked up a crucial groundball off of a Deane face-off win which led to the game-winning goal.

The play that could serve as the model for this squad's never-say-die attitude was the one that Deane turned in to set up his game-winning score.

After battling for the face-off, the ball rolled to Fairfield's side of the field, where it appeared that a Stag would scoop it up. Deane, though, would not let that happen, as he laid out and tipped the ball away from the Fairfield player with his stick, redirecting the ball to Reid.

With Reid in control of the ball, Deane broke towards Fairfield's goal and positioned himself just outside the crease. Reid dished the ball off to sophomore Rory Pedrick, who found Deane on the doorstep. From there Deane deposited the game-winner, the fifth goal of the season for the face-off specialist.

Deane feels that the comeback win shows that the Minutemen are never out of a game.

"I know the guys on this team don't quit," Deane said. "You might knock us down a little bit, but we're going to get right back up and fight until the end. We're down but never out."

Like Cannella, Reid said that the team's leaders stepped up to prevent a loss that would have been a devastating blow to the team's hopes for an at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament.

"We were doing everything we could to keep [a loss] from happening," Reid said. "The seniors have been talking, and sometimes at tough times, people have to put things on their backs and just get it done, and I think you saw that from a couple of guys yesterday."

The dramatic conclusion made up for a mostly forgettable first 59 minutes of the game. The key for UMass will be to sustain the sense of urgency that it played with in the game's final minute in the beginning of games, beginning with this Saturday's battle with No. 9 Syracuse.

"I'd like to see the intensity and the urgency carry over," Reid said. "Guys were playing with a lot of fire in that last five minutes trying to make that comeback happen. As far as playing the game, we could have played much better, but I'd like to carry that emotion over."

Senior longstick midfielder Jake Deane scored the game-winning goal with 34 seconds left in a 7-6 win over Fairfield on Tuesday.

"It's turned into a big rivalry," senior long-stick midfielder Jake Deane said. "It's just like any other game in the way we prepare, but in the back of our minds, we know that they hate us and we hate them."

Plus, Syracuse will always draw a crowd. It's a team that has an amazing winning tradition, and, as Jack Reid put it, "Even if you don't know lacrosse well, you still know who Syracuse is."

"People want to see Syracuse," Cannella said. "People want to see them lose because they're so successful. They're jealous. They want to see Syracuse, but at the same time, they're UMass fans so they want to see us win. Maybe that's why they call it a rivalry."

The simple fact is the word "rivalry" is nothing more than a label. Call it what you want, but when UMass and Syracuse get together, that alone is good enough for me.

Eagles outlast UMass

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — When Boston College junior Pete Frates stepped to the plate in yesterday's non-conference matchup between the Eagles and the Massachusetts men's baseball team, three hours and 10 minutes had passed since the opening pitch slapped the mitt of BC catcher Sean McGill.

During that 190-minute span, the Minutemen (9-20, 7-8 Atlantic 10) battled BC through a rocky 12 innings, which yielded a seven-run frame, a five-run frame and a sequence of five straight UMass hits in the top of the second inning.

By the time the 12th inning rolled around, the two teams had gone scoreless for three innings, and the monotony of stellar late-game pitching lulled the crowd into submission.

Boston College	11

However, with two outs in the bottom of the 12th, Frates ended it all with one violent swing, sending senior David Sullivan's offering over the right field fence and into the long shadows of the late spring afternoon. It gave BC the 11-10 win — its 23rd of the season — and sent the downtrodden Minutemen back to Amherst with could-ofs and should-ofs ringing in their ears.

Ryan Franczek led the Minutemen at the plate — 2-for-5, two runs, one RBI, one walk — followed by Adam Tempesta (1-for-5, three RBIs, one run) and Lou Proietti (1-for-5, two runs, two RBIs.)

Sullivan — 1 2/3 innings, one hit, one run and the Frates homer — gave up the game-winning blast after retiring five straight Eagles starting in the 11th. When Frates made contact, however, everyone knew that the game was over.

"I could tell that [the home run] was long enough to get out," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "[Sullivan] left it over the plate and the kid hammered it. It's too bad because David pitched well and he's been pitching well."

UMass had a chance to close things out in the ninth inning. Mitchell Eilenberg walked the lead-off batter and Stone yanked him in favor of Bryan Adamski — he inherited Eilenberg's runner who had advanced to third; with one out and the infield in, BC's Eric Campbell hit a hard grounder a few feet to Tempesta's left; the second baseman lunged for the ball but it scooted under his glove and into right field, plating the runner at third and tying the game at 10.

After Frates' homer, the teams lined up and the players shook hands. The Eagles crowded around their coach and hollered loudly for Frates, the hero of the day. On the UMass side, it was somewhat different.

The Minutemen haven't had the best of seasons — they're currently a significant 11 games below the .500 mark — and every chance for a win is cherished. Yesterday, UMass had a shot at defeating a decent opponent from the talented Atlantic Coast Conference, and the near-miss was devastating.

The UMass players gathered their gear together in the shadows of the concrete monster (the BC parking garage), which loomed over the field. They left in silence. Some grabbed the back of their heads with both hands in frustration. Others went quietly to the Peter Pan bus that awaited the team.

Stone was his usual quiet self, but the agony was visible. He knew his team just blew a game that it could have, and should have, won.

"We should have won that game," he muttered. "By the time we got into our third pitcher we were up in the game. I thought we could win. I figured we were going to win the game."

Stone made more visits to the hill than he wanted to yesterday. The Minutemen threw five hurlers — Ryan Walczak, Eilenberg, Sullivan, Adamski and Rory McDonald — who gave up 11 runs and scattered 12 hits in as many innings.

Walczak started and ran into trouble early. He was missing up in the zone and couldn't throw his off-speed stuff for strikes.

BC hitters were patient. After right fielder Derrick Durepo misjudged a fly ball from BC's leadoff hitter — allowing the runner to advance to third base to start the game — Walczak hit the No. 2 batter in the back, putting runners on first and third.

Walczak singed two fastballs by the next hitter before allowing a lined shot through the hole, which scored BC's first run of the game. Stone quickly got Eilenberg up in the bullpen, but Walczak gave up two more before he took the hill. The Eagles scored three runs in the bottom of the first frame.

The Minutemen, however, responded with authority in the top of the second.

Adamski led off with a laser to left field, which could have been a double if it hadn't been cut off nicely by the BC left fielder. Catcher Bryan Garrity was next and he was plunked in the back. A balk moved Garrity and Adamski to second and third.

Freshman Jim Macdonald fouled out for the first out — then the Minutemen ravaged the BC pitching staff: UMass laced five straight base hits before Tempesta ended the streak with a rocket at the center-fielder, which plated Franczek, who tagged up from third.

The inning ended with Garrity's second at-bat of the frame, but seven runs were on the board and UMass had a 7-3 lead after 1 1/2 innings.

"We battled back," Stone said. "We were down early and we put some solid at-bats together."

Eilenberg replaced Walczak with one out in the first inning and held the Eagles in check after the explosion in the bottom of the third inning, when BC erupted for five runs to take an 8-7 lead.

Eilenberg threw 7 1/3 innings and allowed seven runs on seven hits and five walks. He faced 25 BC hitters, eight more than the other four UMass pitchers combined.

"Eilenberg came in and gave us some solid innings," Stone said. "We just couldn't hang onto the lead."

After BC's No. 2 hitter, with the bases juiced, hit a full-swing dribbler down the third base line in the bottom of the third inning — which scored the Eagles' seventh run of the game — the two team's lines were the same: seven runs, seven hits.

With 14 total runs scored in three innings, a three and a half hour-game didn't seem far fetched. But both pitching staffs calmed down and threw three straight scoreless innings — fourth, fifth, sixth — after the early fireworks.

UMass cruises past Blue Devils

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Sophomore left fielder Lauren Proctor went 2-for-4 with two runs scored in yesterday's 9-3 win over Central Connecticut State.

The Massachusetts softball team overcame a rough start in New Britain, Connecticut, Wednesday to earn its 19th win in its last 21 games. Freshman Whitney Mollica broke another UMass batting record, adding the single-season home run mark for a freshman to go along with the school's single-season RBI record, as the Minutewomen defeated Central Connecticut State 9-3 in a non-conference game that was rescheduled twice before finally getting underway.

The meeting between the two teams was originally slated as a doubleheader for last Thursday, April 20, but UMass ended up hosting Harvard that day, a meeting that was moved up from this week. The Minutewomen then prepared to travel to Connecticut yesterday, but due to the forecast of rain, the game was once again moved.

The Minutewomen will return to Atlantic 10 action Friday, when they take on Dayton in an afternoon doubleheader. The first game will start at 3 p.m. at the UMass Softball Complex.

Once play finally began yesterday, the Minutewomen fell behind early. The Blue Devils grabbed three unearned runs in the first inning to give them the early lead. After a bunt-single and a hit batter, Brandice Balschmiter walked the bases loaded without recording an out.

On the next play, CCSU scored two unearned runs on an error by second baseman Kristi Stefanoni. Balschmiter settled down, striking out the next two batters, but followed it up by walking the next two, allowing another unearned run.

The Minutewomen came back in the third inning with two runs. Shortstop Stacy Cullington hit a bases-loaded triple to left center field with two outs, knocking in a pair of runs. Mollica, who started the play at first, tried to score as well, but was thrown out at the plate, ending the inning with UMass down 3-2.

In the fourth inning, the Minutewomen put the game out of reach. Right fielder Lesley Ferrara hit a three-run home run with no outs to put UMass up 5-3. Then, with two outs, Mollica hit her record-breaking 10th homer of the year to center field.

The Minutewomen poured it on in the top of the seventh, scoring two more runs. Left fielder Lauren Proctor started off the inning with a one-out double. Then, after Samantha Salato walked, Ferrara singled to load the bases.

Stefanoni then made up for her error in the first with an RBI single, scoring Proctor from third. Amanda Morin got into the action as well, singling to center to drive in Salato. The Minutewomen took a six-run lead into the bottom of the seventh.

Balschmiter closed out the game with a 1-2-3 seventh inning, giving the Maroon and White the victory. She finished the game with 10 strikeouts, five walks, and allowed three runs, all of them unearned. The game marks the ninth time she has had double digit strikeouts in a game.

UMass out-hit the Blue Devils 15-1, led by home runs from Mollica and Ferrara. The Minutewomen got plenty of help from the top of the order, as Morin and Candice Molinari, the team's No. 1 and 2 batters, each went 3-for-5 on the day. Cullington was also hot at the plate, going 2-for-3 with a single and a triple.

Mollica's homer in the fourth moved her past Brandi Cross, who hit nine round-trippers in 2000.

Questions still linger for Young

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

Nobody quite knows what to make of Vince Young.

A quarterback? For sure. The best one on this weekend's draft board? Well, it's funny how a player's stock can rise and fall in the span of weeks and months.

The Texas quarterback, one of the best "athletes" in the draft, once struggled so much with the Longhorns that some felt he'd be better off at another position. These days, that conversation is long gone. But so is some of the luster from his Rose Bowl performance, a game in which he led the Longhorns to the national title and, at least for a time, surpassed USC's Matt Leinart in many opinions as the best quarterback, maybe the best player, in the draft.

"It's been kind of up and down," said ESPN draft expert Mel Kiper, who most recently rated Young the fourth-best player available. "But my attitude is that any quarterback taken in the draft is going to be a project."

Floyd Reese, general manager for the Tennessee Titans, who are considering taking Young with the third pick, said "I don't think I've seen a quarterback with the athleticism he has, and we had Steve McNair for a while."

Indeed, Young's athleticism is stunning. And his timing was impeccable. He showed off the whole package, playing for the national title on Jan. 4 in the Rose Bowl. He passed for 267 yards, ran for 200 more and scrambled 8 yards on fourth down with 19 seconds left for the winning touchdown — his third of the night — in a 41-38 win over Leinart and USC.

It was sweet redemption for the junior out of Houston, who was bitterly disappointed after losing the Heisman Trophy to USC's Reggie Bush. And Young outplayed Leinart, who came into the game viewed as the better, more polished, more NFL-ready quarterback.

Suddenly, a player who wasn't even sure if he would leave Texas looked like he might be the best player in the college game. He decided to go pro. With his home-town team, the Houston Texans, picking first, many thought it would be a perfect fit.

"I walked into the grocery store the other day and some guy was hollering Vince's name at me from three aisles over," said Houston's new coach, Gary Kubiak. "I've been places where people are talking about Reggie Bush. I guess I don't see it that way as much as some people may see it."

Like most coaches who have seen Young work out, Kubiak said he was impressed. Still, the Texans signed David Carr to a three-year extension in February, signaling the probability they're set at quarterback for a while.

Minutemen and Orange renew rivalry on Saturday

KAREN WINKLER/COLLEGIAN

April 30, 2005: UMass 14, Syracuse 13 (OT)

UMass players celebrate after a dramatic win over the Orange at Garber Field. Syracuse erased a five-goal deficit in the fourth quarter to force overtime, but Jeff Zywicki's goal 50 seconds into the extra session gave the Minutemen the victory. The win was the first of two for UMass over Syracuse last season.

Former Minuteman Chris Doyle celebrates after his first period goal gave UMass a 4-2 lead in the first round of the NCAA Tournament against Syracuse last year at Garber Field. The Minutemen went on to win 16-15, knocking the Orange out prior to the NCAA semifinals for the first time since 1981.

On Tuesday, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse spotted the Fairfield Stags a 6-4 lead late in the fourth quarter before coming to life and scoring three goals in the final 1:03 to pull out a one-goal win.

If the No. 11 Minutemen (9-3, 4-2 ECAC) wait that long to turn it on in Saturday's 2 p.m. matchup at No. 9 Syracuse, it's safe to say that they probably won't have the same chance for a last-minute comeback.

"It's going to be a high scoring game and we need to match that on offense," senior attacker Sean Morris said. "This game has always been a shootout, and we have to be prepared to score 13 or 14 goals."

While Syracuse (6-4) has the ability to put big numbers on the board, UMass coach Greg Cannella believes his defense, which hasn't allowed more than eight goals in any of the past five games, will be up to the task.

"[Syracuse is] extremely explosive," Cannella said. "You look at their lineup, and they have very talented players and any one of them could really burn you. It's going to be a tough matchup for us defensively, but we've buckled down in the last four or five games and really done a great job. It's our hope that we can defend Syracuse the way we've defended other schools."

The defense took a major blow earlier this week with the loss of sophomore David Von Voigt to a calf injury. Cannella said he hopes that Von Voigt will be able to comeback at some point, but with only a week left in the regular season and Von Voigt currently on crutches, a return seems unlikely.

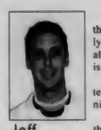
As the defense has hit its stride, the Minuteman offense has encountered a rough patch. UMass entered the week as the third most prolific offense in the country, averaging 11.5 goals per game, but has scored just 13 in the last two games.

"I don't what it is; maybe guys are playing a little bit tense," said Morris, who leads the nation in scoring. "I don't know, but it needs to change come Saturday. We need to get back to what we were doing and play confident and know that we can do it."

Cannella agrees that some players' confidence levels may be a little low, especially after Tuesday's game, in which UMass took 47 shots but netted just seven.

"The only thing is that you have to go out there and play with confidence," Cannella said. "We haven't been able to finish the ball very well, but you have to snap out of that. We talk about going to the next play and you hope that guys are mentally tough enough so that they can do that."

Another challenge facing the Minutemen on Saturday will be playing in the Carrier Dome. UMass was able to knock off the Orange in dramatic fashion twice last year, but both wins came at home on Garber Field. The Minutemen are 0-10 all-time in the Dome.



"It's a really hard place to play," Cannella said. "The acoustics on the field are horrible; you can't hear, so communication-wise, it's pretty tough on the field.

"The fact that Syracuse is always so good is another reason why people hate to go there. We've talked a lot about being mentally tough and certainly we need to do that — just go out there and play and not think about the environment."

Senior defenseman Jack Reid isn't intimidated by the Dome or concerned with the NCAA Tournament implications of Saturday's game. For Reid, squaring off against the Orange is enough to get him fired up to play.

"I love playing in this game," Reid said. "I don't care about anything else right now. I just want to play in this game. Forget the NCAAs and all that stuff, all that's on the line right now is this one game."

Determining what makes a real rivalry

Jeff Howe

Staring through the scope of the barrel, the crosshairs are firmly in place. The ammunition has already been loaded, and the trigger is cocked back.

But for the first time ever, the team wearing the bull's eye is donning maroon and white.

"Yeah, you could probably say that," Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella said. "That's pretty accurate, no doubt."

The Minutemen are the ones being hunted by Syracuse this time around. They're the ones who own the bragging rights, the ones who beat the Orange twice last year, the ones who stopped Syracuse's season short of the Final Four for the first time in 22 years.

UMass used to be an old-fashioned whipping stick to the 'Cuse, but since the Minutemen have done a lot to even the playing field by winning three of the last four games with the Orange, this is starting to turn into the rivalry that everyone has been calling for — depending on who is asked.

"Yankees, Red Sox; now that's a rivalry," Cannella exclaimed. "In order to have a rivalry, you need some competition. If you want to call it a rivalry just because of the last games, we won three of them. Before that, we hadn't won since 1981, so you can't call it a rivalry when it was so one-sided — until you beat a team and become consistent with that, and I don't think we've done that yet.

"I don't think it's a rivalry, and everyone wants to call it that. Maybe because of our success, people here want to call it that a little bit more, but you've got to be consistent over a stretch rather than just a couple games."

"I feel like it is [a rivalry] and always has been," senior attackman Sean Morris said. "They get up for us, and I know we get up for them. I think they're going to be fired up for us because we knocked them out of the tournament last year, and they'll be gunning for us. We have to be ready to play."

"I think it's a rivalry since I got to this school," senior defenseman Jack Reid said. "Maybe it isn't when you look down the line in history because it was so long since we beat them. But as far as the class of 2006 is concerned, you have to consider it a rivalry."

Heading into this weekend's contest, the atmosphere should definitely — pardon the pun — rival that of any big time athletic event, whether it's on the college or professional level.

Syracuse will be out for blood. The Orange were heavily criticized last year when no one stepped up to wear the Holy Grail number "22" for the first time in — fittingly, or maybe unfittingly — 22 years. The character of their leadership was in question, and after losing to UMass twice in a span of 15 days, there was an unfair amount of speculation as to whether Syracuse's dominance could survive long-term in the post-Powell days.

Add Jeff Zywicki's infamous "Canadian flip" after the April 30 overtime victory in response to Mike Powell's famous rally cry, and the Orange have all the incentive they need to re-shift the balance of this lacrosse war.

Revisiting last year's two historic victories

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The headline on the sports page of the Collegian read "Déjà vu all over again" on May 2 of last year. Senior Jeff Zywicki had just scored an overtime goal to knock off Syracuse by a 14-13 score for the second straight time these two heralded clubs met at Garber Field.

It was eerily and unpredictably predictable. Zywicki knew it all along.

"Tell them how I called the overtime goal yesterday," Zywicki gleamed when he was walking by Sean Morris, who was surrounded by a pack of media members.

"He did," Morris — Zywicki's roommate at the time — acknowledged. "We were talking about it at the house ... and we were just saying nonchalantly about how it was going to be a close game, and if someone sticks the game-winner, we've got to do a front flip in front of their bench because they rubbed it into us last year. He did it. He stuck it and ran and did it. He backed it up."

Zywicki's eternally dubbed "Canadian flip" was the first thing he did after scoring the extra-frame goal, a fitting celebration for a team that hung onto the most dramatic of victories in program history. The Minutemen had a five-goal cushion with less than nine minutes to play in the April 30 contest, but Syracuse stormed back to tie the game at 13 with 28.4 seconds left on the game clock.

The Orange proceeded to win the overtime's opening draw, and a shot by Brian Crockett pinged off the post before the Minutemen recovered, took the ball downfield and kicked off the party during the campus' Spring Weekend.

UMass mourns loss of beloved faculty member

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A former professor of education at the University of Massachusetts and advocate for educational access and diversity died of natural causes on April 24 at the age of 74.

Norma Jean Anderson of Shutesbury became a faculty member at the University in the 1970s when she assumed the duties of associate dean of student and alumni affairs. In charge of admissions, degree-granting and placement at the school, she led efforts to recruit a more diverse student body, according to the UMass News Office.

Of the 700 graduate students who were enrolled after Anderson began her new position, about half the students were of color and half were women. Anderson is also credited to attracting now-celebrity comedian Bill Cosby and his wife Camille to UMass.

"My wife, Camille, and I have lost a dear friend with the passing of Norma Jean Anderson," Cosby said to the UMass News Office. "She was the advisor for both of us in graduate programs at UMass Amherst, and she served as a lifelong inspiration. As a faculty member in the School of Education, she blended family with professional life 24 hours per day. Students would be in her home until 2 or 3 in the morning, where she made sure we were getting the help we needed. Mrs. Cosby and I attribute our lifelong commitment to education, and what we have achieved in this field, to the influence of Norma Jean Anderson."

According to the UMass News Office, Anderson was also one of the founders of the Organizational Development Program and ran a special master's degree program that annually admitted 15 students without bachelor's degrees but whose potential and life experience qualified them for acceptance. During the program's 15 years of operation, Anderson said later, every one of the students earned a master's degree and more than half went to complete doctorates.

After retiring from the faculty in 1994, Anderson continued her involvement with issues of educational diversity.

Johnston jury hears closing arguments

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — After a three-week trial that ran the gamut from shocking to heartbreaking, the 16 person jury in the trial of a man accused of killing a former University of Massachusetts student heard closing arguments yesterday.

Bryan R. Johnston, 24, of Westfield, shot and killed UMass student David E. Sullivan, then 22, with a .223-caliber rifle on Dec. 7, 2004, police say.

Johnston faces charges of murder, armed burglary, possession of a large-capacity firearm, and use of a firearm in the commission of a felony.

If convicted Johnston, who pled not guilty by means of insanity on April 5, automatically will be sentenced to life in prison.

Johnston's defense attorney Alexander Nappan contended that Johnston suffers from schizophrenia, a claim that was submitted by two professional forensic psychologists during the trial.

"This has been a battle. The commonwealth couldn't produce an expert that would testify that Johnston was not suffering from a mental illness," said Nappan. "We produced two."

Nappan illustrated for the jury the gradual change in Johnston's behavior, a change that included delusions that the Korean Mafia was "after him" and than his best friend, Sullivan, was planning to kill him.

Nappan argued that as Johnston's friends grew older and separated from him, Johnston slowly lost his mind.

"As his world grew smaller and smaller it became more fearful. As his friends branched out and moved into adulthood, they became less and less involved in his life he, had to use alcohol and drugs to medicate him," said Nappan. "Doesn't this express the actions of a delusional man ready to explode?"

Nappan asked the jury to trace Johnston's behavior from the months prior to Sullivan's murder to the months during Johnston's stay at the Hampshire County House of Corrections.

"Doctors at Hampshire County House of Corrections gave Johnston an anti-psychotic drug," said Nappan. "You can trace his reduction in bizarre behavior from that time."

Nappan pleaded with the jury to find Johnston not guilty of murder.

"I'm not asking you to feel sorry for him. I'm asking 'isn't what you've all learned from this trial was a man was delusional?' We've proved Bryan Johnston is mentally unstable," said Nappan. "If you [the jury] agree, than you must find him not guilty."

Prosecutor for the commonwealth, Renee Steese, argued that Johnston was criminally responsible during the murder of Sullivan.

"The commonwealth doesn't have to prove that Johnston is sane," said Steese. "We just have to prove that he was criminally responsible during the act of the crime."

Steese said that Johnston's heavy consumption of drugs led to his erratic behavior.

"Dr. Welner testified that heavy consumption of drugs would cause delusions to be present and that when the drug abuse dissipated so would the frequency of delusions," said Steese. "But Johnson never stopped using drugs. He used cocaine, he used weed and he drank a great deal of alcohol."

"We've proved that the defendant was able to appreciate the wrongfulness of his actions and conformed his behavior to the letter of the law," said Nappan. "That in itself is basis for a guilty charge."

Steese contended that the Sullivan's murder was deliberate and pre-meditated.

"On Dec. 6, 2004 Bryan Johnston drove to David's apartment at 105 Meadow St. in Amherst, walked in the front door without knocking because he doesn't want anyone to see him. Walks up the stairs, opens David's door, shoots him six times and walks out," said Nappan. "This was a deliberate act, which proves he was able to think coherently and clearly during the time of the murder."

UMass students on their way to class yesterday were greeted by yellow boxes inspired by the "Super Mario Brothers" series of video games seemingly floating in midair.

Although not filled with 1-Ups or assorted growth-enhancing mushrooms, the boxes provided some much needed amusement for many that spotted them.

The "Mario blocks" were the brainchild of sophomore Dante Ciliberti, a merry prankster determined to make UMass a bit brighter and a little more pixilated.

Calling the project "Operation Mushroom Kingdom," Ciliberti and his crew used fishing line to suspend the colorful boxes all around campus.

"I'm just trying to make the campus look a lot prettier than it is," said Ciliberti.

A group of three Mario-minded friends assisted Ciliberti in hanging the boxes throughout the early morning yesterday.

Charlotte de Vries, a sophomore Mechanical Engineering major, along with fellow students Ed Charlebois and Devon Courtney helped string fishing line from trees, buildings and even sculptures across UMass.

The decoration process began around 2 a.m. and ended sometime around 4:30 a.m.

The first box to go up was tied to the infamous "Pants" sculpture in front of the Fine Arts Center. De Vries, carried on Courtney's shoulders, secured the block to the sculpture while Ciliberti climbed onto the roof of the FAC to suspend another box to the overhang in front of the entrance.

Next came the first of many tree-climbing expeditions, as the students strung a line across the small stone bridge near the FAC, so the block hovered over the heads of those that crossed the walkway. After insisting that the fishing line be tied as high up in the trees as possible, Ciliberti declared that anyone with a mind to take the box down would "have to work to destroy my [stuff]!"

Charlebois's acrobatic tree-climbing skills enabled him to dangle blocks from branches in front of Bartlett and Machmer halls, while Ciliberti scurried up another large tree to place a block floating by Knowels Hall. Another was suspended across the W.E.B. DuBois Library courtyard so that it seemed to float in the middle of the expanse.

The group employed the classic "throw the spool of line and hope it catches on some branches technique" to hoist yet more symbols of childhood memory above the stairs outside the Worchester DC and along the side of the campus pond.

Ciliberti's plans were working out perfectly, until the time came to execute his most ambitious scheme – raising one of his Nintendo creations above the Orchard Hill bowl. The original plan called for the line to be anchored onto the guardrails surrounding the seventh floor balconies of Webster and Dickinson. When it was discovered that the doors to the balconies were locked, an alternative arrangement was put into effect where the fishing line would have to be tied to portions of the dorms' windows.

Charlebois, standing on the second floor of Field, and de Vries, perched on the seventh floor of Dickinson, dropped the spools of fishing line out the windows once the ends were properly secured. Ciliberti then tied the loose ends together with the Mario block in the middle. As the lines were tightened, the box rose like a space shuttle lift-off high above the Bowl.

"That is brilliant," said Ciliberti as the box began to hang more than thirty feet above the ground. "I am so pleased."

However odd this may seem, the pranksters admit that the idea is not original.

"I heard about it happening at [U.C.] Berkeley," said Ciliberti, "I immediately thought, 'I have to do this at UMass.'"

A website created by the Berkeley fanatics provided detailed instructions for the creation of the iconic cubes. The Mario boxes began life as cardboard boxes from UPS. Some time spent in the Student Union's Craft Center with ten or so friends yielded the bright creations seen floating overhead yesterday. The team added yellow paper and spray painted the traditional orange question mark to create the videogame props. In all, the project cost only about $40-$50, which Ciliberti said he financed by selling bracelets made from forks that were "absolutely not stolen from the DC," which he sells for $5 each.

"We got a lot of odd looks," from passers-by during the blocks' creation in the Craft Center, de Vries said. "A few people would walk by and then we'd hear them humming the theme song," she added.

Ciliberti said that he hoped "everyone will get the cultural reference," of his "art project." In the end though, it's all about having fun.

"We're just hoping it brings a smile to people's faces," he said with a smirk of his own.

Construction set to continue

By Mike Sanchis
Collegian Staff

UMass students expecting a return to business as usual shouldn't hold their breath, as plans for construction currently extend through 2008.

That was the message communicated by James Cahill, Director of Facilities and Campus Planning, in a comprehensive presentation to the Faculty Senate last night.

In a forty minute PowerPoint presentation, which he originally said would take only fifteen minutes, Cahill listed a smorgasbord of construction projects, planned for both the east and west ends of campus, many of which are scheduled to be completed in July and August of this year. As part of the New Dirt campaign, which has been announced primarily through the ubiquitous signs springing up around campus, the plan encompasses both the construction of the new North Residential Area residence halls, currently on schedule to be finished by the start of next semester, as well as a new Central Heating Plant, to be fully operational in March 2008.

Most of the construction currently underway, such as the tunnel being built under North Pleasant Street near the Lederle tower, is intended primarily to route steam and heat lines to the eastern parts of campus, including the new residence halls that are being built next to the Sylvan residential area.

Cahill stressed the importance of "putting a good spin" on the construction.

"As much dirt as there is around and dust blowing and disruptions that detract from everything else, this is a good thing that's happening, and when it's all done it's going to be a better place," Cahill said. He then added, invoking

Student wins trading award

By Susan King
Collegian Staff

Alexander Epshteyn, a graduate student studying Computer Science at the University of Massachusetts, won third place in the first annual Interactive Brokers Electronic Trading Olympiad earlier this month.

The Olympiad was organized by the Interactive Broker's Group (IBG), the world-wide leader in market making and broker-dealer services, in order to encourage students to write computer programs to trade stocks or other market commodities through the application program interface (API) of IBG's Trader Workstation software. The contestants had to be graduate or undergraduate students studying computer science or engineering and no live support was given throughout the competition.

Contestants were given a fake sum of $100,000 to invest in anyway they chose. The object was to make the most amount of money they could after a ten week period.

Epshteyn said he had "originally envisioned trying to implement some artificial intelligence algorithms to make lots of trades every day based on market information received through the API". After realizing this strategy would require too much time, and the competition was already halfway through, he decided to write a program to invest almost all of his money in Google stock, which is the riskiest on the market.

"I knew that only taking a sizable risk would allow me to beat other students with just four weeks left in the competition," he said.

His investment became a roller coaster ride. Epshteyn said he would gain $40,000 one day and lose $60,000 the next day. However, Google's impending admittance into the Standard & Poor's 500 stock index earned him a $23,000 profit which gave him a share of the third place prize, which was $5,000 each.

Epshteyn said he had faith in Google because he worked for the company as an intern last summer.

"Attracting quality engineers has become a real challenge in the financial services industry," Sanders said. "Programmers must be close to trading operations in order to make quick changes; therefore, outsourcing these jobs does not make sense."

Epshteyn says he had no previous financial training and learned everything as the competition progressed. He earned his bachelor's in computer science and math from U Mass in 2004.

IBG will match the first, second and third-place prize money to the contestant's sponsoring university or college.

Congress plans for new oil taxes

By H. Josef Hebert
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congress considered billions of dollars in new taxes on oil companies Thursday, looking for ways to punish the cash-rich industry and soothe growing anger over high gasoline prices.

Senate Republicans also proposed a $100 fuel-cost rebate for millions of taxpayers, and Democrats talked of suspending the 18.4-cent federal gasoline tax for two months to ease Americans' pain at the pump.

But even as lawmakers jockeyed for political advantage on the volatile issue, there was widespread agreement among economists and energy experts that the government has few if any weapons to quickly drive down gasoline prices that have rushed past $3 a gallon across much of the country.

"Unfortunately there's nothing, really, that can be done that's going to affect energy prices or gasoline prices in the very short run," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke told a congressional hearing.

Still, lawmakers scrambled Thursday to put together legislative packages they hoped would — if at times only symbolically — demonstrate their sympathy for the nation's motorists and their willingness to stand up to Big Oil.

Congressional anxiety in this election year is increasing as major oil companies begin announcing huge first-quarter profits. Exxon Mobil Corp said Thursday it made more than $8 billion during the January-March period, the fifth largest opportunity and access. She served on a University of Pennsylvania committee that recruited and selected outstanding students for graduate studies in education and also worked as an educational consultant in the U.S., Europe, Asia and Africa. In addition, she developed curriculum and training programs for the U.S. Navy, U.S. Department of State, local government agencies and public school systems.

"Norma Jean Anderson served UMass Amherst with distinction and creativity," said UMass Amherst Chancellor John Lombardi. "She will be remembered for many things, among them her leadership in addressing issues of institutional racism and instilling the values of social justice at the School of Education and across the university."

"Norma Jean Anderson was a mentor to many faculty and students, not only in the School of Education but across the campus," said Provost and Senior Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Charlena Seymour. "She was a dynamic and effervescent woman with a glowing smile, someone who always made you feel comfortable in her presence. I know that when I arrived at UMass Amherst as a young faculty member, she was very helpful to me and my family."

She leaves her son, Rev. Carols W. Anderson of Montague; two daughters, Rhonda J. A. Gordon of Shutesbury and Rev. Crystal L. Roberson of Amherst, her adopted son, Timothy Anderson-Haley of Manhattan; 11 grandchildren, seven great-grandchildren, and a nephews and niece.

Funeral services will be held Sunday, April 30 at 7 p.m. in the First Congregational Church of Amherst on Main St. Calling hours are Saturday, April 29, 6 to 8 p.m., at Hope Community Church, 20 Gaylord St.

Court acquits peace brigade

By Samuel Maull
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Eighteen anti-war activists who call themselves the Granny Peace Brigade were acquitted Thursday of disorderly conduct charges stemming from a protest outside a Times Square military recruiting center last fall.

Judge Neil Ross said his verdict following a seven-day bench trial was not a commentary on any police action that day.

However, he said the evidence before him showed, "there was no blockage of pedestrian traffic and anyone who wanted to enter the recruiting center could do so."

The packed courtroom erupted into applause after Ross said the prosecution "failed to prove each defendant guilty of each charge." If convicted, each could have faced up to 15 days in prison.

Lead defense lawyer Norman Siegel said the women were "extremely pleased" with the judge's verdict.

"They are great Americans, and they walk the shoes of great Americans who have made America the place that it is," he said.

The defendants — including several in their 80s and 90s — had been charged with two counts of disorderly conduct in the Oct. 17, 2005, protest against the war in Iraq.

During the trial, prosecutors said the defendants had prevented others from entering the recruiting center. They called three police officers as witnesses. All testified that the protesters refused to move when Lt. Kevin Lee, the first witness, told them to disperse.

quarterly profit for any public company ever.

"While ExxonMobil executives are popping champagne and celebrating their record profits, American families are popping antacids under the strain of soaring gas prices," said Sen. Bob Menendez, D-N.J.

Menendez proposed a 60-day suspension of the 18.4-cent federal tax on gasoline and 24-cent-a-gallon diesel tax. Revenue lost to the government, as much as $6 billion, would be made up by removing some oil-company tax breaks, he said.

Among the tax provisions targeted by both Republicans and Democrats was a measure that has allowed oil companies to save tens of millions of dollars through rules for oil inventories.

A House-Senate negotiating committee appeared close Thursday to changing the accounting rules, imposing $4.3 billion in additional taxes on the oil companies over the next five years. Only recently House Republicans and the White House had strongly opposed the change.

The oil industry said it amounted to a windfall profit tax, which oil company executives have said would reduce the amount of money available for oil exploration and development.

Presumably, oil companies also could pass an additional tax burden onto consumers.

Senate Republicans, meanwhile, unveiled a 10-point response to high fuel costs including a proposal to give millions of taxpayers $100 checks. They also proposed for the first time a federal law against price gouging.

"It's a bold package to help consumers ... to help ease the pain," said Majority Leader Bill Frist, who promised a vote on the measures by next Tuesday.

"We are going to ease the burden," promised Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), R-N.M., chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

But Democrats criticized the GOP proposal because it linked attempts at short-term relief with oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, an issue that has divided the Senate for decades.

"It's designed to protect Big Oil while mistakenly believing that drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge will solve America's energy problems," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

The GOP plan also would repeal some recently enacted tax breaks for oil companies, ease permits for refinery expansion, provide tax breaks for development of gas-electric hybrid cars and give authority for the Transportation Department to increase auto fuel economy, although it would not require such increases.

While at a gas station appearance in Biloxi, Miss., President Bush said he welcomed any action by Congress to give him authority to change the auto fuel economy requirements as it recently did with small trucks.

Much of the day in the Senate, meanwhile, was taken up by a dispute over whether to vote on a proposal by Sen. Ron Wyden (news, bio, voting record), D-Ore., to require energy companies to pay a federal royalty on all oil pumped from the Gulf of Mexico if oil prices exceed $55 a barrel. Some oil now is exempt from royalties, costing the government billions of dollars.

Newspaper execs look to profit online

By Elizabeth M. Gillespie
Associated Press

SEATTLE — With subscribers canceling and ad revenues sliding, editors gathering this week were hunting ways to harness the Internet's power to lure back readers and win over those who've never picked up a print edition.

Despite the gloomy statistics, panelists at the American Society of Newspaper Editors' annual meeting insisted that news of the newspaper's imminent demise has been greatly exaggerated.

Steven T. Gray, managing director of Newspaper Next, a project led by the American Press Institute, pointed to reasons to buck up, especially the hearty appetite non-newspaper readers have for news — which a growing number of people are getting from the Web or through cell phones, personal digital assistants and e-mail.

The dilemma is how to pay for the gathering of all that electronic news, much of which is free.

"There is no bigger problem today than the fact that we're not getting paid for online news," said William Dean Singleton, vice chairman and CEO of MediaNews Group Inc., which announced a deal this week to add four newspapers to the 40 it already owns. "If we can't get paid for it, we aren't going to be able to continue to afford to do it."

The American Press Institute is part way through a yearlong project to help the newspaper industry embrace a more diversified business model, one that relies on a broader mix of products targeting a wider array of readers.

"We're watching our audience slip away," Gray said. "There's a lot of fear, and there's a lot of depression, and I think a lot of denial in our industry, because we want it to be the way it used to be."

With the struggle for new readers and the pressure to deliver news in new formats comes the latest version of the longtime tension between paying the bills and paying for good journalism.

"All of us are scrambling to try to serve the Internet audience," said Marilyn Thompson, editor and vice president of the Lexington Herald-Leader in Kentucky, who said "cataclysmic changes" of recent years have forced hiring freezes, dried up training money and shrunk the news space in many papers. "The bottom line to me is that good journalism matters and will always matter," she said Thursday.

Gray said some skeptics have suggested that newspapers will wind up dumbing down the news and abandoning their civic duty to be watchdogs if they focus too much on pulling in people who don't read newspapers.

"When we have to admit that more than half the public is no longer regularly using newspapers, our civic mission is already in grave danger," Gray said. "The most important thing we can do to continue fulfilling that is to find ways to re-engage with that missing half of the audience."

Gary Pruitt, chairman, president and chief executive of McClatchy Co., predicted that newspapers will continue to see an erosion in their print readership and must seize on the explosive growth in local search, led by Google Inc.

Amy Fisher blames drug use for shooting

LOS ANGELES — The Ecstasy made her do it. Amy Fisher says she was strung out on the club drug when she shot her boyfriend's wife in the face in 1992.

"I was using Ecstasy, a lot of Ecstasy," Fisher, nicknamed the "Long Island Lolita," tells "Entertainment Tonight" in an interview that was to air Thursday. "I had no control."

Fisher was 16 when she visited the home of her much-older lover, Joey Buttafuoco, a car mechanic on New York's Long Island, and shot his wife, Mary Jo, as she answered the door.

The drug made her feel "stronger and confident," she says.

"I just did something totally irrational," Fisher says. "Believe me, rational people don't go to do something like that in the middle of the day. It's just insane."

She served seven years in prison for the attack.

Buttafuoco pleaded guilty to one count of statutory rape and served four months in jail. His wife survived the shooting. The couple remained together after the Fisher affair, but divorced after moving to California.

Senate approves changes to bylaws

Humpty Dumpty, "We have to mess things up before we get them back together again."

As part of the media blitz, Cahill said the university had been utilizing orientations, mass e-mails, public service announcements, press releases, posters, table tents, new student packets and direct mailings to inform the campus community about the construction. In addition, he stressed that interested parties should visit the New Dirt Web page, which is updated daily in order to ease events planning on campus. The page can be viewed at umass.edu/newdirt.

The Senate also approved some crucial changes to the Rules Committee Bylaws, in a motion that at the start of the meeting appeared headed toward confrontation.

The key changes involved the appointment of undergraduate and graduate student representatives to Senate Committees. In the past, the Bylaws required the appointment of representatives to these Committees by the Student Government Association and the Graduate Student Senate.

But members of the Rules Committee claimed that the student government organizations were neglecting this responsibility, and sought to amend the Bylaws to read that "student members shall be appointed as the Student Government Association and Graduate Student Senate shall determine, or as otherwise deemed appropriate by the Rules Committee."

The proposed changes elicited concern from Uri Strauss, the GSS president, who feared that the new language would limit student participation on Faculty Senate Committees. Members of the Senate countered that the SGA and the GSS had failed to fill more than 50% of their spots on the committees, and that the changes were necessary to streamline Committee business.

Crisis was averted, however, when an amendment was offered by Senator Roland Chilton of the Sociology Department. Chilton's amendment added the following phrase: "when these organizations [SGA and GSS] fail to appoint student members by the end of the second week of the fall semester." Senator Chilton's amendment was accepted, and the motion passed without debate.

Asked to comment after the vote, Strauss, who had attended the Senate meeting with the intention of debating the Bylaw changes extemporaneously, replied that the amended motion was "not perfect, but it's much better."

The meeting concluded with an amendment to the Academic Regulations, which would inform students that all work submitted for a grade may be entered into a database for the detection of plagiarism. The amendment passed, again without debate.

The final meeting of the Faculty Senate will be on May 18, the day after classes end.

New protest and boycott aims to 'close cities'

By Dan Whitcomb
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Pro-immigration activists say a national boycott and marches planned for May 1 will flood U.S. streets with millions of Latinos to demand amnesty for illegal immigrants and shake the ground under Congress as it debates reform.

Such a massive turnout could make for the largest protests since the civil rights era of the 1960s, though not all Latinos — nor their leaders — were comfortable with such militancy, fearing a backlash in Middle America.

"There will be 2 to 3 million people hitting the streets in Los Angeles alone. We're going to close down Los Angeles, Chicago, New York, Tucson, Phoenix, Fresno," said Jorge Rodriguez, a union official who helped organize earlier rallies credited with rattling Congress as it debates the issue.

Immigration has split Congress, the Republican Party and public opinion. Conservatives want the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants classified as felons and a fence built along the Mexican border.

Others, including President George W. Bush, want a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship. Most agree some reform is needed to stem the flow of poor to the world's biggest economy.

"We want full amnesty, full legalization for anybody who is here (illegally)," Rodriguez said. "That is the message that is going to be played out across the country on May 1."

Organizers have timed the action for May Day, a date when workers around the world traditionally have marched for improved conditions, and have strong support from big labor and the Roman Catholic church.

They vow that America's major cities will grind to a halt and its economy will stagger as Latinos walk off their jobs and skip school.

Teachers' unions in major cities have said children should not be punished for walking out of class. Los Angeles school officials said principals had been told that they should allow students to leave but walk with them to help keep order.

In Chicago, Catholic priests have helped organize protests, sending information to all 375 parishes in the archdiocese.

Chicago activists predict that the demonstrations will draw 300,000 people.

In New York, leaders of the May 1 Coalition said a growing number of businesses had pledged to close and allow their workers to attend a rally in Manhattan's Union Square.

Large U.S. meat processors, including Cargill Inc., Tyson Foods Inc and Seaboard Corp said they will close plants due to the planned rallies.

Critics accuse pro-immigrant leaders of bullying Congress and stirring up uninformed young Latinos by telling them that their parents were in imminent danger of being deported.

"It's intimidation when a million people march down main streets in our major cities under the Mexican flag," said Jim Gilchrist, founder of the Minuteman volunteer border patrol group. "This will backfire," he said.

Some Latinos have also expressed concerns that the boycott and marches could stir up anti-immigrant sentiment.

Cardinal Roger Mahony of the Los Angeles archdiocese, an outspoken champion of immigrant rights, has lobbied against a walkout. "Go to work, go to school, and then join thousands of us at a major rally afterword," Mahony said.

And Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who has long fought for immigrant rights, has said he expects protesters to be "lawful and respectful" and children to stay in school.

In Washington on Thursday, immigrant-rights activists brushed off talk of a backlash.

"This is going to be really big. We're going to have millions of people," said Juan Jose Gutierrez, director of the Latino Movement USA. "We are not concerned at all. We believe it's possible for Congress to get the message that the time to act is now."

Katrina report lambastes White House

President George W. Bush puts his arm around homeowner Ethel Williams during a visit to her hurricane devastated home.

Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman U.S. Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, speaks on April 27, 2006.

WASHINGTON — A Senate inquiry into the government's Hurricane Katrina failures ripped the Bush administration anew Thursday and urged the scrapping of the nation's disaster response agency. But with a new hurricane season just weeks away, senators conceded that few if any of their proposals could become reality in time.

The bipartisan investigation into one of the worst natural disasters in the nation's history singled out President Bush and the White House as appearing indifferent to the devastation until two days after the storm hit.

It said the Homeland Security Department either misunderstood federal disaster plans or refused to follow them. And it said New Orleans for years had neglected to prepare for large-scale emergencies.

"The suffering that continued in the days and weeks after the storm passed did not happen in a vacuum; instead, it continued longer that it should have because of — and was in some cases exacerbated by — the failure of government at all levels to plan, prepare for and respond aggressively to the storm," concluded the report.

It was titled "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," sober words for the future.

The Senate inquiry is the third major federal report on the government failures exposed by the Aug. 29 storm, which killed more than 1,300 people and which the Senate Budget Committee says has so far cost the federal government $103 billion.

The report follows similar inquiries by the House and White House and comes in an election year in which Democrats have pointed critically to the administration's Katrina response.

The senators concluded that only by abolishing the Federal Emergency Management Agency — which Sen. Susan Collins (news, bio, voting record), R-Maine, called a "humbling bureaucracy" — and replacing it with a stronger authority could the government best respond to future catastrophes.

But the two lawmakers who led the inquiry, Collins and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., said such an overhaul could not be completed by the June 1 start of the hurricane season.

"As a practical matter, that's just five weeks away, and it's not going to happen," Collins told reporters. "But that doesn't mean that we should continue in the long term to operate with a system that's failed, that is so clearly flawed."

Looking ahead to approaching hurricane season, Collins added: "We're clearly better prepared than last year, but are we prepared enough? No, we're not."

Underscoring the hurdles the proposals face, eliminating FEMA got a cool reception from the White House as Bush headed to the still-ravaged Gulf Coast to view rebuilding efforts in New Orleans and Mississippi.

"As we're headed into the hurricane season, now is not the time to look at moving organizational boxes around," said White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend.

Besides dumping FEMA, the report makes 85 other recommendations, from clarifying who's responsible for maintaining New Orleans levees to demanding better plans for protecting or evacuating elderly and poor victims.

The report calls for more funding for disaster planning and response, but does not specify how much or where the money would come from.

The Bush administration says it has been working to prepare for what the National Hurricane Center has predicted will be an active decade for hurricanes. It is rebuilding New Orleans levees, prodding local governments to update evacuation plans and hire emergency workers, and creating databases to order and track food and other supplies needed during disasters.

Though the new report singles out officials from New Orleans to Washington for blame — and lambastes Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff in particular — it gives Bush a mixed review for his performance. It credits the president for declaring an emergency before the hurricane's landfall, but faults him for waiting until two days after it hit to return to Washington and convene top officials to coordinate the federal response.

Lieberman, in an addendum, took sharper aim at Bush, who he said appeared distracted from the disaster as it unfolded. "The president is, after all, the commander in chief — not only in terms of international crises, but in terms of catastrophes here at home," he said.

Not all the senators who participated in the seven-month inquiry agreed with its central recommendation — to create a National Preparedness and Response Authority but keep it within the oversight of Homeland Security Department to draw on the larger department's resources.

Setting out paths in life

Kevin Pascucci

The next time you are watching TV, turn it to either E!, VH1, or MTV. If TV's not really you're thing, take a look at an issue of Teen People or Seventeen the next time you are near a magazine rack. Either way, you will see what I am about to point out in this column. What you'll see is a standard that has been set for young girls today that will rarely ever be met.

There are those out there who are blessed with perfection (or at least think they are), and unfortunately have become the societal expectation of young girls. A lot of the people reading this right now are probably saying, "Duh?", but let me explain my point.

This expectation is nothing new to the female gender. For quite some time now, girls have been expected to look, talk and act a certain way within society. But rather than being expected to excel within the work place or get an education, girls are expected by their peers to be sexy or hot. Now don't get me wrong. There's nothing wrong with a girl wanting to feel good about herself. It's when a girl objectifies herself and sacrifices who she is for social acceptance that this becomes a problem.

What has really tuned me in on this issue has been watching my 13-year-old niece grow up and search for social acceptance among her peers. My niece is a very intelligent and pretty young girl. She's got a ton of potential, and is on a path that could take her to any college she wants to go to down the road.

The only thing I see standing in my niece's way of achieving her goals is her friends. My niece doesn't relate to the geniuses in her advanced classes, but also doesn't completely identify with the girls who seem to embrace her either. My niece loves to read but has friends who actually make fun of her for reading books. They'll also criticize her if she's not wearing the latest fashion or designer name clothes.

There's nothing wrong with a girl wanting to feel good about herself. It's when a girl objectifies herself and sacrifices who she is for social acceptance that this becomes a problem.

Who do these young girls idolize you might ask? Well, my niece recently showed me some of their MySpace pages, and the answer to that question became apparent pretty quickly. Most of the profile pictures where of these 12 to 13-year-old girls posing in alluring positions and wearing short skirts, which were right next to pictures of Paris Hilton or Nicole Richie under "Who I'd Like to Meet."

Unfortunately, girls like Paris Hilton have become who Generation Y look to for guidance and influence. This has resulted in female youths that are less focused on doing well in school or getting ahead in life but more focused on how they can make themselves more attractive to boys.

Guys haven't really helped this trend either. Today's male is also expected to be a chauvinistic, sexist pig who looks at girls as nothing more than pieces of meat. Young boys also see this in older men, and try to emulate this behavior themselves. Don't believe me? A boy in my niece's class told her one day that he liked her junk in her trunk. Get my point?

As the role models and sources of influence get worse, so will the attitudes and viewpoints of today's pre-teens. Not only do the kids in my niece's junior high talk like this to each other, but they also take part in sexual behavior that I didn't even know existed when I was 12-years-old.

I don't think that these role models and our society are completely to blame for this though. It's all too easy to simply point the finger at the media and then just let the parents off the hook. My sister is a wonderful mother, and takes the time to talk to my niece and listen to her. This is probably why my niece is so honest with her mother and isn't involved in a lot of the stuff that goes on in her school.

Sadly, not enough parents are like this, and kids are often left to figure things out for themselves. It's when this happens that kids begin to look to other sources for guidance in their life. It's unlikely that we are going to be able to give our society a major overhaul to make it a better place for young teens to grow up, but parents do need to start in their own households. Parents talking to their kids is such a basic, simple concept but is one that is often forgotten or neglected.

Kids are growing up faster than ever before, and parents need to take notice of this trend in today's youth. Growing up is already difficult and awkward as it is, let alone without having to worry about meeting some high societal standard of perfection. These kids are the future of America, and should be learning how to do well in school at this point in their lives, not "10 Ways to Make a Guy Think Your Butt is Out of This World." I rest my case.

Greg Collins

Today the film "United 93" will be shown in theaters to a general audience for the first time. This movie depicts the story behind the only hijacked airplane on September 11 to fail to hit its intended target, Washington, D.C. "United 93" has created nationwide controversy over whether such a form of entertainment should have been made portraying a 9/11 event and whether now is the right time to show it to the public.

Countless individuals in academia, the media, and the entertainment industry have used the horrific events of 9/11 for a wide range of purposes. Unfortunately, some have exploited these events and their symbolic meaning for their own personal gratification or to intentionally manipulate analysis of its political implications. A professor from the University of Colorado publicly articulated that the people onboard the hijacked airplanes deserved to be victims of the terrorist attacks because of the American values they represented. Additionally, filmmakers have intentionally and systemically used manipulative footage and shoddy critical thinking skills to further their own personal agendas.

Monumental historical affairs will inevitably lend themselves to be subject to these forms of self-promotion and will allow individuals who have no other interest besides their own narcissism to shamefully disrespect the historical and moral significance of the event.

Monumental historical affairs will inevitably lend themselves to be subject to these forms of self-promotion and will allow individuals who have no other interest besides their own narcissism to shamefully disrespect the historical and moral significance of the event. However, demeaning instances such as these have needlessly taken advantage of American citizens. In essence, just because many have exploited 9/11 does not mean that one cannot try to confront it honorably through artistic expression.

The fact that filmmakers of "United 93" may reap profits from the movie does not lessen the noble message it transmits. To take a recent example, whatever one thinks of the politics of Michael Moore, he should not be criticized for making money on "Fahrenheit 9/11" and his other documentaries. Whether one defends or vilifies the filmmakers for making a profit is up to his or her own personal convictions. What people can agree on is that exploring the nature and actions of the people aboard United Airlines 93 through an artistic realm can be emotionally gripping in such a way that it is indeed possible to take an historic event and create an art form that honors those who perished.

There have been many good-faith attempts to capture the psychological, emotional, and philosophical significance of that day through political writing, but doing so through art perhaps is the most effective way of encapsulating such a day of horror.

I have only see trailers for the film, but I get chills up my spine every time I see images of that movie, which in turn gets me thinking about the heroic acts our fellow Americans committed during that day.

To overcome tyranny and stand up in the face of evil, in this day and age of Muslim terrorists, we must first conquer our fear of tyranny and evil. One of the highest moral faculties of each human being is that of recognizing fear in oneself and overcoming it. This is what happened when passengers on United 93 recognized their impending doom yet still found the resolve to strike back at the terrorists.

The question has been raised whether this is an ideal time to release this movie to the general public. Issues of timing appropriateness in this case are left to the subjectivity of the individual, so it is hard to conclude when is a prudent time to release a movie depicting a historical event, if ever. The implication of the argument of timing calls into question how and when do we, as Americans and as individual beings, confront and come to grips with appalling historical events of the past. Living life while being afraid of the present and future can deny innumerable opportunities. But living life while being afraid of what happened in the past can do just the same.

Failing to take risks, whether it is through artistic or political means, limits the opportunity to look back in history and acknowledge the implications and importance of life-changing events or epochs. If we are constantly worried about the appropriateness of reacting to various historical events, we will impede our progress of learning about its political and social implications. Perhaps most importantly, it will restrict us from learning what it teaches about eternal moral issues of good and evil.

At least for a short span, all Americans should stop squabbling over the politics of President Bush and the war on terrorism to view this film. Perhaps instead of worrying about the appropriateness of the timing or the profit-making intentions of the filmmakers, all Americans can unite in remembering when our fellow Americans stood up in the face of evil. Such remembrance is the very antithesis of shameless self-promotion.

Rebecca Paskievich

It is not just a game; it is not simply a sport. For me, it could not be classified as an "extracurricular activity." Softball is a huge part of my life. Not to knock other sports, but not everyone can be a softball player. Not everyone can drill their brains so that seven different options for each pitch come to mind routinely in an instant. It is a hard game; trials and tribulations are inevitable, but therefore, it is great competition.

It's weird that I'm not playing softball this spring. This is the first spring season since I was seven that I am not on a softball team. I considered playing softball in college, a major reason why I spent a Post-Graduate year of study at Phillips Academy. I talked to a few coaches but ultimately decided that I would rather focus on my academics. Now, when the sun shines as I walk to class and the smell of fresh cut grass saturates the air, I dream about softball. I definitely don't regret my decision not to pursue softball in college but it is a significant adjustment.

I'm sure many of you who were adamant athletes in high school feel a sense of detachment in college and long for the days of playing around with the kids you grew up with.

I'm sure many of you who were adamant athletes in high school feel a sense of detachment in college and long for the days of playing around with the kids you grew up with. Intramurals are great but there isn't that same sense of competitiveness and camaraderie as your hometown sports teams.

I had a real attachment with my high school teams and this connection was realized last year while playing at boarding school with an entirely new set of girls. The best part of high school sports is that while playing hard you laugh even harder and make countless memories over the years.

In the final inning of a tournament game of my senior year, my coach replaced the seniors and left a proposed situation for next season on the field. As the younger girls hustled to their positions and I jogged back to the dugout, something comparable to our pitcher's inside curveball hit my heart. I felt like I was turning in my uniform already… and it hurt. I had been in the same spot for three years: it was my home. I loved centerfield, everything about it. I know every divot, every soft spot, and every hole in that area behind the high school.

For four years, on my way to history class, I would stop on the staircase and stare at my home field. During the fall, I would gaze out my French class window and see the autumn foliage creating a collage of color that protected the baron base paths. The field soaked in a wintry white when the snow began to fall; the fence remained the only proof that a field resided there. As winter faded into spring, cool winds blew the brown-sugar-like dust from the infield in an excited swirl for softball season to arrive. On game days I resided at the windowsills during school, mesmerized at the greenery that was such a familiar safe-haven. I couldn't wait until 2:15 when twelve of my friends and I would get a chance to clench our cleats into the grass and dig our heels into the batter's box.

It's not like I'll never get to step foot on my high school field again; an invisible gate did not surface and restrict my playing on it. But even though I can visit, I can never really go back. At that point in the last tournament game, my eyes swelled when I realized that I'd never look over and see two of my close friends, who I've played with since we were nine, at first and second base. I had to catch my breath after I yelled "air two, ground three" from the dugout: that is someone else's job now. It seems surreal when I think about how my sister, Rachael, and I will never wear the same uniform ever again. I'll always consider those girls my teammates and my friends, but remembering seems insignificant compared to actually being there.

It wasn't so much that I didn't want to leave — it's just that I didn't want it to stop. When I look back on my high school sports experience, I won't remember my field hockey team record, my time in the 50-yard dash, or even the color of our uniforms (ok, maybe that I will, considering we were the "Big Blue") but I'll forever remember the people.

During my softball career at Swampscott High I shared moments that are forever imprinted, not only in my mind, but also deep in my heart. There, I learned the real definition of "team." It is one of the most important concepts I learned at Swampscott High and one that is impossible to forget.

At college it's important to remember your high school experiences and cherish the memorable things that, at the time, seemed ordinary. Take care to create new memories by getting involved and out of your dorm room. Learning takes place outside of textbooks; often times, things learned beyond the classroom are infinitely more essential.

ACTUALLY, IT DON'T COME EASY

I could scarcely believe my eyes as I read Gilad Skolnick's "Women have it so much easier than men" article. I sincerely hope that his article was writing in a sarcastic tone, because if he was serious, he is surely mistaken and inappropriately fresh about a subject that literally means life or death for many women in the world.

To start off, Gilad can't speak of women's privileges in a world where some women get clitoral circumcisions, often against their wishes. I'd like to see Gilad tell women in Burkinas in Afghanistan or women in Iran, Saudi Arabia or Shiite-controlled areas in Iraq that they're privileged. He should do so right before they get spit on (or worse) by the roving "morality police" militias. Perhaps he wishes to tell that to the woman who repeatedly get gang-raped or "honor murdered" in various countries, even by close male relatives. He can start by talking to Mukhtaran Bibi, the Pakistani women who made headlines for having the courage to bring attention to her gang-rape case in Pakistan. I'm sure she'll agree she was "privileged" to have several man rape her. What a great benefit it is to be a woman in those parts of the world, huh?

But, enough about the terrible world outside our borders...What about women in the U.S.? Would Gilad want to address the statistic that shows that women continue to make 65-75 percent less than a man does in the same income positions? Perhaps it would behoove him to visit a rape counseling center, here in the good ol' "civilized" U.S.? What about domestic abuse rates?

Maybe Gilad would like to address that great privilege of being a woman in this country. Shall we speak of sexual harrasment in the work place, of the pressure to acquiesce to male sexual advances in order to either "climb up" the employment ladder or even maintain present positions? Ask any woman, here on this campus, in a position of power if she's ever had to endure at least one incident of inappropriate sexual advances in the road to her career spot? Gilad could also speak to the objectification of women in the mass media, or the lack of recognition/compensation for unpaid "home care" labor that is assumed is the woman's "responsibility."

I could go on, but what I've highlighted is enough. It is a sick joke to attempt to counter all of the facts I have outlined by making references to poor ol' men having trouble in dating situations or that women can carry more items in purses than pockets. If Gilad has any shame left, he'd publish an apology to the many women on this campus that wake up every morning, look in the mirror and motivate themselves to come to their work or study precisely to avoid having to end up in a life where we have to endure the pseudo-intellectual pontifications of ignorant men. Maybe Gilad isn't one of them, but he sure wrote like one.

WHEN REMINDING, DON'T FORGET

Every Spring since I can remember, those little yellow flags commemorating the Holocaust have gone up on one of the lawns adjacent to the Campus Pond. And that poorly lettered sign has acknowledged the death toll among other oppressed groups.

In a 1939 speech by Adolf Hitler to his military officers, in preparation for the invasion of Poland, Hitler asked, "Who remembers now the extermination of the Armenians?" In contemporary fashion, the speech was leaked to the public.

Modern scholars and partisans argue over the existance and extent of the Armenian Genocide during World War I, but Hitler obviously believed in it and used it as the prototype for invading Poland and later "The Final Solution" against the Jews.

I think it is shameful that the Holocaust Remembrance here at UMass does not acknowledge it.

Arctic Monkeys stay simple on 'Whatever'

By Steve True
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

NORMAL, Ill. — Slated on the cover of Blender Magazine as the one band to watch in 2006, The Arctic Monkeys are making their presence known in the United States.

Hot off their No. 1 single in the U.K., "I Bet You Look Good on the Dance Floor," The Arctic Monkeys are going to blow up in the states this year. If you haven't heard of them, believe me you will.

The single is a drum heavy rock song that carries a great guitar line, but is not even the best song on their album. The lyrics are fun, easy and catchy. The song is most likely to become a hit in similar fashion to Franz Ferdinand's "Take Me Out."

However, the song doesn't do the band justice considering their endless talent in all forms of musical variations. They have the ability to change styles from emo to alternative to jam rock to punk to good old-fashioned Rock and Roll.

On the track "Mardy Bum" they slow things down a bit at the beginning with simple guitar plucking rather than strumming. This introduction leads into a bust out of rhythm and jamming on a smooth instrumental chorus. This is likely the most talented showcase of the band's ability to write music.

The young group is already becoming familiar with one another's talent and what they offer to the group's overall package. They have the ability to produce music at a level that makes the listener very excited for what they will offer when they mature even more.

The songwriting is exceptional on the tracks "Perhaps Vampires is a Bit Strong But..." and "When the Sun Goes Down." The first song leads into the second through explanation of the people they are referring to.

"Cause all you people are vampires and all your stories are stale/ And though you pretend to stand by us I know you're certain we'll fail."

The chorus expresses the groups sheer determination and hard work they are willing to put forth to become successful in the music industry.

Once they get popular they say these peoples' views change and they want to be a part of their success, thus the metaphor of vampires changing when the sun goes down.

Most of the tracks are heavy on the pace, but on the track "Riot Van" they change their style and perform a ballad, which shows that they have the ability, but they realize their fans want to see them bust out the guns on the remainder of the tracks. Just the guitar accompanies a soft voice singing about an unfortunate run-in with police officers.

The lyrics are sung with an English accent that gives the music an original, unique and fresh feeling. The band also doesn't try to do too much with the notes they choose to work with. The fact that the music is simple and easy to enjoy is what makes so desirable to the avid music fan.

The band isn't trying to overly hype themselves up. They want their loyal fans to remain loyal, while getting new fans to appreciate their music.

This is noticeable on both the tracks "Fake Tales of San Francisco" and "From Ritz to Rubble." They are letting the listener know that no matter how big they become they will continue to keep doing what they are doing.

The Arctic Monkeys, seen here posing backstage, stick with catchy rhythms and lyrics on their new album.

'Butterflies' gives comfort

New book deals with teenage pregnancies

By Mary Yurgil
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

NORMAL, Ill. — Thirty-four percent of women become pregnant at least once before the age of 20, amounting to nearly 820,000 women a year, according to The National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy.

These women could easily be sitting next to you in class, be a co- worker or even a friend.

In Karen Hart's case, author of "Butterflies in May" due out in May, several friends of hers during high school and college faced the situation of becoming pregnant and being forced to make a decision to keep the baby, put the baby up for adoption or having an abortion.

"I've always found teen pregnancy a compelling subject that is still very much taboo in our society," Hart said. "I wanted to break that taboo and write a realistic story about the emotional journey of one teen's pregnancy and lead the reader through her decision-making process as well as the aftermath of her final decision."

Hart's book takes this nerve-wracking time of uncertainty and places it into context through Ali Parker, a fictional high school senior who becomes pregnant by her boyfriend Matt.

Ali and Matt easily have the type of relationship that any teenage girl would dream of for her senior year. When Matt first transferred to Ali's high school he was the one who Ali wanted to be with but didn't think she ever would be.

Through friends and classes the two became close and started dating. After several months they became sexually active.

Ali's problems begin when she realizes her period is 10 days late, causing her to buy a pregnancy kit. Not informing Matt about her late period, Ali decides to keep the problem to herself, and plans on doing so until her best friend, Monica, discovered the pregnancy kit.

Assuring her friend that there is not a problem and that she plans on waiting a few more days before taking the test, Ali shoves the kit into a drawer, hoping to forget about it.

Spotting a few days later, Ali believes her problems are over. It's not until the next month when her period is due again that she realizes she is yet again, late.

Taking the pregnancy test, Ali discovers that she is pregnant. Ali and her friend visit the clinic for a pregnancy test to be conducted by a professional, only to find out that the results are truly positive.

It is at this point when Ali's world begins to turn upside down.

Between the emotional roller coaster of telling her parents and their initial response of telling her to get an abortion, and her relationship with Matt falling apart, Ali begins to realize the difficult, life-altering decisions that she has to make.

Linda Wedwick, assistant professor in the Center for Reading and Literacy and curriculum and instruction department at Illinois State University, was given an advanced copy of the book to review from the perspective of a former teacher of adolescents.

"Teen pregnancy, this issue, does not have a simple choice to make," Wedwick said. "The writing would appeal to adolescent readers ... in high school and even in college."

While all the characters offer differing perspectives and suggestions on Ali's situation, ultimately it is Ali who makes the decision to change her life.

Hart's first book is an emotional piece for those who have lived through a similar situation and even those who have not.

This real-life situation is put into a fictional setting, but proves to be a beneficial learning experience not just for adolescents but any young female finding herself in a similar situation. Hart's writing style is both clean and clear, flowing through the trying times of Ali and those connected to her.

"Butterflies in May" is a heartwarming book that walks the reader through the ups and downs of a teenage pregnancy without arguing pro-life or pro-choice.

Wu-Tanger balances the equation

By Zachary Franklin
Daily Trojan (USC)

LOS ANGELES — It's atypical that one would find a hip-hop artist of any caliber who does not like the spotlight.

Most are drawn to the swanky lifestyle, filled with expensive cars, beautiful women and amazing parties.

The concept of toasting, or displaying a braggadocio attitude while putting down one's opponent, has been ingrained into most hip-hop fans, even occasional listeners.

Flashing the latest fashions, trends and styles has become an extension of this attitude.

But such is not the case with Wu-Tang Clan DJ and producer Mathematics.

"I was originally content with my role in the Wu-Tang and to just stay in the background," he said. "And when Wu blew up, I was content with that."

With push from his Wu-Tang brethren, Mathematics and his musical accomplishments are now starting to reach broader audiences.

The Clan affiliate will release "Soul of a Man," a double album that will include 15 tracks of original music by the Wu producer, and a bonus album, which will have unreleased material and some of Mathematics' favorite songs, which he crafted with the likes of Raekwon, Ghostface Killah and Method Man over the years.

"This album is for those that really like music," he said. "It was created strictly for the music and I want people to get it and appreciate the music. It's for those die-hard fans."

The new release will be the third for the "in-house" Wu-Tang producer, following up his 2005 album "The Problem," and 2003's "Love, Hell or Right."

Instead of simply building a continuous loop and calling it a track, "Soul of a Man" sounds more like a honing of skill and the release of a coherent instrumental album.

Mathematics has a way of layering his tracks that slowly develop throughout the song and give the listener something new to pick up on and pay attention to with every listen.

He also carefully placed each song on the album, making sure the music melodically flows from one track to another, without too much pause or listener adjustment to a different sound.

"I'm making beats all the time and when I have a lot of music that I'm going to put on an album, I like to put the ones that sound good together," Mathematics said. "And I will develop that certain kind of beat to put everything together. So, for instance, if this is a soul beat, I might place it here. Or if this track is more up-tempo, it's going to come on later in the album."

The eclectic mix of soul is also very apparent throughout the album, an ear he said he has from growing up listening to the temptations and other Motown artists that his father loved, as well as the Jackson 5 and Blue Magic, which his older brothers and sisters played for him.

Even with the soul and funk that was playing in his home, it was hip-hop that Mathematics paid particular attention to.

"Hip-hop had a big influence on me while I was growing up," he said. "I grew up around the Cold Crush Brothers and the Treacherous Three, listening to these cats on mix tapes. And I just fell in love with it."

He laughs at some of his earliest memories of the culture. "When hip-hop came out, this one kid I knew was breaking (a type of break dancing involving a series of moves that could consist of foot shuffles, spins and turns)," he said. "And I was like, 'What's that?' And he was like, 'This is b-boying.'"

For Mathematics, he said some of his first attempts at hip-hop came when he tried to mimic the artists he heard on his mix tapes.

"I always tried to learn the words and routines of certain artists," he said. "We used to get tons of tapes from around the way and I wanted to be an emcee."

But by 1987, Mathematics was DJing block parties in the Baisley Projects on the South Side of Jamaica in Queens, N.Y.

"I had packed up on DJing from going to one of my friends houses and seeing his turntables," he said. "I started in something like 1986, and when I threw my first park jam in '87, I knew in one form or another I was going to be a part of hip-hop."

It was when he hooked up with then Cold Chillin' artist UMA, aka The Genius, who would go on to become one of the nine members of the super group Wu-Tang Clan, that things began to change for Mathematics, and his childhood and teenage hobby of hip-hop turned into a business.

At 50, Play-Doh refuses to grow old in a changing world

By Jenee Osterheldt
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Perhaps it's the way it squishes through your fingers.

Maybe it's the sharp scent.

Or it could be the creative freedom.

Whatever it is, Play-Doh is celebrating its 50th year this year, and its makers aren't sharing their recipe for success with anybody.

It's definitely a mix of water, flour and probably lots of salt, because that's part of its signature smell and what keeps people tasting it. (Don't say you haven't tasted it.)

Hasbro exec Leigh Anne Cappello says the ingredients for Play-Doh are mostly the same today as they were when it was first sold as an off-white modeling compound in 1956. Only now there are plenty of colors, from primary to pastel. And this year, Hasbro is introducing a 50-pack.

Cappello, vice president of marketing at Hasbro, says that aside from new colors, there have been some minor tweaks to make it softer and squishier."

Part of Play-Doh's ability to grow with the generations is that it really is tested by kids and approved by moms, she says. "From 2 to 102, people enjoy playing with Play-Doh. And it allows children limitless ways to express themselves creatively and to have something in their minds that is beautiful to share with their friends and family."

Ajia Johnson says it's Play-Doh's imaginative possibilities that give it staying power among the new school toys. Johnson, a 26-year-old attorney, says she still likes to squeeze through Play-Doh — even though she's more of a Silly Putty lover.

"No matter the era, if you sit a child down with a bunch of colored clumps, they'll be occupied for hours making replicas of things they see and things they'd like to see," Johnson says.

Johnson's younger sister, 6-year-old Malon Hardin, loves the Doh. When she's not mashing it into their mama's carpet, she's allowed to play with it. Her favorite color to create with is red, and she thinks it's fun because she can make things like smiley faces and snowmen.

"I played with it," remembers their mother, Anita Hardin, 48. "But now all I do is pick Play-Doh up off the floor and put it in the trash."

Despite its violations to her floor, Hardin still thinks it's a great toy.

"Children can learn from it, and it brings out creativity."

Aside from the secret ingredients and imagination factor, Brandon Faith Harrell says master marketing strategies also have helped Play-Doh remain relevant.

"As a child, I didn't know there was any other clay besides Play-Doh," says Harrell, a 29-year-old metalsmith. "It was advertised so much, that when my teacher gave me this dough, and it wasn't in the yellow container, I was like, 'What's this stuff?'" she says. "Then I was like, oh. But I like Play-Doh because it doesn't get stuck under your fingernails."

She says Play-Doh inspired her.

"It was my earliest three-dimensional media," says Harrell, who recently created a Play-Doh dispenser, a Play-Doh-inspired incense burner and a few other Play-Doh-inspired pieces (www.brandon.polyextrude.com).

She also likes Play-Doh because it's not a gender specific toy.

"It's one of the few toys that any kid can play with. And Play-Doh has a great formula. It smells good and you can taste it, and you won't die if you eat it. I never ate it but I liked to lick it sometimes," Harrell admits. "Who doesn't?"

Cappello, the Hasbro vice president of marketing, says she has never tasted Play-Doh but says it is non-toxic.

How does she envision the future of Play-Doh?

"As long as it is squishing through the hands of children everywhere, it's as limitless as the compound itself."

A giant tub of Play-Doh is featured outside the 1960's themed hotel at Walt Disney World in Florida.

Josephine Baker: Image and Icon

By Jeff Douglas
Associated Press Writer

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Her erotic — and often amusing — dancing fractured racial barriers in Europe, as audiences in 1920s Paris looked on in astonishment at the sexy moves of a nearly naked Josephine Baker.

Decades after her last performance, in 1975, images of Baker shimmying her hips to a jazz beat still evoke excitement.

"Josephine Baker: Image and Icon" opens Friday at the Sheldon Art Galleries in St. Louis, where she was born 100 years ago this June. The free exhibit highlights the career of the black entertainer, who left a segregated United States in the '20s to become an international superstar and the toast of Paris.

"Everything is rare. Posters and programs that were probably turned out in the hundreds are impossible to find today," exhibit curator Olivia Lahs-Gonzales said about the show, two years in the making.

As part of Baker's centennial celebration, Webster University in suburban St. Louis will show three of her movies from the '20s and 1930s this weekend. Yale University film studies professor Terri Francis is among a handful of scholars who will speak during a Josephine Baker symposium on Friday.

Not many people know the full breadth of Baker's life, Lahs-Gonzales said. She's mostly remembered for her provocative dance with only a string of bananas around her waist.

If it were not for her nephew, Richard Martin Jr., Baker's roots here might have been forgotten. It was only in the last 10 years that a St. Louis street was renamed Josephine Baker Avenue in her honor.

Baker ran off from St. Louis with an all-black traveling road show, the Dixie Steppers, at the age of 13 and was a sensation in Paris before she turned 20. She spent most of her life in France, obtaining French citizenship.

Many images in the show depict a slice of Baker's life that was not well recognized in the states, including her roles with the French resistance during World War II and her adopting and raising 12 children from different ethnic backgrounds at her estate in Bordeaux, France.

As visitors to the Sheldon galleries stroll past magazine covers, posters and photographs of Baker, her voice can be heard through recorded song.

The exhibit chronicles the life of the jazz-age expatriate and entertainer turned humanitarian and civil rights activist. Lahs-Gonzales searched extensively to track down vintage memorabilia many items belonged to private collectors and public galleries.

A few works were hanging in the St. Louis home of Mary Strauss. The art philanthropist has collected images of Baker for more than 20 years and donated a number of items to the exhibit, including a massive movie cutout from Baker's 1930s film, "Zouzou."

"She's so adorable — that's what I love about her," Strauss said. "Even when she's being sexy, she's cute and funny about it as if she doesn't take it very seriously."

As Ernest Hemingway put it, she had a "smile to end all smiles." Her uninhibited dance moves were exotic, yet tasteful enough to draw standing ovations from both men and women.

"But she was so many other things and really paved the way for other African-American stars," Strauss said.

One of Baker's biggest disappointments, though, was that she was not accepted in America, as she was in the rest of the world, said Richard Martin III, Baker's great-nephew.

"The dancing, the entertainment got her on the scene. But she was truly a humanitarian and concerned about human rights for all people. That's what I'm most proud of," Martin said.

Baker was the only woman to speak at the 1963 "March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom," where the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. delivered his "I Have a Dream" speech. And when Baker toured the United States, she chose not to perform in segregated places.

"We'll show the world that racial hatred is unnatural, an emotion dreamed up by man," Baker said. "There is such a thing as universal family ... it's possible for children of different races to grow up together as brothers."

But her ambitious plans for racial harmony and to establish a college focused on international race relations around the time of the civil rights movement never materialized. She died April 12, 1975, at age 68.

"Josephine Baker: Image and Icon" runs through Aug. 26 before it moves to the National Portrait Gallery in Washington, D.C.

Dancer Josephine Baker will be featured at the Sheldon Art Galleries at Webster University in St. Louis. The black entertainer fractured racial barriers for the entire country.

Cowboy Mouth gets heard

By Ryan Sullivan
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

NORMAL, Ill. — Just because Cowboy Mouth is a band with a silly name does not mean that it should be made a joke of. It's one part cowboy, and it's one part mouth. What's not to like?

Considering the band was based in New Orleans, these guys know about Southern hospitality. This Cajun-influenced rock supergroup has released its fair share of albums, but the real meat and potatoes when it comes to this band are the live shows.

Lead singer Fred LeBlanc has been known to give a 110 percent effort in his live shows. His enthusiastic screaming entices the crowd to actively participate through dancing, jumping, and singing along.

Many of the songs on "Voodoo Shoppe" try to retain the same level of energy as their live shows are known for. They meet this goal throughout some of the album.

The album starts off with its funniest track, titled "Joe Strummer." It tells the tale of a sexy lady who thought she was scene but in reality was just obscene. She did not know who Joe Strummer was. Bad move, according to Cowboy Mouth.

"She started talking 'bout being my wife, but why would I want to be with someone who doesn't know the Clash saved my life."

The album's sense of humor drops down a notch after the first track. From here on out all we have are serious rock songs. Not that there's anything wrong with that, but what differentiates Cowboy Mouth from other middle-pack rock bands?

"Winds Me Up" is a little number that sounds like it was stolen from Jet's secret playbook. Well maybe not their secret playbook, it's not that good, but their open playbook. If singer-drummer Fred LeBlanc's voice wasn't so different it could easily be confused as a Jet song.

The song "Hole in My Heart" feels like it belongs in an Aerosmith B-sides compilation. That is, until LeBlanc's distinct, yet mediocre voice is heard and it is remembered that Stephen Tyler isn't the one serenading.

It seems like Cowboy Mouth has a fun time assuming the identities of other bands for a song. What this band needs to have is its own individuality to focus on the lyrics and vocals.

The best song on the album is "This Much Fun," a fast joyful song that does a great job, for the most part, of perfectly placing LeBlanc's awkward voice into good music. It is not done enough on this album and this song truly shines because of it.

The lyrics, again, can be an issue on this disc. On the fist-pumper "Supersonic," words start turning into disposable garbage, making no sense other than just trying to sound stylish.

"Get me off the ground/ Fly me upside down/ Fly me 'till I'm found/ Take me to the speed of sound/ Call me crazy ... I'm supersonic, baby overdrive."

Wait, what?

The next song gets even worse. In "I Told Ya," LeBlanc deepens his voice and starts singing like a black man at a gospel show, very much like the ones on television on Sundays.

Hurricane Katrina makes a cameo appearance in a few of the later songs, considering these boys, and girl, are from New Orleans. These musicians pay their dues to the tragedy in the catchy "The Avenue" and the Doors-esque "Home," which is respectable.

While this album has its fair share of shortcomings, its saving grace is the fast, uplifting melodies that it carries throughout most of the album. Also, some of these songs are without a doubt more enjoyable when listened to live.

If one is a fan of bands that sound more like classic rock with a contemporary twist, Cowboy Mouth is for them. Go buy their album. They've got Cowboy Mouths to feed! Get it?!

Austin Museum to share its work

By Tim Madigan
Knight Ridder Newspapers

AUSTIN, Texas — Jessie Otto Hite says that during her 27 years at the Blanton Museum of Art at the University of Texas, the one constant — other than Hite herself — has been the need for galleries the institution could call its own.

Consider that over its four-decade history, the Blanton (named for former UT regent and museum benefactor Jack S. Blanton) had quietly accumulated one of the broadest, most impressive collections in Texas. That process began in the late 1960s when novelist James Michener started donating about 400 of his 20th-century American paintings to the school. The museum then began building one of the nation's best collections of Latin American art and eventually added hundreds of European masterpieces. Its collection of prints and drawings, ranging from the Renaissance to the avant-garde, has been extraordinary all along.

But almost no one knew. For most of its existence the Blanton has been a museum in name only. Its works were consigned to storage or divided into rather dingy galleries in two buildings in the heart of the UT campus, available to the art faculty and students but largely hidden from the general public.

"We've been a well-kept secret," says Hite, the museum's director. "We're tired of that. ... Our dream has finally come true."

And in a big way. On Saturday night, on the southern tip of the UT campus, the Blanton will debut a massive gallery building that for the first time will house the museum's 17,000-piece collection under one roof. In its around-the-clock opening celebration that begins at 9 p.m. and features everything from group yoga to gospel music, the Blanton will officially become the first major art museum in Austin and Central Texas, one that is almost certain to become one of the premier visual arts destinations in the state.

The new museum's heft alone might make it so. When a companion building for museum administrative offices, classrooms and a cafe is completed across a plaza next year, the $83 million Blanton will be the largest (in square feet) university museum in the nation, and the third-largest of any in Texas, behind only the encyclopedic Museum of Fine Arts, Houston, and the Dallas Museum of Art.

The museum will also be, as UT administrators have long envisioned, a southern gateway to the campus, easily accessible to Austinites generally (with plenty of parking next door), and a highly visible symbol for the importance of humanities in academia.

"When the pair of buildings are seen together, with the plaza, it's going to become one of the favorite places in the art world, certainly a favorite in Texas," says former UT president Larry Faulkner, a leading proponent of the museum who retired this year. "A quest of long duration is finally coming to a stage of fruition. ... Something extraordinary has been achieved after a long struggle."

He referred to a building process almost biblical in length and difficulty.

There was the morass of state politics to contend with in the 1980s, and the chronic difficulty of raising money. But the most embarrassing and highly publicized agonies came in 1999, when the original Blanton architects, Jacques Herzog and Pierre de Meuron of Switzerland, squared off against members of the UT board of regents. The Swiss architects had proposed an avant-garde building, while the regents wanted a traditional style, an impasse that eventually led Herzog and de Meuron to walk away. The dean of UT's School of Architecture resigned in protest, and Hite says she thought about quitting, too.

Instead, with hefty donations already committed and a burgeoning art collection to accommodate, the university pressed ahead with the museum project. Hite stayed on and helped hire another prominent architect, Michael McKinnell of Boston. Which eventually led to a sultry spring morning a few weeks ago, when Hite happily conducted another in a long series of pre-opening tours of the building with the red roof of Spanish tile and Texas limestone walls.

The new Blanton, which sits several blocks north and within plain view of the Texas Capitol, is anything but striking from the outside, a rather boxy structure that resembles several other Mediterranean-style buildings on the UT campus. But most visitors will find the museum enchanting from the moment they enter its soaring 50-foot atrium with skylights and blindingly white walls.

Hite's recent tour began there, then led through new classrooms and boardrooms, and into first-floor galleries where traveling art exhibitions were already installed. Up a winding staircase were the museum's signature galleries (over 28,000 square feet), some of them intimate for the smaller European paintings and the collection of prints and drawings. Larger pieces of contemporary art were hung in sprawling, high-ceilinged spaces with soft natural light. By the end of the two-hour tour, Hite had shown masterpieces ranging from Renaissance works to contemporary abstracts and almost everything in between.

"I had known the collection in bits and pieces over the years, but seeing it installed (on a recent tour), I was knocked out," says Bill Booziotis, a Dallas architect and longtime art lover. "I told Jessie that the big story was going to be what a great collection they had, that it was going to be a bigger story than the building."

To Hite, an affable woman who began her career as a curatorial assistant at the Blanton in 1979, it's about time.

"Patience is my weak point, and boy, has that been tested," she says. "What should have taken four years has taken 10 or 12 years to get this done."

Hite says she will never forget the mental image: Mari Michener, the tiny wife of the famous novelist, hectoring a lanky university president named William Cunningham whenever the two ran into each other at UT functions in the 1980s and early 1990s.

"She used to shake her finger at him," Hite recalls, laughing, "saying, 'We need a new museum.' "

The Micheners were entitled to some finger-shaking. For decades, James Michener had been an avid collector of works of 20th-century American painters, researching the art he purchased with the same vigor he did his novels. UT legend has it that in the early 1960s, when Michener was defeated in a run for Congress from a district in Pennsylvania, he began to look for a permanent home for his paintings. The fledgling museum at UT, founded in 1963, promised the Micheners two floors of the humanities building. The first Michener paintings were donated in 1968.

A UT museum building was contemplated as early as the 1980s but was put on hold because of Gov. Bill Clements' dreams for a state art museum (those plans fizzled for lack of funds). As a result, the growing UT collection remained consigned to small galleries in the art building and in the humanities building across campus.

Not until the mid-1990s, when the Micheners donated $10 million for a new museum, did the project again gather steam. Other major donors fell in line. In 1998, Herzog and de Meuron, superstars in the world of architecture, were selected to design the building. That same year, the Blanton acquired what is known as the Suida-Manning Collection, more than 600 paintings and drawings considered one of the finest collections of Renaissance and Baroque art in the nation.

Then — with the Blanton seemingly poised to join the state's cultural elite — came the meltdown. In their preliminary sketches for the museum, Herzog and de Meuron proposed a sprawling 1-story building with an undulating roof. The UT regents, particularly a South Texas oilman named Tony Sanchez, insisted on a traditional approach more in keeping with the style of the campus.

Sanchez, who was also the unsuccessful Democratic candidate for Texas governor in 2002, went so far as having his own sketches commissioned to help Herzog and de Meuron along. They quit instead, as did Lawrence Speck, dean of UT's School of Architecture. In a campus protest, outraged students bore a placard reading "Hold the bologna — we want the Swiss."

What the Blanton got instead was a courtly, highly respected architect from Boston, Michael McKinnell says he took the job only reluctantly, after being convinced that "the decks had been cleared for a new approach." In the design process that followed, McKinnell says he encountered no interference from the regents, but he collaborated closely with Faulkner, Hite and her curatorial staff.

Ironically, the building he came up with seems exactly what the regents hoped for in the first place. There are flourishes in the massive structure — overhangs, arcades and detailing on the limestone walls — but even museum officials describe it as somewhat bland and highly in keeping with the red roofs and limestone walls of the rest of the campus.

"This will not be seen as an avant-garde building," McKinnell says. "I think it is an architecture of resistance, resistance to a current and very interesting movement to make museums in and of themselves extra-striking and eye-catching. Some of those museums don't necessarily provide the appropriate environment for the contemplation of (the art.)"

The Blanton, with its eclectic gallery spaces, surely does, in the opinion of university and museum officials and most early visitors.

"I just believe that art looks better in traditional spaces," Hite says. "This is what we're trying to do, and we're not apologizing for it."

Particularly as the opening draws near, and Austin buzzes around its first major museum. From a direct mailing announcing the museum in February, Hite says the Blanton hoped to attract 850 new members from the Austin community and $65,000 in donations.

"We got 1,800 new members and $175,000 instead," Hite says. "In one focus group, when they were showing the works of the collection, one woman started crying. She said, 'I can't believe we're going to have a museum.'"

On the recent day in the museum, as the opening drew near, Hite wasn't beyond a little disbelief herself.

"We've suffered a lot to get here," she says, smiling. "I mean, really, a lot."

A model of the Blanton Museum of Art, seen above, will give Austin, TX residents a taste of fine art.

He hit the road with The Genius as the DJ for the Cold Chillin' Blizzard Tour, along with then hip-hop heavyweights Biz Markie, Big Daddy Kane, Kool G Rap & DJ Polo, Kid Capri and Masta Ace.

"Being around the Wu-Tang and producing, I mean, really living off of this, didn't sink in until a few years ago when I realized this is a job," Mathematics said. "And I began to take it real serious. The demand and everyday living keep me from just staying in the house and making music. I have a family to take care of and there seems to always be something to do."

From 1996 until the present, Mathematics has had his hand in producing at least one track for every Wu-Tang Clan album and subsequent solo releases by individual members.

Whether it was crafting "Cobra Clutch" or "Wu Banga 101" from Ghostface Killah's 2000 sophomore album, Supreme Clientele, or putting down "Do You Really (Thang Thang)" and "Rules" from Wu-Tang's 2000 album The W and 2001's Wu-Tang Iron Flag, respectively, Mathematics has always found himself busy with projects.

"Basically, producers, like me, always stay working," he said, "so I always keep my beats coming."

Mathematics is slated to have production credits on Raekwon's still yet-to-be-released "Only Built for Cuban Linx 2," an album with Masta Killa and is also preparing to head out on tour with the Wu-Tang Clan.

If that is not enough, Mathematics is prepping the release of a DVD titled "The Beat Kings," featuring interviews from some of the greatest producers in hip-hop, such as Pete Rock, Marley Marl and The RZA to Kanye West, Alchemist and Just Blaze, said Mathematics.

"Though people have been doing a number of hip-hop documentaries, I actually came up with this a few years ago," he said. "I included a number of songs from the actual artists and I ran into licensing problems. So I had to go back and craft an original score to the DVD."

Stardom might seem like an unfamiliar word to Mathematics, but with more than two-dozen production credits to his name and three albums under his belt, the Wu-Tang producer might soon find himself getting calls from artists outside the Clan umbrella.

Yet, his focus still lies with the Wu-Tang.

"That 'W' logo is embedded in so many people's minds," he said. "It's going to be Wu-Tang forever. Wu-Tang is my brothers, and I'm their DJ."

Mathematic's third album, 'Soul of a Man,' is slated for a summer release. For more information, visit www.nature-sounds.net.

Former Wu Tang Clan member Mathematics, seen here, vows to stay loyal to the music of the Wu Tang in his third album, "Soul of a Man."

weekend on a losing streak, the atmosphere in the clubhouse is positive. And with some recent success, the Minutemen have much to look forward to in 2006.

"We've always had high hopes throughout the season," Sullivan said. "Nothing really gets us down. We know we're playing better, and we're sticking together. So it should work out well for us.

"We've been getting stronger as the season goes," he added. "We're starting to put it all together. Just coming off of that sweep [last weekend against Saint Louis], that's huge. That puts us right back in it. Temple is kind of the weaker team in the league, and we should be able to boost ourselves back into the playoff standings."

The Minutemen are right in the middle of the pack when it comes to their placement in the A-10 standings. With that in mind, Stone would rather have his team play by the old cliché of "one game at a time."

"We can't be looking towards the playoffs," Stone said. "We need to take care of business each weekend, first. In the league, we're actually in pretty good shape. But it's up to us. We need to take care of our own situation, and if we do that, I guess we'll have an opportunity at the end. But we can't be looking ahead. We have to play good baseball, and win."

Jersey-bound after 11th straight Atlantic 10 championship

By Joey White
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's rowing team is fresh off its 11th consecutive Atlantic 10 Championship and will be taking on the best in the nation Saturday in Princeton, N.J.

Princeton University, the No. 1 team in the land, will be hosting UMass, George Washington and the University of Tennessee.

"They are extremely fast," UMass coach Jim Dietz said of the Tigers. "What we're hoping for this weekend is to take out Tennessee and reclaim our [No. 3 ranking in Mid-Atlantic Region] status over GW after that loss [A-10] weekend."

The Colonials' varsity eight moved up to No. 3 in the Mid-Atlantic Region Poll with their victory over the Maroon and White at the A-10 championships by more than eight seconds.

"It was unthinkable that we lost that race," Dietz said of the varsity-eight race where the Minutewomen finished fourth.

UMass will have a different look in its varsity-eight boat Saturday. Sophomore Amanda Mawn will replace Rachael Nealer and will be in the third seat, while Hannah Brewster will move up into the second seat. Junior Ellen Maskrey will once again lead the team in the stroke seat, where she rowed last season.

The remainder of the varsity-eight squad will stay the same with sophomore coxswain Dana Pulda, and rowers Catherine Gariepy, Gabrielle Papineau, Katie Berger, Stephanie Hopf and Sarah Marsan.

On Saturday, Princeton's varsity-eight boat improved its winning streak to 33 races when the Tigers defeated No. 10 Dartmouth by nearly 20 seconds and Penn by over 33 seconds.

Princeton will not only be looking to improve its first varsity-eight winning streak to 36 races, but will also look to complete a perfect novice season.

The Tigers have been No. 1 in every Collegiate Rowing Coaches Association/US Rowing poll of 2006, as they have beaten the majority of their opponents by 20-30 seconds.

Only two squads have come within 10 seconds of Princeton all season. In their first races of the season on March 25, the Tigers beat No. 9 Brown by 9.3 seconds and beat No. 4 Yale by 9.1 seconds on April 15.

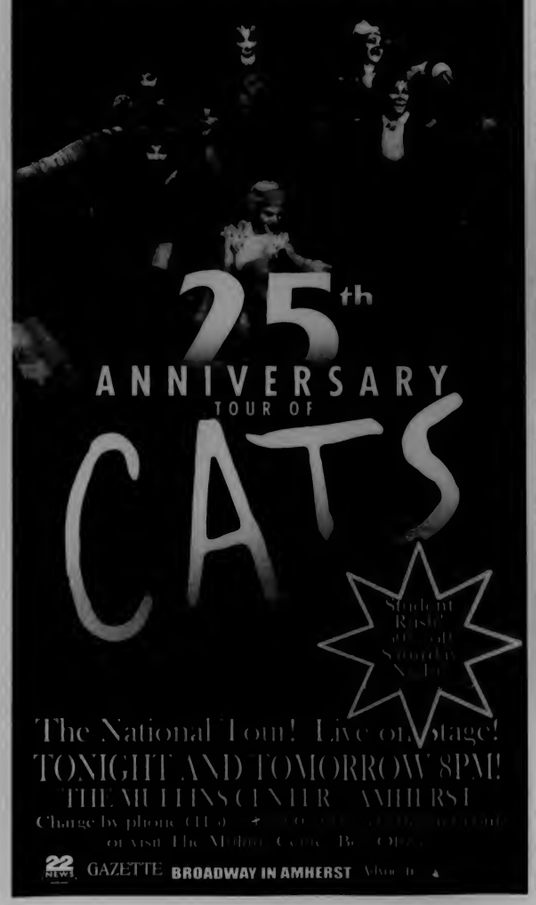
"We're just hoping to get into the top-20 in the country," Dietz said.

A good way of doing that would be to beat the Volunteers Saturday, who sit in the 20th spot in the nation.

Tennessee's varsity-eight squad is ranked third in the South Region behind Virginia and the University of Central Florida.

Last year the Volunteers posted their best finish at the NCAA Championships with an eighth-place showing.

"They're a program that expects to be [at the NCAA Championships] every year," Dietz said of Tennessee. "And we want to get UMass to be expected to be there every year and the way to do that is to face better programs."



The Minutewomen have strengthened their schedule in the 2006 campaign by facing the likes of Columbia, Boston University, Brown and Texas.

"You knock them out, you look like a contender," Dietz said.

The Minutewomen have had these races circled on their calendar for a long time now.

"The goals here are actually higher. We breezed through the A-10 weekend," Dietz said. "I think they're going to get more up for this race – more competition."

again not dress for today's game. Considered a central piece of the defense, she has started in all 10 games she's appeared in and scooped up 22 groundballs. She has yet to appear in an A-10 game.

Bolduc commended senior captain Kerri Connerty, who is normally in attack, for moving to midfield in light of the setback, saying she was "proud of her in doing it so gracefully."

Toss It Up

For the last 20 minutes of practice, the Minutewomen lined up at the Garber Field end line facing the Southwest Tunnel for a long shot contest, the first time all year they've played this game. Only a handful of the players' balls made it past the center line, where Bolduc was standing. This, along with a game she calls "Power Finesse," are a way for Bolduc to keep the players loose and having fun.

Lucky Charms

When asked about recruiting McCormick, a high school All-American, last year, Bolduc flashes a class ring nestled comfortably on her left ring finger. Bolduc was a 1995 graduate of Albany Academy for Girls, an archrival of McCormick's Saratoga Springs High, and reminisced about the close games they had during her playing days there.

On a more relevant note, Bolduc hasn't taken off the ring since the A-10 season started nearly three weeks ago. She wears it everywhere –including when she sleeps at night and washes up in the morning – and considers it a bit of a good luck charm. Even in the three conference losses, the Minutewomen have appeared to play solid.

And don't be unnerved if you see Bolduc frantically scrambling around before today's game. It's probably just her looking for a penny on the ground heads-up – another of her good luck charms.

UMass preps for postseason with pre-conference meet

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts track and field teams are set and ready to go to the UNH Pre-Conference Meet in Durham, N.H. this Saturday.

Both coaches said that their respective teams will use the meet as preparation for the Atlantic 10 Championships, the New England Championships and the NCAAs, which are all scheduled to take place over the next month.

Coaches often use these "tune-up meets" to experiment with entering certain athletes into events that they are not necessarily used to.

"It's not unusual at meets like this for coaches to put athletes in an event that may be used as an effort to sharpen up a possible performance down the road," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said.

He mentioned that sophomore Nathan Barksdale might be one of the athletes that he will experiment with.

"Nathan is one of those guys who everyone takes for granted because he's very, very consistent," O'Brien said.

He added that Barksdale is an important factor in UMass' 4x100- and 4x400-meter relays, and they will remain his prime concern this weekend. However, O'Brien said that Barksdale will be entered in an additional meet-either the 200-meter or 400-meter dash.

Another key component of the ever-improving relay teams is junior Manny Harris-Lopes. He has made a name for himself as a dominant first runner in both events and when Saturday rolls around he will have an additional contest in mind.

"We'd like to have him record a faster time in the 400-meters this week so that when the Conference [Championships] come next week he could possibly move into the top section of 400-meter runners, therefore increasing his chances of placing," O'Brien said.

There are still some athletes, however, who will be sticking to their strengths this weekend.

One of these athletes is junior Erik Hoagland.

Hoagland is a perfect 4-0 in the long jump.

At the UConn Invitational last weekend he won the event with a jump of 23 feet, 8.25 inches, the second-longest in school history.

He also turned in a season-best mark of 46 feet, 3.5 inches in the triple jump to walk away with second place.

O'Brien added that freshman Steve Gerome, sophomore Nils Fischer and senior Ryan Corbett should all have excellent tune-up meets.

UMass women's coach Julie LaFreniere echoed O'Brien, stating that the upcoming competition will be used to prepare the Minutewomen for A-10s the following weekend.

"[We will try] to sharpen them up, just to see what's going on," LaFreniere said. "[We want] to see what their performances will be like and help us make decisions as to who to enter at the Atlantic 10 Conference Meet."

Primarily a long-distance runner, DeRosa will be entered in the 800- and 1,500-meters, in order to focus on speed.

"She's a very strong distance runner. She can hold a certain pace for a long time," LaFreniere commented. "She will not be the fastest 1,500-meter runner there, and probably not the fastest 800-meter runner. [But] if I put her in a 5,000-meter [race] she would be the fastest one."

LaFreniere added that she is thinking of submitting DeRosa in the 10K race at the A-10s and hopes that this pre-conference meet will prepare her for it.

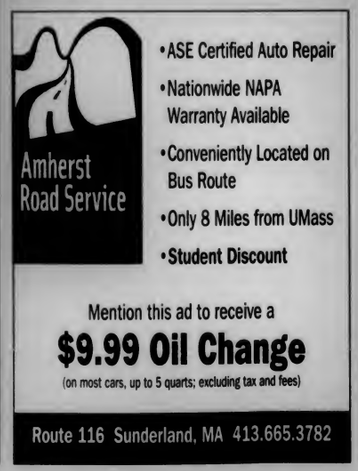
Freshman thrower Jordan Veney has been preparing all year and has exploded onto the UMass track and field scene.

She boasts season-best throws of 136 feet, 1 inch in the discus and 126 feet, 4 inches in the hammer throw. She has also broken the UMass shot put record five times, most recently at the Brown Invitational on April 16 with a mark of 44 feet, 10.25 inches.

LaFreniere doesn't expect her stellar performances to cease anytime soon.

"Every weekend I see nothing but improvement for her," LaFreniere said. "She's a very competitive person. She's not happy with her performances."

Due to being plagued with a nagging injury to her take-off foot, sophomore pole-vaulter Kristen Bakanowski's main goal will be to regain her form. LaFreniere said the frustrating ailment has been affecting her approach and it is something they plan to work on this weekend.



LaFreniere commends that, despite the pain, Bakanowski has not missed any competitions lately. In fact, last weekend at the UConn Invitational, she placed third in the pole vault with a height of 11 feet, .25 inches.

LaFreniere was dismayed to report that freshman sprinter Dionise Miranda will officially miss the remainder of the outdoor season.

Miranda has been out of commission since severely pulling her hamstring at the Indoor Atlantic 10 Championships on Feb. 18.

She has attempted to ease back into competition on numerous occasions, but her injury never healed.

Minutemen take on lowly Owls

After frustrating loss, UM returns home

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

It has been fairly quiet down at Earl Lorden Field as of late.

The Massachusetts baseball team has only played three out of its first 29 games at home this season. Starting this weekend, the Minutemen (9-20, 7-8 Atlantic 10) will be homesick no longer.

UMass begins a 14-game home stand this afternoon when it takes on Temple (7-31, 1-12 A-10) at 3 p.m. at Earl Lorden Field. Today's game against the Owls will be the first of a three-game series. Saturday and Sunday's games are both set to start at noon.

UMass last played at home on April 8 and 9 against Duquesne. The Minutemen took two-of-three from the Dukes, but have been on a 10-game road trip ever since. Needless to say, the Maroon and White will enjoy a little home cooking.

"It feels good," senior pitcher David Sullivan said about playing at home. "Being on the road is the worst thing because you get awful crowds. It's going to be good to be home and playing on our field, something we're used to. The environment just helps you play better."

"You always like playing at home, and we just haven't," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We've only played three games at home this season. So hopefully we'll come out playing our best baseball. It's exciting to be home. You know, you can sleep in your own bed, and it makes a difference."

Temple has lost its last 12 games, and is currently in last place in the A-10. The Owls have only one conference win this season, but that doesn't mean the Minutemen won't have to bring their A-game.

"We can't be concerned with the fact that their record is not strong," Stone said. "We need to be concerned with playing good baseball once again. We're better than we were two weeks ago. We're improving. We've got a good attitude. We're competitive, but we need to be a little bit more competitive in some situations at the plate, as well as on the mound."

UMass has been playing much better lately. It has won three of its last five games, including a three-game sweep over Saint Louis last weekend.

The Minutemen are coming off of two heartbreaking losses. Northeastern defeated UMass, 7-6, in the consolation game of the Beanpot tournament on Tuesday at Fenway Park. The very next night, Boston College – the 2006 Beanpot Champions – beat UMass, 11-10, in dramatic fashion, thanks to Pete Frates' walk-off home run in the bottom of the 12th inning.

While it was disheartening for UMass to play so well and lose back-to-back games, Stone is starting to like what he sees from his players.

"I'm encouraged with the way we're playing," Stone said. "I'm encouraged with the attitude, and the competitiveness the team brings everyday.

"I think they're excited about having a good weekend," he continued. "I know they were disappointed, which they should be, losing those games. If you're a competitor it should bother you to lose a ballgame like that when you should win. And that would have been a good win. BC's a good team. We were disappointed, but I think we were also positive. Everybody's spirits are up, and we're ready to go this weekend."

The Minutemen offense has produced 36 runs in the last five games, thanks to the solid play of sophomore Ryan Franczek. The third baseman is riding a career-high 12-game hitting streak, and leads the team with a .340 batting average and 25 runs scored.

See BASEBALL on page 10

Third baseman Ryan Franczek extended his hitting streak to a career-high 12 games against the Boston College Eagles on Wednesday.

Newcomer Charlotte, Dayton tops in Atlantic 10 baseball

Atlantic 10 Baseball is rolling. Most teams are 14 to 15 games into their respective schedules. The Massachusetts Nine are hanging around the middle of the bunch, packed in between George Washington (6-7 A-10) and Saint Louis (8-7 A-10), and tied with Richmond and Saint Joseph's with 7-8 in-conference records.

The Charlotte 49ers, the A-10's most recent addition, and the Dayton Flyers sit atop the conference with a 12-3 records against A-10 foes. Charlotte has an impressive 28-12 overall record, two games better than Dayton (24-14 overall) in the loss column.

Martinez gets national recognition

Collegiate Baseball announced Monday that Fordham's junior right-hander received its Louisville Slugger National Player of the Week Award after striking out a career-high 14 batters in a 2-0 win over Temple on April 9. The 14 strikeouts were the most by a Rams pitcher since the 1956 season. Martinez threw eight consecutive strikeouts over the first three innings.

Adamski doubles as pitcher

UMass junior first baseman-pitcher Bryan Adamski received the A-10 Pitcher of the Week Award because of his stellar showings in all three games of a three-game series with Saint Louis. Adamski recorded a save in each game in the Minutemen's first sweep of a conference opponent this season.

Adamski made a relief appearance in Wednesday's match up with the Boston College Eagles. He took the hill with a one-run lead and the tying runner on third base. Adamski induced a grounder to the second baseman with the infield in, but Adam Tempesta couldn't come with it and the Eagles tied the game at 10. BC went on the win the game on a game-winning home run in the bottom of the 12th inning.

Adamski has notched five saves in 10 appearances this season. He has a 1.86 earned run average for the year.

Marshall Law

Richmond freshman Ian Marshall received the Pitcher of the Week and Rookie of the Week awards in the A-10. The freshman earned his second win of the season after tossing a seven-inning, complete-game shutout over the lowly Duquesne Dukes on April 23.

Minutewomen's season comes down to final weekend in Philly

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

As typical coach-speak comes and goes, you're bound to hear the cliché, "every game is just as important," dropped often.

But more than any other game this season, today's Senior Day matchup between the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team and the Duquesne Dukes (10-4, 3-2 Atlantic 10), is absolutely pivotal.

That might explain the enormous grin on UMass coach Carrie Bolduc's face yesterday afternoon at the conclusion of practice. She considers herself to have lived for these types of games during her playing days at Syracuse – and being the top-tier program it is, there were plenty of big-time games to look forward to at SU.

Right now UMass is down to its last dollar. One more loss, be it tomorrow or on Sunday at George Washington, and it's over. It's go-for-broke time or no time at all, and when pressed on the matter Bolduc is more passionate than she has been all season long. She's practically ecstatic, but not to the point where she loses her trademark calmness.

"I love this stuff," Bolduc said. "I love being in pressure situations, and I'm looking forward to seeing them [Duquesne]. We thrive off of these kinds of games."

Bolduc went on to stress how well she feels her Minutewomen play under pressure despite their uber-youth, and if they play the way she is preaching than this afternoon's game – the final home game of the year – should be another barnburner.

Aside from a 19-8 beatdown earlier in the year at the hands of Duke, Duquesne's high-powered offense keeps it close in losses and when they're ahead can often prove nightmarish, as Saint Joseph's and Howard found out earlier this year.

Kelly Mulford (43 goals, 49 points) and Courtney Tamasitis (38 points) spearhead a group of attacks and midfielders that are outshooting opponents at a rate of 9.8 per game (6.8 on goal).

The most interesting matchup of the day, however, will not be who plays the better up-tempo style of attack, but how each team's defense responds. The Krista Mann-led Dukes are allowing a conference-low average of 8.44 goals per game, while Jackie Nesbitt heads a UMass defense that leads the A-10 in ground balls per game (27.33).

With No. 11 Richmond, No. 18 St. Bonaventure and Temple punching their tickets to the A-10 Tournament next weekend in Washington, D.C. – each has just one conference loss – this game will determine who gets the fourth and final seed. Should UMass beat Duquesne but lose on Sunday to GW – and Duquesne beats Temple on Sunday – the Minutewomen are out. If UMass wins both games, they're in regardless of the DUQ-TU game. Should they lose, Duquesne gets the nod.

Considering GW (5-10, 1-4 A-10) has already knocked itself out of contention with painful inconsistency – this, after receiving votes in preseason Top-20 polls – the Colonials would love nothing more than to play spoiler and knock someone else out. That could come at the expense of UMass.

It's no secret the Minutewomen are one of the youngest teams in the northeast, sporting 17 underclassmen, and countless times over the years, rookie inexperience has shown through.

This could be the case for UMass, given that its top two scorers are a sophomore (Kathleen Typadis, 37 points) and a freshman (Kayt McCormick, 30 points) – both of whom are outstanding athletes but young nonetheless – but Bolduc remains her usual calm self when asked about the possibility of cracking under pressure.

"Not in my book," she said. "We don't have anyone like that on our team. They like [the pressure] just as much as I do. I don't think you're an athlete if you don't like this kind of stuff."

Struggling Dayton visits UMass

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team (28-13, 12-2 Atlantic 10) returns to A-10 action today at the UMass Softball Complex to battle conference foe Dayton (15-24, 6-8 A-10). The doubleheader will start at 3 pm.

The Minutewomen return home after a short road trip in which they were 2-1. After splitting a weekend doubleheader with A-10 newcomer Saint Louis, the team defeated Central Connecticut Wednesday, 9-3, in the single matchup.

The Minutewomen are 16-3 all time against the Flyers, and swept them in last year's meeting, allowing just two runs in the two games.

"[Dayton] is usually pretty scrappy with us," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "They'll come at us pretty hard and I think they'll be competitive."

With the conference schedule winding down, teams on the edge of the postseason are looking to make an impact. Dayton, at 6-8 in the A-10, will be looking to do just that.

"It's sado-or-die situation for them so I think they'll come at us with everything they have," Sortino said.

UMass, however, stands firmly atop the A-10 conference standings at 12-2. The Maroon and White hold a 2 1/2-game lead over Charlotte and Fordham. Temple would be the final team to make the tournament, with a one-game lead over St. Bonaventure.

One of the biggest reasons for Minutewomen's success is the production at the top of the order. Amanda Morin and Candice Molinari have become a solid 1-2 punch for UMass, setting up for power hitters Whitney Mollica and KJ Kelley.

Morin and Molinari have scored a combined 73 runs on the season, and are at the top of the roster in on-base percentage, hits and batting average.

Molinari is currently on a 16-game hitting streak in which she is batting .500 with a .635 slugging percentage.

"That's what the [Morin and Molinari] are there for, to set the table," Sortino said. "The fact that they're getting on the table is critical to people in the heart of the order to have somebody to hit around."

Morin, a junior, made the move the leadoff spot this season. She has led off 26 games for the Maroon and White, and is hitting .451, scoring 32 runs since making the switch and has combined with Molinari to create a new offensive threat for the Minutewomen.

"I think they feed off of each too," Sortino said. "It's nice to have a lefty-lefty combination. They both have good wheels and can manufacture some things and do a little bit of running, so I think they're a good combination."

One of the players they have been setting up for is freshman Whitney Mollica. UMass' third baseman broke another record on Wednesday when she hit her 10th home run of the season, setting the mark for freshmen at UMass.

Mollica also owns the single-season RBI mark with 50. She has a shot to break the Atlantic 10 record for RBIs before the regular season. The current mark is 56, held by Fordham's Laura Klaiber, who set the record last season.

She is also chasing the UMass single season home run record, set last year by Kelley, who hit 14. Mollica's 10 is a best for freshman, but with 10 games remaining in the regular season, there is a chance she can take hold of the overall mark as well.

The Minutewomen will play seven games in five days next week, including doubleheaders on Monday, Tuesday and Friday, before concluding their season next Sunday against UConn on Senior Day.

The Minutewomen are 16-3 all-time against the Flyers, who are struggling in the 2006 campaign with a 15-24 overall record.

Second baseman/shortstop Stacy Cullington is batting .232 with 19 hits, 17 RBIs and three round-trippers on the season.

Bryan Johnston convicted of first degree murder

By Adam Goreck
Associated Press

NORTHAMPTON — A former Westfield State College student was convicted of murder Friday in the shooting death of his longtime friend.

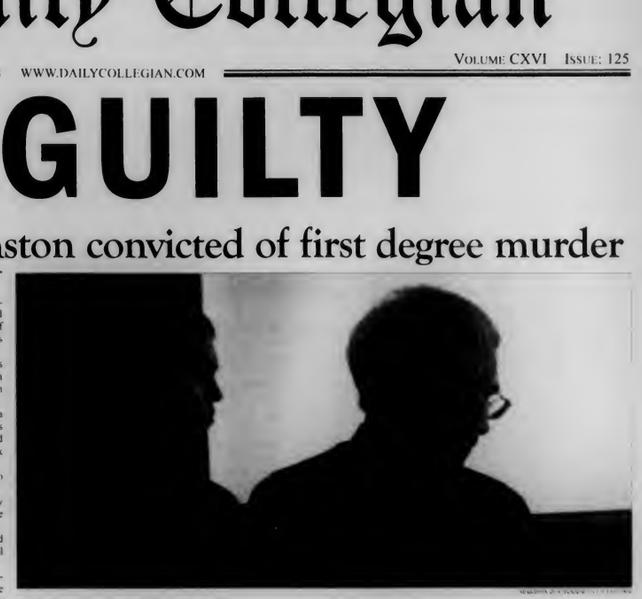
Bryan Johnston's lawyers argued he was insane when he shot David Sullivan, a senior at the University of Massachusetts, in December 2004.

But prosecutors said Johnston — a one-time criminal justice major — was clear-minded at the time, and only behaved erratically when he was using a heavy mix of drugs, alcohol and steroids.

Johnston was immediately sentenced to life in prison without parole.

He also was found guilty of burglary and weapons charges, for which he will be sentenced on Tuesday.

Johnston and Sullivan were childhood friends who went to the same high school in Dalton.



Sullivan's family members left the court without commenting, but prosecutor Renee Steese described them as "relieved and pleased with the verdict."

Jurors had begun deliberating the case Thursday afternoon.

Defense attorney Alex Nappan said he was shocked that they returned a verdict so quickly.

"It took a month to try, 150 hours of testimony, and the jury took seven hours to reach its verdict," he said.

"I don't question the jury," he said. "I don't understand what they did."

Bryan Johnston, left, sits in Hampshire Superior Court next to defense attorney Edward Berlin on April 10. A jury rejected the defense's argument that Johnston was insane when he shot and killed longtime friend and UMass student David Sullivan.

Bryan Johnston after his Dec. 7, 2004 arrest on a murder charge.

He said Johnston is "OK" but his family, who sat in the courtroom throughout the trial, is "devastated."

Throughout the four-week trial in Northampton Superior Court, Nappan tried to paint Johnston as an ordinary college student who began to unravel in the grips of mental illness. Friends of Johnston testified he would seem unstable when he drank alcohol, which they said he did often.

Sometimes he would brandish the handguns he owned, and once held a gun to a friend's head, they said.

Nappan said Johnston became convinced that Sullivan wanted to harm him, and began collecting guns to protect himself.

A forensic psychologist who evaluated Johnston at Bridgewater State Hospital testified that Johnston did not seem delusional after the killing.

Johnston shot Sullivan six times with a laser-sighted assault rifle in his friend's off-campus apartment in Amherst.

After the shooting, Johnston stashed the murder weapon in a tree by the Connecticut River in Hadley. Johnston's car became stuck where he parked it. When Hadley police officers — who were unaware of the murder — came to assist Johnston, they smelled alcohol on his breath but allowed him to call a friend to pick him up.

Police said that Johnston later called his parents and admitted he had killed Sullivan.

"This is a person who was extremely clear at the time of the killing, and extremely clear during the time after the killing," Steese said during her closing arguments.

Trial Notes

— The jury could have found Bryan Johnston guilty of either first degree murder, which indicates the homicide was premeditated, or second degree murder, which is homicide committed without premeditation but with some intent. He was found guilty of murder in the first degree.

— It took the jury seven hours to reach its verdict, after one month and approximately 150 hours of testimony.

— Johnston received an automatic sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole.

— Judge Bertha Josephson will sentence Johnston on weapons charges Tuesday. David Sullivan's family will also give victim impact statements.

— Johnston's lawyers claimed he suffered from delusions relating to paranoid schizophrenia leading up to Sullivan's death. Both the prosecution and the defense presented psychologists that testified both for and against the mental illness argument.

Limits on young drivers examined at UMass

By Donald Rando
Collegian Correspondent

Drivers who are 16 to 19 years old have the highest crash rates per licensed driver in the Bay State, according to researchers at the University of Massachusetts, who believe a graduated licensing system saves lives.

"National research shows that one of the reasons teens are over-represented in crashes is their willingness to take risks," said Michael Knodler, a Massachusetts Traffic Safety Research Program (MassSAFE) research fellow and assistant professor of civil and environmental engineering at UMass. "A number of research efforts have tackled this issue and the major reasons are believed to be their lack of actual driving experience."

MassSAFE research indicates that graduated licensing, called the Junior Operator License (JOL) in Massachusetts, has shown to be an effective way of giving young drivers experience behind the wheel while under adult supervision.

The JOL, which was implemented in 1998, puts restrictions on new drivers, such as limited driving hours with passengers at night and increased penalties for driving violations. The restrictions and increased penalties are removed once the driver reaches the age of 18.

MassSAFE research shows a 14 percent drop in the rate of 16-year-old drivers involved in crashes resulting in injury after the beginning of the JOL program.

"We believe that a multifaceted approach which includes education, enforcement, engineering, and legislative components can be effective" in reducing crashes involving young drivers, said Knodler.

However, Knodler acknowledges that improvements could be implemented.

"There are several revisions to the law that ought to at least be considered. Some examples of this include an expansion of the nighttime driving restriction from 9 p.m. to 5 a.m., as this is a high crash period for young drivers," he said.

He also said that strengthening the driver education program to provide added real world experience, implement-

Chemist uses grant to examine protein

By Steve Stafford
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts chemist Jeanne Hardy has been named a recipient of the Beckman Foundation Young Investigator Award. With this award, she will receive a three-year grant worth $264,000 to study a protein that kills sick cells.

"Basically, what we want to do is put an off-switch in a protein, just like a light-switch," Hardy explained. "We would be able to turn it on and off to see what it does. What we care about is what happens then. If we turn it off, does it affect diseases? For example, if we turn off cancer cells, will they behave like regular cells?"

Currently, drugs don't even target a single percent of cellular proteins. Moreover, scientists don't have an effective way to determine if blocking a specific protein is useful in fighting cancer or Alzheimer's.

Hardy plans to use this prestigious grant to further her protein investigations. The Beckman Young Investigators Program provides research support to the most promising young faculty members in the chemical and life sciences.

Scientists have historically used "trial and error" to find compounds that could kill cancer cells, Hardy said. Usually, the protein or proteins that a compound attacked were unknown. Since this method usually blocks more than one type of protein, many unwanted side effects occur, which is why cancer treatments cause patients to lose their hair and become nauseated. If drugs were

Immigrants, supporters take another stand today

By Erin Texeira
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Now that immigrants have grabbed the nation's attention, what next?

Monday has been set aside for immigrants to boycott work, school and shopping to show how much they matter to their communities. But with some growing tired of street protests, and others afraid they'll be deported or fired for walking out, people are planning to support the effort in myriad ways.

Some will work but buy nothing on Monday. Others will protest at lunch breaks or at rallies after work. There will be church services, candlelight vigils, picnics and human chains.

The range of activities shows both how powerful the immigrants' rights movement has become in a matter of weeks, and that organizers don't yet have a clear focus on its next step.

"It's highly unpredictable what's going to happen," said Harley Shaiken, director of the Center for Latin American studies at the University of California, Berkeley. "What unites everyone that's going to do something on May 1 is they are making visible their strong feelings."

Thanks to the success of previous rallies plus media attention, planning for Monday's events, collectively called Un Dia Sin Immigrantes

Middle income families affected by college costs

BOSTON (AP) — The cost of sending a child to college in New England is eating up an increasing portion of the average middle-class family's income, according to a study released Sunday.

Families with students attending private colleges in the region spend about one-third of their income on tuition and related costs, according to the Massachusetts Institute for a New Commonwealth, a Boston-based nonpartisan think tank.

That is up from about one-fourth of family income in 1992-93.

Things are a little better for middle-class families sending children to the region's public universities. Those families spend 21 percent, or about one-fifth of their income, to cover college costs, up from 18 percent in 1992-93.

College costs have climbed faster than income and aid, according to the study, "Paying for College: The Rising Cost of Higher Education."

Although rising college costs are an issue across the nation, the problem is particularly acute in New England, according to the study, authored by Bridget Terry Long of the Harvard University Graduate School of Education.

Tuition and fees at Massachusetts public colleges are higher than the national average.

"Higher education is the gateway to the American Dream," said Ian Bowles, President and CEO of MassINC. "But its cost is accelerating much faster than incomes, even more so in New England than the nation."

Keith Richards undergoes treatment for concussion

WELLINGTON, New Zealand (AP) — Keith Richards fans gathered outside a hospital Sunday where the Rolling Stones guitarist was believed to be undergoing treatment for a mild concussion reportedly suffered when he fell out of a palm tree on vacation in Fiji.

One newspaper also reported that Richards, 62, got on a Jet Ski after the fall and had another accident. Several Australian and New Zealand media outlets reported the fall from the tree.

Band spokeswoman Fran Curtis has said only that Richards was injured earlier this week and flown to New Zealand with his wife, Patti, for observation. Her statement Saturday did not comment on Richards' condition or how he was injured.

New Zealand's Sunday Star-Times provided no details on the Jet Ski crash, but quoted Dr Uzzel Kanti Dhar as saying that Richards was admitted to Suva Private Hospital spokesman hospital in the Fijian capital on Thursday, the same day he was said to have fallen from the tree.

Richards reportedly was airlifted to Auckland's Ascot Hospital later that day. Duty manager Steve Kirby refused to confirm early Sunday that Richards was a patient there, citing the hospital's privacy policy.

Fans gathered outside the hospital Sunday, and New Zealand's TV3 reported that Richards' wife arrived carrying clothes while a security guard carried in three guitar cases.

"Nobody likes falling from a height like that, but he's never fallen from grace for me," fan Dave Buchanan told TV3 News.

Richards and his wife were staying at the exclusive Wakaya Club resort on a small Fijian island when he reportedly was injured.

Safesi Finau of the resort told The Associated Press that Richards and his wife recently stayed there for about a week, but would not say when they left or comment on reports that Richards had an accident.

The Rolling Stones played a concert in Wellington, New Zealand, on April 18 as part of their "A Bigger Bang" world tour.

According to the band's Web site, the Stones' next scheduled concert is late May at the Olympic Stadium in Barcelona, Spain, followed by 34 more dates across Europe.

U.S. cities brace for crowds as immigration reform protests begin

Protesters rally on the grounds of the Capitol Building in Washington, D.C. last Monday to show support for the families of deported immigrants. More immigration protests are expected today nationwide.

— A Day Without Immigrants — is widespread.

Officials in Los Angeles braced for huge crowds: Assistant Police Chief George Gascon said as many as 500,000 people could take part.

In smaller cities such as Allentown, Pa., Omaha, Neb., and Knoxville, Tenn., immigrants and their allies have been going door to door with fliers, making posters and sharpening speeches. In New Mexico, restaurants cooked meals this weekend that they'll donate for Monday picnics in Santa Fe and Albuquerque.

In Pomona, Calif., about 30 miles east of Los Angeles, dozens of men who frequent a day labor center voted unanimously to close Monday, said Mike Nava, the center's director.

"If anyone even comes around looking for work that day," Nava said, "the men want him suspended."

Some insist that a boycott is the next key step — beyond marches — to show the nation just how much economic power undocumented workers hold. "The marches are a tool, but they are being overused," said Mahonrry Hidalgo, head of the immigration committee of New Jersey's Latino Leadership Alliance. Like civil rights boycotts of decades past, he said, "this could finally be the spark for our people to advance."

RETRACTION

To Our Readers,

The editors at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian have retracted an article that was printed in the newspaper on Tuesday, April 25, 2006. The article, titled "Spring event threatened by construction work" and written by Megan Daley, was filled with several erroneous facts and reporting errors.

In short, the article explained that the 40th annual Spring Fling event, which is typically held in the Northeast Residential Area, was likely to be cancelled due to construction problems. The article told readers that construction by the University of Massachusetts was ahead of schedule, and workers would be digging up the quad where the event is normally held. None of this information turned out to be true.

Ms. Daley, who is both a writer and an editor at the Collegian, and was the news editor on duty the night before the article was published, has acknowledged several errors in her reporting. She has also issued a written letter of apology to Mr. Jim Hunt, the Communications Manager for Facilities and Campus Planning at UMass.

Grant used at UMass to fight many diseases

more specifically geared toward certain proteins, then they would be more effective and have fewer side effects, Hardy said.

Hardy's proposal describes a way to control only one specific type of protein, by engineering the protein to be sensitive to the drug her team selects. This is a direct way of determining whether inactivating certain proteins could cure a particular disease and which protein should be targeted to treat which disease. This technique does not delete the protein entirely from the cell and provides a rapid response, so the results demonstrate more accurately what would happen if a drug were developed that targeted a specific protein, said Hardy.

Her proposal focuses on a protein called caspase-7, which is responsible for causing sick cells to die. When these proteins do not function properly, it allows cancerous cells to live, so it is a great test case for development of these techniques, she said.

Hardy joined the UMass Amherst chemistry faculty in September 2005. She received her bachelor's degree in chemistry and her master's degree in biochemistry from Utah State University. She went on to earn her Ph.D. in molecular and cellular biology from the University of California, Berkeley.

Hardy says her time in college was important for her to find the right career path for her. "[UC Berkeley] was a great, focused environment on learning as much as possible, rather than turning students into robots that can test well. I see this same approach at UMass; they really want their students to come out well-trained first and foremost," Hardy said.

"If [UMass] students decide to study biochemistry, I can tell them that it's really exciting," Hardy said. "You hope that you can find the molecules or the proteins that can fight the disease that their parents, brothers, sisters or friends have."

Rally urges end to killing in Sudan

By Elizabeth White
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Thousands of people joined celebrities and lawmakers at a rally Sunday urging the Bush administration to use its political muscle to help end genocide in Sudan's Darfur region.

"Not on our watch," the crowd began chanting as a parade of speakers lined up for their turn on a stage on the National Mall, the Capitol serving as a backdrop.

"The personal motivation for a lot of us is the Holocaust," said Boston-based Rabbi Or Rose of Jewish Seminarians for Justice. "Given our history and experience, we feel an obligation to stand up and speak out."

The organizers' permit estimated a turnout of 10,000 to 15,000 for the rally, one of several planned in U.S. cities over the weekend over what the United Nations has termed the world's worst humanitarian disaster.

"It is the socially responsible, good conscience thing to do," said Ron Fisher, who took a pre-dawn bus from Cleveland with his 15-year-old daughter Jordyn to attend the demonstration. "It's an opportunity to show my daughter what people do when they care about something."

The U.S. Park Police, which does not issue crowd estimates, reported no arrests. "It's a large crowd. I think they have a really good turnout," Sgt. Scott Fear said.

The event attracted high-profile speakers from the worlds of screen, athletics, religion and politics: actor George Clooney, just back from a trip to Africa; Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.; House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California; Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel; Olympic speedskating champion Joey Cheek, who donated his bonus money to projects in war-torn Darfur; and Roman Catholic Cardinal Theodore McCarrick, archbishop of Washington.

Refugee Hassan Cober said he was forced to leave his family and flee Sudan four years ago after many were killed and raped in his village. He urged the U.S. and the United Nations to act quickly, saying he had no idea where his family was or if they were OK.

"We need deeds, not words," said Cober, who now lives in Portland, Maine. "They need to come to Darfur today, not tomorrow, because what is going on is a disaster."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a broadcast interview, noted developments Sunday in Nigeria, where Sudan's government said it was ready to sign a peace agreement to end the bloodshed. Rebels, however, rejected the draft deal. "Obviously a peace agreement would be a very important step forward in getting this done," Rice said on ABC's "This Week."

Sudan has indicated it might accept a U.N. force in Darfur to aid African Union troops if a peace treaty is signed. Years of fighting between ethnic groups and Arab militias in western Sudan have left at least 180,000 people dead and about 2 million homeless. Amid the talks, the plight of 3 million refugees in Darfur has worsened. The U.N. World Food Program said Friday that it was cutting rations in half, citing a lack of funds.

President Bush met with Darfur advocates at the White House on Friday and lent his support to the weekend rallies. "For those of you who are going out to march for justice, you represent the best of our country," Bush said.

Students divided on underage driving law

Laws that restrict driving for people under 18 are growing in support from some analysts at UMass.

ing a driving re-test at the age of 18 and restricting cell phone usage among junior operators could help.

UMass students were not convinced that Knodler's suggestions would make a noticeable difference.

"Well, personally, I got in trouble for breaking the passenger restriction time limits, so I think if more emphasis is placed on them it would help," said Barbara Booras, a UMass freshman. "But no matter what, kids will break these rules. I feel a second road test would definitely ensure that those getting their licenses were fully qualified. It would most likely show a slight decrease in accidents among teenagers."

UMass freshman Meghan Flynn also thought JOI. laws will be largely ignored. "It wouldn't lower the number of crashes because kids would just ignore the restrictions anyways, [but] educating young drivers about the dangers of driving could lower the number of crashes they get in," she said.

UMass sophomore Cameron MacKenzie disagreed. "Young drivers aren't irresponsible because they don't know, it is because they don't care," MacKenzie said. "Aside from excessive use of scare tactics, which isn't a viable option, there isn't any solution except bumping up the minimum age."

The study was part of ongoing analysis of crash and violation data by the MassSAFE, part of the Transportation Center at UMass Amherst. It was conducted by Michael Knodler and Rohin Riessman.

Don't hate them 'cuz you ain't them

Debbie Friedman

A few months back on a seemingly typical Tuesday afternoon, in a pit where Pitas and Thai food are served, something criminal happened. My friend innocently grabbed a tray and some lunch, and then proceeded to head to the checkout. It was at this checkout that injustice showed itself. While standing in line, ready to pay for his meal, the cashier suddenly asked him to open his bag. Upon this request, the cashier found a blue Gatorade, half-consumed, slyly tucked away in his shiny red North Face book bag. For a moment the cashier felt like a noble police officer who had caught a stealthy criminal, but further investigation led everyone involved to the realization that blue Gatorades were not even sold at this location, and thus my friend was innocent.

I guess it could be said that no real crime took place on this afternoon, but that could not be further from the truth, because while my friend would never steal, the cashier inappropriately jumped to conclusions when they saw the popped collar, polo shirt prototype. They looked right past the face, only seeing the grey Boston hat sitting suspiciously atop the gelled, token-trimmed and front-spiked haircut. And from those few features and no credible facts, they unwarrantedly suspected criminal activity. It is not right, nor is it fair. It is just the inescapable strife that the straight white male is forced to endure everyday.

This country is fixated on helping minorities with their issues and agendas — minorities based on race, gender and sexuality. It is always about the less fortunate, the less powerful and the underrepresented. But what about the powerful, best represented and most prominent members of our social hierarchy? They have feelings, too. I know that most are too humbled to write about their life struggles, so I have taken it upon myself. Straight white males, I feel for you.

The straight white male (SWM) carries the weight of the world upon his shoulders. SWMs run the country — quite well, I must say. They also head the agencies that protect us from terrorist attacks and vicious natural disasters with unshakable and utter competence. And on top of it all, they show everyone up on the dance floor. Yet the public is never satisfied with them. We are always jumping up and down to take the spotlight away, leaving the SWM in need of serious attention. While their stoic personas may lead us to believe they do not need our sympathy, deep down, SWMs needs a little TLC just like everyone else.

If you don't agree that the SWM faces a difficult life, than ask yourself why the majority of serial killers are straight, white and male. It is because society pushes them out of the mainstream, far into isolation, where the pressures placed upon them slowly eat away, leading many to commit heartless acts of violence. But the Scott Petersons of the world cannot be so quickly dismissed as lunatics whose hunger for power, sexual desires and lack of societal restrictions led them to kill. If we were to ever look at their lives in detail we would find that being the ideal member of society truly sets one up for a daunting life.

The root of their struggle is shown through some startling statistics. For instance, the average SWM has been called a "dork" at least ten times in the course of his childhood. In a typical SMW's life, the media has negatively stereotyped him twice.

Yet the public is never satisfied with them. We are always jumping up and down to take the spotlight away, leaving the SWM in need of serious attention.

By the time the average SWM hits 18, he has been made to feel out of place about three times, and during the course of an SWM's professional career there is a 10 percent chance that he will lose a prestigious job to a woman or minority who is better qualified. Statistics like these make a world of difference when it comes to understanding the psyche of this dynamic dominant populace. After learning all that, don't you think it's time we all reach out and ask not what the SWM can do for us, but what we can do for the SWM?

The SWM needs a place to go, a group to be a part of so that they can come together for support. After all they do for us, it should be no great sacrifice to channel some tax dollars into a National Association of Straight White Males (NASWM). They could convene, talk about prominent political and social issues, which of course pertain to them, and perhaps initiate cases for legislation to further their cause. This organization would need a president, of course. I envision a charismatic cowboy with chimp-ish charm. This group would give SWMs the extra support they are lacking.

If we take the time to nurture the SWM, the benefits will trickle down the social ladder (just like the tax cuts for the rich that trickled down and saved all the poor people). And if we don't, then prepare to live in a world where woman, minorities and homosexuals are all equally represented and respected. I shudder at the thought, but find solace in the fact that with the continued leadership of the SWM, nuclear annihilation (due to competing SWM egos) will ensure the world will end before this has a chance of occurring.

Clumsy colleague communication

Tucker Merrick

Well, spring is finally upon us. It's a time when faces have smiles, the birds and the bees have sex with each other, and stabbings are at an all-time low. More importantly, it is a time when your eyes aren't set dead ahead of you, squinting against the freezing wind, longing for the warmth of a building. In fact, spring is when your gaze wanders about, looking here, glancing there. As such, when you a traveling from class to class, there's a higher probability of making eye contact with a total stranger, or worse, an acquaintance. These individuals aren't strangers, but they're not far off.

You see this person coming at your 11 o'clock angle. Your mind quickly jumps as you realize that: a) you recognize them, and b) you don't know their name. Hey, it's not your fault — maybe you met them through a friend who doesn't know the meaning of introduction, maybe they lived in your building, or perhaps you were associated through a night of wanton fraternization and drunkenness.

Regardless of the situation, it's safe to say that you are in an uncomfortable state of affairs. Both of you know that the other is coming, and both of you know that you don't really know each other. Thus a clever game of cat and mouse ensues.

As these circumstances arise, there are several routes to take, but knowing the right one is never easy. It requires quick thinking and lighting-fast reflexes to downplay the approaching awkwardness. The real problem is that you can never really know what the other person is going to do, a problem that goes both ways and complicates things. Will this associate just maintain peripheral discipline and fake an interest in the grass as they go past? Will they acknowledge you? Do you want to look up and acknowledge them?

Will this associate just maintain peripheral discipline and fake an interest in the grass as they go past? Will they acknowledge you? Do you want to look up and acknowledge them?

Usually what ends up happening is nothing too spectacular, but stupid and nonsensical all the same. An easy out is when neither of you formally recognize each other, but unfortunately this almost never happens. Someone always seems to concede and give a last-ditch effort at a hello.

First and most importantly, always be looking up about 30-60 feet in front of you. In this way you can set yourself for the interaction that will transpire ten seconds from a sighting.

After the spotting, immediately divert your eyes. I like to pretend that I'm thinking about something important while staring toward the ground, or that I'm just zoning out — perhaps a tree looks like a cloud or something. Whatever the fabrication, the thing you must remember is to stay out of eye contact range. This is essential, as it gives you the time to debate the question: do I want to talk to this person?

From here, it's up to you. On a fundamental level, you can either maintain your constant stare into the great unknown or look up from about five feet away, giving a semi-surprised facial expression followed by some sort of greeting. Remember, if asked how you are, respond with the same question.

Great — now we have to give a quick and jumbled conversation. Let me start by saying "What's up." Now, of course, I expect you to answer that with question of the same meaning, like "What's going on." (You never ever answer either of these questions directly. For one, you don't really want a real answer. Furthermore, think back to those train problems: if one person is walking five miles an hour and one going four, how much time will that give you to have any sort of informative Q and A? None.)

Saying hello to these acquaintances is essentially the admittance to the fact that you recognize each other somehow, but have no additional connection. For these male strangers-but-not-strangers that I run into, default greeting mechanisms in my brain have gotten me so used to saying "man" or "dude" that I sometimes have to catch myself before saying it to girls.

To stop this annoyance that comes along with spring, I have studied the skills levels of people involved in my own various run-ins and come up with some solid foundational rules for a successful walk-and-talk around campus.

A chance recording of acquaintances botching a random encounter. Awkwardness soon followed.

This problem with acquaintances is everywhere on campus. It's with classmates, it's in the gym, it's with that girl you never formally met but who lives on your floor and always sees you whistling Pointer Sisters while you're in your towel.

But why must we put up with all this discomfort? It's nice to be friendly with people, but not at the price we often have to pay, in brain energy or proper rules of engagement. In the end, we live in a fast-paced world where you only have so much time for so many people. Maybe one of these non-relationship associates is the best friend that you'll never have, or the person that would have changed your life. When you walk around on these final beautiful spring days, instead of pointless hellos, why don't you confront your awkwardness, stop one of these people, have a nice little chat, and really find out "what's up" and why. I'm sure you'll learn something interesting, and that will be one less person to feel that mutual uneasiness with as you pass by.

No trespassing, but real crime is perfectly fine

Dan Nicastro

On Friday, five Democratic members of Congress (including Amherst's own representative John Olver) were detained outside of the Sudanese Embassy in Washington for protesting that government's part in violence about the Darfur region. Tom Lantos of California, James McGovern and John Olver of Massachusetts, James Moran of Virginia, and Sheila Jackson Lee of Texas were arrested for disturbing the peace and for protesting illegally. The men at the Sudanese Embassy apparently think that property rights are more important that human rights. If you don't believe me, just ask someone from Darfur. That is, if you can find them.

Anyway, this is great for the Republican Party. How, you ask? Just think: five members of Congress were actually arrested, and not one among them was a Republican. Just think about what that says about the Republican Party. They knew better than to protest and risk angering the Sudanese government and violating their priceless property rights. The Republicans haven't even come close to boasting five congressional representatives thrown into jail. (However, there are a few low-level law-breaking Republicans: there was the Homeland Security official with the child porn thing, Jack Abramoff, Claude Allen, the domestic policy advisor who stole from Target . . . and did I already mention Rush Limbaugh?)

Actually, there have only been two Republican congressmen indicted, and one of them, "Duke" Cunningham, doesn't count because he resigned after he pleaded guilty to taking over $2 million in bribes. Therefore, Tom DeLay is the only Republican member of Congress who has been arrested in the last year or two, and he looked just great in his mug shot. So that leaves the arrest score at five Democrats to one Republican. Who can beat those odds?

And, lest we forget, DeLay was arrested on a trumped-up criminal conspiracy charge. These five Democrats were arrested for trespassing on Sudanese land and violating the sacredness of property rights. Who cares about Sudan? The American people don't understand "criminal conspiracy to inject illegal corporate contributions into [Republican] state elections," but they do understand trespassing and the Sudanese right to protect their property, and they obviously just want the people of Sudan to be left alone.

It's clear that the American people don't care about this Sudan thing, because the "Hollywood liberal elite" has started to come out and let its voice be heard. "Ocean's Eleven" big shot George Clooney talked to Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois about this crazy Sudan thing. Speaking about it, Clooney said, "What we cannot do is turn our heads and look away and hope that this will somehow disappear." These are some pretty fierce words in defense of Democrats who think they have the right to violate the Sudanese property rights and protest wherever and whenever they want.

The American people don't understand "criminal conspiracy to inject illegal corporate contributions into [Republican] state elections," but they do understand trespassing . . .

It's pretty clear that this thing is getting way out of hand and is an obvious political ploy by the Democrats. First they make sure they get the media's attention, and then get themselves arrested for protesting the Sudanese government for God knows what reason. Then these "Hollywood liberals" come out of the woodwork and "coincidentally" start doing the same thing as the Democrats and call for action against Sudan. Obviously, the liberal media is pissed that the war in Iraq is going so well, and are just looking for other ways to make Bush look foolish. Next thing you know, the New York Times, that bastion of liberalism, will be making some outlandish claim, like "In Darfur, several rebel movements are battling government forces and their allied militias in a chaotic conflict that has killed more than 200,000 people."

President Bush has also come out of the woodwork and is finally, after what seemed like years, talking about this situation. After talking with organizers of the upcoming "Save the Democratic Five" rally, Bush told reporters that he "want[s] the Sudanese government to understand the United States of America is serious about solving this problem." However, it's clear that Bush views this as some sort of gambit on the part of the Democrats because he has taken such a long time to act on this issue.

It's said that the Democrats have had to stoop to the level of getting arrested just to try and get their point across. You'd figure they would have some sort of other means of communication with the American people, but obviously this is not so. However, President Bush has made it clear that a country with 300 million people has a vast array of beliefs and ideas, and that he is willing to listen to minority opinions. According to Reuters, he confirmed this as he met with Democratic leaders and said of them, "They agree with thousands of our citizens — hundreds of thousands of our citizens — that genocide in Sudan is unacceptable." Seems like a big fuss to make over trespassing.

May Day

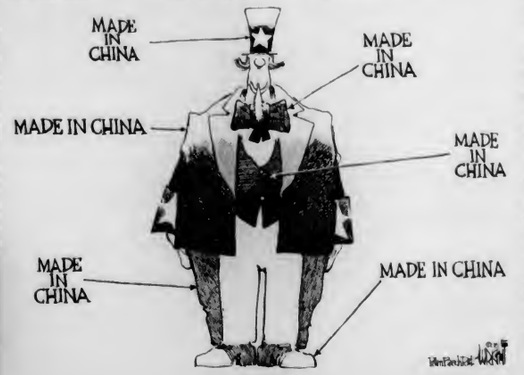
Jeff Napolitano

A professor of Spanish here at the University of Massachusetts once expressed her frustration to me over the state of our political and social culture in the United States. That the richest country in the world does not pay for maternity leave for new parents, while her vastly poorer homeland in South America manages to do so with a mere fraction of the resources, angered her. She was puzzled and angry that our culture, particularly white culture, seems so atomized, disconnected and lacking in a sense of history. That today, May Day, was not celebrated in the United States although it is celebrated around the world infuriated her. "Don't people know what it's about? Don't people know that it started here? How have you lost your history?"

May Day (or Labor Day) is a celebration of the labor movement's push for the eight-hour working day, in the United States, starting around 1884. Workers around the country united to limit wage slavery and improve working conditions, with some success. One of the events leading to a worldwide cascade of labor actions was the Haymarket Affair, in which thousands of workers assembled in Haymarket Square in Chicago to protest ongoing strikes and consequential police brutality. A bomb went off and injuring dozens of police, who then opened fire, killing several protesters and wounding hundreds more. Eight anarchist leaders were arrested, and although no proof of their involvement was shown, four were hanged. International uproar followed the death of these innocent men, and 1886 was then known as the "Year of the Great Uprising of Labor."

We are still in that struggle 120 years later. Wage slavery is rampant, and working conditions are still unjust. Today, May 1, immigrants and their allies will be standing up for their rights as human beings and as contributors to the wealth of this country. The issue is easy to understand: those who work, live, and breathe deserve the same dignity and respect as anyone else who does the same. Ironically, yet typically, it is those who are the most marginalized, the most oppressed, who are made a target by those in power — principally because they are marginalized and oppressed.

Ironically, yet typically, it is those who are the most marginalized, the most oppressed, who are made a target by those in power — principally because they are marginalized and oppressed.



Also ironically, it is the actions of those in power that have fostered the same increased immigration into this country that they decry. The North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) enabled and continues to facilitate the flight of capital from this country. But this capital lost in the United States does not go into the pockets of Mexican workers, instead, it enriches the coffers of transnational corporations doing business in both countries. The result is that the working-class in both countries lose out, and the flow of people from Mexico to the wealthier United States has accelerated.

This debate was recently sparked by the introduction of a bill in Congress (HR4437) that would criminalize illegal immigrants, largely people of color. The bill was introduced by James Sensenbrenner, a representative from Wisconsin who is a stakeholder in Kimberly Clark, a transnational company that has moved many of its jobs to China and Mexico. In order to divert attention and blame away from the fact that Sensenbrenner himself is responsible for the loss of many jobs in the United States, he instead chose to point the finger at vulnerable immigrant populations.

So today, workers and students, in a response to this anti-immigrant racism, will take to the streets to participate in the "Great National Boycott." The boycott is an attempt to counter the new wave of anti-immigrant repression while demonstrating that the dignity of all people is worth the cost of one day's education or wages. The faculty union at UMass has already sent out recommendations to all professors to not penalize their students for their participation in the boycott.

The critical issue of today, from a historical perspective as well as in the perspective of current struggles, is that when we fight for the full rights of immigrants, whether we are ourselves immigrants, we fight for our own rights. Let us not be dissuaded from the politics of "us" versus "them"; instead, let us see through that and recognize that we are all equals who should be struggling together. Today, therefore, join your brothers and sisters today at the Student Union at 11:00 a.m. to continue this centuries-old struggle.

The alternative pop/rock band Guster originally formed in Boston, Massachusetts, but has since expanded to become one of the most successful bands to hit the East coast since the late '90s.

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Hundreds of college and high school students, with some young kids and their parents mixed in, filled the Lefrak Gymnasium at Amherst College on Saturday, April 29 to see Guster and opening act Lake Temple.

The show came to Amherst as part of the second annual Campus Consciousness Tour, sponsored by Clif & Luna Bar. The goal of the tour is to promote environmental awareness among college students and urge them to get involved in environmentally-friendly causes.

Brooklyn-based singer-songwriter Lake Temple warmed up the audience, but his talent was more or less lost on the crowd, which was mostly just interested in Guster. At the end of his seven-song set he received a round of applause, a compassionate cheer from those who enjoyed the set and an eager celebration from those who were just concerned with what was to come next.

Finally, when Guster came on, the whole crowd became one as the boys expressed their plan for the set. "New songs we really like ... and we're going to go deep into the Guster vault for you fans out there." They lived up to it by playing songs that rightfully represented their large catalogue. From the first riff of "I Spy," the fans knew what they had come for. Then they followed with other fan favorites like "Careful," "Demons," "Center of Attention," Amsterdam," "Diane," "Come Downstairs and Say Hello," "Barrel of a Gun," and "Airport Song."

As they played a mix of old favorites, rarer tracks and songs from their new album to be released in June, the boys from Guster expressed an appreciation for the fans, who resembled a Japanese crowd because of their attentive and appreciative attitude.

Band members Ryan Miller (guitar/vocals), Adam Gardner (guitar/vocals), and Brian Rosenworcel (drums/percussion).

The most surprising part occurred when they reached into the vault and pulled out "Window" from their first album, "Parachute." This song, although rarely played live, hit a chord with those who cite "Parachute" as their most innovative album because it best exhibits Brian's creative hand drumming talent, the element that makes Guster's sound so unique. Also, the boys introduced Emily, an Amherst native and Guster fan, who played the violin during another rarely played track, "Two at a Time."

The crowd reacted positively as Guster dispersed new songs amongst the old ones. One of their new songs utilized so much electric guitar that many fans were befuddled to what was happening to the old earthy Guster they love. However, they were reminded of the old nostalgia-themed songs Guster is known for during the performance of the widely known new song called "One Man Wrecking Machine" (which they played during the encore). This song declares, "I wanna pull it apart and put it back together/ I wanna re-live all my adolescent dreams/ Inspired by true events on movie screens/ I am a one man wrecking machine," and reminded everyone of the simple life of childhood.

At the end of the set Adam walked off, but soon returned as Brian began to sing, "Where's Adam?" After a few minutes, Adam played two more songs and finished off the set with "Great Escape" — but this was not the end. Even as the house lights went on, the crowd cheered. Then the band came back on stage again to do one last song, a cover of the song "Hunger Strike" by Pearl Jam. As the band mimicked the "Eddie Vedder voice," the song fit in perfectly with Guster's fun-and-frolic personality.

Loud cheering occurred all throughout the show, proving the fans surely did get what they wished for.

For better or worse, a celebration of CATS at the Mullins

By Leon Ha
Collegian Correspondent

One who attends musical performance with a list of characters that include names such as "Rum Rum Tugger" "Jennyanydots" and "Grizabella" really shouldn't be surprised by what they are about to see. Nevertheless, for anyone unfamiliar with the story of "CATS," attempting to imagine what such a spectacle could possibly consist of is truly stranger than fiction. In hindsight, the title really does say it all.

Broadway returned to the Mullins Center this weekend with back-to-back performances of the hit Broadway musical "CATS." Retired from Broadway in September of 2000 after performing what was then a record-breaking 6,138 performances, the offbeat musical is currently touring venues across the United States.

The story begins with an introduction of the "Jellicle Cats." The "Jellicle Cats," a term from T.S. Elliot's book "Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats" upon which the musical is based, are gathering to celebrate their annual Jellicle Ball. At the event, the Jellicle Cats' leader, wise Old Deuteronomy, will select one of the cats to journey to the "Heavyside Layer," where he or she is to be reborn. The bulk of the musical focuses on each cat's individual performance as each performs in hopes of being selected by Old Deuteronomy.

The honor eventually falls upon Grizabella, a ragged and lonely old cat who performs the title song "Memories," in which she recalls her youthful days of glamour and happiness since gone by. The show concludes with Old Deuteronomy and Grizabella riding atop a magical flying tire where Grizabella eventually departs alone for the Heavyside Layer where she is to be reborn.

For some veterans of the show, the Mullins Center's take failed to recapture the magic of previous performances.

Audience member Lise Starr of Northampton had seen the show twice before in New York and London, but was disappointed with Friday night's production.

"It's hard for a production to meet the same quality 20 years later," said Star. "But they're singing and dancing their hearts out, so it's hard not to appreciate it."

For Brannon Neville, a senior at UMass, "CATS" was an enjoyable introduction to the musical genre.

"I thought it was good," Neville said. "I liked the music and the costumes, but it's the first musical I've been to so it's hard to compare. There were times when it was hard to understand some of the lyrics."

Christy Liu, a UMass senior who attended Friday night's show, is somewhat of a veteran to musicals, although she is new to the "CATS" performance.

"I loved it," Liu said. "I really appreciated the attention to detail they put into the set and costumes. I was able to focus on the characters and see the personality of each cat."

"CATS" was composed by Andrew Lloyd Webber in 1978, and is based on a book by T.S. Eliot called "Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats." It debuted in May of 1981 at New London Theatre.

Liu's only major complaint was with the sound system quality, which she said really detracted from the overall performance.

In the end, there are a few songs that will leave even the least enthusiastic audience members humming the next day. But with minimal plot and nearly three hours of song and dance almost exclusively about cats, the festive show is by no means for everyone. Cat lovers in particular should find no shortage of enjoyment. Others, however, especially those new to the musical genre, would do well to attend with an open mind.

UMass professor screens 'Free Spirit' documentary in NoHo

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

A new feature-length documentary about a renowned Western Massachusetts commune and its notorious founder, Michael Metelica Raptured, will be shown at the Academy of Music in Northampton on May 6 and 7.

The film is called "Free Spirits — the Birth, Life and Loss of a New-Age Dream," and is expected to draw hundreds of the commune's former members from all over the country, along with many from the Northampton area.

Over its 20-year history, the Brotherhood of the Spirit commune, also known as a Renaissance community, attracted the attention of CBS's "60 Minutes," "ABC National News," "People Magazine" and "The New York Times." The commune was also featured in countless other local and national media, including Northampton's own Daily Hampshire Gazette and The Valley Advocate, which featured a story about the commune on the first Valley Advocate cover in 1973.

Some ex-communards have arranged a "reunion gathering" in Montague to correspond with next weekend's screening.

According to former member Melving Weiner, people are expected to come from San Francisco and Seattle.

The film's writer and director, Bruce Geisler, is a UMass Amherst professor in the communication department. Professor Geisler worked on "Free Spirits" for 15 years, and finally finished the film this March.

Professor Geisler conceived the project as a look at the present-day lives of former commune members, many years after they left. The more he researched, the more he realized that he would have to tell the story of the commune itself.

"Michael was described to me as 'one part rock 'n' roll-outlaw biker, and one part spiritual master,'" said Geisler. "And when I first met him in 1970, he certainly lived up to that."

Geisler had close contact with the commune in the early to mid-1970s, but left the area to attend USC's film school.

According to Geisler, when leader Michael — a high school dropout, Hell's Angels "wannabe" and spiritual visionary — and eight teenage friends retreated to a Leyden, Massachusetts tree-house in 1968 for an adventure in poverty and mysticism, they never knew it would grow into one of the largest and most controversial communes of its era.

Many stayed a decade or more, creating an example of brotherhood and harmony they hoped would serve as a model for the world.

By the story's end in 1988, the commune had influenced thousands. For some, it was the highlight of their lives. For others, Geisler discovered, the dream became a nightmare.

Professor Bruce Geisler, the writer and director of "Free Spirits," also teaches communication courses at UMass.

In-state tuition woes?

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q. I HAVE BEEN CHARGED FOR TUITION AS AN OUT-OF-STATE STUDENT AND BELIEVE I SHOULD ONLY HAVE TO PAY IN-STATE RATES BECAUSE I LIVE OFF CAMPUS AND HAVE HAD A CONTINUOUS LEASE FOR TWO YEARS. I HAVE WORKED HERE THE LAST TWO SUMMERS AND PAY MASSACHUSETTS TAXES ON THE MONEY I EARN FROM MY JOB. I RECEIVE NO SUPPORT FROM MY PARENTS, WHO LIVE IN NEW JERSEY, AND THEY DO NOT CLAIM ANY DEDUCTION FOR ME ON THEIR TAXES. I AM REGISTERED TO VOTE IN MASSACHUSETTS. I TRANSFERRED MY DRIVER'S LICENSE AND CAR REGISTRATION FROM NEW JERSEY AND HAVE A MASSACHUSETTS AUTO INSURANCE POLICY. SINCE BEGINNING AT UMASS, I HAVE NOT LIVED IN NEW JERSEY AT ALL. IS THERE ANYTHING ELSE I NEED TO DO?

A. Every individual has at least one residence and one domicile, with the domicile being the residence which the individual considers primary and where the individual intends to remain. Even though you are emancipated from your parents, have expressed the desire to become a Massachusetts resident, and have taken many steps to make Massachusetts your home, you are not a Massachusetts resident for tuition purposes. The Board of Trustees has passed a policy that determines residency for tuition purposes, which is a stricter standard than residency for most other purposes.

The Residency Status for Tuition Purposes Policy established by the Board of Trustees can be found in the maroon Academic Regulations booklet, which is issued by the Dean of Students Office. Section 2.1 states that for the purpose of assessing tuition and fees, a person shall be classified as a Massachusetts resident or a non-Massachusetts resident. A person shall be classified as a Massachusetts resident if he or she shall have resided in the Commonwealth for purposes other than attending an educational institution for twelve months immediately preceding the student's entry or reentry as a student. Physical presence for the entire twelve-month period need not be required as long as the conduct of the individual, taken in total, manifests an intention to make Massachusetts his or her permanent dwelling place. In other words, you must live in Massachusetts for one year as a non-student. The way you can accomplish this is to withdraw from school for a full year while continuing to live and work in Massachusetts. You will have to decide whether it is worth it to interrupt your education for a year to qualify for the lower tuition rate when you return.

The information contained in this article refers to Massachusetts law and does not constitute legal advice. If you need legal advice, seek out an attorney who can give you advice based upon your circumstances and applicable law. Fee paying UMass Amherst students with questions may call the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 to arrange an appointment.

Tommy Chong 'lights up' the Calvin

By Paul A. Jackmauh
Collegian Correspondent

Attention: Those of you funky rascals out there who observed April 20 as a holiday would do well to read the next few sentences. Calvin Theater, May 4, 8 p.m. There, now you know where you need to be in order to see Tommy Chong — actor, comedian, cannabis-culture superhero, and star of the Marijuana-Logues, who is coming to Northampton this week.

That's right — the man, the legend, the one and only Tommy Chong is coming like a puff of smoke on the horizon. Most know Chong as the stony co-star of the classic Cheech and Chong movies, which helped define and certainly entertained a new generation of stoners in the later '70s and '80s. Some of you kids might have heard his comedy records, or seen him on "That '70s Show" as Leo, the (slightly stupid) Photo Hut attendant. Maybe you even know some lucky fossil who caught his standup act in the '70s, where he met his partner in crime, Cheech Marin. This week we're lucky enough to catch Chong in his latest comedy project, the Marijuana-Logues.

As you might deduce from its name, this sketch show is devoted to everyone's favorite little green plant (if it's not your favorite, you probably wanted Amherst College. Don't worry, it's right down the street). According to the Marijuana-Logues Web site, the show "sets herb center-stage, delving into fact and fiction, myths and misnomers alike ... it illustrates that cannabis culture is a thing of substance, humor and creativity." A hazy-good time is guaranteed for all. It's been a hit at national comedy festivals as well as a special feature on HBO.

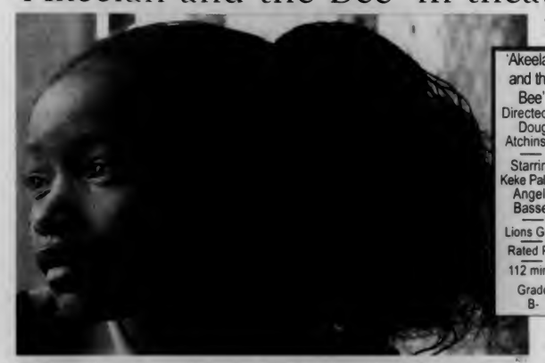
After a smashing year-long stint at The Actors' Playhouse, an off-Broadway club, the show took off for its first tour, taking Tommy Chong along with it. Chong joins performers, writers, and creators Arj Baker, Doug Benson, and Tony Camin. These award-winning comedians are celebrities in their own rights; they've written for Comedy Central and appeared on programs such as "The Late Show With David Letterman," "Late Night With Conan O'Brien" and "The Tonight Show" in addition to co-creating the Marijuana-Logues and winning numerous awards at comedy festivals over the years. Doug has even contributed to episodes of "Curb Your Enthusiasm" and "Friends."

Directing the troupe is Jim Millan, who some will know as a creator of and writer for the sketch show "The Kids in the Hall." Jim directed the act when it went on tour in 2002, helping to transform it for the road.

In an interview with The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Chong explained how the original idea for the show came from spoofing on the Vagina Monologues, popular at the time.

"It just fit perfectly for a couple of potheads to put their jokes into play," says Chong, who's been working with these guys for about a year now.

He added that it's "probably the most fun" he's had doing a gig ever. "I almost feel ashamed I have to get paid for it," he said.



Chong is best known for starring in "stoner movies" with Cheech Marin.

The cast has fun on the road too, said Chong, sight-seeing, snapping pictures, working on sketches, laughing and napping — basically what we all wish to be doing at any given moment. The group doesn't have specific plans for the show beyond its first tour, which will take the crew from New Jersey to Hawaii.

So put down that bowl and run to grab a ticket before you forget. This show won't be coming back any time soon, nor will Mr. Chong. Show up, have fun, go home with some bragging rights. Peace, man.

'Akeelah and the Bee' in theaters, not spellbinding success

Keke Palmer plays Akeelah, a young girl from south L.A. who tries to make it to the National Spelling Bee.

By Jake Monte

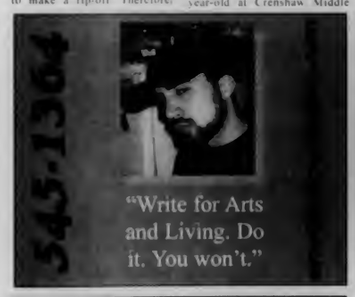
It was inevitable that the success of "Spellbound," the documentary about eight kids who went all the way to the National Spelling Bee in Washington D.C., would make dollar signs appear in the eyes of studio executives, and they would frantically jump at the first chance to make a rip-off. Therefore, it seemed "Akeelah and the Bee" would be like every other Hollywood simple-minded marketing idea — plagiaristic and by the book. To the contrary, "Akeelah and the Bee," starring Lawrence Fishburn and Angela Bassett, displays some considerable artistry and has a great deal of verve.

Akeelah Anderson (Keke Palmer) is a headstrong 11-year-old at Crenshaw Middle School, a place that doesn't have kickballs or doors for the bathroom stalls. She has a talent for spelling. Her teacher hands her back a spelling test she didn't study for with a perfect score. Word spreads among the faculty of Akeelah's ability to spell, and teacher Joshua Larabee (Lawrence Fishburne) takes to the unenthused Akeelah. Akeelah enters herself in the Crenshaw Middle School spelling bee. Encountering resistance from her mother, Wanda (Angela Bassett), Akeelah sets out with Dr. Larabee to go all the way to the National Spelling Bee in Washington D.C.

The film is set against the backdrop of the Crenshaw District's environment of drugs and violence. Akeelah's brother has a friend named Derrick-T, who has a $300 watch. Her mother is too preoccupied with this dilemma to worry about Akeelah and her passion for spelling.

"Akeelah and the Bee" could have gone like clockwork — one victory after another while we watch bored and uninvolved. Since one mistake in the spelling bee means Akeelah is disqualified, one would think Akeelah would run through this film as if winning the National Spelling Bee is easy. That doesn't happen. In the qualifying round, Akeelah gets the word "synecdoche" wrong but, in what is a great bit of plotting, still manages to make the top ten. Writer Doug Atchison manages to find highs and lows in this story, which is surprising and impressive.



The film isn't without flaws, however. There's a romance in the film between Akeelah and a boy named Javier, a fellow speller. Javier kisses her abruptly at one point, a moment that could have used some buildup. It may make for a tight screenplay, him kissing her out of the blue, but without some romantic sparks, it makes the film feel unnatural.

The direction is intense, fluid, and alive. Atchison puts so much energy into this film. It's clear that not only might he be going for an Academy Award, but he wants everyone in the audience to break down in tears and proclaim that this is a profoundly affecting film. What he has forgotten is that if a film is going to be this risky in its presumptuous corniness — Akeelah spends most of the film on the verge of tears — the audience isn't going to be willing to let it affect them emotionally.

Dr. Larabee has Akeelah read a quote from Nelson Mendela he has framed on his wall, which reads, "Our deepest fear is not that we're inadequate. Our deepest fear is that we are powerful beyond measure."

"Akeelah and the Bee" was derived from the documentary film "Spellbound," and that was easy to overlook, but the fact that this poem has appeared in a couple films as of late, most notably "Coach Carter," is a detriment to this film's quality. There are plenty of good poems out there, and since this film is a knock-off anyway, one would think Atchison could find something more original.

Atchison is going for a story meant to inspire kids to do well in school. That much is clear from the film's glorification of Akeelah's rise to the top. All her friends, her family, and the entire community get behind her. But if you're over the age of 18, much of the film's tender appeals to getting ahead in life will be lost on you.

one with his second goal of the game with 10:21 left in the third, but the UMass offense was held scoreless until a Jim Connolly goal with 15 seconds left in the game.

"I think we were just trying to make things happen," Morris said. "We had a bunch of turnovers, and were just trying to do too much. We had opportunities, but we just didn't finish them."

With the UMass offense sputtering, Syracuse extended its lead with a pair of man-up goals in the third period to take a 9-6 edge into the final quarter. The Orange were strong all game with the man-advantage, finishing 3-of-7 on man-up opportunities, while the Minutemen struggled, going 0-for-5. UMass's ineffectiveness was uncharacteristic, as the team entered the game scoring on 50 percent of its man-up chances.

"You have to give credit to their man-down unit; they knocked down a lot of passes," Cannella said. "And then you have to give credit to their man-up offense, they can really shoot the ball."

Forced to play catch-up against the explosive Syracuse attack proved to be too tall of a task for UMass in the fourth quarter, as the Orange scored three times to extend their lead to 12-6 before Connolly added his late goal.

Minutewomen sweep Dayton season in school history, and she has only given up three homers in 36 appearances.

On the other side of the seniority spectrum, senior Lesley Ferrara is having a breakout season and proved that on Saturday. Her two hits in Game 1 provided an RBI, and in Game 2 Ferrara knocked in three RBIs. Ferrara has started every game this season, with 33 hits, seven doubles, 19 RBIs and a .303 batting average.

Regardless, the leader on offense this season has been a freshman. Whitney Mollica has put together a record-breaking rookie season, recording 50 RBIs, 55 hits, 10 homers and a .414 batting average — all team-highs.

The other offensive threat for UMass has been junior Amanda Acampora, whose six homers are second on the team and her 25 RBIs are third.

Senior pitcher Jenna Busa put forth an impressive showing against Dayton, allowing just one run in seven innings. It was this time last season that Busa began to break out, as she led her team to an A-10 championship, pitching every game of the conference tournament.

Candice Molinari will look to continue to extend her hitting streak today, as she has recorded at least a single hit in the previous 18 games.

The Rhode Island Rams only have three contests remaining, as they prepare for the A-10 championships. In a matchup with the Flyers yesterday, the Rams split a doubleheader, winning Game 1, 2-1, and then getting shut out in Game 2, 6-0.

The Rams are currently sixth in the conference standings, and much of their success has been due to senior pitcher Katie Halcomb. With a 12-11 personal record, Halcomb has been the leading pitcher, compiling a 2.96 ERA and recording 122 strikeouts. Offensively, Courtney Wall and Christine Gentile have combined for 50 RBIs, seven homers and each have an average above .300 at the plate.

In 2005, the Minutewomen blew the Rams out in a doubleheader on May 6, winning Game 1, 12-2, and Game 2 by a margin of 9-0 in five innings. UMass goes into today's contests against the Rams riding a four-game winning streak, and winners of 13 out of the last 14 games.

While UMass remains atop the A-10, Charlotte is on its heals, and the upcoming week can make or break the Minutewomen's regular season. Charlotte is in the No. 2 slot of the standings with a conference record of 13-3 — just one win below UMass.

The Minutewomen lead the A-10 in several categories this season, including team batting and pitching.

Today's doubleheader begins at 3 p.m. at the UMass Softball Complex. The Minutewomen take on Maine tomorrow, Boston College Wednesday and then St. Bonaventure on Friday.

to be the biggest, as well.

The Maroon and White would not have had the chance to clinch a playoff spot yesterday if it weren't for the heroics of sophomore Kathleen Typadis and freshman Meghan Reddy just two days before. UMass defeated Duquesne by a score of 12-11 in overtime on Friday afternoon at Garber Field, securing a possible tie-breaker with the Dukes.

Duquesne jumped out to a 10-6 lead late in the second half, when Reddy decided to take the game into her own hands. The freshman scored three goals in a 1:41 span to tie the game at 10. Typadis scored the go-ahead goal with one minute left to play, but Duquesne answered just eight seconds later to send the game into a wacky non-sudden death, six-minute overtime frame.

Typadis scored with less than three minutes remaining in overtime to set the stage for a dramatic 12-11 UMass victory.

"I was just so in the moment," Typadis said. "I just wanted to finish. I just wanted the time to stop at that point. I thought I was going to have a heart attack."

"This was a huge win for our team," Reddy said after Friday's game. "It was just like an adrenaline rush. The whole team wanted to win."

"They got it done under pressure," Bolduc said about Reddy and Typadis' play. "We've been doing a lot of pressure situations. It's funny because we've been doing a lot of power-finesse drills, and Meghan was one of the last kids in there, and just kept hitting goals. Obviously, it was evident today. She's confident under pressure, and stepped up and got it done."

UMass is 0-3 against the rest of the teams left standing, but Bolduc remains confident that things will be different the second time around.

"We expect to do nothing but win," Bolduc said. "I think we're in a great situation right now. We know what St. Bonaventure, Temple and Richmond are about, and we're prepared to see them again. We're looking forward to the opportunity."

Connerty's late goal lifts UM

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Going into yesterday's battle with George Washington, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team knew what it had to do to get into the Atlantic 10 Tournament: win.

UMass senior captain Kerri Connerty certainly took that into consideration when she netted the game-winning goal with 5:31 remaining in regulation yesterday, sealing the deal on the final postseason berth in the conference. The goal not only gave the Minutewomen an 11-10 victory over the Colonials, but it also gave Connerty one more shot at obtaining an A-10 Championship.

"It feels great because it could have been the last game of my college career," Connerty said. "So putting in the game-winner was pretty cool."

Connerty ranks eighth all-time in UMass scoring history with 128 points in her collegiate career, so Minutewomen coach Carrie Bolduc is not the least bit surprised that she stepped up when the season, and her career, was on the line.

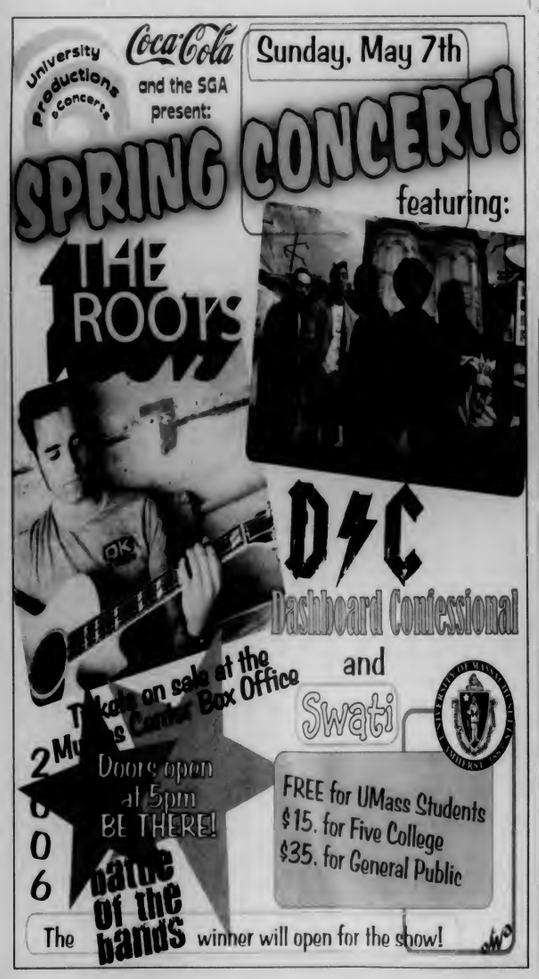
"Kerri has been through many situations like this before, and she got it done," Bolduc said. "It's awesome. I'm so proud of her and happy for her. It's a great way to finish the season and take it on to the next level."

The Minutewomen will take the fourth and final spot in the conference tournament, thanks to Connerty's heroics yesterday afternoon.

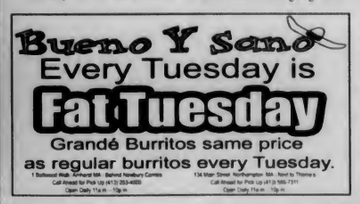
Connerty led the Minutewomen in assists this season with 17 helpers. And because of her team-first attitude, she gives all the credit on the game-winning goal to her teammate.

"At the time, I wasn't sure it was going to be the game-winner," Connerty said. "It was an assist from Kristina Twichell. It was a risky pass, but I just felt it in my gut that it was going to go in. We were giving the eye contact back-and-forth, so we knew that we were going to do it. I'm glad that it worked out, and I'm psyched that it was a great pass, too.

"I just wanted the goal to go in," Connerty added. "It was a great pass, and I just wanted to make the shot to make it a great play. Getting up by one [goal] was obviously all that was on my mind. We hadn't been ahead the whole game, so I knew the first time we were ahead would obviously be a great moment, going into the last five or six minutes."



While it may be her last shot at winning a championship, Connerty has all the faith in the world that her team will be a force to be reckoned with in Washington, D.C. this weekend.



"I'm so excited that I have a chance to do it my senior year," Connerty said on making the playoffs. "I think that this team can absolutely win the A-10 Tournament this year. We are on such a high after two wins this weekend and our two wins in Philly. I feel like we can take that high and run with it. I fear for the teams that have to play us."

Syracuse gets its revenge

By DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — In the days before the matchup between the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and Syracuse, the Orange players made it clear that they wanted to make UMass pay for the two losses it dealt them last season.

On Saturday, the Orange took the field and backed up their trash talk, downing UMass 12-7 and winning their sixth consecutive game in the process.

No. 11 UMass (9-4, 4-2 ECAC) has lost two of its last three games, and will need to win its regular season finale against Rutgers this Saturday at 3:30 p.m. at Garber Field to keep its hopes alive to receive an at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament. Even if the Minutemen win the game, they won't know their fate until after the NCAA Selection Show, which will take place on Sunday at 10 p.m. on ESPNEWS.

A win against No. 9 Syracuse (7-4) may have been enough to lock up an at-large berth, and it appeared early that UMass could capture its first victory in the Carrier Dome in 12 tries.

After falling behind 2-0 in the game's first four minutes, UMass responded with four straight goals to take a 4-2 lead into the second quarter.

Four different players — Clay Stabert, Fred Federico, Sean Morris and Brett Garber — scored in the first frame for UMass.

Morris and Garber finished with two goals apiece, while Brian Jacovina recorded a career-high four assists, but the Minuteman offense stalled after the first period.

"As I told the guys, this is a game of opportunities," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "In the first quarter we really took care of ours, but we didn't do that very well in the second half of the game and Syracuse did a great job of taking care of their opportunities."

Syracuse made the most of its chances early in the second quarter, and quickly regained the lead with three goals in the first five minutes. Morris fired a shot into the top right corner with 7:37 left in the half to tie things at five, but the Orange scored the next two goals to take a 7-5 lead into the break.

Running diary of 'Cuse trip

Jeff Howe

We certainly weren't pioneers of the road. A trip to Dayton and back through a blinding snowstorm on no sleep and a gassed tank was nowhere to be found on our MapQuest menu.

But the stage was bigger. We were heading to the Carrier Dome, the so-called birth place of Carmelo Anthony, the former stomping grounds of Donovan McNabb and a building where Casey Powell began his Warrior way.

Who'd have known that it was nothing more than a big clump of cement?

But in all seriousness, we were en route to cover one of the most hyped-up (no thanks to writers like myself and fellow Collegianer Dan Duggan, the lone western Mass. print media members who made the trek to Syracuse) lacrosse games of the NCAA season.

There's no need to provide a background of the series between the Minutemen and the artists formally known as the Orangemen, for the purpose of this is to shed light on everything going on somewhere behind the scenes of the action. People don't tend to realize everything that happens before, during and after the games we cover, especially those that require us to hit the road.

So here it is, a running diary with the highlights of our 29 hours away from home sweet Amherst, thoughts of the NFL Draft, an interesting taste in music and a Laura imposter:

Friday, 3:10 p.m. — Whenever I take off for a road trip, I take a look around my apartment and realize that when I return, I have no idea how my life will have changed.

3:59 p.m. — We shouldn't have taken Rt. 9. After 49 minutes in a car that needs a check-up the way the Syracuse lax team needs an ego-check, we finally hit Rt. 91.

4:14 p.m. — Every time I hit the Mass Pike, I swear I'll never come back.

5:15 p.m. — I remember Tim "The Tool Man" Taylor once said the reason men have a better sense of direction than women was because of the iron we have in our noses. I don't know exactly where the great philosopher was going with this one, but the two of us were apparently running a bit low on iron, as we scrambled to figure out which way to go at the infamous I-87/90 split in New York. A late scramble to the right across the median later, and we continue on like nothing happened.

6:11 p.m. — We pull over to the Iroquois rest stop somewhere in upstate New York, only to find the Fairfield baseball team doing the same thing. It's just a hunch, but I don't have a whole lot of faith in the Fairfield bullpen.

7:17 p.m. — We roll into a tollbooth only to be greeted by a kid blasting T.I. "U Don't Know Me" like he was the DJ at the Hippodrome. It's tough to find a tollbooth attendant who will even show you some emotion, let alone one who is throwing a dance party in his 2-by-4 work station.

7:33 p.m. — We come across a sign for Phoenix and Mexico … in upstate New York … probably somewhere really close to Canada … what???

8:00 p.m. — We arrive at our first destination: Oswego, N.Y., to live the life with a friend of mine.

12:35 a.m. — After checking out a few different bars — one of which had the worst "Guitar Dudes" rip-offs I've ever seen — we make our way to The Sting. After rocking out by the jukebox, I head over to see Duggan and Gladdy talking to a couple girls. One of them introduces herself as Laura. I nearly drop my cup while Gladdy practically pukes. Again, if anyone knows Laura from Milwaukee, my e-mail address is at the bottom of this column.

3:45 a.m. — Tom Brady is the greatest quarterback in NFL history.

Saturday, 11 a.m. — Good morning, Oswego.

12:27 p.m. — We're listening to the NFL Draft on the radio, and Reggie Bush is taken second. I could write a senior thesis on why the Texans just made the biggest mistake in the franchise's young history, but I'll settle with just this: The Texans just made the biggest mistake in the franchise's young history.

12:47 p.m. — After spending 10 minutes wondering how the Jets are going to break the hearts of their oh-so-optimistic fans, they select D'Brickashaw Ferguson, causing a round of boos we thought we could hear from Syracuse.

1:05 p.m. — We're officially in the Carrier Dome.

1:20 p.m. — Hooked up to wireless; thank God I can follow the draft.

1:35 p.m. — I read a lacrosse story in Friday's issue of The Daily Orange and remember how much I really hate the Syracuse lax team. All of their trash talking doesn't change the fact that Jeff Zywicki has beaten them twice in overtime, and it certainly won't take away his six-goal, one-assist performance in the NCAA Tournament. Now that I got that out of me…

3:45 p.m. — The Patriots take Laurence Maroney, a good player, but 10 picks too early. I like the running back selection, but I think there was a little too much left on the board at this point. Wait, I'm sorry. You're right. Once I win three Super Bowls, I'll criticize Bill Belichick. Good pick.

4:10 p.m. — Syracuse wins 12-7. This is me being objective.

4:18 p.m. — While walking around the Dome with our heads cut off trying to find the press conference, we get help from the most useless Carrier Dome employee in the history of the building, and that includes (unnecessary shot at Syracuse student newspaper alert!) Gerry McNamara.

5:01 p.m. — Goodbye, Syracuse.

6:35 p.m. — I get the best phone call of the day. The Pats traded up to draft Chad Jackson. The 2006 NFL Draft is now officially a success.

8:12 p.m. — We somehow make it back to Amherst in three hours and 11 minutes. Seriously, can someone do something about the awful shape of Rt. 9 after the bridge? Can UMass loan one of the 989,345,239,934 construction vehicles it has on campus right now to the cause?

I swallowed a bug.

SU players pay price for comments

By JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — Talk is cheap, until you have to pay for it.

In the few days leading up to Saturday afternoon's contest between the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and historic nemesis Syracuse, all was quiet on the UMass front, but the howls from the Orange could be heard from the Pioneer Valley.

The Minutemen beat Syracuse twice last year — both times at Garber Field — and ended the Orange's 22-year run to the Final Four after knocking them out of the NCAA Tournament in the first round on May 15, so SU's returning players took this year's rematch in the Carrier Dome personally.

But after two Syracuse seniors — attackman Brett Bucktooth and midfielder Brian Crockett — were quoted in Friday's copy of The Daily Orange with some comments that were a little too over-the-top for Coach John Desko, they were forced to pay a price.

The eighth-year coach made the conscious decision to bench two of his leaders at the start of the game — just minutes after they were on the field with 13 of their fellow classmates for a Senior Day ceremony.

"In the climate today, I didn't think some of the comments they made publicly were appropriate," Desko said following the game. "We talked about that before the game, and I think they heard what I was talking about and learned from that. As a result, they didn't start."

But regardless of the first-quarter dunce cap Desko made Bucktooth and Crockett wear, both were big contributors in Syracuse's 12-7 win. Bucktooth led the way with three goals and an assist while Crockett chipped in with a pair of scores.

On Friday, Bucktooth gave his thoughts on the revenge factor the Orange were using as motivation for the weekend's game.

"They hated us for a long time because they could never beat us," Bucktooth said. "And then they finally got a couple of wins and they think they're everything, so we need to put them back where they belong."

Crockett spoke of his personal relationships — or lack thereof — with his opponents on the UMass sideline.

"The first time we lost to UMass was enough," Crockett said. "But to go back there and lose again, especially with a lot of the stuff those guys were saying to us, myself and a lot of other people are ready for this game. I don't know a lot of [the UMass] players personally, but the ones I do know, I don't like. The team in general, I don't really have a whole lot of respect for them, and I want to beat them pretty badly."

UM takes two from Dayton

By ERIC ATHAS

Eight contests, 11 days, and four Atlantic 10 opponents stand in the way of the Massachusetts softball team and the start of the postseason. After sweeping the Dayton Flyers in a doubleheader Saturday, the Minutewomen kept their No. 1 standing in the A-10 intact and can improve upon their conference record when they take on Rhode Island (20-23, 8-9 A-10) today in another home doubleheader.

UMass has a hectic week ahead, playing a total of seven games over the next five days, capping the 2006 regular season off with a Senior Day clash against Connecticut on Sunday.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen allowed the Flyers to score just once during the doubleheader, while producing a total of 10 runs. In Game 1, freshman Brandice Balshmiter registered her ninth shut-out of the season, giving up just two hits and striking out seven batters. Balshmiter now has a personal record of 22-7, while maintaining an ERA of 0.63. Her 226 strikeouts are third on the list of most strikeouts in a single

Minutemen drop series to Owls

By ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It took five innings for the Massachusetts men's baseball team to get on the board in yesterday's game against the Temple Owls, the Atlantic 10's worst team.

Owls hurler Tom Dolan no-hit the Minutemen (10-22, 8-10 A-10) by throwing an array of sidearm curveballs and pin-point fastballs, and held UMass to just two runs on three hits through the eighth inning.

UMass dropped the third game of a three-game series, 15-2, against the Owls yesterday at Earl Lorden Field, after the 10-run rule (if a team is losing by 10 or more runs through seven innings it forfeits) ended the game early. The Minutemen lost two-of-three to the Owls in the first series with Temple this season.

UMass lost Friday's game, 8-4, and won Saturday's, 10-5, before succumbing in the rubber game of the series yesterday.

"We just didn't hit," a dejected UMass coach Mike Stone said after the game yesterday. "We did nothing. It was a poor effort on our part because [Dolan] was not overpowering. We were just not doing enough at the plate."

In the bottom of the fifth inning with the Minutemen down 3-0, freshman Jim MacDonald stepped to the plate. UMass hitters had looked off-balance and sluggish until MacDonald launched a Dolan offering deep to right-center field. It cleared the hedges behind the home-run fence, sailing over the 370-mark with ease.

The Minutemen pushed the margin to just one run in the sixth inning, when catcher Bryan Garrity singled up the middle to score freshman second baseman Adam Tempesta from third.

It was downhill from there. The Owls went on a 12-2 run and UMass couldn't stop the bleeding. Stone made numerous trips to the hill and made several pitching changes — Tom Cote, Bryan Adamski and Mitchell Eilenberg all made relief appearances — but missed spots and free passes gave the Owls many opportunities to bury UMass.

"We were just looking for somebody to get somebody out," Stone said. "We couldn't get anyone out when there were runners on base. We gave up and I've never seen that before from this team.

"We quit today. And it was embarrassing."

In Game 2 of the three-game series, senior hurler David Sullivan threw eight solid innings, allowing five runs while scattering 11 hits. Junior shortstop Lou Proietti went 4-for-5 with two runs scored, and Bill Rankin went 2-for-4 with an RBI.

The Owls scored three first-inning runs, helped by a two-strike double by Temple's Dan Brady, who went 2-for-4 on the afternoon. After the first inning, Sullivan settled down, shutting out Temple over the next seven innings before scoring two runs in the top of the ninth. Adamski relieved Sullivan and sealed the deal for the Minutemen, recording the final three outs of the game.

The Minutemen lost the Friday contest 8-4 after a late-inning run fell short when a Rankin fly ball led to a doubling-off of Charles Kelly at third base. Freshmen Joe Cotone and MacDonald went a combined 4-for-7 in the loss.

UMass clinches postseason spot

It was do-or-die for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team this weekend, and the Minutewomen (7-10, 4-3 Atlantic 10) won a pair of games in dramatic fashion to clinch the final spot in the A-10 Tournament.

UMass knocked off Duquesne 12-11 in an overtime thriller on Friday, and defeated George Washington 11-10 yesterday afternoon to send the Maroon and White to the postseason for the third time in four years under coach Carrie Bolduc.

The Minutewomen will now have the fourth seed in the four-team A-10 Tournament, which will begin Thursday in Washington, D.C.

UMass's win over George Washington (6-11, 2-5 A-10) gave the Minutewomen the advantage in a tie-breaker with Duquesne (11-5, 4-3 A-10), who finished the regular season with a 4-3 conference record, as well, after its 12-11 win over Temple yesterday.

While Bolduc's squad may have stumbled out of the gates in 2006, they finished the season strong, and will not settle for anything less than an A-10 Championship.

"It's good to be back," Bolduc said on getting into the playoffs. "Our goal was to get back this year. We're here and now it's our goal to get further, and not just make it, but win. It's rewarding, and it pays off. It paid off for our hard work, not only as coaches, but as players, too."

Senior captain Kerri Connerty scored the game-winning goal yesterday with 5:31 remaining in regulation to give the Minutewomen an eventual 11-10 win and a playoff berth.

The goal gave UMass its only lead of the game, and it proved

Activist discusses state of public school system

By PIOTR BUTKIEWICZ
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Educational activist Jonathan Kozol criticized the state of public school systems in America last Thursday during a speech given to a crowd of about 80 students, teachers and community members at Amherst College.

Kozol, a former public school teacher, began writing books and lecturing about the problems he saw in the American educational system in the 1960s. For the past 40 years, he tackled problematic issues in education, such as race, segregation, class inequality and unequal school funding. He has also worked against larger social problems like poverty, homelessness and class differences.

In Thursday's talk, called "Invitations to Resistance: Strategies for the Defense and Transformation of Our Public Schools," Kozol articulated his main criticisms against the No Child Left Behind education policy. He said standardized testing is overemphasized, ineffective, and financially wasteful. He also derided the continued segregation of students along racial lines, which he argued is partly a function of the general population segregation by the housing markets.

Kozol stressed the idea that segregation into rich and poor school systems is a disservice to our children, and that this separate schooling is inherently unequal. He discussed the U. S. Supreme Court's 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education that outlawed segregated educational facilities for black and white Americans. Since the 1960s, Kozol argued, educational segregation has only gotten worse. On this particular issue, "We've essentially gone back to the reconstruction era," Kozol said.

During his speech, Kozol also attempted to inspire the college-aged audience to become active in social and educational change.

Jonathan Kozol speaks at Amherst College on April 27.

"Change begins with you," he said. He called on the students to support three main policies to improve educational equality: student bussing to increase inter-district transportation, the consolidation of school districts and "powerful, passionate legal attacks" on the real estate, banking and mortgaging businesses, which Kozol says "architect" the housing segregation in America.

Kozol also pointed out an already successful consolidation of school districts in Kentucky where, in the mid-1980s, school district lines were redrawn to purposefully mix racial and economically divided neighborhoods, creating more diversity in every school district.

Students hold rally to support immigrants

By NICOLE BOONJAKUAKUL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

From Los Angeles to Chicago, from Miami to Boston, the national immigration strike, "A Day Without Immigrants," had citizens and immigrants alike protesting for immigration rights yesterday afternoon.

Many University of Massachusetts students showed their support for the cause with the "Walk Out for the Great American Boycott for Immigrant Rights," a protest that began at the steps of the Student Union and ended at the Amherst Town Common.

The national protest is a result of the immigration bill, H.R. 4437, which was passed by Congress on Dec. 16, 2005. The bill, "The Border Protection, Antiterrorism, and Illegal Immigration Control Act of 2005," restricts immigrants' rights, enhances border security and criminalizes immigrant communities. People nationwide have since been advocating for full amnesty and human rights for the millions of undocumented workers in the country since the bill was presented.

Over 150 advocates from the UMass campus and Amherst community gathered first at Student Union to hear the opening speeches from members of the Office of ALANA Affairs and the UMass faculty, including Nate Kupel, Tony Udell, Tom Coish, and Professor Enoch Page.

"Mexicans did not cross our border," said Nate Kupel. "We crossed their borders by taking Texas and New Mexico. Now, because of unjust immigration policies, they're not afforded the same rights as U.S. citizens. ... Do people deserve to be treated poorly for wanting to provide for their families?"

Student Government Association President Elvis Mendez leads UMass students from the Student Union to Amherst Common yesterday during a rally for immigration rights.

Professor Enoch Page concluded the opening rally by explaining that minority groups need to work together to join forces and create stronger coalitions to weaken the power of white supremacy.

Moments later, the march began and chants like, "Ain't no power like the power of the people 'cause the power of the people don't stop!" and "No justice, no peace!" reverberated throughout Amherst. Several onlookers cheered for the demonstrators, while police guided the marching protestors from North Pleasant Street to Main Street.

During the march, Sai Madivala, a graduate assistant asked, "When was the last time there was a wave of immigrant protests like this? We are exploiting the Third World. We go in, take their wealth, and expect the people not to follow. Of course

Protesters worldwide call for workers' rights

By IRWAN FIRDAUS

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Workers around the world held May Day rallies Monday to press for better factory conditions and higher wages in mostly peaceful marches, while activists in the Philippines and Belarus used the holiday to show their opposition to their governments in tense protests watched by police.

In Sri Lanka, where violence between Tamil Tiger rebels and the military has heightened fears of a return to civil war, the government canceled all May Day rallies in the capital, Colombo. Traditionally, almost all Sri Lankan political parties hold May Day rallies.

About 100,000 workers took to the streets across Indonesia, protesting a labor law that would cut severance packages and introduce more flexible contracts that would chip away at worker security.

"Don't change the law," thousands of laborers chanted in downtown Jakarta. Fearing violence, about 13,000 police were deployed, some carrying riot shields and manning water cannons, said police chief Maj. Gen. Firman Gani said. No incidents were reported.

In Cuba, more than 1 million workers in red T-shirts distributed by the government crowded into Havana's Plaza of the Revolution and adjacent avenues, and listened as President Fidel Castro said recent U.S. military maneuvers in the Caribbean were aimed at intimidating Cuba and its ally, Venezuela.

Castro also criticized Washington's handling of the court case of Cuban-born militant Luis Posada Carriles, whom he accuses of being the Western Hemisphere's No. 1 terrorist, and who is being held in the United States on immigration charges. Posada, a former CIA operative and fervent Castro foe, is accused of masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that killed 73 people and has applied to become a U.S. citizen.

Most rallies across Europe were peaceful, although tensions were evident in Belarus, where about 2,000 opposition supporters marched in Minsk in a show of defiance, days after the authoritarian government of President Alexander Lukashenko tried to stop an unprecedented series of demonstrations by throwing protest leaders in jail.

The rally began with an unauthorized march by 800 activists, who walked about 1 1/4 miles from the Academy of Sciences to a square where authorities had given permission for the gathering, which grew to about 2,000. Police stood on either side of the demonstrators as they walked to the square, warning them that they were breaking the law, but did not intervene.

Supporters of labor rights and better conditions for workers rally in Minsk, Belarus yesterday as part of the worldwide May Day protests.

Police later stopped opposition figure and former parliament speaker Stanislav Shushkevich, who had organized the march, and summoned him to appear in two days' time at a police station on charges of staging an unauthorized rally.

Hundreds of thousands of people turned out across Russia for more traditional May Day celebrations.

About 25,000 people gathered in Moscow opposite the mayor's office in the warm spring sunshine to hear speeches from trade union leaders and the mayor and listen to a concert, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported.

In Istanbul, Turkey, police fired tear gas and pepper spray at demonstrators shouting slogans against the United States and the International Monetary Fund, and detained about 40. In the town of Elazig in eastern Turkey, another 30 were detained following a scuffle with police that left four people injured.

City to remake Faneuil Hall marketplace

BOSTON (AP) — About 30 years after Faneuil Hall Marketplace was transformed from a rundown eyesore into one of Boston's top tourist attractions, some city officials think the shopping and restaurant district is losing its identity and is due for another makeover.

The city-owned but privately managed marketplace is plagued by high rents that are pushing out the local merchants while opening the doors for large national chains and numerous bars.

The Boston Redevelopment Authority is scheduled this week to meet with marketplace manager General Growth Properties to discuss the future of the area, which consists of four buildings — Quincy, North and South markets, and historic Faneuil Hall itself.

"I don't believe it's being managed properly. If they don't want to work with us, something has to happen," Mayor Thomas M. Menino said told the Boston Sunday Globe. "Longtime merchants are closing shops because of rising rents. It's not Faneuil Hall Marketplace anymore. It's a mall."

The city also plans to form a watchdog advisory group to help attract more local merchants.

Officials and some merchants grew alarmed when Urban Outfitters and Dick's Last Resort moved in within the past year.

There is also concern about the fact that retail sales at the marketplace have fallen three of the past six years at stores open at least a year, according to Michael Kelleher, who manages the property for General Growth and started managing the property just two years ago. Although this year sales are improving, up 13 percent compared to last year, he said.

Kelleher said the marketplace, which attracts about 20 million visitors per year, tries to attract local merchants, but needs the chains to succeed. Urban Outfitters and Dick's Last Resort have taken over areas that have been vacant for long periods of time, he said.

Rents are also a barrier. Some retailers and food vendors pay up to $150 a square foot, said several tenants.

BRA executive director Harry Collings said the mounting concerns over the direction of Faneuil Hall Marketplace prompted the city to demand the meeting with General Growth.

"We're concerned about retaining the character of Faneuil Marketplace," Collings said. "At night, the area is becoming too much of a party place and that's not the original intent."

The area was slated for demolition until a group of residents sought to preserve it in the early 1970s.

Architect Ben Thompson and developer James Rouse got the support of then-Mayor Kevin White to revive the marketplace.

By 1983, the district had about 172 businesses, and more than 90 percent were local, according to the Faneuil Hall Merchants Association. Chains now make up 50 percent of the retailers, up from 5 percent in 1983.

Lawmaker seeks to close drunk driving loophole

HYANNIS (AP) — A Cape Cod legislator wants to close a loophole in the state's drunken driving laws that bars juries in criminal trials from being told whether or not a defendant refused to take roadside tests or a Breathalyzer.

But he could be up against the state constitution.

Preventing such testimony often leaves juries to wonder whether the tests were even offered, police and prosecutors say.

"It puts Massachusetts prosecutors behind the eight ball," said Andrea Nardone, vehicular crimes staff attorney for the Massachusetts District Attorneys Association.

State Rep. Cleon Turner, D-Dennis, has crafted a change to state law that would allow refusal testimony in both civil and criminal trials. He may file the legislation in as little as two weeks with House counsel to determine its legality.

"We're at the phase of this that we are looking for input and encouragement, or discouragement, from others out there in the world," Turner told the Cape Cod Times.

Yarmouth police are also on board.

"I think it's the most serious crime," Yarmouth police Lt. Steven G. Xiarhos said. "It kills thousands of people each year and many of them are innocent people. Is that the way we want to live?"

In Massachusetts in 2004, 476 people died in alcohol-related crashes and 38 percent of drivers in those crashes had a blood alcohol content of the state limit of 0.08 or higher.

Rhode Island, Hawaii and Oklahoma also do not allow refusal evidence into criminal trials.

Xiarhos has polled juries after drunken driving trials. The Breathalyzer frequently comes up.

"They say, 'We thought you didn't offer it or it was too low,'" Xiarhos said.

About 25 percent of all drivers arrested for drunken driving in the United States refuse to take Breathalyzer tests. In Massachusetts, that number is almost double, according to an August 2005 report commissioned by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration.

The state toughened drunken driving laws in October with the passage of Melanie's Law, which include increased penalties for refusing to take a Breathalyzer test.

But the topic of refusal evidence never made it into the final version of the bill.

The barring of refusal evidence hinges on the state Constitution, which contains a provision safeguarding citizens from self-incrimination, Nardone said.

In response to a legislative inquiry in 1992, the Supreme Judicial Court ruled that allowing refusals would create a catch-22 situation, where refusing or taking the test could lead to an implication of guilt.

people will follow the money!"

The march, led by Stephen Mahood and UMass Student Government Association President Elvis Mendez, ended at the Amherst Town Common, where the UMass protestors met with supporters from Amherst College, Hampshire College, and Mt. Holyoke College. Several booths promoting voting rights for immigrants lined the Common and signs from the International Socialist Organization, reading "Ningun Ser Humano Es Ilegal (No Human Being is Illegal)" were displayed throughout the crowd.

The rally and vigil at the Common began with Native American community member, Sarah Little Crow stating, "Today... is not about silence." The crowd cheered when Manny Castro of Hampshire College wore a Mexican flag on stage while shouting, "This fight is going around on all college campuses in the nation! It's a fight for human rights!"

Over 400 people stood at the Common for over two hours, listening to the speeches of various Amherst immigrants, professors and representatives from Amherst College, UMass, and Hampshire College, as well as local high school student advocates.

"This is the new civil rights movement, a movement of unity," said Agustin Lao-Montes, a Hispanic resident of Amherst. "This is about human rights, civil rights, labor rights. It is for racial justice and democracy to end criminalization of immigrants in the U.S. Let us stay alive! Keep marching, organizing, educating, and building coalitions. Turn the energy into a progressive movement to create a rainbow coalition."

Another local advocate said, "It isn't just about immigrants, but about who the scapegoats are. It's always the same logic: 'Latinos are the cause of America's problems.' But America's always been a dangerous place. Say no to totalitarianism!"

Members of Out Now, Inc., a youth organization for lesbians, gays, bisexuals, and transvestuals from SpringGield also showed up at the rally to show their support.

"We do a lot of protesting for all human rights," said Holly Richardson, a member of the non-profit organization. "It wasn't long ago when queer people were placed in the same boat as the immigrants. In a way, homosexuals are immigrants, and homophobia is the same as xenophobia. We want to raise empowerment through solidarity and truth."

A Northampton radio station, 103.3 Low Power-FM, also promoted their radio show, Trigger Radio, which sends the message, "Immigration affects everyone in the nation. There shouldn't be a divide between groups. Let's help the people of color challenge all notions of what it is to be 'American.'"

A Hampshire College professor said at the end of the rally, "It's time to think about opening the borders. Let's respect the human rights of all human beings!"

agreed that bussing students between segregated districts is an improvement, but said it was treating a symptom rather than the disease.

"We need more than band aids," Garcia said. "We need to attack the root of the problem, which is much larger. What is fundamental is the constitutional issue of justice in education."

Rachel Cardona, who works on social and economic diversity issues for the Office of the President of Amherst College, has been to every one of Kozol's talks at the school and said she is always impressed with the amount of students who are inspired to take action.

"Five of them came to me after the talk and asked 'What can we do to help?'" Cardona said.

Other students had similar reactions to the event.

"One of the things I appreciate about Kozol," said Amy Sternheim, a University of Massachusetts student, "is the way he gets you to examine your privilege and ask 'How can I share it?'"

Kozol is currently on a nine day tour around the U.S. promoting his recent book "The Shame of a Nation: The Restoration of Apartheid Schooling in America," which was published in 2005.

No progress made in Darfur negotiations

By Bashir Adigun
Assiated Press

ABUJA, Nigeria — The first day of an extended deadline for reaching a peace deal in Sudan's Darfur region saw no progress Monday, and the State Department said its No. 2 official is flying to Nigeria in hopes of prodding the rival factions.

The government said Sunday it was ready to sign the deal. But the rebels still are pushing the government to add a vice president from Darfur and unite its three states — creating a more autonomous region.

In accepting the draft, the government agreed to disarm a militia it is accused of unleashing on Darfur civilians, commit millions of dollars to rebuilding a region devastated by poverty and war, and compensate victims of the fighting.

African Union mediators who wrote a draft agreement gave the two sides until midnight Tuesday to formally end a conflict that has killed nearly 200,000 people and displaced millions. Talks have been going on for two years.

Sudan's chief negotiator Majzoub Khalifa said Monday the main stumbling block was the number of rebel forces to be included in the national army. The rebels also are demanding that compensation go to individual victims of violence, rather than being included in plans for regional reconstruction.

Khalifa said rebel reluctance to sign the peace agreement was "regrettable" but declared that Khartoum would begin abiding by the plan immediately.

"Anyone who obstructs peace efforts should be forced to bear responsibility," Khalifa said.

He warned the rebels they would be dealt with "seriously," saying his government, the AU and the United Nations would take "a number of steps" against them if they continue to reject the deal. He did not elaborate.

But Ahmed Hussein, a spokesman for one of two rebel factions, said earlier: "We are not ready to sign until the Sudanese give concessions to our demands."

In rejecting the AU draft, he said he was speaking on behalf of both his Justice and Equality Movement and the other main rebel group, the Sudan Liberation Movement.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick is flying to Nigeria in an effort to break the impasse.

"The parties have made progress in recent days, but some key issues remain unresolved," the State Department said.

"The United States urges the Darfur rebel movements to focus on the few key issues that stand in the way of reaching a settlement, and we urge the government of Sudan to send a senior representative back to Abuja to finalize the peace agreement."

Among other provisions, the draft circulated last week called for a cease-fire. Both sides have agreed to a truce before, only to keep fighting, even in the last week. The draft also calls for an infusion of funds into a region the draft document described as "historically deprived."

It also addressed complaints from Darfur rebel groups that they had been neglected by the national government, calling for the president to include a Darfur expert, initially nominated by the rebels, among his top advisers.

But the Justice and Equality Movement said the proposal does not adequately address implementation nor their key demands.

Salim Ahmed Salim, a lead mediator for the AU, said the bloc had bowed to requests from the United States and others to continue negotiations.

"The African Union has extended the deadline of the peace talks by 48 hours as requested by the United States and other international partners to allow extensive consultations to go ahead," he said.

In Washington, actors, athletes, politicians and religious leaders rallied Sunday to call attention to the Darfur conflict and urge greater U.S. involvement in ending what the United Nations has called one of the world's worst humanitarian disasters.

Years of fighting between ethnic groups and Arab militias in western Sudan have left at least 180,000 people dead and about 2 million homeless. Darfur's violence recently spilled into neighboring Chad and threatens to escalate: Osama bin Laden last week urged his followers to go to Sudan to fight a proposed U.N. presence.

Amid the negotiations, the plight of 3 million refugees in Darfur has worsened. The U.N. World Food Program said Friday it was cutting rations in half, citing a lack of funds.

An agreement between Sudan and the rebels likely would be seen as a triumph of African diplomacy. The talks have been organized by the 53-nation AU, with key participation from leaders from South Africa and Nigeria.

Sudan has indicated it might accept a U.N. force in Darfur to aid AU troops if a peace treaty is signed.

In the draft, mediators also proposed that the people of Darfur vote by 2010 on whether to create a single geographical entity out of the three Darfur states, which would presumably have more political weight.

Decades of low-level tribal clashes over land and water in Darfur erupted into large-scale violence in early 2003 when some ethnic groups took up arms, accusing the east African nation's Arab-dominated central government of neglect.

The central government is accused of responding by unleashing Arab tribal militias known as Janjaweed to murder and rape civilians and lay waste to villages. Sudan denies backing the Janjaweed.

The draft agreement calls for disarming the Janjaweed and integrating some rebels into the national army and security forces.

Correction

Yesterday, the Collegian ran a caption in the Arts and Living section identifying Bruce Geisler as a demonstrating communard. The man pictured is actually a member of the commune named Peter Harris. Prof. Geisler did not participate in that demonstration, and had already left the commune when the photograph was taken. We apologize for the error.

Historians explore newly found gospel

By Kristi Roberts
UWire (D.C. Bureau)

WASHINGTON — For centuries, Christians have followed the New Testament Gospels of the Apostles Mark, Mathew, Luke and John -- but what about Judas?

Recently the discovery of what historians and theologians are calling the Gospel of Judas has caused a stir in the Christian community. The Gospel was found in Egypt in the early 1970s and was put on the antique market where it was sold and kept in a bank vault until the owner donated it to the Maecenas Foundation for Ancient Art, because he worried about the text's rapid deterioration.

Despite its state, the text was a remarkable historical find because it was so complete.

"It's always exciting to have a new piece of data," said Hayim Lapin, an associate professor of Jewish and ancient studies at the University of Maryland. "Researchers always have to cobble scraps of documents together."

The document has been characterized by many as a lost Gospel. However, theologians have known about the text for centuries and say it is not a threat to the Christian faith, Lapin said.

The Rev. Peter Antoci agrees.

"The Gospel [of Judas] belongs to a body of writings in Gnosticism," Antoci said. "It was never accepted in Canonical text of the Bible."

Gnosticism is a mixture of pre-Christian and early-Christian beliefs which believes in the ability of some to transcend the physical world through the acquisition of mysterious spiritual knowledge. It does not believe, like Christianity does, that the resurrection of Jesus permitted transcendence.

Canonical texts are characterized as "divinely inspired" and meant to be in the Canon, or New Testament of the Bible, according to Fr. Bill Byrne. They were written before the end of the first century, whereas Gnostic texts weren't written until the second and third centuries.

"The text [of the Gospel of Judas] shows evidence of the knowledge of the four canonical texts," Antoci said. "In fact, it is a response to them."

This difference in time is important to the religious significance of the documents, according to Bryne.

"Catholics believe that public revelation, or the word of God, ended with the death of the last Apostle," Byrne said. "The Gospel of Judas was written after that."

"This text has significance in a historical context, but doesn't shed light on the teachings of Jesus Christ," he said.

According to Antoci, many scholars have evidence of the knowledge of the Gospel of Judas as early as the fifth century, in which theologians denounced the text, along with other Gnostic texts as religiously insignificant.

Both Antoci and Byrne agree that while the text has no religious significance, it's a fantastic scholarly find and provides new insight into how Christianity was developing in its earliest stages.

When the finding of the Gospel of Judas was first announced it caused a sensation in the media, because it called into question the validity of the canonical text. However, people are always looking for a good reason not to believe in the teachings of the Church, Byrne said.

According to Antoci, this isn't the first time.

"Everybody flipped out about the 'DaVinci Code,'" Antoci said. "It happened with 'The Last Temptation of Christ,' too. It seems like every 10 to 15 years people write fiction and religion and get people excited. I just want to say, what part of 'fiction' don't you understand?" he said.

Byrne agrees.

"People think there's some secret that still has to be discovered," Byrne said. "But there aren't any more messages. We've got the message. Now, it's the church's job to explain and preserve the revelation for each age."

Police deal with nearly 1,000 partygoers

FridayApril 28

Bryan Donovan, 20, of 51 Neponset Rd., Quincy, was arrested and charged with disorderly conduct at 12:56 a.m. at Delano's on 57 North Pleasant St. Police reported that Donovan appeared highly intoxicated and combative.

Julia M. Heath, 45, of 441 Main St., was arrested and charged on two counts of littering, throwing glass on a public walkway, and disorderly conduct.

A dog walking into the road reportedly caused an Amherst woman to crash her car in an embankment at 5:06 p.m. on 150 East Leverett Rd. The brown 2002 Ford Explorer sustained extensive front-end damage and was towed to College St. Motors. There were no reported injuries to the driver.

Several witnesses called police at 10:02 p.m., claiming an African American male was picking up old ATM receipts and putting them into his car. The incident occurred at the Bank of America at 29 Monatgue Rd. No arrests have been made.

Police were called to assist the Amherst Fire Department at 58 Rolling Green of 422 Belchertown Rd. at 9:45 p.m. after a person was found unconscious on the floor of the residence. The person was described as having a strong pulse but weak respirations and was subsequently transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Stephen Govoni, 19, of 18 Viking Ln., Sandwich, was arrested at 303 Puffton Village at 9:53 p.m. for being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol.

Walter H. Mengden IV, 20, of 9 Dunedin Rd., Wellesley, was arrested at 11:24 p.m. at 53 Fearing St. and charged with having an open container of alcohol, and being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol.

Jonathan Franci Mazzola, 21, of 86 Elm St., Belmont, was arrested at 11:34 p.m. at 109 Fearing St. for having an open container of alcohol.

Tracy Ann Crowley, 19, of 84 Seaside Ave, Stamford, Conn., was arrested at 11:36 p.m. at 111 Fearing St. and charged with being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol.

Joshua Adam Strauss, 20, of 15 Duke St., Swampscott, was arrested at 11:41 p.m. at 177 North Pleasant St. and charged with being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol.

Sean P. Ryan, 20, of 3 Abbutus Ln., Sandwich, was arrested at 11:43 p.m. at 31 Phillips St. and charged with having an open container of alcohol and being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol.

SaturdayApril 29

Reports of noise and numerous people on the front lawn of 525 East Pleasant St. resulted in the arrests of three people who live there. Juliana Demoraes Roth, 23, Matthew Araujo, 22, and Michael Miraglia, 23, were arrested for unlawful noise at 12:55 a.m. Police report to have witnessed loud music being played, people vomiting on the front lawn and a glass smoking device with resin inside, which was later seized to be destroyed.

Jeffrey Raymond Johnston, 20, of 91 Prince St., Boston, was arrested at 1:01 a.m. at 33 Phillips St. for being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol and having an open container of alcohol.

A brick was reportedly thrown through the upper windows of a living room at W D Cowls Inc. of 32 Cowls Rd. Police were dispatched to the location at 10:54 a.m. An egg was also reportedly thrown at the owners' vehicle. Police believe two local boys are responsible for both incidents.

Residents of 25 Townehouse at 50 Meadow St. were reportedly awakened by a loud bang and found the outer windowpane of a double-pane glass slider being shattered. Police were dispatched to the location at 11:16 a.m. No arrests have been made thus far.

Police responded to 294 Puffton Village at 12:55 p.m. after receiving reports of larceny. The owner reported that two pieces of exercise equipment, a chest/lat machine and a stationary bike were stolen from the front of the residence.

Kapil Edke, 22, of 2D Brandywine Dr. was arrested at 5:34 p.m. at 50 Meadow St. for wanton and lascivious lewd conduct and indecent exposure. Edke allegedly had a towel wrapped around himself and flashed people as they walked by.

Two women were arrested at 10:16 p.m. at 19 Northampton Rd. and charged with multiple counts of drug possession. Diana Harmon Weiss, 18, of 25 Outlook Rd., Swampscott was charged with possession of a class D and B drug, and Jillian Ashley Zygmunt, 19, of 19 Lawrence Ter., Swampscott was arrested for possession of a class D drug.

Paul Michael Jr., 20, of 54 Beaver Brook Rd., Burlington, and Ryan J. Gochis, who is now 21 but was 20 at the time of the incident, of 9 Birch St., Burlington, were arrested and charged with being under the age of 21 in possession of alcohol and having an open container of alcohol. Joseph Paul Mitrano Jr., 21, of 115 Drake Rd., Burlington, was arrested for having an open container of alcohol.

Andrew Williams Archer, 19, of 225 High St., Pembroke, was arrested at 12:17 a.m. at 14B Brandywine for being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol.

Katina Kristine McDonald, 18, of 309 Plymouth St., Middleborough, and Paul Charles Scattaretico, 19, of 26 Riverside Pl., Dobbs Ferry, NY, were arrested at 12:21 a.m. at 9 Townehouse after they entered the quad with alcohol in their possession.

Sean Christopher Calicchio, 20, of 198 Presidents St., Brooklyn, NY, was arrested at 12:49 a.m. at 50 Meadow St. for disorderly conduct.

Police broke up a party of approximately 1,000 people on Meadow St. just before 1 a.m. Police say some people were throwing lawn furniture and beer bottles. Some people in the crowd also allegedly knocked out the lights in the quad. Thirty local police officers and six state police officers were called in to disperse the crowd. Police also reported seeing some bloodied people walking away from the crowd. Three arrests were made, starting at 12:55 a.m. Anthony Louis Guerrette, 22, of 69 Holm Ave., Portland, ME, Raunny Rosario, 24, of 162 Pleasant St., Lowell, and Benjamin Michael Waterfall, 19, of 784 West Roxbury Pkwy., Roslindale, were all arrested for disorderly conduct.

An alleged assault of two men at 33 East Pleasant St. resulted in a police investigation. Three or four Hispanic males reportedly drove a Honda Accord to bus stop where two of the males allegedly jumped out and punched a man in the face. Another man at the scene attempted to help and was also reportedly punched. There have been no arrests at this time.

James Yaman, 22, of 24 Hallock St. Amherst, and Michael D. Sciamanna, 21, of 15 Glidden St. Beverly, were arrested for unlawful noise at Halcourt Gardens Bldgs. 1-4 at 2:25 a.m.

Benny J. Cruz, 39, of 111 Pine St. 1A, Holyoke, was arrested at 8:58 a.m. in front of the Amherst police station for assault and battery.

Melissa Garber

Instead of your typical lazy weekend, Habitat for Humanity offers students the opportunity to make a real difference. It's something nobody should pass up.

Last Friday afternoon my friend Kyle, treasurer of the UMass chapter of Habitat for Humanity, called me. A bunch of people had bailed for Saturday and he was wondering if I could work from 9 to 4 on a site in Northampton. Initially I couldn't imagine waking up by 9 a.m. on a Saturday morning. I had expressed interest in working at a Habitat site but I can't even make it to my 9:05 a.m. classes. I didn't have plans or excuses for why I couldn't help out though, so I obliged.

I stumbled out of bed Saturday morning at an unmentionable hour and headed over to the Northampton site with Kyle and his friend Jen. The task for the day was dry walling, but Kyle and I ended up helping insulate with John Nathan, a habitat recipient who would be living in the duplex we were working on.

Seven hours worth of fiber glass on my skin definitely wasn't pleasant but it was completely worth it. It gave me a sense of usefulness. I haven't been that productive in ages and it didn't take much. I'm 18; I have full use of my limbs, so seven hours of insulation work could hardly qualify as strenuous for me. Granted I was exhausted by the time four rolled around, but that's to be expected.

Habitat for Humanity is probably one of the easiest organizations to get involved with. There are plenty of local sites to volunteer at. At the Turner Falls site on I. Street they just broke ground March 28; there is still plenty of work to be done in Northampton on Westhampton Road and there is a site in Amherst on Southeast Street on land donated by Amherst College. Building on the Amherst site is tentatively starting at the beginning of September. Construction shifts are 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Saturdays and 12 to 4 p.m. on Sundays at all the mentioned sites.

Habitat is a nonprofit organization. Habitat houses are interest free and the monthly mortgage payments made by recipients go toward purchasing land and other materials for more Habitat houses. "One of the things they do is build communities instead of just houses," John noted. This is especially true for the duplexes being finished up on Westhampton Road. There are six families who will be living and working together in these duplexes.

My Saturday mornings typically consist of nursing hangovers and dragging my burnt out half starved self to the DC, after I finally manage to roll out of bed.

Every family member receiving a Habitat house age 18 and older has to put in 250 hours of sweat equity on their own house and on other sites. John attests, "When I go in there I always have fun and the crews are really great." Volunteers range from college kids to professionals.

Some people go in there with the knowledge of carpentry on their belts, others, like me, know nothing. "Everyone makes their contribution and everyone values that," John commented. All that's required for Habitat volunteers is punctuality on your shift. If you're coming individually, any day is good as long as you're on time for your shift, or if you're with a group you can claim an open day.

The UMass Habitat for Humanity group is going to the Westhampton Road site again on May 13. It's a perfect way to get involved. I would recommend Habitat for anyone interested in volunteer work. I hate to sound preachy but I feel that as a college student I spend a lot of my time doing worthless things.

When I'm not writing papers or doing the crossword I'm typically sitting around my dorm doing something damaging to my body. I bet a lot of students can relate to that. My Saturday mornings typically consist of nursing hangovers and dragging my burnt out half-starved self to the DC, after I finally manage to roll out of bed. This usually occurs around mid afternoon. I'm only fully functional by around 4 p.m., which is about the time I can start the process all over again.

But when I finished Habitat by 4 p.m. I had already worked for seven hours on a site that would be the future home of the guy I was working with. There's something really cool about that. At Habitat you actually get to work with the people the organization is helping. "I used to think in the beginning it was going to be uncomfortable, but it's the opposite," John said, "It's hard to describe but I feel good every time I go there, I feel humble."

Everyone works together on building a home. People who will be living in the homes, people who know what they're doing, people who volunteer with groups, people like me who are clueless; everyone comes together and creates this really amazing thing. You're not just sitting around on a perfectly good Saturday, you're accomplishing something that really affects people – you're building a home. I can't imagine most college kids do anything that significant on the weekends.

The day after my first Habitat experience Kyle and I met up with John and his son at the Community Fair held here at UMass. We just talked about Habitat and the impact it has had. One of the best parts of doing this was just getting to hear John's story. It was nice to get a different perspective on the world. Everyone has a story to tell.

I guess my point is that Habitat for Humanity is a really good experience. There really aren't that many excuses for why people can't get out there and work on a Saturday besides sleep deprivation and nasty hangovers. I wouldn't really consider either a valid justification. It's a really good opportunity and I'm happy I didn't pass it up.

A waste of time and (my)space

Michael Toomey

With their roots in "networking," whatever that happens to mean, websites like Myspace, Xanga and Facebook offer users the seemingly dull capability to create a personal page for themselves. Upon my first hearing about these sites, I assumed most people wouldn't be interested in investing the time and effort to make a public display of how unremarkable they are.

However the error in my thinking lies in forgetfulness, forgetful that most people are unaware they're tragically common, because my dismissal of these sites had as much foresight to it as used by the myriad agencies that initially turned down megamodel Tyra Banks. But unlike Tyra, who has graced the world with the pleasance of a pretty face, these sites have given scores of my generation a personal investment in wasting time, take a major toll on our social climate, proliferate interpersonal frigidity, and are also responsible for some downright creepy, borderline voyeuristic tendencies.

Not letting their bland mediocrity get in the way of making a snazzy page, millions of young folk readily took to uploading fuzzy pictures of themselves, compiling long lists of their likes and dislikes, and proving that literacy is still a problem area in the US educational system. The worst ones I've seen have ranged from being all pink, sweetened with sickeningly lame slogans in cloud-like letters such as "2 hot 4U" and shirtless Gotti brother pictures; to hopelessly pretentious artistic endeavors including black and white, intentionally blurred photos, unreadable poetry, and affected sidebar witticisms.

Perhaps you're not objectively attractive but have a few pictures that take off a few pounds and recall Gisele Bundchen, well congratulations, you're now hot!

My point here is not to illuminate the decline of modern civilization but to highlight the strange fact that kids are using these WebPages to represent their idealized self. As the blank slate allows for so much image control, users can create a reality based on the divulgences they choose. Perhaps you're not objectively attractive but have a few pictures that take off a few pounds and recall Gisele Bundchen, well congratulations, you're now hot! Or let's say you're a very soft-spoken individual who reserves voicing opinion for teatime with mommy, on Myspace you can rant and rail against everything in the world and too many, be identified as the outraged cynic that you aren't.

That is the magic of Myspace. Its illusion can be comforting, and even empowering to those able to overlook the gaping disparity between their online and real-life friends, and revel in the furnishings of their playhouse. The need for acceptance is human nature. Today's technology adds the virtual wonderland to the map of places we might find it, making Myspace an extension of human nature.

That last statement probably doesn't read as radically as it might, because Myspace is such a huge phenomenon it wouldn't be hard to take for granted its integration into our way of life. Simply put, it's huge. When my roommate asked if I had a Myspace and I replied a flat "no," without any explanation (he's one of them, you see.) He went on to solicit the site, "you've got to get it. Everyone in the world has it!" I just smiled, masking my ensuing moment of depression in realization that for all intents and purposes he was telling the truth. You're hard pressed to find anyone between the ages of 16 and 25 who isn't an active participant in this charade. This is an important fact, because it leads to a curious twist in the world of the everyman's website. Virtually everyone has it, which naturally includes your everyday physical friends.

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

What they left out was "also a place for stalkers and bored students."

After lots of exploration through this prefabricated mess of airbrushed lives, people tend to gravitate around their friends' pages, regularly contributing such prose as "lol...I was soooooo drunk last night! lol! C U! 2nite cutie! Luv xoxox," to the comment board. So what eventually happens, probably inversely related to the time spent as a user, is a focus on the pages of real friends. So now, not only can you spend time with your cronies, call them on cell phones, and chat via instant messengers, you can also bolster each other's confidence by exchanging obligatory niceties on Myspace. We can now be so connected with our friends that the rest of the world doesn't really seem to matter anymore. So we find our social environments more cliquey than ever before, where countless little clusters have formed in what was once somewhat homogenous, a catalyst being these damned personal web pages.

If push came to shove, I'd imagine most users would concede that a contributing factor to their participation in these interactive systems is quite simply a lack of anything better to do. No one can really truly believe that finding the right Mustang background to match your font color is a worthwhile venture. We do this because we're bored. In my estimation though, the maintenance of a Myspace page would likely exacerbate a case of the doldrums to the point of literal collapse.

Meaningful exchanges are few and far between, so the interactive aspect of the site is pretty limp, although there's something to be said for a "hey, im jus sayin whatup." That unpretentious acknowledgment is what we all crave in some way or another, someone expressing a genuine care or concern for us. What I fear is that things like these interactive web pages might be intimating in the most subconscious of ways, that we can only be warm and caring to those close to us. We can hide behind an impressive html façade, only letting our inner circle see through to our vulnerability and fears, but more importantly, to what's real. It seems kind of isolating, it seems like it erodes our ability to operate in new social contexts; but then again it might be nothing more than a good way to bleed the clock.

A tale of two protests

Mike Sances

"Protesting doesn't work." It is a common refrain these days, and it is true in some sense. It all depends on what "work" is presumed to mean, and what the goals are. If the expectation is that change will happen the day after the demonstration, then obviously protesting does not work, and has not ever worked.

If, on the other hand, the goal is to build community, to affirm that there are thousands of Americans who feel the same as you, then whether protesting "works" is far more debatable. If it is to add momentum to, for example, the growing antiwar sentiment in the country, and to pressure members of Congress into changing their position on the war before it costs them their seats in November, then protesting has a good chance of "working," much as it has in the past. Even then, however, results will not be immediately apparent.

It is therefore difficult to give an account of Saturday's march in New York City without sounding negative. In truth, the highlight of the march did not occur until Sunday, when I read that the estimated participation was somewhere around 300,000. The vanload of people from Amherst who I had the pleasure of attending with made it 300,015. We started out among the labor contingent, behind the Transport Workers Union and the Service Employees International Union. The unions' participation was striking.

But while results were not instant, post-march analysis was. It seemed we all came away with an idea of how things should have been done.

But as the march began and we moved ahead in the crowd, the labor unions melted abruptly into a column of youths, dressed in red tee-shirts, who chanted at the direction of their leader, armed with a bullhorn. "Death, death, death to fascists!" was their battle cry. These were the Progressive Labor Party, the PLP, and one of them eagerly thrust their "revolutionary communist newspaper" into my hands. Just then I spotted an elderly veteran, who apparently had been trailing along the barricades following us. "That's right," he nodded, "this whole march was set up by the Communist Party."

He was right, sort of. Since 2001, one of the two major organizers of the big demonstrations in New York has been ANSWER, which stands for Act Now to Stop War and End Racism, and which has long been suspected of being a front group for state socialists and apologists for North Korea. Strangely, ANSWER was uninvolved in this march. They seemed to have rebranded themselves as the World Can't Wait campaign, after publicly splitting with the more moderate United for Peace and Justice, traditionally the other primary organizer, some months ago.

Still, everywhere you turned there was a different Communist, Socialist, Marxist, or Workers party, from the PLP to Workers' Assets ("Bush Lost Iraq," their signs dumbly complained, as if that were a bad thing) to the US Marxist-Leninist Organization to the Spartacist League to the International Socialist Organization to the Working Families Party. And every one of these had its own newspaper, either for a modest "suggested donation" or for free.

We had expected a rally at the end of the march, but instead there was a "peace festival," an amalgamation of tents for all the disparate organizations working for the same thing. But while results were not instant, post-march analysis was. It seemed we all came away with an idea of how things should have been done.

There was no unifying message, I complained; there were too many groups with identical goals and with similar names. Others commented on the mysterious lack of civil disobedience; still others wondered where the role of electoral politics was in all of this. When the New York Times predictably gave the march scant coverage the following day, someone floated the idea of marching on the paper's offices and demanding to speak to the ombudsman.

Compare all this to Monday's rally in Amherst in support of immigrant rights. The success of that action, and whether it "worked," was not something you had to think about, or qualify, or write off as a "learning experience." True, there were some odd moments, such as the typical comparisons made between America and Nazi Germany, as well as one speaker "thanking the white people" who came to show their support. But overall the message was clear: justice, human rights, and to hell with House Resolution 4437. I came away certain that Congress was listening, or that if they were not; they would come to regret it dearly. For many important reasons, you could not say the same thing about Saturday.

STOP SCORNING SKOLNICK SARCASM

Glad Skolnick's "Women have it so much easier than men" was a delight for me to read. For Jamie Foxer, who wrote a disgruntled reply, it was just the opposite.

Jamie accuses Glad of neglecting to see that many women in the world do not have it as easy as he claims. However, if Jamie has read any of Glad's past articles, she would know that he chooses to be sarcastic and what I believe is funny in his writing. Yes, many women lead terrible lives and it is devastating to know this fact. But in a world full of terrible things, every once in a while it is advantageous to laugh.

Glad's article may have been offensive to some, but to me, a female, well, I just had to laugh. I believe he knows that it sucks being a woman sometimes, but a little comic relief is something we all need. So to Jamie, and others who may have taken Glad's article a little too seriously, lighten up, because sometimes you just have to laugh.

MORE FUNDING IN BETTER PLACES

A more accurate headline for Thursday's story about the budget for student activities would have been "Registered Student Organizations receive 25 percent increase." In fact, that was the reporter's lead.

With its new tutoring and mentoring program, The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) is trying to fill some of the gap left by the dismantling of the Office of ALANA Affairs (OAA). OAA was last funded at just under $200,000. SCERA used to have four full-time professional staff.

If it had that today, that would be over $200,000. Combined, those amounts would be around $400,000. Despite the great need for large-scale advocacy on campus – a need signaled by trends such as chronic state under-funding and quadrupling of student charges over the last two decades. (Furthermore a need ratified by the most recent student elections) – during the budget process, SCERA accommodated other campus funding needs, including those of RSO's, to end up at $195,085.

Regarding the funding of the Student Government Association (SGA) and area governments, it's only the SGA that can really conduct university-wide advocacy and governance, so it should be funded first and best.

John Vanderslice on touring and 'Revolt'

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Though he may not have the wide commercial success of some of his peers, John Vanderslice is an indie veteran with the talent to back up the large amount of critical acclaim and the devoted cult that he has built over the years. Vanderslice came to the Iron Horse in Northampton last Wednesday on a tour to support his latest album, "Pixel Revolt," and spoke to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian about the record — his most complex to date — the subsequent touring and what lies ahead for him.

While Vanderslice tours with a full band, he records his albums with essentially just himself and his collaborator, Scott Solter, at his own Tiny Telephone studio in California. Because of this situation Vanderslice is able to weave many elements into each song, taking them from a basic premise into something completely different; "Pixel Revolt" is extremely layered, even by previous Vanderslice standards, and he acknowledges it can be very difficult when he has to bring the songs back to a more terrestrial level for a live band setup.

"When we were a couple months from leaving on tour," Vanderslice recalls, "we brought a list of songs that we thought we could play and I was very discouraged. I was like, 'man, we're not going to be able to play many of these songs and we're going to have to go out and play like 3 or 4 songs from [Pixel Revolt's] some of [these songs], like "Exodus Damage" took us like 20 hours to arrange it for a live performance." However, when the band took the stage to an eager crowd at the Iron Horse, the songs sounded effortlessly transposed to the new set up. With a lineup that consisted of guitar, bass, drums, and a combination Wurlitzer keyboard and Moog synthesizer, the band was able to create full and faithful renditions of key songs from Vanderslice's catalogue.

Aside from having a new group of songs to incorporate into his set Vanderslice also, for the first time in his solo career, has a fixed band. Though Vanderslice says he has been too busy to start writing new songs with them, he has plans to incorporate the line up into his next album. "I'm going to try to do something different with this band and this album and just try to write songs with this band, and arrange stuff with them and figure out how to do it."

While Vanderslice writes mostly in the first person, he often takes the persona of others, splicing real life with fiction. For "Pixel Revolt," Vanderslice made a point to get more personal. "The thing is that [John] Darnielle [of The Mountain Goats] made 'The Sunset Tree' and it was the first record that John had made that was all autobiographical [He told me] 'you have stories that you need to write and sing about' ... he really encouraged me and showed me the way ... 'Pixel Revolt' is probably 50/50 [personal and not], maybe more." No matter what percentage fact or fiction, Vanderslice has a knack for making any situation hit home. For instance, "Trance Manual" — a song that he performed most[ly solo during the set, which follows a lonely reporter who finds comfort in a prostitute in the war-torn country he is stationed in — is able to take on a far greater meaning than the basic premise it is based on.

Vanderslice admits it was difficult to split up the calculated track list of the "Pixel Revolt" album. "Sometimes it seems silly to me to play certain songs live," he said, "because they are connected; not only in a narrative sense, but thematically and musically to other songs on the record ... It seems like they are out of context in a certain way." However, the mix of songs in the set list that covered a span of 5 years, and a lot of lyrical and musical ground, flowed well, with more straightforward performances standing next to more complex ones, ending with a handful of heavily stripped down "Pixel Revolt" songs.

As Vanderslice's stock continues to rise he is eager to get back to the studio to work on a new album. Luckily for fans that missed the Iron Horse performance, Vanderslice says he will be doing another round of touring in the fall, before hunkering down to get to work. After a heavy round of touring Vanderslice worries he will be too exhausted to be very productive. At first serious, then joking, he says, "I'm going to have turn off my phone and internet and seriously shut down, it's going to be bad ... I really think I'm going to have go somewhere and write. I don't know what that means, maybe I have to get a tent and go camping. I don't know, how do people do it?" When George Harrison is brought up Vanderslice asks, "After the Beatles didn't he go to the Maharishi and just drop out [of society]?" After pausing for a moment and smiling he quietly thinks out loud, "f, that's got to be great."

Bands like Tool and Wolfmother have cut out a metal niche

By Ben Weiser
The Orange County Register

Let me begin by admitting (again) that heavy metal is my weakness — which is to say my blind spot, not my guilty pleasure. Critical objectivity is an oxymoron if you ask me, but whatever shred of it I possess rapidly melts out of my ears when I encounter sonic sludge from the dark beyond.

I know what I love and like: Led Zeppelin, Black Sabbath, System of a Down, Queens of the Stone Age, most Metallica, the Mars Volta (if that counts), some Iron Maiden and Deftones, more and more of Tool. And I know what I don't like. Those Godsmack clowns, for instance, who have made the same album four times now.

Frankly, the only notable thing about "IV," the Boston group's latest, is that, like a more famous fourth effort, it sports its own "Battle of Evermore." That is, a slow, fantastical, mandolin-driven track featuring female counterpart.

And it has a rehash of "Voodoo." Fresh out of ideas, guys?

Most anything else metallic I enjoy, however, tends to blur the line between pure metal and mere hard-rock, so I'd feel foolish deeming, oh, Soundgarden metal. I'm not even sure you can safely call Zep metal these days, anymore than you could say Guns N' Roses or Smashing Pumpkins or Audioslave are or were metal, even though they really all are at their core, I suppose.

The only pattern I can detect from my limited taste is that, as with all other genres, I gravitate toward the unique. Some fresh twist forged from the same molten matter that turns instantly impenetrable in the hands of mediocrities.

What really sells it is when it's presented by a compelling persona. Like Rob Zombie, whose over-the-top mix of B-movie horrorshow, cartoonish menace, a guy in a giant robot costume and enough deviant sexiness and devilish riff-mongering to delight pole dancers was monstrous (that's a good thing) Wednesday night before a rumbling horde at the House of Blues in Anaheim, Calif.

Mind you, I don't really listen to Zombie's albums — no more than I ever spun White Zombie. I played his new one ("Educated Horses") once before this show, realized it was more of the same grooves that suck me in, tease with sinister urges, then drift from memory — and now I doubt I'll play it again. Unless I need something for my next Halloween mix disc. But then I'd just return to what jolted me at the Mouse House: "More Human Than Human," "Living Dead Girl," "Thunder Kiss '65."

Yet I have great respect for how Zombie has carved out a niche for himself, to the extent that he's not just kept his wild style thriving through regular regurgitation, he's also developing into a first-rate terror-flick director. He has become one-of-a-kind — something the hard-working Italians of opening-act buzz band Lacuna Coil can't claim just yet. The sextet has the skill, the look and the sound — like Evanescence with more intensity. But they need a breakthrough song — and a rote cover of Depeche Mode's "Enjoy the Silence" isn't it.

Wolfmother, on the other hand, the touted Aussie trio, has a debut teeming with fine entries into the classic-rock canon — least of which is "Woman," the catchy single radio has been routinely promoting.

The band's debut (in stores Tuesday) couldn't spell out my definition of good metal more clearly. The easy summation: Sabbath attempting to be as epic as Zeppelin with an urgent, quavering voice (and occasional punkish abandon) borrowed from

Dead Heart Bloom 8/10

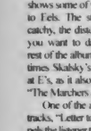
KEI Records

Dead Heart Bloom is the solo project of Boris Skalsky, bassist and keyboard player of the dreamy space-rock band Phaser. Even if the minimalist dreaminess of Phaser doesn't thrill you, Dead Heart Bloom might still be worth taking a look at.

Skalsky hasn't totally abandoned the spacey elements of Phaser, but he's taken them and applied them to a project with more pop leanings; at times Dead Heart Bloom even sounds just a bit like the beat driven rock of "Souljacker"-era Liels. Just as often, though, the album lets the listener drift along on soft strings arranged by Skalsky and played by the Sunrise Quartet, with occasional guitar and piano interjected into the mix. It seems tough, but Dead Heart Bloom have struck a nice balance between lively and sleepy on this record.

"Sodom," the album's second song, shows some of what draws comparisons to Liels. The string parts are fast and catchy, the distorted bass almost makes you want to dance — more than the rest of the album does, at least — and at times Skalsky's voice even subtly hints at El's, as it also does on the beat-driven "The Marchers are Coming."



One of the album's more interesting tracks, "Letter to the World," gently propels the listener through waves of dreamy guitar drenched in reverb, melodic piano and lush strings as Skalsky's voice mesmerizes the listener. It shows some of the elements held over from Phaser, but also sounds a lot like indie rockers For Stars at their sleepiest, and somehow the transition from mildly danceable to trance-inducing works for Dead Heart Bloom.

Dead Heart Bloom's cover of Johnny Cash's "Folsom Prison Blues" is one of the album's bigger surprises. Unlike so many remakes of classic songs, Skalsky manages to make his worth listening to. He begins with pure silence and from there goes into a slow and mournful rendition of the song, set to otherworldly atmospherics that highlight just how depressing the lyrics can really be. It doesn't let up, and he ends on a low, painful-sounding rasp that would make the Man in Black proud.

If you like your indie rock on the sleepy side, than "Dead Heart Bloom" is an album you should check out. Actually, even if you don't, you still might want to give them a chance, since the whole album is available as a free download from their Web site, deadheartbloom.com. Of course, if you like it you can also purchase a CD copy of it, but if you think this might interest you, there's no reason not to give it a listen.

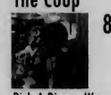
Volcano Records

After nearly five years the wait is finally over for Tool fans, and not a moment too soon. While radio rock of all forms has grown increasingly tired and stale, Tool has been hard at work crafting another carefully assembled record that is more than worth the wait. Never content to repeat the past, the alt-metal – or whatever label will be applied to them – quartet has pushed themselves even further on their fourth full-length, "10,000 Days."

The opening track, and first single, "Vicarious" is a strong song but by far the most play-by-numbers Tool track on the whole set. Sounding like a more aggressive version of the sound perfected on their last album, 2001's "Lateralus," vocalist Maynard James Keenan rallies against reality TV and the voyeuristic joy in watching hypervivolent entertainment. Behind him guitarist Adam Jones pounds out a hard riff while the astoundingly tight rhythm section of bassist Justin Chancellor and drummer Danny Carrey throw odd time signatures in with a subtlety that is severely lacking in Tool's baby brother bands in the math-rock genre.



What has always made the band stand out from their peers it is that Tool does not revel in, and repeat, their tricks; they incorporate them into great song-writing and continue to push themselves into new areas. Over the course of the album Tool continues to experiment. The two-track epic "Wings For Marie" and "10,000 Days (Wings Pt. 2)" runs a combined 17-plus minutes, and is one of the more heartfelt and personal lyrics that Keenan has ever written; an ode to his mother who recently succumbed to cancer. As usual Tool strays from the hard-rock pack by not falling prey to cliches or childishly earnest writing; there's no confusing the lyrics on "10,000 Days" that deal with angst and pain with the many nu-metal bands that questionably list Tool as an influence.

Keenan's lyrics are infamously open to interpretation, but the themes that "10,000 Days" touches on are more down-to-earth than the metaphysical themes of "Lateralus." "Right In Two" seethes about the sellishness of humanity. Elsewhere the 11-minute "Rosetta Stoned" seems to tell the other side of the psychedelic drug experience that so many Tool songs have advocated; where the protagonist begins by running through an almost indecipherable backlog of the day, ending with an alien encounter and, ultimately, finding that he just defecated in his bed.

While "10,000 Days" 11-track, 77-minute run time may sound imposing, Tool has never been a band to waste a second and this time around feels far more efficient than "Lateralus." Likewise, the music touches upon all past elements of Tool; The acid-rock of debut EP "Opiate," the heavy, almost-funky bass of "Undertow," the wigged-out alterna-rock of "Aenima" and the epic, far-reaching scope of "Lateralus," all the while taking a bold new step and creating a new footprint for Tool. Beyond that the music and the songwriting takes many chances, finding all the instrumentalists doing the best work of their careers.

As with any of their releases, some of the fickle fanbase is bound to turn away from "10,000 Days," but it is one of the most rewarding listening experiences to come around in a long time. Tool's peculiar, off-psychedelic style ensures they will no doubt emerge as one of the most intellectually-stimulating, musically-uncompromising, inventive and important bands in whatever box people try to stuff them into. For anyone interested in any sort of modern art rock, "10,000 Days" is a must-have.

The Coup 8/10

Pick A Bigger Weapon
Epitaph Records

On their first album since 2001's "Party Music," funk-infused political rappers The Coup may have toned down their image – the pre 9/11 cover for "Party Music's" album cover depicted rapper Boots and DJ Pam The Funktress blowing up the World Trade Center but they certainly haven't backed off from their edgy, cerebral leftist lyrics. The Coup's whole premise seems to be changing the world and having a good time; as evidenced by the bouncing "Laugh/Love/F" whose laid-back chorus smoothly rhymes, "I'm here to laugh, love, f, drink liquor and help the damn revolution come quicker." Throughout their careers The Coup mix Parliament and Prince influenced beats with raps that are clever, funny and thoughtful; as their last album implied, The Coup is the perfect soundtrack to a raging party conducted by the world's most fun-loving revolutionaries.

And unlike many of the money-grabbing stars that top the rap charts, The Coup has no interest in selling-out, even if they shine their hardline messages with accessible, smiling beats. In fact, the closest that "Pick A Bigger Weapon" comes to pure mainstream rap is on the slow jam, "I Just Wanna Lay Around All Day In Bed With You," where they mimic – or parody – the trademark Lil' Jon background scream. And unlike some other political rappers, The Coup have an ear for great beats; songs like "My Favorite Mutiny" show that Boots and Pam spend as much time and effort on the music as they do on the lyrics, and Boots isn't afraid to step off the mic for a few bars for an instrumental section. For people who find Public Enemy and Paris a little too left-field musically or perhaps want to subvert a Friday night playlist, almost any track on "Pick A Bigger Weapon" should be a perfect fit.

While The Coup have been in the game for a while, this album, their fifth, is perhaps their best. While the raps and the beats occasionally recall the loveable lunacy of Kool Keith or the futuristic alien funk that the best Outkast songs coast on, The Coup make each song a unique, and enjoyable, experience. "Head (Of State)" begins with a playground chant that begins with "Bush and Hussein together in bed" before employing the double entendre of the title, eventually concluding with, "billions made and millions dead." When the verse kicks in Boots rides a fairy-tale flow, explaining how the War in Iraq came to be in terms that, true to the song's form, a child could understand; all while using enough brains to keep intellectuals listening.

The Coup shines by mixing intelligent political lyrics and sexed up beats; songs like "Babylet'shaveabybeforeBushdosomethin'crazy" are self-explanatory in their nature but have a lot more to offer than just the gag of the title. "Pick A Better Weapon" is an album that can start a party or a revolution, and everyone benefits. The Coup wouldn't have it any other way.

Special shows Davis's star quality

By Hal Boedeker
The Orlando Sentinel

A new profile of Bette Davis echoes her famous line in "Now, Voyager:" "Don't let's ask for the moon. We have the stars."

"Stardust: The Bette Davis Story," premiering Wednesday on Turner Classic Movies, gives you the movie star in blazing bursts. The real woman, however, is as elusive as the man in the moon. She was a teller of tall tales that cloak her life, a smart but combustible character who exhausted those around her before her death at age 81 in 1989.

Her life unfolds as a mix of good Bette and bad Bette, a throwback to the twins she played in "A Stolen Life." In trying to explain Davis, writer-director Peter Jones runs into an insurmountable problem. Like many great stars, she is an enigma, a quality that reinforces her enduring appeal.

The documentarian struggles to sort out the Davis saga and finds telling clues in her tumultuous childhood. Her father walked out on the family, which fostered her distrust of men. Her mother lived for Davis but used the actress as a meal ticket.

Jones reveals that, in contradiction to her oft-repeated statements, Davis had a warm relationship with her father and resented her mother.

The documentary discusses Davis's alcoholism, her bullying style and her four disastrous marriages. In the most sensational bit, "Stardust" suggests that her physical abuse of her second husband could have contributed to his death from head injuries.

Davis, a two-time Oscar winner, could be a mercurial colleague. After "The Little Foxes," director William Wyler kept his vow never to work with Davis again, although they had clicked on "Jezebel" and "The Letter." "All About Eve" co-star Celeste Holm dubs Davis "the rudest woman I ever met."

Yet Jones achieves balance in profiling this formidable figure. "Stardust" makes it clear that daughter B.D. Hyman wrote her scathing Davis tell-all for money and against the wishes of Michael Merrill, Davis's son.

Davis was tireless as the head of the Hollywood Canteen that catered to servicemen during World War II. She gleefully mocked her image by teaching TV host Jack Paar how to mimic her cigarette-waving mannerisms.

Despite a series of devastating strokes late in life, Davis valiantly continued to make appearances. "I think she gave people courage," co-star Gena Rowlands says.

If Jones doesn't fit the pieces of the Davis personality together, he still excels in celebrating her career. He reminds viewers that she could be a subtle performer and far more versatile than mere campy icon or horror star. TCM will show her films on Wednesdays and Thursdays during May.

Ellen Burstyn applauds Davis's skill at playing blind in "Dark Victory." Jane Fonda lauds Davis's acting with her eyes in "Jezebel." James Woods marvels at Davis's "total absence of narcissism" in her performances and her willingness to "show the nakedness of human need."

"Stardust" highlights famous Davis films, such as "What Ever Happened to Baby Jane?" and "All About Eve," but also such lesser-known gems as "Old Acquaintance," "The Catered Affair" and "Strangers," a TV movie for which she won an Emmy.

"I always felt her vulnerability," says Rowlands, who played her daughter in "Strangers." "You could always see it, though she'd have killed you if you said so."

Jones artfully ties together the Davis biography by using "Stardust," her favorite song, and a vignette about 7-year-old Bette looking at the nighttime sky. The star theme also recalls the ending of "Now, Voyager" and reminds viewers that she left a constellation of superb performances.

'Wii' the new name?

By Ryan Chartrand
Mustang Daily (Cal Poly)

SAN LUIS OBISPO, Calif. — "Xbox 360," an epic name of mystery and grand proportions.

"PlayStation 3," a name of nostalgia, imagination and infinite possibilities.

"Wii."...

Um, I don't know. What the hell does "Wii" even mean? How do you even pronounce it? "WEE. Let's go on the swing!" or "Why is this such a terrible name?" The Japanese have been crazy when it comes to the video game industry for years, but when you change a next-gen console name from "Revolution" to "Wii," you might as well rename it one more time to "We are Insane."

Let's listen in on how Nintendo can possibly justify their fall from sanity.

"While the code-name 'Revolution' expressed our direction, Wii represents the answer. Wii will break down that wall that separates game players from everybody else. Wii will put people more in touch with their games ... and each other," according to the Wii Web site.

First, Wii does not represent the answer; if anything, it represents the letter E on an A-D multiple-choice test. Second, "Wii" is not going to put me more in touch with my games. A revolutionary controller will, but apparently it's not revolutionary anymore.

"Nintendo needs you. Because, it's really not about you or me. It's about Wii. And together, Wii will change everything."

Alright, now might be a good time for someone to start investigating into a possible cult. Let's not forget this is coming from the same people that think Italian plumbers can save princesses from evil turtles.

Sure, you can argue that names like Gizmondo, Dreamcast and Sega Saturn are far better than Xbox 360 and they failed horribly. But let's not forget that history doesn't repeat itself, it only rhymes. And what rhymes with Wii? Sigh. Then again, outlast rhymes with Dreamcast ...

I really thought Nintendo had it this time. I really thought that for once they might be able to at least dominate the second seat in the next-gen console war. But with a name like Wii, I'd be surprised if anyone takes them seriously anymore.

Nintendo was going to start a revolution. Neither Microsoft nor Sony had any plans of completely ditching standardized controllers. Gamers around the world have only seen the previously-named "Revolution" as this godly console that only the imagination can define. As more and more specifics come out, the facts are looking more dismal and a name change like "Wii" is only killing the "Paul Revere Factor" that their revolution once had.

Nintendo still lacks an out-of-the-box DVD player functionality. Who wants to buy a $400 system if they're not getting their bonus DVD player with it? While Nintendo worries about an external DVD player for its Wii, Microsoft and Sony are fighting over who will be able to play HD-DVD's first.

Nintendo, you have one E3 to clean up your act or else the casual gamers will spend the next five years not even knowing how to pronounce "Wii."

The good and bad of metal

Jack White.

Plus, fabulously dumb lyrics. "She's a woman/You know what I mean/You better listen/Listen to me."

Genius.

But none of that conveys just how much fun the Wolfmother record is. Despite all obvious comparisons, right now it sounds refreshingly unlike anything else out there.

But the only heavy thing I've heard lately — apart from the remarkable new Pearl Jam album, which says and means so much I need more time to digest it properly — is Tool's "10,000 Days," in stores Tuesday along with PJ's latest.

Granted, I'd need a season to make heads or tails of the concept I think vocalist Maynard James Keenan is putting across. Something about facing personal madness in the face of a world run amok, as I hear it, culminating in a fascinating, potent piece, "Rosetta Stoned," in which the antihero of this convoluted tale ends up ranting like an insane-asylum inmate en route to a lobotomy.

I can't stop deciphering it. Which surprises me. In the past, Tool's albums have left me stone cold, their steely surfaces like a prism that won't let any light pass through. In the five years since the quartet last surfaced, not only has Maynard's manner reached a melodic plateau (thanks to his work with side project A Perfect Circle), his concepts have gained focus. And the band's almost unparalleled knack for polyrhythmic what-not has become impossibly complex, spewing chopped-up meter only Zappa could follow.

Better still, Tool has vastly improved its sense of drama and atmosphere, with many nods to Pink Floyd's "Meddle"-era spaciness; the whole gargantuan effort even ends with several minutes of nothing but surging white noise.

Your guess is as good as mine what that signifies. But I know this much: I've hung Tool in the shed of discarded oddities for too long. I recognized its potency all along, but I never had much need for its relentless, chugging assault before. Now I can't get Maynard's voice out of my head.

to her. I really made sure that she thought it through because it worried me – don't make this decision because of me, and don't make it because I went here. That doesn't matter to me. I really wanted to make sure she was happy in her decision."

Holly has battled through an injury-plagued freshman season in 2006. She started in the first six games of the season, all while playing with an inflamed rib cage. And while Holly and Tracy will tell you that they are two totally different people, Bolduc sees one important similarity: they are both warriors.

"She's like her sister," Bolduc says. "When Tracy was a senior, she had this cough that was unbearable to even listen to. It was so bad at one of the practices, I just told her to go home, and I never tell people to do that. Tracy is a fighter, and so is Holly. They are very similar. Holly fought through her rib cage injury, so you can kind of draw a parallel there in that they're not going to give up, and they just want to play, they want to compete and they want to win. They'll do whatever it takes."

Regardless of injuries, Holly had a solid freshman year. She finished the regular season with eight points on eight goals, as well as tallying 30 ground balls, 20 draw controls, and causing 16 turnovers.

Her most notable game of the season came against Vermont on March 29 at Garber Field. It was Holly's first game back after missing the previous two contests with the rib cage injury. Needless to say, Holly returned with a vengeance, scoring her first career hat trick, and leading the way in UMass' 16-9 win.

The victory over Vermont snapped a three-game losing skid for the Minutewomen, and even though Drown was not fully healed, her will to play was a testament as to how tough she really is.

"I was really sick for a while, and after I was sick, my rib cage hurt pretty badly," Holly says. "I didn't really know why, so I kept going to the doctor's and got an x-ray. It was very frustrating to play with because every time I would breathe in, it would hurt. But there was nothing they could do for it, so I just sucked it up.

"It hurts at times [during games]," she continued. "I'll get hit, and it hurts. But I'm fine. It's something I've learned to deal with it. I never would stop playing for something like that. It's nothing serious to me. I've dealt with worse things."

And the most courageous part:

"It was very surprising to everyone when I decided to come here because I really was against doing that," Holly says. "I just decided that I really liked the school at one point. I decided that I could deal with following in Tracy's footsteps. I woke up one day and said, 'I think I'm going to look at UMass.'"

Holly didn't even tell anyone that she was hurting.

"I didn't know for like two-and-a-half to three weeks that she was injured," Tracy says. "I knew something was bothering her, though, because she would be coming off the field and grabbing her chest."

Having her older sister around when she was sick and injured was one of the benefits of having Tracy as a coach, especially when they were on the road.

"It's just nice to have a comfortable face to see everyday," Tracy says. "When she was sick, and we were at Hofstra, I think it was probably the best thing in the world that I was there for her. And I would do that for any of my players, but just knowing that I'm her sister, it's comforting. It's just like having a parent there."

While Tracy knew her sister's injury was holding her back, she could not give any extra attention to Holly on the field. And sometimes, that was the hardest part about having to coach her younger sibling.

"It's a challenge," Tracy says. "As a coach, it's difficult because you never want to show favoritism to any player. Unfortunately, I think Holly gets the backlash of it because I almost avoid correcting her or specifically yelling at her. I don't try to pick her out, and I think sometimes that hurts her because I do know her so well, and I know her facial expressions, and I know her body language.

"It's been touchy, but from the beginning until now, it has changed a lot," Tracy continued. "Because now, everybody knows there's no favoritism. The whole team knows I do not favor Holly just because she is my sister. So now it's much easier. I'm able to say, 'Good job,' or scream and yell at her because I don't think it matters anymore."

There's no question that the Drown sisters have grown closer during this unique experience. And with a full season now under her belt, the entire UMass coaching staff has high expectations for Holly.

"She's been as consistent as a freshman could be," Bolduc says. "As a freshman, she does everything right, if not more. She had a tough beginning of the season due to some injuries, but she's finally recovering from that, and is getting stronger and building up her strength on the field. I think we're going to see some good things from her in the future."

As for life after college, Holly remains adamant on being her own person. And while Tracy hopes to be calling the shots one day, she also sees a little bit of coaching in her sister's crystal ball.

"As for me, I don't know where the wind is going to take me," Tracy says. "I would definitely love to be a head coach. I need to learn a lot more. I need to get more experience. I need to learn more about the psyche of the girls because dealing with girls on a day-to-day basis is very difficult. It's all about their psychology, the way to motivate them, the problems that they face everyday. In that respect, I need to gain more experience, but I definitely aspire to be a head coach one day."

"I think Holly is definitely going to go in a different direction after college," Tracy says. "Holly is an extremely talented writer. She is more of a creative-type person. She likes being with herself, her books, and her work. But in the same respect, she has been able to coach. She does camps at home. The kids absolutely adore her. I think she's got a lot more coaching to her than she thinks she does."

"I was talking to a couple teams while the draft was going on," Cobbs said. "I had four teams lined up. They said they probably weren't going to draft me, but I still had hope that they would.

"I thought I was going to be a [Washington] Redskin," he added. "They were talking about making a deal but wanted to do it [on Monday]. But Minnesota was interested in me, and they wanted me right away. They had the deal before the Redskins so I went with Minnesota."

Cobbs' most valuable asset is his versatility. He began at UMass as a running back, shifted to cornerback through the middle portion of his career and was a duel threat out of the backfield and as a wide receiver during his senior season. And when healthy, Cobbs has been an explosive weapon on special teams.

He is moving away from the offensive side of the ball to further develop as a defensive back in the NFL, which will give him more of a shot to land a roster spot with the Vikings, who have been weaker on defense for the better part of the last decade. And with defensive-minded Brad Childress taking over the head coaching position, Cobbs' focus on defense will only help his chances to make the team.

"I'm not going to be playing both sides," Cobbs said. "I'm going to be playing defensive back and try to get in on special teams as a kick returner. I also want to get in on kickoffs so I can run down there and make some tackles. That is my best fit right now. I'm just trying to focus on one position as a defensive back."

James has been a force in the defensive backfield for the Minutemen for the last four years, recording a program-record 20 career interceptions, a mark that led all active Division I athletes through the end of 2005.

While he has shown the obvious ability to be a playmaker as a safety, James' best shot to see time on the defensive side of the ball in Baltimore will be as a nickel back. With his speed and tackling ability, he like Cobbs should have a solid chance to make the team by being productive on the special teams unit.

"I don't know what it will take [to make the team], but all I can say is that I'm going to go out there and give it all that I've got, work hard and do everything that is asked of me and try to contribute as much as I can," James said.

"If they stay healthy, they'll both have an opportunity to make their respective teams," Brown said. "I really feel that strongly about both of those guys athletically. If they can stay healthy, both guys will have a chance to make their respective teams. Both are quick.

"Shannon is a safety with coverage skills so he can play nickel," Brown continued. "His versatility is without question. Both will be special-teams guys as well, and that is the beauty of it. Both guys are great special-teams players so their versatility will be their biggest strength."

Plus, James will have the chance to learn from one of the most exciting young players in the NFL over the last few years, safety Ed Reed.

"That would be fun," James said. "He is one of the best in the game if not the best. That is a big advantage, being able to learn from him and having him teach me some things."

But for right now, Cobbs and James are just taking it all in and starting to re-shift their focus on doing what it takes to make their respective squads.

"It's a good feeling because I've wanted to be in the NFL since I was a young kid," Cobbs said. "I can't even explain it. It's breathtaking. I've been working and working just like everybody else trying to be that person who makes it into the league, and I'm the guy who got to that level. Now I have to stay on the same level by executing and doing what I have to do."

"When you're a [Division] I-AA player, sometimes you have to fight that uphill battle to get your opportunity," Brown said. "But now they're in camp and have the opportunity to live out the dream."

Maroon and White faced best in the country

By Joey Witte
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's crew team was well tested Saturday when it faced the best in the country.

The Minutewomen went up against No. 1 Princeton, No. 20 Tennessee and Atlantic 10 foe George Washington in Princeton, N.J. They finished third ahead of the Colonials in the varsity-eight race.

"It was certainly a moral victory – they wanted to even the score up [against George Washington] a little bit," UMass coach Jim Dietz said. "Going into the race they knew they were a better crew than GW and wanted to prove that they were."

The Maroon and White will return to action May 6-7 and will be going for their fourth consecutive Eastern College Athletic Conference championship.

The Tigers proved they were the best in the nation as they won by 22 seconds over Tennessee (7:06.7), followed by UMass (7:11.4) and the Colonials (7:13.3).

The win for Princeton marked its 36th consecutive streak and capped its first-ever 14-win season. The only event that the Tigers didn't cross the line first in was the second varsity-eight race, where they finished just two seconds behind the Volunteers.

"I consider them very good results. I was pretty pleased with the entire day across the board," Dietz said. "We were more excited for this race than the A-10s a week ago."

The Maroon and White made a few changes to its varsity-eight squad from the team that raced in Camden, N.J. on April 22 at the A-10 Championships.

Sophomore Amanda Mawn saw her first action in the varsity-eight boat by replacing Rachael Sealer.

"I thought she did well, she was pleased with it," said Dietz of Mawn, who rowed in the third seat.

The different look for UMass also saw junior Ellen Maskrey back in the stroke seat where she sat last year. With the switches, Hannah Brewster moved up to the second seat.

The remainder of the varsity-eight boat was unchanged with sophomore coxswain Dana Pulda, and rowers Gabrielle Papineau, Stephanie Hopf, Sarah Marsan, Katie Berger and Catherine Gariepy.

The Minutewomen trailed Tennessee by one link, but caught up to the Volunteers with about 300 meters left to go.

"UMass held their own against the Tennessee boats," Dietz said.

The Maroon and White also finished third in the second varsity-eight race, 20.4 seconds behind Princeton. They finished second in both the novice-eight (29.2 seconds behind Princeton) and novice-four (38 seconds behind Princeton) races, while placing fourth in the varsity-four event, 19.7 seconds behind the Tigers' "B" squad.

"I think [Saturday's races] were very uplifting for the team," Dietz said. "All these boats rowed really well [Saturday]. I think it's important not just for next weekend, but also in a year."

tell. Two of those seats include Seat 3 and Seat 4. They are the ones with which my family holds partnership.

One of my favorite stories from sitting in those seats is from a game played back in 2001. It was pitcher Bryce Florie's first game back after a devastating injury suffered just the year before.

On Sept. 8, in a game where he was pitching against the New York Yankees, Florie was drilled in the face by a line drive off the bat of outfielder Ryan Thompson. (A pitch thrown 96 mph is estimated to be hit back at around 120 mph.) The impact fractured his cheekbone, as well as his orbital socket and damaged his retina. It took him out of baseball for about a year.

Then, on the night I was there, I saw one of the most emotional spectacles in my life. About two-thirds of the way through the game, manager Jimy Williams came out to the mound to initiate a pitching change. However, this was no ordinary pitching change. As Williams signaled for his righty, the Fenway Faithful simultaneously rose to their feet. As soon as the intercom started blasting rock music, the stadium announcer declared, "Ladies and Gentlemen, coming into the game...Bryce Florie."

With that the pitcher trotted in from the bullpen and Fenway exploded into pandemonium. I got this feeling inside of me that is hard to describe. But, I know that I felt everything Florie did at that moment. I was as excited, nervous and misty-eyed as I'm sure he was. The fans gave him an ovation unlike any I had ever heard before. His brave comeback from such a devastating injury made the facility come together, as one.

This moment is a perfect example of why Fenway Park means so much to so many fans, including myself. Red Sox Nation is not merely a club, but more like a family. When Florie made his dramatic comeback on that cool night in 2001, Sox fans young and old rose to their feet to welcome back one of their brothers, whom they had never forgotten about.

However, my story is just one of millions that could be told by millions of people. Other stories would be of a stadium full of people holding their collective breath as Carlton Fisk frantically waved his arms, begging his home run to stay fair in 1975. Carl Yastrzemski hitting his 400th home run into the right field bullpen — or about Ted Williams embracing a Fenway crowd one last time at the 1999 All-Star Game.

And though the Sox ended the 86-year old Curse of the Bambino in 2004, I can still hear and feel the despair of deceased fans who passed away waiting for the championship that came just a little too late. As corny as it may sound, there is a sort of brotherhood among the members, past and present, of Red Sox Nation. I sympathize with the generations of diehard fans and Royal Rooters whose time simply ran out before their beloved BoSox could bring home the crown.

But, I can't help feeling that when the Sox held the victory parade after winning the World Series, that the ghosts of Red Sox past, including my Italian immigrant great-grandfather, Crescenzo DiMichele, were right there by my side. Together we celebrated with the Sox and thanked them for finally bringing one home to Boston.

UM track wraps up meets before A-10s

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts track and field teams journeyed to Durham, N.H. for the University of New Hampshire Invitational on Saturday. It was the last meet before a string of weekend championships set to begin next Saturday with the Atlantic 10 Championships.

Track coaches will routinely use meets like this to tune up their athletes for the season's homestretch.

That did not, however, prevent the Maroon and White from bringing home some solid performances.

"It was a nice meet for us at this time [in the season]. We had a chance to have the kids polish up on some events that they'll probably need some work on before the conference [Championships]," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "It was short and sweet, so it appears as though we came out without too many bumps and bruises. I thought it was a real nice weekend for us."

All season long O'Brien has praised freshman Steve Gerome for his athleticism and versatility in the sport.

At the UNH Invitational, however, he had Gerome compete in the events he will be competing in at the A-10s: the long, the 4x100- and 4x400-meter relays.

He placed sixth in the long jump with a leap of 21 feet, 6.75 inches, while helping the Minutemen finish second in both relay races.

Gerome also performed in the 110-meter hurdles, coming in second with a time of 16.93.

Both sophomore Nathan Barksdale and junior Manny Harris-Lopes took part in the 400-meter dash, as well as both relays.

Barksdale finished third in the 400-meters with a time of 50.13, while Harris-Lopes placed seventh in 51.13.

O'Brien entered them only in the meets that they will be competing in next weekend.

There was nothing too strategic about junior Erik Hoagland's performances, however. O'Brien merely had him compete in the same events, the long and triple jump, which he has been dominating all year.

He won both events, beating runner-up sophomore James Myles of UNH by just over seven inches with a jump of 22 feet, 9.75 inches. He came from behind in the triple jump with a distance of 47 feet, 11 inches to win the triple jump. The mark also qualified him for the IC4A Championships.

"Erik kind of did what Erik does," O'Brien commented. "We've grown accustomed to what he's been doing and it's good to see him continuing that."

O'Brien also complimented the performances in the 800-meters that were turned in by sophomores Kevin Murphy and James Bentley and freshman David Lopes.

The trio finished third, fifth and seventh with times of 1:57.19, 1:58.03 and 1:59.53, respectively.

The Minutewomen took advantage of the nice weather conditions and came home with numerous performances within point-scoring range.

One of those performances was handed in by junior Katelyn O'Toole, who claimed second place in the high jump with a leap of 5 feet, 1.75 inches.

"Katelyn had a nice day for jumping," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "[It] was one of the better days of jumping so far this year."

Freshman thrower Jordan Veney concentrated on the hammer throw in order to prepare her for A-10s.

She has broken the UMass shotput record five times this year, including most recently at the Brown Invitational on April 16, with a chuck of 44 feet, 10.25 inches. She has also been improving in the discus with a season-best of 136 feet, one inch.

Despite such heralded success, she is still learning the hammer throw. But that did not prevent her from setting a personal record of 138 feet, four inches.

"[It] was a nice improvement. And hopefully coming into A-10s she'll be in the 140 [foot range]," LaFreniere said. "She keeps improving every single week."

Sophomore Christina DeRosa is a cross-country star, as well as a long-distance specialist for the track team. She was entered in the 800- and 1,500-meter races on Saturday in which she placed tenth (2:29.78) and third (4:47.10), respectively. Her time of 4:47.10 in the 1500-meter was a personal record.

However, DeRosa's goal wasn't to focus on winning, but rather on conditioning.

"[It] was a speed workout for her," LaFreniere said.

She later added that DeRosa's ability to hold a strong pace for a very long time has led her to consider entering DeRosa in the 10K race at A-10s.

Despite having a nagging foot injury, sophomore Kristen Bakanowski won the pole-vault event once again.

Her vault, which cleared 11 feet, 11.75 inches, ties her seasonal best.

LaFreniere has plenty of confidence in her vaulters as they prepare for next Saturday. But she's a little concerned about the repercussions of Bakanowski's ailing foot.

"[Her injured foot] is feeling better," LaFreniere mentioned. "But, the problem now is that she's had to take so much time off from any of her sprinting that it's going to start effecting her at some point. But, she's in pretty good shape going into the A-10 Conference [Championships]."

UMass graduate student Marissa Kay Callahan also had some stellar performances. Her mark in the triple jump of 38 feet, 5 inches won her first place and also beat her previous all-time best performance by almost half a foot. It also qualified her for the ECAC Championships.

Callahan, who hopes to one day become a neurosurgeon, set another milestone — a season-best mark of 16.19 in the 100-meter hurdles.

LaFreniere added that all of her athletes have great attitudes and that they are looking forward to the great competition awaiting them at A-10s.

Minutewomen face Black Bears today, can clinch A-10 championship with win

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team must do one single thing in the upcoming week to become the 2006 regular season Atlantic 10 champions — win.

With a No. 1 slot in the conference standings and a doubleheader sweep of A-10 rival Rhode Island yesterday afternoon, the fate of the Minutewomen's regular season lies in their hands.

UMass (32-13, 16-2 A-10) can help its cause when it faces non-conference Maine in another doubleheader today at the UMass Softball Complex, with the first game kicking off at 3 p.m. and the second at 5 p.m.

Sophomore Stacy Cullington helped the Minutewomen's cause today, and didn't waste any time doing so. After Rhody designated player Alyssa Martino singled to right field in the first inning of Game 1, UMass responded.

Candice Molinari doubled to left field, setting up freshman Whitney Mollica, who put the Minutewomen on the board with a single. After KJ Kelley scored Mollica, Cullington stepped up to the plate and smashed a homer to left field, putting UMass up 5-1 early on. The home run was Cullington's fourth of the season, as she has registered 22 RBIs.

Two more RBIs was all Rhode Island could muster up in the first half of the doubleheader, as pitcher Brandice Balshmiter was able to hold the Rams scoreless through the final five innings of play. Another RBI by Mollica in the fourth inning, and powerful hitting by Lauren Proctor and Kelley put the game out of reach as UMass went on to win 8-3.

Mollica's six RBIs on the afternoon tied the single-season A-10 record, as the freshman has compiled a whopping 56 in 2006.

Four of those 56 RBIs came in Game 2, as the Minutewomen capped off the sweep with a decisive 11-3 trump of the Rams. The first two innings were scoreless as UMass pitcher Jenna Busa and URI pitcher Jill Anderson ducked it out. Although an errant throw gave the Rams the first score of the game, the Minutewomen broke Anderson, rattling off six runs in the third.

A single by Mollica put up the first two runs for UMass and hits by Proctor and junior Amanda Acampora made things difficult for URI. Senior Lesley Ferrara put things away for good with her second homer of the season in the fifth inning.

Stacy Cullington and the Minutewomen look to capture the regular season Atlantic 10 Championship tomorrow against Maine.

The win was the ninth for Busa, who has come through big as of late for UMass. The pitcher from Lexington currently has an ERA of 4.80 with 55 strikeouts. Her counterpart, Balshmiter, has been heating it up all season, compiling 234 strikeouts and a 0.71 ERA.

Today's contests are just the beginning of a chaotic week for the Minutewomen, as they will travel to Chestnut Hill tomorrow to take on Boston College, hop on a plane for a clash against St. Bonaventure in New Orleans, LA, on Friday, and then will return to the Pioneer Valley on Sunday for senior day against Connecticut.

The game against the Huskies is the final one of the season, before the start of the A-10 championships on May 11.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Holly Drown (left) came to UMass to play for the women's lacrosse team this spring. UMass wasn't on Holly's radar at first because of her reluctance to follow in her older sister's footsteps. Holly Drown hopes to create her own legacy at UMass, with a little help from her big sister

You may see a familiar number around Garber Field these days. Chances are if you have been to a Massachusetts women's lacrosse game this year, you have noticed a player – wearing the number 22 – scooping up ground balls and causing turnovers in the midfield. But it's not the number 22 that UMass is used to.

For three seasons, Tracy Drown led the Minutewomen offensive attack while donning 22 on her back, before graduating in 2004. Nowadays, a member of the Drown family is still wearing that number down at Garber Field. Only it's not Tracy. It's her little sister, Holly.

The number 22 runs in their family. At least, that is the reason why freshman Holly Drown decided to wear it on the back of her jersey. She certainly did not want to be the one to break the tradition.

"I didn't really have a choice on that matter," Holly says. "I wore 22 in high school, too. [Tracy] was always 22 in college and in soccer. And I like the number 2. It was just convenient that way."

"It's sort of our thing," Tracy says. "After me leaving, there was a year apart, and none of the freshman had taken 22, even before she committed. So, it was meant to be. She loves the number 22, my dad loves the number 22, and I like the number 22. I was that number in high school, I don't know, it's just one of those things."

Tracy Drown is now in her second season as the assistant coach of the UMass women's lacrosse team. Her little sister, Holly, just finished her first regular season of collegiate lacrosse with the Minutewomen.

While it looks to be a story of sisterly love, Holly never wanted to follow in her older sister's footsteps. In fact, she wanted to avoid being in Tracy's shadow so much, that UMass was never even an option.

"Holly didn't even want to come to UMass at first," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc says. "She didn't want to follow in Tracy's footsteps. I actually didn't even actively recruit her until the end of the summer. And at that point, it really sparked some interest. So she ended up looking, and we got her here."

Holly was looking at Boston University, Syracuse and New Hampshire, and was lined up to do official visits to those schools over the summer.

As things played out, Bolduc randomly wrote Holly an e-mail. She wrote the e-mail as a friend, and offered to help Holly throughout the selection process. But at the end of the e-mail Bolduc asked her if she had ever thought of looking at UMass, and from there on in, it was a perfect match.

"It was very surprising to everyone when I decided to come here because I really was against doing that," Holly says. "I just decided that I really liked the school at one point. I decided that I could deal with following in Tracy's footsteps. I woke up one day and said, 'I think I'm going to look at UMass.'"

"Being familiar with the program was one of the reasons why I came to UMass," Holly says. "But not necessarily because she was the assistant coach. There were no guarantees that she was going to be here, there never is. I just liked the school."

Holly chose the Maroon and White mainly because of her familiarity with the school and the program, but it had nothing to do with her older sister. Tracy knew that Holly's decision should not be based on those holding the whistles, so she did not convince her to come to UMass.

"What I was taught when I was looking at colleges was you can't judge on your coaches," Tracy says. "It has to be on the girls, the program that you have and your school. So I made that clear

James and Cobbs signed in aftermath of Sunday's NFL Draft

The NFL Draft came and went without much stirring in Amherst over the weekend, but since its conclusion, there have been a flurry of moves involving three former players on the Massachusetts football team.

On Sunday night, safety Shannon James signed a contract with the Baltimore Ravens, and defensive back R.J. Cobbs signed on with the Minnesota Vikings. And late yesterday afternoon, defensive end Keron Williams was invited to camp by the Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

"It just shows that we're getting some respect at this level, but more importantly, it's just a culmination of their careers here and what they have accomplished by getting that opportunity at the next level," UMass coach Don Brown said.

James was considered a high-level prospect last fall with some scouts holding his stock as high as a possible second- or third-round selection, but he slipped through the draft over the weekend before signing with Baltimore.

"The last couple days have been stressful," James said. "I was wondering where I would be and what was going to happen. It was nerve-wracking, and I'm excited this whole process is over. Now I just get to go play football."

Cobbs' weekend was a little more sporadic. He was talking with the Chicago Bears and Indianapolis Colts before zeroing in on two more defined choices.

Fenway Park is sacred ground to many fans in Red Sox Nation

Domenic Poli

Throughout the world there are structures that have a striking essence to them. And inhabitants of every place think that their structure is the most captivating of all. For India, it's the Taj Mahal, for the Britons it is Big Ben or Buckingham Palace. But if you have dirty water in your veins, it is none other than Fenway Park.

Being born and raised in Quincy, a town less than 10 minutes outside of Boston, I was brought up believing that the Fens is sacred terrain, much like a church. And in a sense, it is. It's a place where folks come to spend time with one other, pray intensely, and their requested miracles sometimes go unanswered, or at least for a while anyway.

Well, this sacred terrain was one of the most significant structures throughout my childhood.

My grandfather bought into a season tickets deal back in 1970. For years he would take my dad or my uncle to a handful of games every season. Then, when I was born, he handed the tickets down to my father and he has taken me or my brother to Section 30, Box 77, Row A for as long as I can remember.

The feeling that I get when I'm there is unlike any other. The stadium has such a celebrated history, and when I'm sitting there, right smack-dab in the middle of Red Sox Nation, I realize that I have become part of that history.

I can almost see the ghosts of games played — Babe Ruth bringing the crowd to its feet, Ted Williams not tipping his cap or Dave Roberts sliding under Derek Jeter's tag in Game 4. It's an eerie, almost surreal feeling.

Erected in 1912, Fenway Park is the oldest in the major leagues. But what is even more fascinating to me is the significance of the structures within the structure. Fenway has almost as many separate pieces of storied real estate as Washington D.C. Every historical dimension and feature provides interesting obstacles challenging to players, but entertains for fans.

Even though almost of all you are quite familiar with it, I will give you a brief verbal tour of this slice of heaven known as Fenway.

First of all, the Green Monster is the most synonymous feature connected to baseball lore in the entire country. To players, the 37-foot spectacle stands out in left field as a haunting reminder that home runs do not come easily in the major leagues. At a reasonably-short distance of 315 feet, it is riddled with dents of homers, destined to be reduced to wall-ball singles.

Despite the particularly short porch in left, Fenway owns one of the longest centerfields in the league. At 420 feet from home plate, it is said that the stadium's centerfield is where triples go to die.

Not wanting to be left out of Fenway's list of oddball dimensions, right field also has its share of secrets and adventures. Besides a low concrete slab, which gives the baseball a pinball machine-like effect, right fielders must deal with blinding glare of the setting sun, which can disable their ability to locate a fly ball. At around 380 feet, Fenway's right field is one of the most feared amongst outfielders, who must learn to adapt to its tricky nature.

But, keep in mind that the field isn't the only feature that could share an anecdote. The press box would boast about how it held the presence of broadcasting legends Curt Gowdy, Ken Coleman and, now, Jerry Remy and Don Orsillo. The visitors' dugout would talk about the games when it hosted legends like Mickey Mantle, Frank Robinson and Whitey Ford.

This delightful little ballpark hosts over 36,200 seats, and every one of them has a story to

UMass prepares for Siena after rough weekend at home

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team is in recovery mode right now.

Temple, the team with the worst record in the Atlantic 10 conference, dealt the Minutemen (10-22, 8-10 A-10) two losses in this weekend's three-game series, including a 15-2 blowout on Sunday that UMass would like to forget.

Siena is next. The Minutemen face the Saints this afternoon at Earl Lorden field for a 3 p.m. start.

UMass had the day off yesterday due to NCAA regulations (a team can't practice or play more than six days in a row, and the Minutemen have five games in the next six days) and used the time to lift weights and visit intermittently with UMass coach Mike Stone.

"We see some people as they come and go throughout the day because they're lifting on their own today," Stone said. "You try to say to say a few things here and there to get everybody to move on, to make some adjustments.

"Every situation is different," he continued. "We just have to play better and make a better effort. I think everybody realizes that we didn't have the best effort [Sunday], which was unfortunate."

UMass hurler Chris Lloyd gave up three runs in five innings yesterday before the Owls ousted Lloyd and drove a stake deep into the Minuteman bullpen. Among the assembly line of pitchers Stone threw yesterday was lefty Tom Cote, who will be starting this afternoon.

"I thought he threw the ball well [on Sunday]," Stone said. "I thought he made some quality pitches. That's the reason why he's starting [this afternoon]. Of the relievers that we brought in [Sunday], I thought he looked as sharp as anybody. We're hoping that he's going to be a good pitcher for us in the future."

On Sunday, the Minutemen cut a 3-1 deficit to 3-2 in the bottom of the fifth inning – after a single up the middle scored Adam Tempesta – but the Owls scored the next 11 runs until, mercifully, UMass succumbed to the Run Rule (if a team is losing by more than 10 runs by the seventh inning or later then it is an automatic loss) in the eighth.

Without practice yesterday and only brief talks with some team members scattered throughout the day, ambiguity is Stone's primary feeling, but he remains positive about the rest of the week.

"I think people are moving on," he said. "Every kid has a different personality. Sometimes there are different issues to deal with. That makes a year like this so challenging.

"You obviously do a lot more coaching in a year that you are struggling as opposed to a year that you are cruising," Stone added. "When you have a good team you don't want to screw anything up. You just pat them on the back. Every day right now is a challenge."

UMass is in the midst of a home stretch that will take it to the end of May. The Minutemen returned triumphantly to the Northeast after sweeping new conference-addition Saint Louis in a weekend series.

But after a slim 7-6 against Northeastern in the consolation game of the annual Beanpot Tournament held at Fenway Park, and an 11-10 loss to Boston College last week on a game-winning homer in the bottom of the 12th, it is no surprise that – after turning in excellent efforts against decent non-conference opponents then dropping two-of-three to lowly Temple – Stone views every day as challenging.

Freshman Jim MacDonald, batting in the five-spot in Sunday's game, launched a homer in the fifth inning to end the no-hit bid by Temple starter Tom Dolan. Dolan worked quickly through the first four innings, shutting down the Minuteman offense and forcing many hitters to foul off pitches on late swings.

New RSO aims to give students voice

By Heather DiMaio
Collegian Correspondent

Aiming to give students an alternative political voice on campus, University of Massachusetts undergraduates Kelly Scinto and Alex Trefonas are in the process of establishing a new Registered Student Organization (RSO) for Libertarians, the first of its kind, called Reason On Campus.

Scinto, a freshman theater major, founded Reason On Campus. After being involved in politics in high school, she said, "I decided to found this RSO because I was really frustrated that there was nothing for Libertarians on campus, and I think it is an up-and-coming party for young people."

Co-founder of the organization Alex Trefonas, a freshman computer systems engineering major, said, "While UMass claims to be a very political campus, it is more apathetic, and I'd like to change that."

The Libertarian party in general stands for a hands-off government. While Libertarians uphold the Constitution, they believe that people should be able to do whatever they want as long as they do not infringe upon the rights of others. Libertarians fight for states' rights as opposed to national resolutions, and believe that the government should serve only to protect the rights of the people.

Reason On Campus plans to take these Libertarian ideals and apply them to some hotly debated current issues on campus. Scinto and Trefonas said that a goal for Reason On Campus is to fight for the respected privacy of students, something they feel is being neglected here at UMass. They intend to speak out against the new alcohol policy and the ability of police to enter dorm rooms without a warrant.

"We are adults; we should be able to conduct our lives how we want as long as we're not hurting anyone," said Scinto.

Reason On Campus also intends to dispute the growingly popular practice of professors and employers using Facebook to find pictures of students and potential employees engaged in illegal acts and punish them for it.

"We believe Facebook should be pretty open and shouldn't be used against students," said prospective member Anudha Mittal.

Trefonas added, "We don't think victimless crimes should be a crime, basically."

Though the academic year is coming to a close, Scinto and Trefonas said that plans are currently in progress for the rest of the year and for next year. They plan on rallying, advertising and tabling to raise awareness about Reason On Campus.

Scinto said that next year they plan to have debates with other political groups. These debates will be open to students so that they can make decisions based on their observations about which political group they align with.

"One of the biggest goals for our organization is to give students another outlet politically," said Scinto.

Another prospective goal for the Libertarian group is to collaborate with other organizations that are interested in human rights. Scinto said they plan to get involved with The Invisible Children Issue, fighting for child soldiers overseas. Another possible collaboration may be with an independent group of Amherst College and UMass students rallying against the genocide in Darfur.

The group is an organization designed with students' interests at heart, Trefonas said, and added, "We think a lot of students are looking away from the Republican Party now with everything that is going on, and we're hoping they look to us as an alternative."

Prospective member Stephan Adams said, "It's good to fight for the rights of students, because a lot of institutions don't listen to them."

Reason On Campus is still completing the process of becoming an official RSO, but interested students are welcome to join. Students may do so by joining the Facebook group, Reason On Campus, or by sending an e-mail to reasononcampus@gmail.com.

Johnston given sentence

Bryan Johnston was sentenced to 20 to 30 years in prison yesterday for armed burglary charges, on top of a term of life in prison without the possibility of parole for his conviction of first degree murder.

The former Westfield State College student was convicted on Friday of murder charges in the death of University of Massachusetts student David Sullivan.

Judge Bertha Josephson sentenced Johnston yesterday in Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton for the armed burglary charge. She also gave him 10 years for use of a large capacity firearm for the commission of a felony, and 9 1/2 to 10 years for use of a large capacity firearm without a license.

The sentencing yesterday is considered significant because if Johnston's murder conviction is successfully appealed, he would still have to serve the other sentences.

Sullivan's mother reportedly gave a statement to the court about the impact her son's death has had on her family.

Experts give advice to law school students

By Justin Pope
Associated Press

(AP) –For Amy Bennett, owning a Brooklyn wine shop is a far cry from her former life — and income — as a corporate lawyer in Manhattan.

"I take out the trash. I take out the wine and carry cases," she says. But she loves her new career, and the flexibility it gives her to be with her children. And she sometimes uses her J.D., negotiating leases and navigating New York's byzantine liquor licensing laws.

As satisfied as she is, however, Bennett is hard-pressed to think of any peers from her law firm days who have changed tracks so dramatically.

"Most of my colleagues are out making partner now or starting their own firms," she said. "I kind of took a jag."

"Jags" like Bennett's are something many lawyers fantasize about, especially after another long night poring over documents. But surprisingly few take the leap. Many face law school debts, or grow accustomed to a high-salary lifestyle or, having sunk three years and thousands of dollars into their degree, feel obliged to practice.

And that, experts say, is something to think about before starting law school.

It's a common refrain: "I want to go to law school but I don't want to be a lawyer." But that's a "truly horrible idea," says Weston Donehower, a lawyer at the firm Gilbert, Heintz & Randolph in Washington, D.C. "There are a lot of things you can do with a law degree. But it trains you to be a lawyer. Ninety-eight percent of the jobs that you are now prepared for are lawyer jobs."

In fact, many law school grads eventually go on to a range of fields: business, government, academia — even managing baseball teams (the St. Louis Cardinals' Tony LaRussa). But a law degree costs a lot more these days than it used to, so students unsure about whether they want to practice should ask if they really need the J.D. credential.

Soon after starting law school at Washington University in St. Louis, Deborah Schneider started to see how most lawyers spend their time and saw it bore little resemblance to a "Law and Order" episode. She was bored to tears. After graduation, she worked for a couple of dot.coms (started by other disenchanted lawyers) and eventually became a career counselor, co-authoring a book targeting younger versions

Music downloading causing a 'Ruckus'

New music download site hits the UMass campus

By Melissa D'Amico
Collegian Staff

Sure, UMass students can illegally download all the music they want using programs like LimeWire and all they risk is getting computer viruses, getting their Internet shut off or getting sued. No big deal, right? Well, the SGA decided that students should have the option not to take these risks. Any UMass student with a UMail account can now access over 1.5 million songs by using Ruckus, a legal downloading service used by over 50 universities throughout the nation.

"About a dozen UMass students are being sued for illegally downloading [files]. So we wanted to give students an option to access free music," said Sean Bliss, Speaker of the Undergraduate Senate. "[Ruckus] is great for those who don't want to risk illegal downloading."

After registering with Ruckus, and downloading Ruckus Player, students are able to download as much free music as they want. The software is smooth and quick, says Bliss. Entire albums can be downloaded within a matter of minutes, and the sound quality is much better than illegally downloaded files, he added.

"As long as you are connected to the Internet, it is amazing," said Bliss.

Within the first three days of being available to UMass, over 4,000 students signed up for the service.

With a continually expanding library of music, students are able to find music to suit all of their interests. By having over 30 genres of music to choose from, including hip-hop, funk and Celtic, Ruckus enables students to find both popular and lesser known artists. "You can download a wide variety of music, and get pretty much whatever you want for free," said freshman music major Dave Mansfield.

Many students agree that service is convenient, it is easy to search for music, and it has no problem downloading multiple files at once. However, the greatest benefit students see when using Ruckus is that it is legal.

"I'm glad UMass is allowing students to download music legally. I don't see why all students don't use it — it isn't illegal," said junior math major Guerdon Bennett. "You can never be sure of the different dangers there are with illegally downloaded files, viruses and things like that. Now, you don't have to worry about things like that."

Although Ruckus may seem like the perfect solution to students' downloading dilemmas, it, like illegal downloading, has its drawbacks. While Ruckus is great for students who spend a lot of time at their computer, it is not as convenient for those who are constantly on the go because music files downloaded using Ruckus files are not iPod-compatible. In order to transfer music from the computer to an MP3 player, students have to rent "Ruckus-to-Go," a portable music device. Music files downloaded with Ruckus can not be burned to a CD, either. Also, Ruckus can only be used while on campus, during the academic year, and students are not able to access music files otherwise.

Since Ruckus was brought to UMass three weeks ago, the SGA has received "hate mail" complaining about the negative aspects of Ruckus, said Bliss.

The SGA chose Ruckus because they wanted to find a service that could successfully be used by most students.

"This service is legal and so it is not as convenient as illegally downloading," said Bliss. "There is never going to be a service that makes everyone happy."

The SGA is continuing to work with students to make the service as beneficial as possible. "I'm graduating, so it won't affect me, but I am encouraging SGA to find a program that is iPod and Mac compatible. Ruckus does not have to be the only option," said Bliss.

Despite the fact that some students are upset about not being able to transfer their music from Ruckus to their iPods, it has not kept students from enjoying the Senate to work for new immigration laws

Demonstrator Nallely Vasquez, 16, waves an American flag as hundreds gather to protest at Malcolm X Park on International Workers' Day in Washington, DC.

15-year-old Brian Gamboa (L), a Mexican high school student, participates in an immigration reform rally in front of the New York/New York Hotel.

WASHINGTON — The U.S Senate will make a new attempt this month to agree on immigration reforms, a top Republican said after more than a million people took part in demonstrations and a one-day economic boycott. Senator Bill Frist, leader of the Republican majority in the chamber, said, however, that he wanted the new legislation devoted to concentrate on increasing border security against illegal entrants. The huge protests of recent weeks by mainly Hispanic groups hit a new peak Monday with a one-day strike, an economic boycott and nationwide street protests across the United States, to back reforms that help the estimated 11.5 million illegal immigrants get a legal status.

Organizers hailed the protests as a success and have vowed to step up pressure on Congress.

But Frist said on CBS television: "I will bring back comprehensive reform in about two weeks, comprehensive reform that starts by tightening our borders — border security first and foremost."

He added that it would include "a strong interior enforcement program" and a temporary worker program.

Acknowledging the boycott of which was intended to show the economic weight of the immigrant community, Frist said: "We know that many of our states and economies are very dependent on legal immigrants for work."

But the Republican leader said any new law had to address the army of illegal immigrants.

"We don't know who they are. They're in the shadows and we need to devise a plan to bring them out of the shadows, short of amnesty, but treats them in a fair and compassionate way."

As leader of the Senate, Frist sets the agenda in the chamber.

The House of Representatives has already passed a bill that would make illegal entry, and helping illegal immigrants, a crime. This bill has united the mainly Hispanic immigrant community to demand reforms that give more help to undocumented workers.

While the immigrant protests have made headlines, polls indicate that concerns about immigration are one of the key public concerns as the United States heads into mid-term elections in November. President George W. Bush's party is battling to retain control of Congress.

Monday, there were giant demonstrations in several U.S. cities. Hispanic groups also called a one day strike, for children to be withdrawn from school and a boycott of stores.

In Los Angeles at least 600,000 people marched in two major rallies — organizers claimed there were 1.5 million — while more than 400,000 others rallied in Chicago, and tens of thousands turned out in other cities across the United States.

Los Angeles has been a focal point for weeks of protests that some analysts are starting to compare to the civil rights movement of the 1960s.

Organizers of the protest said there had been a major economic impact. Many factories, farms, fast food restaurants and stores that rely on low wage labor closed or restricted their operations because of the day of action.

"Today we march, tomorrow we vote and if they deport us we will jump over the border fence," chanted marchers in Los Angeles as they waved U.S. and Mexican flags.

U.S. immigration policy has become a major talking point throughout Latin America.

The Mexican government said Tuesday that it supports the immigrant demands.

Ruben Aguilar, a spokesman for Mexico's President Vicente Fox, said of the demonstrations: "We are very respectful of the sovereignty of the U.S government – but the government agrees with the demands of the migrant groups that their contribution to the U.S economy should be recognized."

About half of the illegal immigrants in the United States are said to be from Mexico

Woburn man arrested for disorderly conduct

12:50 a.m.
Nathan Taylor Bedrick, 21, of 13 Otis Street in Woburn, was arrested on charges of assault and battery. Officers on routine patrol on the east side of University Drive observed a vehicle parked on the side of the road, in which two males were arguing. A witness had reported that one of the males had struck the driver of the car, who was a female. Police approached the car in an unmarked cruiser. The two males were identified, and admitted that there was an argument between the three of them. Bedrick was identified as the one who struck the female, and was placed under arrest.

Roberto Del Pozo, 24, of 2 Rice Circle in Cambridge, was arrested on charges of disorderly conduct, accosting/annoying a person of the opposite sex, simple assault and battery, and breaking and entering for a misdemeanor. Officers responded to a report of a suspicious person in Melville dormitory approaching numerous females. According to the report, the man was following females into the ladies' room and asking for their phone numbers, putting his arm around the shoulders of women without consent, following females into their dorm rooms and attempting to kiss one of the females. Police described Del Pozo as loud, uncooperative and evasive in answering questions from the officers. When asked, according to the report, he did not seem to care what the officers wanted to know and was misleading about his identification. Officers engaged in questioning with him for close to 30 minutes, trying to find out his business on campus, before placing him under arrest. Del Pozo is a student at the University of Massachusetts Boston.

1:47 a.m.
Aidan O'Kennedy, 20, of 355 Pleasant Street in Melrose, was arrested on charges of disorderly conduct. A cadet observed a fight between two males outside of Patterson dorm in Lot 50 (Southwest). Closed-fist punches were thrown to the chest and head, and threatening comments were made. One of the males attempted to run from the scene when police came to break up the fight, was identified as O'Kennedy and was placed under arrest.

2:15 a.m.
Daniel John Lopes, 20, of 1 Fernway Avenue in North Reading, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of liquor and speeding. Officers observed a vehicle traveling southbound on Governor's Drive at a high speed. The vehicle was stopped by police upon turning onto Commonwealth Ave. Upon approaching the vehicle, officers observed the odor of alcohol on Lopes as well as slurred speech and glossy eyes. Lopes was given five field sobriety tests, which he failed, and was placed under arrest. He was also reported to be traveling at 45 mph in a 25-mph zone.

Stephanie G. Clemens, 18, of 28 Walnut Street in Arlington, was arrested for possession of a Class D drug, minor in possession of alcohol, plate sticker violation, and having an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle, and George Matthew Jones, 18, of 106 Varnum Street in Arlington was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol. Officers stopped a vehicle traveling on Massachusetts Ave. with an expired plate sticker. The rear passenger, identified as Jones, was observed to be in possession of an open can of Budweiser beer and had other amounts of beer on him, both in his sweatshirt pocket and in a pouch on the seat in front of him. Clemens, the operator of the vehicle, was not of age to be drinking, nor was Jones. Police also found a small amount of marijuana in the center console of the vehicle, in addition to marijuana stems and seeds. The small amount of marijuana and a glass pipe were confiscated, and both Jones and Clemens were placed under arrest. Neither Jones nor Clemens are UMass students.

8:00 p.m.
Paul B. Hapakian, 42, of 22 Autumn Lane in Amherst, was arrested for a domestic assault and battery. Police responded to a domestic call in Lot 62 (south of Clark Hall), where a woman said a male acquaintance of hers slammed her head against the window of his car and took off in the vehicle. She was not in need of medical attention. Police called the judge, who got the victim a restraining order. The suspect, identified as Hapakian, was identified and arrested at his house on 22 Autumn Lane at 1 a.m. Monday morning. Hapakian was transported to Hampshire County Jail for a later court appearance. UMass Police was working with the Amherst Police Department on this case. The report also indicates that Hapakian and the victim, who are in a relationship together, had attended a fraternity party.

Harvard author faces further allegations of borrowing

By Andrew Ryan
Associated Press

BOSTON—The publisher of a Harvard University student's "chick lit" novel remained silent as allegations of literary borrowing keep growing against Kaavya Viswanathan's "How Opal Mehta Got Kissed, Got Wild and Got a Life."

The Harvard Crimson, alerted by reader e-mails, reported on its Web site Tuesday that "Opal Mehta" contained passages similar to Meg Cabot's 2000 novel, "The Princess Diaries." On Tuesday, The New York Times also reported comparable material in Viswanathan's novel and Sophie Kinsella's "Can You Keep a Secret?"

Little, Brown and Co. pulled "Opal Mehta" from shelves last week when extensive similarities were discovered to two earlier works by Megan McCafferty, "Sloppy Firsts" and "Second Helpings." But the publisher has not said if the book would be canceled altogether or simply revised, as originally planned.

Little, Brown has not responded to several requests by The Associated Press for comment.

In Cabot's "The Princess Diaries," published by HarperCollins, the following passage appears on page 12: "There isn't a single inch of me that hasn't been pinched, cut, filed, painted, sloughed, blown dry, or moisturized. ... Because I don't look a thing like Mia Thermopolis. Mia Thermopolis never had fingernails. Mia Thermopolis never had blond highlights."

In Viswanathan's book, page 59 reads: "Every inch of me had been cut, filed, steamed, exfoliated, polished, painted, or moisturized. I didn't look a thing like Opal Mehta. Opal Mehta didn't own five pairs of shoes so expensive they could have been traded in for a small sailboat."

Viswanathan, who reportedly signed a six-figure deal with Little, Brown, did not immediately return calls for comment Tuesday.

Kinsella's book was published by Dial Press, which is owned by Random House, Inc., as is McCafferty's publisher, the Crown Publishing Group.

Random House spokesman Stuart Applebaum told The Associated Press on Tuesday that "with Little, Brown having voluntarily withdrawn their book from the marketplace last week," Random House would have no further comment.

Iran threatens Israel upon U.S. attack

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad gestures to journalists in Tehran.

By Ali Akbar Dareini
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran—A top Iranian Revolutionary Guards commander said Tuesday that Israel would be Iran's first retaliatory target in response to any U.S. attack. "We have announced that whenever America does make any mischief, the first place we target will be Israel," the Iranian Student News Agency quoted Gen. Mohammad Ebrahim Dehghani as saying.

"We will definitely resist ... U.S. B-52 (bombers)."

President Bush has said a military option remained on the table if Iran did not agree to international demands for it to stop enriching uranium. However, he also has said Washington wanted to solve the dispute over Iran's nuclear program through diplomacy.

Israeli elder statesman Shimon Peres called on Iran to scrap its nuclear program and warned: "Remember that Israel is exceptionally strong and knows how to defend itself."

Dehghani, who served as a spokesman during large-scale Revolutionary Guards war games last month, said the exercises were held ahead of schedule to send a message to the United States and its allies over Tehran's nuclear activities.

"We were due to organize the maneuvers in May but due to timing conditions and issues related to [our] nuclear energy and upon the recommendation of Mr. [Ali] Larijani [Iran's top nuclear negotiator], it was held 40 days sooner than planned," he said.

Friday marked the deadline set by the U.N. Security Council for Iran to freeze its uranium enrichment program. Council members are now considering next steps, which could include punishing sanctions, although Russia and China oppose that step.

Israel's military chief said in comments published Tuesday that if Iran does obtain nuclear capability, it will constitute a threat to Israel's existence. When asked if the world can, militarily, stop Iran's nuclear program, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz told the Maariv newspaper: "The answer is yes."

Asked whether Israel would be involved in such a military operation, Halutz said, "We are part of the world."

Nagin outlines city's new evacuation plan

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, left, presents the city's new hurricane evacuation plan at a news conference at City Hall in New Orleans on May 2, 2006.

By Brett Martel
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS—Mayor Ray Nagin unveiled a new evacuation strategy for New Orleans on Tuesday that relies more on buses and trains and eliminates the Superdome and Convention Center as shelters.

"There will be no shelter of last resort," Nagin declared.

The mayor, facing a runoff election May 20, has been widely criticized for failing to get the city's most vulnerable residents out of town as Hurricane Katrina approached.

The Superdome and Morial Convention Center became a scene of misery for days after the Aug. 29 hurricane as thousands of evacuees, many of them ill or elderly, languished with shortages of food and water.

In the future, Nagin said, the Convention Center will be a staging point for evacuations, not a shelter.

"Amtrak trains will also be used for evacuation purposes, which we're really excited about," Nagin said. He said federal Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff had cleared the way for the use of passenger trains.

Nagin added that the city's communications infrastructure is being beefed up and that contingency for communication failures had been developed.

The new plan also touches on a heart-wrenching decision evacuees faced ahead of Katrina. To board the buses, they had to leave their pets, and some refused to go without them. In the future, evacuees will be allowed to bring pets with them as long as they have some type of cage to safely put them in.

New Orleans homeland security director Terry Ebbert said the plan also includes arrangements for swiftly getting tourists out of town.

In the day before Katrina, about a million people drove out of the area on interstate highways as authorities converted all lanes coming toward New Orleans into outbound traffic. But many of the city's poor either had no transportation or couldn't afford to leave.

The storm killed more than 1,300 people in Louisiana and Mississippi, adding to a devastating hurricane season considered the most destructive in recorded history. The new plan applies to a city that now has a vastly diminished population, less than half its pre-storm number of about 455,000. The poor neighborhoods where many became stranded amid Katrina's flooding are largely empty.

To help the recovery in New Orleans and other hard-hit regions, Gov. Kathleen Blanco has proposed a $7.5 billion rebuilding and buyout program. A state House committee approved it Tuesday, and the governor's allies hope to have full Legislative approval by early next week.

The next Atlantic hurricane season begins June 1 and runs through November, and forecasters are predicting at least nine hurricanes, five of them intense.

Republicans aim to embrace college women

By Alexa Millinger
The GW Hatchet (George Washington U.)

WASHINGTON — Could Republicans be shaking their "good ol' boys" image? Some say the Republican Party's female presence is undergoing a resurgence, even if statistically they are still very much in the minority.

The number of Republican women elected to Congress has increased slightly over the last two congressional election cycles, starting with 44 in 2000, and rising to 49 in 2002 and then 55 in 2004, according to data compiled by the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

Lisa Ziriax, communications director for the National Federation of Republican women said she attributes this increase of women in Republican leadership roles to both inspirational characters and the party's platform.

"I think some women may be motivated by seeing figures like [Secretary of State] Condoleezza Rice, but I think it is primarily the issues that motivate them," she said.

At GW, Republican student leaders believe that women are becoming some of the most active members of their party, despite their low membership numbers.

Alexandra Valenti, membership director for George Washington University College Republicans, said about 38 percent of this year's members are females, but stressed that "among our most dedicated members, our female members outrank the men."

"Especially when thinking about all of our active members, I would venture to say that we have more very active women than men, though men do have a monopoly on the executive board," she wrote in an e-mail. This year, there are seven men and three women on the group's executive board and next year there will be five men and three women on the board, plus two freshman representatives elected in early fall.

At an event for women the GW College Republicans held at the University Club last week, speakers emphasized the importance of female Republicans in college making their involvement in the party known.

At the event, attended by about 50 women, National Federation of Republican Women Membership Director Andrea Bryan explained that the organization is launching a new program to expand membership to young women. She added that the party's main female demographic is white, middle-aged homemakers, and that "needs to change."

Christine Kelly, a professor at William Paterson University in New Jersey specializing in women's issues, said she sees the new focus on women in the Republican Party as a "breakthrough for women."

"The Republican Party understands that in order to maintain a coalition they need to admit women in greater numbers," Kelly said.

She added that statistics show the number of young women Republicans is not increasing; rather it is a case of women speaking out more by taking leadership positions within the party and becoming more involved in female recruitment.

Freshman Carolyn Schintzius, a member of the GW College Republicans who attended last Monday's event, said that the Republican Party should be focused on recruiting more women, but for now she thinks the women within the party are being portrayed strongly.

"Since there is such a small number of us, it adds to the fact that we need to advocate our positions more strongly and actively in order to have an impact," she said.

Kelly added that she does not think the stereotype of young people being associated with the Democratic Party is changing, adding that the conservative culture and the Republican era has not really penetrated youth culture.

"The real trends are not abstinence or Christian music," she said. "Because capitalism dominates, what sells is not the conservative virtue model."

Kelly believes that young women tend to be Democrats because of liberal social issues many support, like reproductive choice, one of the "key dividing lines for young women."

Kristen Stromberg, GW College Republicans' freshman representative, said that with issues like abortion, she thinks the Republican Party is more beneficial to women.

"Although the feminist movement was originally identified with liberals, the idea that a woman can be anything is across both parties," she said.

Senior Annie Zhou, a member of the College Republicans, said her ideological views come from finding herself more aligned with the pro-business aspect of the Republican Party. Kelly corroborates this by speculating that one reason some young women do choose to be Republicans is to better "position themselves in a global economy" and because of "corporate benefits."

'Gospel of Judas' discovery intrigues scholars

By Kristi Roberts
UWIRE

WASHINGTON—For centuries, Christians have followed the New Testament Gospels of the Apostles Mark, Mathew, Luke and John — but what about Judas?

Recently the discovery of what historians and theologians are calling the Gospel of Judas has caused a stir in the Christian community. The Gospel was found in Egypt in the early 1970s and was put on the antique market where it was sold and kept in a bank vault until the owner donated it to the Maecenas Foundation for Ancient Art, because he worried about the text's rapid deterioration.

Despite its state, the text was a remarkable historical find because it was so complete.

"It's always exciting to have a new piece of data," said Hayim Lapin, an associate professor of Jewish and ancient studies at the University of Maryland. "Researchers always have to cobble scraps of documents together."

The document has been characterized by many as a lost Gospel. However, theologians have known about the text for centuries and say it is not a threat to the Christian faith, Lapin said.

The Rev. Peter Antoci agrees.

"The Gospel [of Judas] belongs to a body of writings in Gnosticism," Antoci said. "It was never accepted in Canonical text of the Bible."

Gnosticism is a mixture of pre-Christian and early-Christian beliefs which believes in the ability of some to transcend the physical world through the acquisition of mysterious spiritual knowledge. It does not believe, like Christianity does, that the resurrection of Jesus permitted transcendence.

Canonical texts are characterized as "divinely inspired" and meant to be in the Canon, or New Testament of the Bible, according to Fr. Bill Byrne. They were written before the end of the first century, whereas Gnostic texts weren't written until the second and third centuries.

"The text [of the Gospel of Judas] shows evidence of the knowledge of the four canonical texts," Antoci said. "In fact, it is a response to them."

This difference in time is important to the religious significance of the documents, according to Byrne.

"Catholics believe that public revelation, or the word of God, ended with the death of the last Apostle," Byrne said. "The Gospel of Judas was written after that."

"This text has significance in a historical context, but doesn't shed light on the teachings of Jesus Christ," he said.

According to Antoci, many scholars have evidence of the knowledge of the Gospel of Judas as early as the fifth century, in which theologians denounced the text, along with other Gnostic texts as religiously insignificant.

Both Antoci and Byrne agree that while the text has no religious significance, it's a fantastic scholarly find and provides new insight into how Christianity was developing in its earliest stages.

When the finding of the Gospel of Judas was first announced it caused a sensation in the media, because it called into question the validity of the canonical text. However, people are always looking for a good reason not to believe in the teachings of the Church, Byrne said.

Careers in law still draw huge salaries of herself called "Should You Really Be a Lawyer?"

"I spent more time and energy researching the purchase of my car than I did researching the purchase of my law degree, even though law school cost nine times more," said Schneider. In her book, she advises prospective law students to sit in on classes, talk to practicing lawyers and even intern with a firm. For some people, that will validate their decision. For others, it will save them three years and $150,000.

Why do some people make bad decisions about law school? Schneider and others point to a number of factors.

College seniors and recent graduates feel pressure to get started on a career. Looking around, they see peers applying to law school. And why not? What other careers have so few prerequisites and such good salaries? Well, Schneider says, more than you might think. Law might be a good option, but don't assume it's the only one.

Some see law school as three years of intellectual exploration — a way to extend college. True, there are chances to take electives toward the end of law school. But much of the curriculum is set in stone, and is unmistakably preprofessional.

"It's a professional degree," says Sarah Zearfoss, director of admissions at the University of Michigan's law school. "It isn't the same as a liberal arts education, and people who come expecting that are going to be disappointed. And frankly, it's a lot of hard work."

That said, applicants don't need to know exactly what they want to do; they just need to have thought through why they want to be lawyers. Says Georgetown Law dean of admissions Andy Cornblatt: "Some of our best students are people who just sort of found their passion within the general field of law once they got here, and that's fine."

Law can look like a sure road to wealth. Media stories and Web sites like greedyassociates.com draw attention to the starting salaries at prominent, big-city firms, which are now creeping toward $150,000.

But smaller firms don't pay as well; the private sector average is about $80,000. The median starting salary overall for 2004 law school graduates was just $55,000.

Only 56 percent of 2004 law school graduates took their first job with a firm, according to the most recent figures from NALP, the National Association for Legal Career Professionals. Nearly 28 percent went into public service employment, including work as government lawyers (such as prosecutors or public defenders), judicial clerkships and public interest law, where salaries start at around $40,000.

And public sector work is tough financially. The American Bar Association says students who borrow for law school graduate owing on average about $80,000. One study estimated that two-thirds of law school grads can't afford to take public interest jobs. A handful of wealthy law schools forgive debts for graduates taking public interest jobs, but comparatively few students attend such schools.

Lay wraps up testimony at Enron trial

By Michael Graczyk
Associated Press

HOUSTON — After exchanging some parting shots with his prosecutor, Kenneth Lay finished six days of testimony at his federal fraud and conspiracy trial Tuesday by professing love for Enron Corp., the company he founded, and the people who worked there.

"I loved Enron very much," Lay said in a brief response to the final question from his lawyer, George Secrest. "And I loved Enron's employees very much. I spent half my professional life running Enron. I think we built a great company. We changed energy markets around the world.

"I think the most painful thing in my life was watching Enron finally have to go into bankruptcy."

The comment was similar to his statement at the opening of his testimony last week. And as he has during more than a week on the witness stand, Lay jousted with prosecutor John Hueston, this time over taking responsibility for the implosion of the once-giant energy trading company.

Lay continued to cite deceit by former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow as being "at the heart" of Enron's collapse.

"Your list of people to blame and events to blame did not include yourself, did it, sir?" Hueston asked him.

"Did I make mistakes?" Lay replied. "I'm sure I did, Mr. Hueston. I had to make real-time decisions based on the information I had at the time."

Hlueston accused Lay of making self-serving statements, and Lay replied: "It is just the truth."

The pair also disagreed over other testimony, like that of former Treasurer Ben Glisan, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy and testified that Lay and his co-defendant, former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling, knew financial structures that Glisan and Fastow had created were hiding losses at Enron.

Told by Hueston that Glisan had no reason to lie, Lay replied: "He did not tell the truth. That I know."

Under more friendly questioning from Secrest, Lay denied prosecution suggestions last week that he was trying to tamper with witnesses when he tried to speak with them.

"I was trying to see if they would meet with my lawyers," Lay said.

He said he suggested through a woman who once worked at Enron that he and prosecution witness Vince Kaminski "have a cup of coffee."

Lay also added sarcastically, "I guess the FBI will now talk to her."

He said he was surprised to learn Kaminski, a former top risk analyst at Enron, was a prosecution witness. Kaminski told jurors he got a cold response when he told Lay and other executives in October 2001 that Enron needed to "come clean" on questionable financial structures in the weeks before it filed for bankruptcy protection in December.

Lay and Skilling, who testified earlier in a trial now in its 14th week, are accused of repeatedly lying to investors and employees about Enron when they allegedly knew the company's success stemmed from accounting tricks.

The two men counter no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few executives, like Fastow, who stole money through secret side deals. They attribute Enron's descent into bankruptcy proceedings to a combination of bad publicity and lost market confidence.

In one of the few moments during the entire trial where everyone in the courtroom laughed, including prosecutors and the judge, Lay Tuesday was addressing a comment from his lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, who has been assailed by Hueston for calling a prosecution witness a "monkey" in front of reporters. Ramsey has been absent from the trial for weeks recovering from surgery to relieve pressure in an artery.

Secrest said Monday the remark was "trained monkey," not just "monkey." And on Tuesday, Hueston asked Lay whether that clarification made that slur any better.

"I wasn't trying to defend my monkey one way or the other," Lay said, before realizing his slip of the tongue.

"I'm sure glad Mr. Ramsey's not here," he said as the laughter abated.

Following Lay to the stand was Martin Siegel, an attorney from New York working for Lay in a related Enron case, who said his client had been trying to pay off $7 million he owed Enron from a 2001 draw from a company line of credit.

Enron founder Kenneth Lay arrives at the courthouse for his sixth day on the stand in his fraud and conspiracy trial Tuesday, May 2, 2006.

State unlawfully hired lawyers

BOSTON — The Romney administration has acknowledged that it violated a law aimed at limiting the hiring of outside law firms when it retained a prominent firm during a bitter fight over asbestos removal at a Cambridge courthouse without seeking competitive bids.

Mark Nielsen, legal counsel to Gov. Mitt Romney, said the Division of Capital Asset Management didn't comply with state law when it hired Goulston & Storrs to represent it in a dispute with employees at the Edward J. Sullivan Courthouse in Cambridge. The employees have demanded that they be relocated while asbestos is removed from the building, which houses Middlesex Superior Court, Cambridge District Court, the Middlesex jail and the district attorney's office.

Goulston & Storrs charged the division $325,000 in legal fees to represent the division at six hearings on the asbestos problem before a Massachusetts Bar Association committee, according to state records obtained by The Boston Globe.

Under a law passed in 2003 at Romney's urging, the executive branch is barred from hiring private lawyers unless the governor's legal counsel certifies in writing that no government lawyer can do the work. The law also requires the state to seek the lowest bid.

Nielsen said David Perini, commissioner of capital asset management, didn't do either of those things when he hired Goulston & Storrs.

"I don't think there was any absence of good faith on his part, but there was an oversight," Nielsen said.

Robert Mulligan, the state's top trial court judge, retained the same firm last month to defend him in a lawsuit filed April 7 by courthouse employees who are worried about exposure to asbestos.

Nielsen said the law only applies to the executive branch, not the judicial branch, so Mulligan was not required to seek competitive bids for the legal work.

Study shows Americans have worse health than English

By Carla K. Johnson and Mike Stobbe
Associated Press

CHICAGO — White, middle-aged Americans — even those who are rich — are far less healthy than their peers in England, according to stunning new research that erases misconceptions and has experts scratching their heads.

Americans had higher rates of diabetes, heart disease, strokes, lung disease and cancer — findings that held true no matter what income or education level.

Those dismal results are despite the fact that U.S. health care spending is double what England spends on each of its citizens.

"Everybody should be discussing it. Why isn't the richest country in the world the healthiest country in the world?" asks study co-author Dr. Michael Marmot, an epidemiologist at University College London in England.

The study, based on government statistics in both countries, adds context to the already-known fact that the United States spends more on health care than any other industrialized nation, yet trails in rankings of life expectancy.

The United States spends about $5,200 per person on health care while England spends about half that in adjusted dollars.

Even experts familiar with the weaknesses in the U.S. health system seemed stunned by the study's conclusions.

"I knew we were less healthy, but I didn't know the magnitude of the disparities," said Gerard Anderson, an expert in chronic disease and international health at Johns Hopkins University who had no role in the research.

Just why the United States fared so miserably wasn't clear. Answers ranging from too little exercise to too little money and too much stress were offered.

Even the U.S. obesity epidemic couldn't solve the mystery. The researchers crunched numbers to create a hypothetical statistical world in which the English had American lifestyle risk factors, including being as fat as Americans. In that model, Americans were still sicker.

Smoking rates are about the same on both sides of the pond. The English have a higher rate of heavy drinking.

Only non-Hispanic whites were included in the study to eliminate the influence of racial disparities. The researchers looked only at people ages 55 through 64, and the average age of the samples was the same.

Americans reported twice the rate of diabetes compared to the English, 12.5 percent versus 6 percent. For high blood pressure, it was 42 percent for Americans versus 34 percent for the English; cancer showed up in 9.5 percent of Americans compared to 5.5 percent of the English.

The upper crust in both countries was healthier than middle-class and low-income people in the same country. But richer Americans' health status resembled the health of the low-income English.

"It's something of a mystery," said Richard Suzman of the U.S. National Institutes of Health, which helped fund the study.

Health experts have known the U.S. population is less healthy than that of other industrialized nations, according to several important measurements, including life expectancy. The U.S. ranks behind about two dozen other countries, according to the World Health Organization.

Some have believed the United States has lagged because it is more ethnically diverse, said Suzman, who heads the National Institute on Aging's Behavioral and Social Research Program. "Minority health in general is worse than white health," he said.

But the new study showed that when minorities are removed from the equation, and adjustments are made to control for education and income, white people in England are still healthier than white people in the United States.

"As far as I know, this is the first study showing this," said Suzman. The study, supported by grants from government agencies in both countries, was published in Wednesday's Journal of the American Medical Association.

Other studies have measured the United States against other countries in terms of health care spending, use of medical care and availability of health care services. But this is the first to focus on prevalence of chronic conditions, said Anderson, the Johns Hopkins professor.

Sniper's accomplice may testify, says source

Convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad gestures as he addresses Judge James L. Ryan during a media preview before the start of his trial April 28, 2006.

By Stephen Manning
Associated Press

ROCKVILLE, Md. — Washington-area sniper Lee Boyd Malvo is negotiating a plea bargain in which he would testify against his former mentor John Allen Muhammad, a person familiar with the case said Tuesday.

Negotiations between prosecutors and Malvo's attorneys have not been finalized, but Malvo is prepared to testify about the shootings and his relationship with Muhammad, the source said.

The source, who confirmed the report by WTOP radio in Washington, requested anonymity because the deal was not complete.

Attempts to reach Malvo's attorneys Tuesday were not immediately successful. Deputy State's Attorney Katherine Winfree, who is prosecuting Muhammad, would not comment.

Jury selection began Monday in Montgomery County Circuit Court in the case against Muhammad, 45, who is charged with six counts of homicide in the 2002 sniper shooting spree that left 10 people killed and three people wounded.

Under the terms being considered, the source said Malvo would plead guilty in connection with the six shooting deaths in Montgomery County, where the spree began and ended.

He would be sentenced to life in prison, the maximum sentence for a homicide committed by a juvenile. Malvo, now 21, was 17 at the time of the shootings and is already serving a life sentence in Virginia.

legal service.

"I guess it would be better if the files were iPod-compatible but you are still able to listen to the music in your room," Mansfield said. "It doesn't really matter to me [if the files are iPod-compatible] because the service works great, and it's legal."

The motion to bring Ruckus to UMass was unanimously passed in Senate after a semester of research. Most of the "footwork" was done by former Senator Brian Whalley, said Bliss. In researching, it was found that Ruckus was the most popular service among public universities, and it has the largest number of deals with large record labels as compared with other services.

"Ruckus was the most eager to engage with the UMass community," said Bliss. "They were very flexible, and worked very well with us."

As the first legal downloading service at UMass, this was a way for the SGA to see how students reacted to their decisions.

"Ruckus is a great opportunity to be used campus-wide to get student reactions to SGA decisions," said Bliss. "Through the feedback we have gotten, we are able to see that students are paying attention to what the SGA is doing and are becoming more active."

Romney warns of bumps in health care law

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Massachusetts faces potential "bumps in the road" as it tries to turn the promises of its new health care law into a reality, Gov. Mitt Romney said Monday — even as he announced another crucial step in the state's experiment with near universal coverage.

Romney said the state has formally submitted the plan to the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, the federal agency that will decide if the plan goes far enough to guarantee Massachusetts keeps receiving hundreds of millions in federal Medicaid money each year.

Also Monday, Romney announced a new Medicaid fraud unit designed to crack down on those taking advantage of the new system.

Romney used Monday's twin announcements to ratchet down expectations for a smooth launch of the landmark law, designed to help insure nearly all of the state's estimated 550,000 uninsured residents.

"There's a general perception that the health care bill is done," Romney said. "The truth is the heavy lifting is still under way and there's a lot more heavy lifting ahead of us."

One of the first bumps is getting federal approval of the plan. Romney acknowledged Monday that the state was handing over the plan well past an initial federal deadline of Jan. 15.

State Health and Human Services Secretary Timothy Murphy said members of his staff are heading to Washington on Tuesday to walk federal officials through the details of the new law.

"We will be working with them day and night," Murphy said.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., issued a statement Monday saying he will work to help protect the $385 million in annual Medicaid dollars the state could lose if the plan is rejected.

The health care law sets an ambitious schedule. Under the timetable, the state is supposed to start offering new subsidized health care plans to the poorest residents in October.

By the beginning of next year, private insurers are supposed to start offering lower-cost health plans for individuals not poor enough to be covered by the subsidized plans and who don't receive insurance through their jobs.

One of the most daunting tasks is the creation of an entirely new state bureaucracy, known as "Commonwealth Health Insurance Connector" — the bureaucratic infrastructure on which much of the new law's innovative reforms rest.

The connector is supposed to work as a clearing house matching the uninsured with new health care plans.

Romney said for the connector to work, "the computer systems are going to need to be able to deal with a half a million people buying insurance through an entity that doesn't exist today."

"So many parties have to come together that achieving this timetable even if there are no bumps in the road will be very difficult," he said.

To guard against fraud, the state is planning to combine two separate existing Medicaid fraud units into one, according to state Medicaid Director Beth Waldman.

The goal of the new unit is to look for abuse both among insurance providers and individuals, and referring those cases to law enforcement if needed.

Last October, state Auditor Joseph DeNucci issued a report saying the state could be losing hundreds of millions of dollars in Medicaid fraud — and should be doing more.

Waldman said that estimate of fraud is high given more sophisticated computer tracking systems in place now. She said the state recovers about $10 million in fraud, but probably could find more.

"We do know that there's probably more out there than we're finding and we want to find better ways to do it," she said.

Lawsuit turns Voting Rights Act on its head

By Emily Wagster Pettus
Associated Press

MACON, Miss. — Ike Brown is a legend in Mississippi politics, a fast-talking operative both loved and hated for his ability to turn out black voters and get his candidates into office.

That success has also landed him at the heart of a federal lawsuit that's about to turn the Voting Rights Act on its end.

For the first time, the U.S. Justice Department is using the 1965 law to allege racial discrimination against whites.

Brown, head of the Democratic Party in Mississippi's rural Noxubee County, is accused of waging a campaign to defeat white voters and candidates with tactics including intimidation and coercion. Also named in the lawsuit is Circuit Clerk Carl Mickens, who has agreed to refrain from rejecting white voters' absentee ballots considered defective while accepting similar ballots from black voters.

"They've been trying to target me for years, the attorney general and all them, because we're so successful," the 52-year-old says. "Hey, if you're a failure, nobody will mess with you. But we're successful in east Mississippi."

The Justice Department complaint says Brown and those working with him "participated in numerous racial appeals during primary and general campaigns and have criticized black citizens for supporting white candidates and for forming biracial political coalitions with white candidates."

Noxubee County — a rural area along the Alabama line named for a Choctaw word meaning "stinking water" — has a population of 12,500, 69 percent black and 30 percent white. Whites once dominated county politics here, but now only one white person holds countywide office, and he says Brown tried to recruit an out-of-county black candidate to run against him three years ago.

The federal case against Brown, scheduled for trial this fall, represents a change in direction in the use of the Voting Rights Act, says Jon Greenbaum, director of the voting rights project for the Washington-based Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

The law was written to protect racial minorities in the 1960s when Mississippi and other Southern states strictly enforced segregation.

"The main concern we have in the civil rights community isn't necessarily that that DOJ brought this case," Greenbaum says. "It's that the department is not bringing meritorious cases on behalf of African-American and Native American voters."

Justice Department records show the department's last voting-rights case alleging discrimination against black voters was filed in 2001. Since then, six cases have been brought on behalf of voters of Hispanic or Asian descent in five states — plus the case involving white voters in Mississippi.

Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland would not comment on the case, but provided stacks of documents, including the consent decree signed by Mickens, Noxubee County's chief elections officer.

Brown, a former tax preparer, served 21 months in prison in the 1990s on a felony conviction of preparing fraudulent federal income-tax returns. He retained his right to vote.

The same federal judge who handled his earlier trial is now overseeing the Justice Department case.

"This case is real simple," Brown says, stretching back in a maroon chair during an interview in Mickens' office, where voter-registration records are kept. "Find me one white person that was discriminated against."

The main white person who makes the claim is Ricky Walker, the county prosecuting attorney who believes Brown recruited an opponent for him simply because he's white, an action Walker called "racist."

Walker says that when he qualified to run again in 2003, Brown brought in a black lawyer from another part of the state to run against him. A circuit judge found that the lawyer, Winston James Thompson III, had not established residency, and Thompson was not allowed on the ballot.

"I think he just wanted to have a person in that office that he had some control over, a black person," Walker says.

Brown, chairman of the Noxubee County Democratic Party since 2000, says Thompson recruited himself.

Brown's defense attorney, prominent black Republican Wilbur Colom, disagrees with Brown's political views but defends his right to speak.

"I think Ike does play race politics," Colom says. "He is a black political leader who fights the fight like we were still in the 1970s. He doesn't recognize the progress that we have made."

But Colom criticizes the Justice Department for filing a complaint against a black political consultant while ignoring similar behavior by white political operatives in Mississippi.

"It has overtones of politics and that's the wrong road for Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department," the attorney says. "It's going to destroy their credibility the next time they ask black people to listen to them."

Democratic state Rep. Reecy Dickson says Brown is a political celebrity who evokes strong reactions from friends and foes. Brown moved to Noxubee County in 1979 to work on Dickson's campaign for county superintendent of education and later helped her bid for the Legislature.

Asked if Brown is fair, she smiles slightly.

"The question comes down to: What is fair in politics?" Dickson says. "I heard someone say once, 'Fair died a long time ago.'"

Brown sees the Justice Department case as whites dissatisfied with growing black political power in east Mississippi — particularly his power. He says the lawsuit is a way to muddy his name.

"It's all about voter suppression," he says.

The marketing and politics of fear

Jackie Hai

Last Saturday night, my mom called and urged me to turn on A&E because "that movie about the 9/11 airplane" was being aired. We both thought this was strange, since the feature film "United 93" is currently playing in theaters; why would it be on television at the same time? As it turned out, the movie playing on A&E was a separate, made-for-TV number titled "Flight 93."

This answered the first question, but naturally raised another: isn't it convenient that the simultaneous release of two nearly identical films about 9/11 took place just as Washington is gearing up for the 2006 congressional elections?

There has been an unsurprising amount of debate surrounding the United Flight 93 movies, not the least of which include the ethics of their makers capitalizing on the tragedy so soon after it took place. There's another kind of cashing in going on we shouldn't overlook: this administration and their political allies banking on our memories of that terrible day in September 2001.

The terrorist attack, perhaps the worst to strike this country, was also the best thing that could have happened to the new residents of the White House. It was exactly the kind of catalyst they were waiting for, opening the floodgates for mass manipulation of the American psyche through relentless propaganda.

Frightened into acquiescence, the majority of people have allowed the Bush administration to get away with everything, from not-so-secret prisons and torture, to illegal spying on U.S. citizens, to a war on Iraq that is now proven to have been waged on utterly fabricated premises. Voicing any kind of opposition is unpatriotic and helps the terrorists.

The complicity of American media and marketing also plays into this strategy. Prior to the 2004 presidential election, the Media Education Foundation, a documentary producing company based right next door in Northampton, released "Hijacking Catastrophe: 9/11, Fear, and the Selling of American Empire." It is a critically acclaimed look into the agenda of those benefiting from the military-industrial complex from the post-Cold War era to today, and how our fears of vulnerability generated by 9/11 were skillfully manipulated to achieve those preexisting goals. It was also seen by very, very few people. The reason? Commercialized propaganda sells better than unpleasant truth.

What about the insurgents in Iraq killing our soldiers every day, which they see as an unwanted occupying force? By this point, we are far and away from the original hijackers of the airplanes, but it doesn't matter anymore. The war machine has churned up enough smoke to sufficiently blur the issue.

Over the next several weeks, millions of viewers will pay to crowd into theaters and watch the riveting story of the brave men and women who lost their lives fighting against terrorists on board an airplane. Reactions will vary between sorrow and anger, uncertainty and resolve. Will we have learned anything new, gained some heretofore undiscovered insight into what took place that day? Not likely, because the reenactment was pieced together from stories we already know, flight records and cell phone calls, eyewitness accounts from the ground. No, some people will say the film is a commemoration of heroic sacrifice and a reminder of who the real enemy is.

Therein lies the problem. Who is the real enemy? Osama bin Laden and his henchmen, who we let escape in the mountains of Afghanistan? The government sure doesn't like to talk about him anymore. Saddam Hussein and his nonexistent ties to al-Qaeda and nonexistent WMDs? Never mind. What about the insurgents in Iraq killing our soldiers every day, which they see as an unwanted occupying force? By this point, we are far and away from the original hijackers of the airplanes, but it doesn't matter anymore. The war machine has churned up enough smoke to sufficiently blur the issue.

September 11 is like a giant hammer. Whenever public opinion takes a nosedive, someone pulls it out and beats us over the head with it as if to say, "Remember? Remember 9/11?" The ensuing haze makes it that much easier for the Bush administration to pursue their agenda unfettered. No doubt, more than a few people up in Washington are hoping that the United Flight 93 movies will implant themselves in voters' minds, tipping the scale to help the Republicans maintain a majority in Congress.

How much longer will we accept it? If the current political climate is any indication, then the answer is not much. Approval ratings (now at 34 percent) are in a steady decline with no signs of reversal, Bush's speaking tour around the country — to bolster support for the war — was a flop and, even in red states, more people disapprove of his policies than not. Americans are desensitized to a lot of things; maybe we now can add propaganda to the list. Our patience, it seems, is finally starting to wear thin.

Look outside the situation in Iraq

Bonnie Solomon

Our country has become more and more divided over the years. Not very often does this nation come together for a cause. This past Sunday, almost thousands of students, teachers, Christians, Jews, Muslims, Republicans and Democrats rallied together in Washington D.C. to create awareness about the genocide in Darfur. According to SaveDarfur.org, this was the largest public outcry for Darfur since the conflict began three years ago and one of the only rallies that has attracted such a diverse group of people.

Darfur is a region on the western border of Sudan. For years now, there have been acts of genocide that have been largely underrepresented in U.S. media. Right now, according to SaveDarfur.org, over 400,000 people in Darfur have died or been murdered, 3.5 million are hungry and 2.5 million have lost their homes.

According to The New York Times, "In 2004, the House of Representatives approved a declaration of genocide for Darfur, and since then the House and Senate have urged stronger peacekeeping missions and approved billions of dollars in aid to Sudan and the Darfur region of the East African nation. This is not enough."

Among the many speakers at the rally were Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, George Clooney, Elie Wiesel, and Oduho Dominic, a refugee from Sudan. The demonstrators and speakers agreed that what the U.S. government is doing is not enough.

At the rally, Nick Clooney, George Clooney's father and a writer for the Cincinnati Post, said, "We didn't stop the Holocaust. We didn't stop Cambodia. We didn't stop Rwanda. But this one, we can stop."

Not only are so many people from Darfur being killed, but thousands of women have been raped.

Many of the other speakers also related this genocide to the Holocaust. During the Holocaust, Jews, and many other minorities, were killed because they were believed to be inferior. The African Muslims in Darfur are being persecuted by Arab Muslims, whom are of the majority, because they are believed to be inferior.

The majority of protesters at the rally were Jewish. They believe that there is no way that we can let a mass genocide happen again. The genocide in Darfur is too much like the Holocaust and must be stopped before it gets any worse than it already is. The only way that we can do this is by creating awareness, becoming unified and encouraging the president to do more about this horrible situation.

Not only are so many people from Darfur being killed, but thousands of women have been raped, according to SaveDarfur.org. This is one way for the Janjaweed militias to continue attacking Darfurians after driving them from their homes.

The Janjaweed has been allied with the Sudanese government, and many of these militants are committing these atrocities without a thought from the government. Many Janjaweed have been integrated into the army and police, and no one has been charged with any crime, and their actions are not being challenged.

Only yesterday has some serious action been taken by the U.S. and British governments. Diplomats have gone to the African Union (AU) to get the Sudanese government to sign a draft settlement, but three Darfur rebel factions have refused to sign, thus creating a 48-hour extension on this draft, which ended at midnight on Tuesday night.

Personally, I have only been aware of this genocide since Friday. Many of you, I believe, may only have heard about the rally and may only be getting all this information as you are reading it. I hope to make you all more aware of situations outside of the war in Iraq.

Media coverage is spending too much time on this one event in our history, and I feel that if all these other events in the world go unrepresented, then no one will remember them. Some people still believe the Holocaust never happened. We need to ensure that this never happens with the genocide in Darfur. We need to ensure that genocide will never happen. We need to ensure that we do not forget.

'Flung into an adult world'

Chris Reardon

My first passion was action movies. When I was a kid I admired actors like Jean-Claude Van Damme, Wesley Snipes and, I'm ashamed to admit, Chuck Norris. I realize the folly of my youthful ways now, but come on, people — you know you wished you were that kid in "Sidekicks" when you were eight years old.

Now when I watch bad movies like that, all I can think of is how bad they are. Most of the action gems from my youth (including, but not limited to, "Street Fighter," "Speed" and "Universal Soldier") are all but unwatchable now. Although some exceptions do come to mind (like the "Die Hard" series and the first two "Terminators"), I feel ridiculous ever having watched some of the movies that didn't age quite as well.

So then why did I like them so much when I was kid? Mostly, it was the fantasy associated with these films. When I was eight years old, I would imagine that I knew as many ways to kill a man as did Steven Seagal, and nobody stood a chance against me. Of course, encounters with bullies and my older siblings spoke of a different truth, but in my own mind, I was unstoppable.

13 years later and I'm still that same little kid in many ways, only instead of facing bullies and pretend ninjas, now I have to face writing assignments, tests and credit card bills. My imagination is as active as ever, but fantasizing about roundhouse kicking a piece of paper just isn't very satisfying. When I do have a problem with someone, I joke with my friends about how I really need to get my hands on a Hattori Hanzo sword to take care of it.

Meanwhile, I've never been in a real fight, and I have a history of avoiding confrontation at all costs. It's so easy to imagine violent solutions to all of my problems, but, of course I'd never act on those thoughts in real life.

Instead of facing bullies and pretend ninjas, now I have to face writing assignments, tests and credit card bills. My imagination is as active as ever, but fantasizing about roundhouse kicking a piece of paper just isn't very satisfying.

I often worry that I let my imagination get the better of me, and that one day I'll retreat into a fantasy world from which I can't escape. As a writer, I value my imagination as a tool of my trade, but I know too many stories about writers that go crazy and either kill themselves or become institutionalized to not be concerned.

Everyone says that you need to keep in touch with your inner child if you're going to be happy. Nobody warns you that not evolving from your childhood ways can be just as maladaptive. When I came to college, I was flung into an adult world that I was a bit underprepared for, and I made my share of bad choices as a result. But the one thing that I truly regret is not taking an active role in my own life. For too long I've been the star of my dreams, with but a bit role in the real production.

Last year I changed majors — from psychology to journalism. I had always wanted to be an English major but was convinced that getting a job after school would be a lot easier with a degree in journalism. While I was going through the change, I put a lot of thought into the fact that I had resigned myself to being a writer because it seemed like that was what I could do best. At that time, I had a discussion with a friend of mine about where my future lay, and I jokingly insisted that what I really wanted to be was a fight choreographer.

Now that I've been a journalism major for about a year, I'm starting to wish that I'd been more serious about my dream. I might make a good writer, but I honestly think I'd make a great fight choreographer. It seems silly, as a third-year college student, to even be considering such a life change, but maybe that's what it will take to let me star in my own life.

I'm not saying that I'm planning on dropping out or anything. I just think that in order to keep a healthy grasp on my inner child, while at the same time not giving into to fits of reverie, I may have to be more open to the possibility that I've made the wrong choice as to how I lead my life.

What to expect this fall

Andrew Freeman

It is clear to any observer that the glorious campus of UMass Amherst is sorely lacking in one crucial commodity: spirit. Students lumber to and from class in a barely conscious state, and every weekend they desperately flee for the safety of home. Meanwhile, those who live too far away to retreat home curl up in a ball of despair or drown their sorrows in a sea of alcohol. School spirit is at alarmingly low levels, and this requires drastic action.

With the earth-shattering success of UMass Idol, the influence of television on our extracurricular activities is at an all-time high. How better to shake the student body out of its apathy than to appeal to its love of television, that uplifting force? Accordingly, I hereby present a new lineup of student activities for the fall that are sure to raise school spirit and revenue.

UMass "24:"

Join Special Agent Barry Flanders and Springfield's FBI Terrorism task force on one chaotic day as they race against time to foil almost certain collegiate terrorism. Enjoy this exclusive sneak peek: "The following takes place between the hours of 5 p.m. and 6 p.m.: 'No terrorists yet ... still no terrorists ... be vewy vewy quiet ... I'm huntin' tewwowists.'" With antiwar protests, Red Sox riots and other acts of student terrorists gone wild, will UMass survive the coming year? Tune in this fall to find out.

Some foolish souls may complain about the expense, griping that the bill for UMass campuses has risen 69 percent since 2001, according to a MassINC report. But if a substantial increase in expenses is all it takes to raise students' spirits and bind them to campus life, then we should be all for it.

"Fear Factor:" UMass

From the dank dorm bathrooms to the dining halls, the opportunities for embarrassing and revolting behavior are endless. Enjoy the thrill of voyeuristic pleasure as students compete for the ultimate prize: a $1,000 tuition waiver. Please note that this money can only be applied towards tuition, and the exorbitant fees will remain untouched. How far would your classmates go for such a grandiose sum? Catch the torture and the terror this fall.

"CSI:" Amherst

An all-star cast of detectives from the UMass Police Department raid student dorms in search of violations of the new alcohol policy. Using state-of-the-art forensic science, they uncover even the slightest trace of beer or other controlled substances, bringing vicious criminals to certain justice. Watch this fall as they unearth the stunning truth that lies beneath UMass's pristine facade: many students drink too much.

"Absent Without a Trace"

One academic department's desperate quest to find the thousands of students who disappear from class. See how they use advanced technology and old-fashioned detective work to track down the absentees. Will the missing in action show up for midterms and finals? Can they be found before the end of the semester? Does the administration care as long as the fees are paid? Tune in this fall to find out.

"Dancing with the Whitmores"

UMass bigwigs dust off the dance moves and hit the stage, pairing with eager students who compete for a $1,000 tuition rebate. Will Michael Gargano be unstoppable, or is Chancellor Lombardi a surprise contender? Can our administrators even dance? Don't miss all the pulse-pounding excitement this fall.

"The Apprentice:" Jack Wilson

Join UMass President Jack Wilson as he evaluates candidates for a necessary new post: Vice Chancellor of Vice Chancellor Affairs. Who will win? How is it decided? How many hundreds of thousands will he make? Does the student body care how its money is spent? Find out all the answers this fall.

To be sure, all of these activities will cost money, both to pay performers and to hire new vice chancellors to coordinate them. Ultimately, however, students will find this wealth of activities worth the new $500 student activity fee it will cost to provide them. Some foolish souls may complain about the expense, griping that the bill for UMass campuses has risen 69 percent since 2001, according to a MassINC report. But if a substantial increase in expenses is all it takes to raise students' spirits and bind them to campus life, then we should be all for it.

After all, the key to a good college experience is not academics, not nurturing career or personal development, and certainly not treating students as something other than cogs in the great money-making machine. The key to campus life and school spirit, as well as to television itself, is creating gimmicky events to appeal to your audience. If that distracts the viewers from reality long enough to empty their wallets, so much the better.

Bring back our reputation, UMass

Matthew Lofaro

While academics are the reason we are ultimately here, I am a firm believer that things you do outside of classes and homework are the true preparation for the real world. You practice people skills every time you go out to a party, learning more about human behavior than you did in your intro psychology class. You become more mature and responsible through four years worth of mistakes, screw-ups and bad decisions; learning valuable life lessons every time you wake up handcuffed to a railing in the UMPD, blacked-out and hung over.

During my time here, I've seen and done things that most people never experience, and in my opinion, the University of Massachusetts Amherst is one of the most exciting and unpredictable places in the country.

Last August, when UMass was ranked the number nine party school in the nation, I felt an overwhelming sense of anticipation for the upcoming school year. Most every student here has pride for our school, and will be quick to speak up anytime an ignorant schmuck from UConn or UNH argues that they go to the best party school in the Northeast.

This year, however, I've noticed an indifference to preserving our school's good name. Every time I run into a friend on campus and ask him/her their plans for the weekend, I get the same, repetitive, boring response nearly every time: Goin' uptown, hittin' the bahs (bars, for those of us not from Massachusetts).

Finding a good party on a Friday night has become like the search for weapons of mass destruction in Iraq; we know they don't exist, but we look for them anyway.

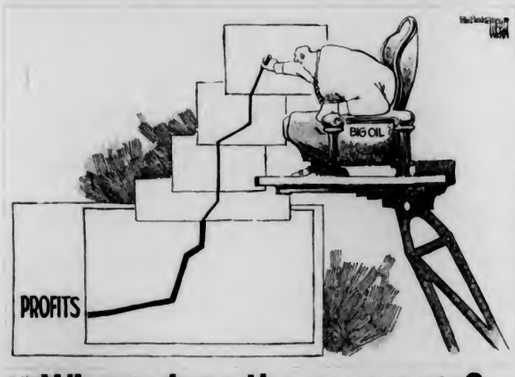
The blame is on everyone's shoulders. The upperclassmen neglect their responsibilities to throw parties in their off-campus residences and have made the bar scene the cool thing to do on the weekend. Suddenly, going to house parties has somehow become cliché, and this is influencing more underclassmen determined to prove their maturity to grab a fake ID and jump in line for the overcrowded bars uptown.

The Pub gets packed shoulder to shoulder; everyone is hot, sweaty and smelly. You wait in line for 20 minutes just to buy a beer for five bucks — the same beer that costs 60 cents at the liquor store. You spend your night fighting past the drunk girl screeching in your ear, whose sole purpose in life seems to be to knock down your drink as she flails around like she's having a seizure.

Because of many of you who feel compelled to show us how cool you are by mobbing the bars, the once proud tradition of wild house parties is becoming a thing of the past. Upperclassmen who have been shaped by parties thrown in Puffton and townhouses are now leaving their complexes deserted on Friday night so they can drive drunk to and from Amherst center, coming back with nothing but a bar napkin and a book of matches in their pockets.

Finding a good party on a Friday night has become like the search for weapons of mass destruction in Iraq; we know they don't exist, but we look for them anyway.

Wake up, UMass. I understand that the cops both on and around campus have cracked down recently, but the students at this school have never bent over for authority before. This is the home of the wildest baseball riots this side of Boston, the late, great Hobart Hoedown and completely out-of-control parties like the infamous crew house bash of fall '03. Unfortunately, there has been an absence of events this year, and any that have taken place have been mediocre at best.



Spring Weekend is this weekend, and there is a serious cause for concern. There are always skeptics who question the credibility of the Spring Concert artist, this year being the Roots.

Concert aside; there is a lack of enthusiasm in general. Many students are going away this weekend, or going home to party with their friends who are out of their schools early. While UConn's Spring Weekend festivities are all over the news, ours is bound to go by silently unless we all take personal responsibility to make this the best weekend of the year.

I can tell you firsthand that the Roots are possibly the best live band out there. The school-sponsored activities will be fun as usual, and everyone should take advantage of them. As far as our party life is concerned, it is up to each and every one of you to take the initiative to get out and have a good time.

Throw a party, get outside and don't hibernate in the bars. Be safe, and be responsible; if you don't give the cops a reason to break up a party, then they wont. Things won't just fall into your lap; you have to get out there, carpe diem and have the Spring Weekend we deserve.

Matthew Lofaro is a UMass student.

Where does the money go?

Sanam Hakim

Bowl Weekend is an annual event held in Orchard Hill and put on by Orchard Hill Area Government. This year, it is being held the weekend of May 11 to 13, and it is mainly comprised of the same traditional events: an outdoor Friday night dance between the four buildings in Orchard Hill, an outdoor barbeque and carnival on Saturday morning, and a seven-hour concert on the hill between Orchard Hill and Central.

This year, a Thursday night outdoor movie has been added to this event, and the whole event has a country theme. Not only is the entire event free, but the first 500 people to the dance on Friday get a free cowboy hat.

The planning that goes into an event as large as this one can be very fun and rewarding, especially with a good group dynamic. What may or may not seem obvious is that the cost of a large event, such as this one, is just as large as the event itself. Bowl Weekend 2006 cost approximately $20,000.

Now think about this: if Orchard Hill Area Government was given $20,000 to plan one weekend, how much more money is there, and where the heck is all that money coming from?

Well, the money comes directly from your pocket. If you look at your bill from UMass Amherst, there's $78 that goes directly to the Student Government Association. The SGA then takes this huge pool of money and allocates different groups, one of them being the Orchard Hill Area Government.

The rest of the money gets put into different committees, which allocate additional money to the groups based on need, and whatever is left over gets poured into the SGA Reserve Funds. During the year, if a group wants to plan a large event, like Bowl Weekend, they can either tap into the SGA's large pool of money or apply for grants from other large pools of money, or both. We did both.

The money itself went towards every minor detail involved in planning a large event: staging, grills, carnival equipment, speakers, food, T-shirts, prizes, renting live farm animals and more. Think about it: the cowboy hats alone cost $897.50. The numbers add up pretty quickly.

When I told my mother the cost of the event I was planning, she reminded me that $20,000 could put a kid through college and even suggested that it should. I considered the idea for a moment, and although she's right, I rejected the idea. Although assorted scholarship options sponsored by the SGA are a great idea, so is wide-scale, student run programming.

Within my ever-increasing bill from UMass, $78 is not a lot of money, especially considering the alternative: a school with no events.

Within my ever-increasing bill from UMass, $78 is not a lot of money, especially considering the alternative: a school with no events. Instead, every student contributes a small amount of money, and the money goes towards planning events. The fun part about that is all students have both access to the money and control over the money. Control comes from joining the SGA and a subcommittee of the SGA, and access comes from joining a Registered Student Organization and coming up with a good idea. Even if you have a horrible idea, you'll still probably get some funding.

Since I first came to UMass, I've had the same quote in my Instant Messenger profile by Mark Twain: "I have never let my schooling interfere with my education." College isn't just a time for us to sit in a chair, read and write papers. It's not even a time to do the same exact thing every weekend.

It's a time for us to learn about the different things we enjoy in life; a time for us to make and lose friends; a time to learn our limits. It's an opportunity to see operas in the Fine Arts Center, cheap. It's an opportunity to feed the crazy ducks in the campus pond all year around. It's an opportunity to lie out in a field and do absolutely nothing. It's a time to roll out of bed, go downstairs and have your whole weekend planned out for you by other students, doing things you wouldn't normally be doing otherwise. It's a time to have the experience of planning a $20,000 event in the first place. Which brings me to my next point.

Who the heck put me in charge of $20,000? Who knows? All I know is that Orchard Hill Area Government took your money, planned an awesome country-themed Bowl Weekend, and the whole thing is free.

Let's face it; we may have put a lot of money into it, but in 50 years, you won't tell your kids about an awesome math test or a really fascinating thesis you wrote about the climate changes in northern Vermont. You'll show them your free cowboy hat, give them your old T-shirts and show them digital photos from your crazy Bowl Weekend night at Zoomass Amherst. That's worth $20,000, don't you think?

The heart-broken talk your ear off

Malinda Govoni

It is a fact, not a mere cliché; breaking up is hard to do. Anyone who is fortunate enough to emotionally survive the loss of a girlfriend or boyfriend, best friend and lover, understands the overwhelming feelings of grief and despair, as well as the sudden desire to party like a failed child star of the '80s. And, for those of us who live through a friend's breakup, with subjection to tearful public outbursts and hours of circular conversations, the ordeal can be quite painful as well.

During the premature stages of a breakup, the emotionally fragile like to communicate their feelings. Such harmless announcements as, "Well, I'm single now, guys," can be heard. The problem is that this happens at inappropriate moments. Recently, this came to my attention at a sushi restaurant when a friend interrupted on-going conversations to awkwardly remind us of her single status with the previously mentioned announcement.

The desperation and un-timeliness of her statement made me cringe. As I popped a spicy tuna roll into my mouth, I wondered why we must be subjected to this over a birthday celebration. The breakup epilogue and the first six chapters were covered during the car ride already. Let it go for an hour.

My apathy turned to disgust as I recalled a time when such things sloppily fell out of my mouth after each of my own tumultuous breakups. At bars, over the phone, through tears of desperation, I spewed prolific amounts of information about my personal affairs. In my own defense, I made a conscious, and sometimes failed effort to filter as many irrational proclamations and out-of-place statements as possible. For an insane person, that is.

Regardless of how one chooses to deal with their temporary insanity, keeping the declarations of heart-break in check proves difficult for some.

Yes, it is true, we are somewhat out of our minds after a breakup. Look around, because it's the season for spring cleaning, or breaking up, and people are acting out of character.

Unattached women and men can be found prowling the bars, calling long lost friends or taking up hobbies that they didn't have time for before the breakup tragedy. Fresh singles, once cuddling on the couch eating ice cream with their honey, can be found at the gym working up an out-of-shape sweat.

Others even resort to therapy — my own friends have — to figure out their intimacy issues and poor mate choices. Regardless of how one chooses to deal with their temporary insanity, keeping the declarations of heartbreak in check proves difficult for some.

For instance, over drinks one weekend night a friend confessed to her ex's buddy that she was miserable and needed a boyfriend. At this point, I just stared into the bottle I was sipping from, dumbfounded. I frantically scanned my memory for any personal professions that paralleled this. Of course, I could recall nothing, but what I did realize is that my friend manages to make insipid statements without batting an eyelash or even flinching in retrospect. It's pathetic.

This level of self-inflicted humiliation over an ex warrants extreme punishment. As a matter of fact, I would accuse myself of a heinous crime and move to another country to start my life over after acting this way. In all seriousness, though, I would have a hard time respecting myself for a while.

With all that being said so un-empathetically, I implore my heartbroken peers to be discrete in what they reveal about their breakup and when. Those around you don't want to relive their own painful stupidity with flashbacks of hopeless gestures and attempts at getting attention or other embarrassing and unappetizing behaviors. You don't want to relive it either, trust me.

Keep the understandable and expected thoughts to yourself, because they loudly ring as ridiculous and annoying when spoken. Refrain from openly pouring salt into your own wound, because while your ex may be long gone years later, this behavior will come back to haunt you. I promise.

Home to me is Westchester, New York. About 45 minutes outside of the city, my town harbors some of the greats; John Scofield, Chevy Chase, the Mott's Applesauce guy (I assume his name is Mott), and my personal favorite, Martha Stewart's estate, in which she served her house arrest.

Yeah, I went to public school, but it might as well have been private. Carpeted hallways, big screen TVs in every classroom, a newly planted turf grass football field (because God forbid it rains and someone gets mud on themselves) and nicer cars in the senior parking lot than in the faculty one. My high school life felt like one big nightmare that took place in an episode of "My Super Sweet 16" (Daddy, I want a BMW. Ew, Daddy. Not a used one.), and I was happy to leave most of it behind me as I went off to pursue a higher education.

I planned never to return until I got a letter from the guidance department asking me to return to the school to speak to graduating seniors about what to expect in their first year of college. My first thought was "hell no," and then I realized that I, too, once had no clue what I was getting myself into after leaving home.

Once your teary-eyed parents wave their baby goodbye, you are literally free to do whatever you want. Maybe you'll go into town and buy your books; maybe you'll go indulge at the DC. Bottom line is that no one cares what you're doing. You're going to think that someone cares for about a month, when you're ordering Dominos at 4 a.m. because it's open and not because you're hungry. It will literally be the cheapest thrill you'll have until you visit frat row. Then it will be the second cheapest.

10:10 a.m. will become the crack of dawn, but you'll never show up to that class anyway, because, like I said, no one cares, including yourself. It won't be until two months into the semester when you find out you've been continuously screwing yourself over because your professor's handing out quizzes every lecture and you're pulling a stellar zero average. That'll teach you. Actually, probably not. Who are you kidding?

It goes without saying that the bathroom on your floor will always be in the process of being maintained whenever you have to shower. It also goes without saying that some people, rather than walking two flights of stairs to an open bathroom, will ignore hygiene all together. You'll learn that if you ever want to find a spare washing machine and dryer (which won't dry anything) you will only be successful at 4 a.m. on any given Tuesday. With, hopefully, the exception of underwear, you will wear everything in your closet nine times because you are lazy, and you already used all the money on your UCard to buy Gatorade to chase your dirty vodka. Febreze will become your new best friend. Your roommate probably won't.

You'll be fat by Christmas, and even though you'll attempt to go to Boyden gym once in a while, you'll spend more time waiting for the treadmill than actually being on one. But, according to you, you are still going to the gym.

At night you'll fall asleep to the sweet sounds of Daddy Yankee blaring from the other side of the wall, and at least one person on your floor will own an alarm clock that will wake up everyone and their mother hours before you have to be at discussion.

At least one white Irish guy in one of your classes will forget to turn off his cell phone and "Get Low" will blast for a full seven seconds — the most awkward seven seconds, because you know everyone is silently "skeet skeeting" to themselves.

Food shopping will ultimately mean bringing a huge bag down to Franklin and taking coffee cups full of Lucky Charms back to your room. Your diet will consist of whatever type of pasta is available, Panini sandwiches, french fries, Cherry Coke and frozen yogurt. You will be fat by Christmas, and even though you'll attempt to go to Boyden gym once in awhile, you'll spend more time waiting for the treadmill than actually being on one. But, according to you, you are still going to the gym.

This goes hand in hand with the notion that going to the library automatically means you're soaking up knowledge as you sit in the Learning Commons, checking your Facebook account, which will be recently updated every nine minutes.

The day you run out of money is the day you decide to get a credit card, and to you, this makes sense. You will spend more money on wings and Vitamin Water than it probably costs you to attend college for a year.

Thursday will become the new Friday, and then, eventually, Wednesday is the new Tuesday and Sunday the new March, and you're drunk all of the time, that's OK, and this is why.

College is the four years when you are given the most responsibility, but you aren't actually expected to be responsible. You get so drunk that you wake up on the floor outside the elevator shaft, it's OK because you're in college. You skip all your classes to watch a "Laguna Beach" marathon; whatever, it's just college.

Fill in your own. You're in college. The phrase "it's all relative" does not apply to the rules of a university of such prestige, and you'll realize this when you're written up for playing "Thriller" too loudly at 3 p.m., but the kid down the hall in the sub-free dorm gets moved to Van Meter because they found pot in his room. Yes, please, let that soak in for a minute.

Gone are the days of Mommy doing your laundry, having your own room, possibly your own bathroom, a meal that doesn't involve a tray, a dryer that actually works and the list goes on. Welcome to, well, not necessarily the real world, but to a world in which your standards are brought to extreme lows. Being on your own will teach you the most important lesson of all; life here is about improvisation. In short, my friend Emily doesn't own a can opener; she opens soup cans by banging at them with knives. And that, my friends, is college.

The Gradual Journey

BY DANIEL PERRAH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Bradley Mann and her spa[ce]-like Canyon Kisses Universe [to] Massachusetts. At the moment, she's in the middle of her [bed]room. Mismatched posters [cov]er the walls, the floor is [cov]ered in clothes and [boo]ks, and Sunday is the [only] day of the week [she] doesn't have class. [Mann] the typical [coll]ege student, [but] she's pursuing The Liberal Arts major.

[She] formed earlier this year and recorded a two-song demo for "Take Me Home," Bradley's voice is smooth and [sul]try as she describes her take on a one night stand. It turns [sou]r and hurt on the bittersweet "Shrapnel." In person, she's tiny. But that voice — it's big. The melodies are infectious as the music surrounding them stops and starts, hiccups, and then drives forward. The band's three guitarists — all named variations of "Matt" — blend together and change pace throughout the songs, never letting the listener get bored. It's perfect mosh pit music.

The punk scene is about as co-ed as a [pun]k scene could be. Avril has [kil]ler songs and Gwen Stefanie has great haircuts. They aren't [mu]sic writers, but on them, so the [fem]ale mold is wide open for [a] fresh sound.

Naturally, Berkley's blonde [and] punk'emo messiness [evo]kes 80s Blondie with a [twi]st — and she's all nervous [ener]gy wrapped in a retro T-shirt, [jean]s skirt and studded belt. She's the other co-ed of a 20-year old college from a middle-class [Cap]e Cod family originally from South Carolina (Southern roots [must] explain why she says "ya'll bite[s]" all the time.) Photos of friends and fans are tacked up on the wall of her room.

Berkley has been singing and performing since she was two years old (a [pro]digy, you [de]cide?) and has [wa]nted to be in a band. She was drawn to the punk scene, and had other brief flings with two bands that went nowhere. Then last December, Gradual guitarist Matt asked her to come to a band practice. She sat and developed her melodies while listening to them play, they jammed together and it just "clicked." They recorded two songs from that very first session.

Naturally, if a band would call one [of] The Gradual, you can tell it's already been around awhile. Mann (Matt Trembley), TJ Soto and Abe Correia have played together on and off for the past four years, trying to find the right combination of sound and band members. They added Matt (Matt J.) two years ago. Mat (Matt Vasta) was added as well, just before Berkley. They knew they weren't going anywhere without a singer. Now that they've found Berkley, the band is pumped and ready to get the word out.

For the past three [mo]nths, the band has juggled [Berk]ley's [sch]edule, while the rest [went] to school in Rhode [Isl]and. They've played a lot of [bas]ements and [Eve]ry Sunday, [the] band gets together to practice. Berkley believes that as the band [gro]ws, so will the [sou]nd. The music, very simply, [is] their expressed mood. As Mann [put] it, "Matt's [fee]ling like a Rock [Sta]r today, so he's [pla]ying like a Rock [Sta]r." Whatever the mood, [the] band is [ex]pressing it. Berkley believes they are in their prime. "Records scan for new talent. It's easy to see how talented [we] could slip through the [cra]cks, but they have already [begun] to develop a following. [The] base of Rhode Island [is] in its infancy, but in [the] weeks since [they] their Berkley-[era] band, they are ranked #17 on [the] Rhode [Island] page. "Six [months] ago, [we] [were] playing [to] empty [rooms]," Berkley says. "Now [we] have [people] singing [our] songs."

British rapper Mike Skinner drives third album to new heights

BY JIM FARBER
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Mike Skinner, aka "The Streets," knows it's weird being a hip-hop star from Britain.

"The rap thing and the British thing are practically opposites," he admits. "We don't talk about money and success, and you guys always talk about it. The British have no hangups about drinking at 11 a.m., and you guys do. We've got the hangup about sex."

If all this is starting to sound like some trans-Atlantic answer to "men are from Mars, women are from Venus," at least Skinner should be given credit for refusing to try to be someone he's not. While American rappers constantly taunt each other over who's "keeping it real," Skinner conforms to a completely different version of reality.

Small wonder his albums, released under the pseudonym The Streets, regularly top the U.K. charts while they only attract a cult following in the United States. That's too bad, considering Skinner's verbiage sensibility, character and — oh, yes — music are bringing something bracingly fresh to hip hop.

The Streets' third and latest album, released last week under the title "The Hardest Way to Make an Easy Living," can be read as a U.K. corollary to Eminem's "The Marshall Mathers LP." Like that Detroit rapper's CD, "Living" offers a meditation on what it's like to suddenly become ridiculously famous. But unlike Eminem's sour, self-pitying, even paranoid assessment of the situation, Skinner turns his expose into a witty and self-aware satire on himself and our collective lust for attention.

The album begins with Skinner admitting to being "off my face" at 11 a.m. From there, he sleeps with a real-life, crack-using pop star (whom he declines to name), gambles up a storm, and details the many wonderful ways pop stars get financially screwed.

The crackling humor he uses throughout undermines any complaint. "I think that's just part of being British," Skinner explains of his flip tone. "[We're] constantly joking about everything, even when we're being serious."

"In the Western world there's very little to really moan about," he continues. "If you grow up in England or America or France you can get a quality education. And if you can't get a job, the government will give you some free money."

Skinner spent his youngest years in the working-class city of Birmingham. He moved with his family to north London as a kid where he began listening to the then-vital "two step" style. This locally grown genre mixed house-oriented dance music with British hip hop. While working in fast-food joints, Skinner began detailing his brain-deadening experiences on low-budget records cut for the indie label Locked On (which boasted several stars of the late '90s two-step scene, including Tuff Jam and Artful Dodger). The songs caught on with kids and the press.

Skinner's first full album under The Streets' banner, 2002's "Original Pirate Material," struck a deep chord with British youth, courtesy of its hysterical monologues. They included things like an erudite, internal debate on the pluses and minuses of beer vs. pot. Just as the early Beastie Boys epitomized the humor of underachieving American youth, Skinner spoke for an emerging generation of Britain's secretly smart layabouts.

Skinner's followup, 2004's "A Grand Don't Come for Free," brought his talent to a new level by offering a sustained narrative that could work as a complete screenplay.

On his latest CD, Skinner again shows his storytelling skills with "Can't Con an Honest John," which offers as densely plotted a caper as a Guy Ritchie movie. Skinner spends more time, however, rapping about the embarrassments of pop stardom with a self-deprecating wit. In "When You Wasn't Famous," he complains, "how the hell am I supposed to do a line in front of complete strangers/when I know they've all got cameras?"

Skinner keeps the jokes coming, even when he raps about the death of his father, in "Never Went to Church." It opens with the line, "two great European narcotics/alcohol and Christianity/I know which one I prefer."

By the song's end, he makes a promise to his late, religious-minded dad that he'll go see "a priest, a rabbi and a Protestant clergymen/you always said I should hedge my bets."

You may have noticed by now that Skinner's raps often don't rhyme. They work only because of his eccentric rhythmic delivery. For this reason, many Americans don't consider him a rapper at all. Skinner addresses this cultural split in the cut "Two Nations."

"Two nations divided by a common language/And about 200 years of new songs and dances/but the difference is language/and just the bits you got wrong/cuz we were the ones who invented the language."

Skinner knows this schism means he's unlikely to become a major star here. But, he insists, "I don't think about success just on its own. You've got to enjoy who you are. And, no matter what, you've got to be yourself."

Mike Skinner, aka The Streets, has seen a huge jump in popularity with his British take on rapping with his third album, "Living."

Teens swap illegals for legals

BY LIZ DOUP
SOUTH FLORIDA SUN-SENTINEL

In so many ways it sounds like any other teenage party.

Kids gathered in an abandoned Florida warehouse where strobe lights flashed and liquor flowed. But then from pockets and purses, the pills appeared.

Vicodin. OxyContin. Xanax. All legal drugs destined for illegal use.

Shannon Johnson, 17, a middle-school dropout, was part of the scene. He popped four or five Xanax, washed them down with vodka and was ready to party.

Not so long ago, kids raided their parents' liquor cabinet when they wanted a quick high.

Today, it's the medicine cabinet.

They're stocking up for "pharming parties," get-togethers sans parents where teens barter legal drugs and get high.

"It's better when you're with other people," says Shannon, a slender youth, lost in a pair of baggy jeans and oversized shirt. "I don't like doing this by myself."

There's nothing new about kids abusing prescription drugs. But pharming parties are a new social twist that contribute to the growing problem of prescription drug abuse, which has worked its way into pop culture via message boards, song lyrics and even T-shirts.

The number of users has mushroomed even as use of illegal drugs, such as heroin and marijuana, has decreased, according to a report by Columbia University's National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse.

The center says that about 2.3 million kids, 12 to 17, took prescription drugs illegally in the past year, based on 2003 figures. That's a whopping 212 percent increase from 1992.

Shannon tumbled into the drug world at 10 with his first puff of marijuana. He's tried a cornucopia of drugs since, including Xanax from the family medicine cabinet, he says. But the kids who snag the family's pills share no cookie-cutter look.

"There's no specific group you can pinpoint," says Doris Carroll, community coordinator of the Palm Beach County (Fla.) Substance Abuse Coalition. "It's not just dropouts. It's not just popular kids. It's not just football players."

Much of the problem is linked to easy access, she says.

Indeed, some kids come by the drugs legally. Maybe they're taking Ritalin for attention deficit disorder or painkillers after losing their wisdom teeth or breaking a bone.

Others pillage medicine cabinets for forgotten pills. Some buy from kids. For others, drugs are a click away on the Internet.

"Kids think, 'It's not heroin. It's not crack. It's a legal drug. How bad can that be?'" says Barbara Zohlman, executive director of Miami-Dade's DFYTI (Drug Free Youth In Town), a school-based drug-prevention program.

In our quick-fix world, kids see adults, who'd never touch an illegal drug, fill prescriptions to treat everything from physical pain to anxiety. Meanwhile, pharmaceutical companies via TV and magazines hype drugs that promise a happier, thinner, more energetic you, all by popping a pill.

Between 1992 and 2002, while the U.S. population grew 13 percent, the number of prescriptions filled for controlled drugs — those with an abuse risk, such as morphine — increased by 154 percent, according to the study.

"We're a society of pill takers," Zohlman says. "We look at something to make us feel better rather than looking inside to make ourselves feel better."

Shannon slumps in a chair at the Starting Place, a treatment facility in Hollywood, Fla., where he's spending three months trying to shake his habit. Beside him sits Kyle Kahler, a fast-talking, energetic 16-year-old who squirms in his chair.

School dropouts at 14, they're both pharming party veterans. And addicts.

Kids like Shannon and Kyle can easily get addicted to painkillers, such as OxyContin or anti-anxiety medicines such as Xanax. But even if their drug use doesn't land them in treatment, it can put them in the hospital.

When properly prescribed and taken as directed, opioids such as OxyContin safely relieve pain. Depressants, including Xanax, ease anxiety. And stimulants such as Ritalin increase attention and energy.

But taking such powerful drugs without supervision or mixing them with others, including alcohol, is a recipe for disaster. They can make breathing difficult or cause a rapid drop or increase in heart rate. They can impair senses so that everyday activities, such as driving a car, are hazardous.

In addition, kids up the danger factor by taking pills in unsafe ways. OxyContin, for instance, is supposed to be released into the bloodstream over several hours for long-term pain relief. But kids crush the pills for a quicker, and potentially more harmful, rush.

About 75 percent of prescription drug abusers also take other drugs or drink, according to the Columbia University report. Shannon and Kyle are no exception, routinely mixing legal pharmaceuticals with illegal drugs.

"You feel like you're on some kind of truth serum," says Kyle, who started smoking marijuana at 10 before moving on to prescription drugs as a teenager. "You have no inhibitions or fears. You feel like you can fight the biggest guy."

Shannon took his first prescription drug illegally at 12. He was at a party and someone offered him a Xanax. Already drunk, he took it.

He's been mixing drugs, legal and illegal, ever since.

Valium. OxyContin. Muscle relaxers. Marijuana. Cocaine. Alcohol.

Sometimes, he'll pop a pill and doesn't even know what it is. Logic tells him that prescription drugs are safer than the street stuff. Because if they didn't help you out, why would a doctor prescribe them, he reasons.

He knows by combining drugs he's playing a dangerous game, but he doesn't care.

"When I get stressed out, it's a way to feel better," he says. "I feel like Superman. I feel I could do anything."

Getting the drugs is no problem. The boys buy from friends — OxyContin $12 to $15 a pill or Xanax for $3. Valium goes for $4 to $5 a pop.

Sometimes kids trade with each other — a couple of Valium for a more powerful OxyContin.

At school or on the street, word of a pharming party drifts like smoke. Maybe they'll meet at someone's house when the parents are gone or rent a hotel room or find an abandoned warehouse.

Shannon was glad to be in the loop. When he got wind of a party, he wanted to be there.

"You're so much happier when you're fked up," he says. "It's all good."

The OxyContin pill, seen above, is just one of the many pharmaceutical drugs widely used today.

Egypt demands return of mask

BY JEFF DOUGLAS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. LOUIS (AP) — If only the 3,000-year-old mummy mask at the Saint Louis Art Museum could talk. Maybe then the mystery of its rightful owner could be laid to rest, much like it was in an ancient Egyptian pyramid so many ages ago.

The Supreme Council of Antiquities for Egypt has given the Saint Louis Art Museum a May 15 deadline to turn over the burial mask of Ka Nefer Nefer, which they believe left the country illegally.

Officials with the museum are evaluating documents from the council that seek to prove that the mask from around 1307-1196 B.C., could have been stolen from an Egyptian Museum storage room.

"We don't feel like we've seen everything yet," Saint Louis Art Museum Director Brent Benjamin said. "It's premature to speculate what the outcome will be. We are looking at documentation and we are still awaiting other materials from Egypt."

Benjamin would not say if the museum planned to meet the deadline.

Egypt's antiquities council first made the claim in late February that the mask could have been stolen in the 1980s when an Egyptian Museum storage room was looted in Cairo.

Zahi Hawass, Egypt's antiquities chief, said he has grown impatient with the St. Louis museum and will turn the matter over to law enforcement or the legal system if the museum does not act soon.

"I have sent them all the proof they need," Hawass said. "I don't understand why they insist on fighting this."

Hawass said under no circumstances could the mask have reached the United States legally because it belonged to the Egyptian Museum and there is no indication that the museum ever sold it.

The museum bought the mask from an art dealer in the United States in 1998 for about $500,000, only after checking with authorities and the international Art Loss Register to see if the item was stolen. The Museum also approved the purchase with the Egyptian Museum, Benjamin said.

The burial cover for the Egyptian woman, made of wood and plaster with glass eyes, was excavated from a pyramid in 1952 in Saqqara, Egypt. Hawass said because of poor record-keeping practices, it was documented only once in 1959.

Benjamin said that so far, he believes his museum did everything it could to obtain the mask legally and in good faith. He said that the museum has a money-back guarantee with the dealer, if the mask has to be returned to Egypt.

The Saint Louis Art Museum's strongest piece of evidence that the item was not stolen is a letter from a Swiss collector included in the mask's provenance, an account of the item's history. The collector is said to have bought the mask in the early 1960s and kept it for more than 30 years until selling it in the 1990s to Ali Aboutaam and his brother Hicham Aboutaam, who run Phoenix Ancient Art in Switzerland and New York. Benjamin said that collector has asked to remain anonymous.

This case is one of several where source countries are trying to reclaim cultural objects that they believe inappropriately left their country, according to Sharon Flescher, director of the International Foundation for Art Research (IFAR).

"The art world in general is grappling with how to respond to these types of claims in an ethical and responsible manner," Flescher said.

The Egyptian mask, discovered in 1952 in a step pyramid, was brought to the St. Louis museum in 1998.

The Gradual Journey

BY DAVID PESSAH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Berkley Sloss sits in her spacious bedroom in the maze-like Kappa Kappa Gamma house on the campus of the University of Massachusetts. At her command, she's on the brink of an Major Metropolitan rock band. The drummer, the bassist, the lead guitarist, a 22-year-old singer who completes the voice and image we crave, who needs a stronger voice and image. The Gradual is her future stage.

The band has formed early but has not recorded a two-song demo. On "Take Me Home," Berkley's voice is smooth and sweet as she describes her take on a one night stand. It turns creep and hurt on the bittersweet "Shrapnel." In person, she's tiny. But that voice — it's big. The melodies are infectious as the music surrounding them stops and starts, hiccups, and then drives forward. The band's three guitarists — all named variations of "Matt" — blend together and change pace throughout the songs, never letting the listener get bored. It's perfect mosh pit music.

The punk scene is about as co-ed as a [illegible] locker room. Avril has Joni Mitchell and Gwen Stefanie has [illegible] bananas. There aren't many others between them, so the punk field is wide open for females with a fresh sound.

Fortunately, Berkley's blonde hair is all punk-emo messiness — I think '80s Blondie with a [illegible] — and she's all nervous energy wrapped in a retro T-shirt, black pants and a studded belt. She's the older sister of a 20-year-old Marine from a middle-class Cuban family originally from South Carolina. (Southern roots must explain why she says "ya'll bitches" all the time.) Photos of friends and family are tacked up on the walls of her room.

Berkley has been singing and performing since she was two years old in pre-school, and decided early on that she wanted to sing in a band. She was drawn to the punk scene, and had other brief flings with two bands that went nowhere. Then last December, Gradual guitarist Matt asked her to come to a band practice. She sat and developed her melodies while listening to the play, they jammed together and it just "clicked." They recorded two songs from that very first session.

Naturally, if a band would call itself the Gradual, you can tell it's already been around awhile. Matt (Matt Trembley), TJ Soto and Abe Correia have played together on and off for the past four years, trying to find the right combination of sound and band members. They added Matt (Matt) two years ago. Mat (Matt Vamp) was added as well, just before Berkley. They knew they were signing anywhere without a singer. Now that they've found Berkley, the band is pumped and ready to get the word out.

For the past three [illegible] the band has juggled [illegible] Berkley is a senior [illegible] while the rest [illegible] school in Rhode [illegible] a lot of [illegible] Every Sunday, they meet at [illegible] house for [illegible] They practice [illegible] on both bands' gold Mondays before Berkley has to head back. The band's seven songs, along [illegible] date to record an EP in May. It's [illegible] to be a flash [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] stubborn" throughout the recruiting process — could play anywhere and have a successful career, but here at UMass, a mediocre program looking to regain its national title form from the 1980s, she could be a star by leaps and bounds. She could be, as Pedrick put it, "a stud."

UMass also had another advantage: cohesiveness. Bolduc's infectious warmth and youthfulness rubs off on her players, making for a team that bonds like superglue and, wins and losses aside, likes to have fun out there.

This is evident in the minutes leading up to the game at Garber Field, where handfuls of players are often dancing around to whatever music is blaring over the loudspeakers (try pulling something like that on Pat Summit's watch).

"That had everything to do with [my decision]," McCormick said of the team's unity. "I love the program, I love where it's at, and coming here I knew I could make an impact in my first year — if not, second — but definitely, when I came here, it was all about the team, coaches, everything. I just loved the school. I knew it was such a young team that in the future we would do great things."

Keeping things simple, Bolduc advertised the school, without any bells and whistles.

"I didn't do anything different," says Bolduc, whose 2005 recruiting class features three high school All-Americans, including McCormick. "Either you like the school or you don't. You can't sell what the school isn't.

"[Rory] was a nice bonus, him being here for a year helped her understand what UMass is all about."

McCormick signed last spring "at the last minute" and has quickly made an impact on the field. She currently ranks second on the team in points (35) behind sophomore Kathleen Typadis (42), and has been making big splashes since the moment she laced up the shoes to take the field.

While the trip to the Carrier Dome to take on Syracuse pops into McCormick's head when asked to name her biggest moment of the year so far (the Minutewomen, for the record, lost that night 15-9), Bolduc cites McCormick's first game in Maroon and White as the best.

That snowy afternoon atop Worcester's Pakachoag Hill (also known as Mount St. James), site of the opposing College of the Holy Cross, the Minutewomen were short two starters on defense. Bolduc placed McCormick, normally an attacking midfielder, in the back.

Despite losing to the Crusaders 11-8, with the field blanketed in a good inch-and-a-half of snow, McCormick electrified. She led all scorers with four goals on five shots, and scooped up four ground balls in what was her first and only start on defense. Bolduc immediately moved her up to attack following the game, and the results speak for themselves.

Bolduc had sparse but strong words to say of that performance: "Holy Cow."

It won't be the last time those words roll off her tongue.

As far as team chemistry is concerned, McCormick has been a quick adapter as well ("I like her character best; she's full of life, a pleasure to be around," Bolduc says). On a team where uniqueness in dress is the common thread, everyone has their own style — white knee socks, black quarter-length socks, black tights, pink wristbands, white headband, black-and-white socks, you name it. McCormick ups the ante, however, with fire-engine-red knee-high socks and a matching bandanna wrapped snug around her forehead.

You can spot her from a mile away sporting what she calls a tradition she's had since high school, but it's the only way she'll have it. The socks have become "ratty and worn," in her words, but the tradition lives on.

Through 2006, McCormick and Typadis have teamed up on the attack to form one of the more exciting scoring tandems in the Atlantic 10. The ying to each other's yang, their contrasting styles play off each other beautifully.

McCormick, at 5-foot-7, is a hard-charging bruiser, fighting her way through defenses like a Mack Truck with one goal in mind: the opponent's goal. Typadis, at 5-foot-2, has become more of a cranial player, bouncing off and swinging around defenders with cat-like grace, and making some speedy cuts and weaves through the middle of the defense for some sweet scores.

"I look up to Kath a lot," McCormick says. "We have totally different playing styles, and she's just a phenomenal athlete. I love having her to play with. It's fun."

As far as that other companion is concerned, Kayt and Rory still keep in touch. While they live on opposite sides of Southwest Residential Area on campus, and are off doing their own things in their own social groups, they still talk a lot.

"We're doing our own thing, keeping in touch, but we definitely support each other," Pedrick says. "I talk to her just as much as any of the other girls on the team. I support her, and she supports me. It's good."

That's for sure. Whenever Kayt's got a problem, all she has to do is call up the kid who's been looking after her since they first met over a decade ago.

Advice? Dilemma? Confused? Just plain bored? Strike up those digits on the cell phone. It's as if they're still in Saratoga, playing another game of toss.

As James Taylor might sing, she's got a friend.

UMass freshman Kayt McCormick was recruited by the likes of Johns Hopkins and Duke, but she preferred the atmosphere at Garber Field, an attraction that brought her from New York to Amherst.

Bryant, Jackson welcome their newborns

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

Kobe Bryant is a new father. So, in a way, is Phil Jackson.

Kobe has a brand new baby girl, delivered conveniently on an off day by his wife, Vanessa, in Los Angeles.

Jackson has a brand new team, delivered late in the season and growing up quickly in the playoffs.

Unlike Jackson, Kobe will have to make room in his family for one more person.

That should be easy, because he's already learning to make room for four other players on the Lakers.

For a long time, it seemed all Bryant would be remembered for this season was scoring 81 points against Toronto, averaging 35.4 a game for the year, and hogging the ball every game while his teammates stood around watching.

That's all forgotten now.

Stunningly, one of the most self-absorbed players in the game has suddenly turned into a team player. It may not last, but Bryant certainly picked a good time to change his stripes.

Somewhere, somehow, a light bulb must have gone off in Bryant's head. How else are you going to explain the craziness in Los Angeles on Sunday?

At one point late in the game, Steve Nash and Jack Nicholson were seen laughing together as if they couldn't figure it out, either. The Zen master on the bench didn't look surprised, but, then again, Jackson never looks surprised.

The shot Bryant took to send the game into overtime and the one he made to win the game as time ran out already have their place in Lakers' lore. But those kinds of shots are expected from Bryant — he's made them throughout his career when it mattered most.

What wasn't expected was the way he played the rest of the time.

Take away the two huge baskets, and Bryant took only 12 shots the rest of the game. And, this time, it wasn't because he was pouting about teammates calling him selfish.

Meet the new Kobe Bryant: team player, humble winner.

"It was the most fun shot I've ever hit, just because it's us, enjoying this as a unit," Bryant said after hitting Sunday's game winner.

Bryant's followers, of course, will argue that he was always about team and winning. The old Kobe, though, figured the best way to do that was to take over every game.

That wasn't going to work in this playoff series, against a team with a reputed (published reports say he has won this year's yet-to-be-announced award) two-time MVP in Steve Nash. Jackson figured that out long ago, and Bryant must have gotten a clue when he scored 51 points against the Suns earlier this month in the regular season and the Lakers still got beat by 11.

So, for the playoffs, there was a new strategy. Jackson told the team to concentrate on banging the ball inside against the Suns, and talked with Bryant about the previously foreign concept of looking for his teammates first.

It didn't quite work in the first game, and maybe because the player Jackson wrote was uncoachable was trying to prove to his coach how coachable he can be when he wants to be.

Indeed, the criticism out of LA after the first game was that Bryant was too passive and that the Lakers gave away a game they could have stolen in Phoenix. The expectation was that Bryant would come out and shoot at will in the second game.

A funny thing happened. He didn't.

The Lakers won the next three with Bryant looking for open teammates, taking shots sparingly and exhorting the other Lakers to play hard. When the game was on the line, Bryant delivered, but his teammates began delivering, too.

Luke Walton was everywhere. Lamar Odom looks like a new player. Kwame Brown is a force on the inside that had been missing, and Smush Parker made the play of the playoffs to give the Lakers a chance to win it.

It helps that this very young team is beginning to understand Jackson's triangle offense. It helps more that, with Bryant playing the role of general instead of an artillery sergeant, the players around him are growing in confidence at just the right time.

"Kobe's our leader, but everybody here in the Laker organization knows we have a group of guys who can play basketball," Parker said.

That leadership didn't end on the court. When the Lakers were done hugging each other Sunday, they went to the locker room, where Bryant stood and pointed out the contributions made by every player.

Jackson, meanwhile, slipped his first Lakers championship ring from 2000 on a finger to let his team know it is playoff time, and wrote 15 on the chalkboard after the first win in Phoenix, meaning the number of games the Lakers need to win for another championship.

A few weeks ago, no one would have thought it possible. It's still not probable, but, then again, who would have thought the Lakers and Clippers might one day meet in an all-Staples Center playoff series?

Right now, Bryant is a proud papa.

And Jackson is getting prouder by the day.

Los Angeles Lakers star Kobe Bryant has adapted to coach Phil Jackson's team-oriented system in the playoff series against the Suns.

Tales of sex, booze and golf in Daly book

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Typical of how he plays, John Daly holds nothing back in his new book.

There are stories of how he lost 60 pounds in college by drinking a fifth of whiskey and smoking three packs of cigarettes a day. One of the longest chapters is devoted to sexual exploits with his four wives and a woman he calls "Almost Ex No. 4." In a harrowing account, he writes about the time his father put a gun to Daly's head in a drunken rage.

But all anyone really needs to know about Daly is this — he named his second daughter after a rehab center.

That would be "Sierra," as in Sierra Tucson, the Arizona clinic where Daly spent three weeks in January 1993 after trashing his Colorado house so badly the police were called.

Clearly, this isn't the stock variety of PGA Tour player autobiographies.

"John Daly: My Life In and Out of the Rough" will be in bookstores Monday, and no one will mistake it for Ben Hogan's book on the fundamentals of modern golf.

"It's the truth. I'm not going to sidestep anything," Daly said yesterday. "It brings back memories of stupid stuff I've done in my life, and good stuff. It was honest."

And it is sure to enhance his grip-and-rip-it reputation.

Some highlights:

— He got disqualified from a junior event in Atlanta when officials found a bottle of whiskey in his bag.

— Forced to lose 60 pounds at Arkansas if he wanted to play on his college team, he once went three days without hardly any food, drinking four bottles of whiskey until he passed out in his room and had to be taken to the emergency room.

"But you know what? My cigarettes-popcorn-whiskey diet worked," Daly wrote. "The pounds just peeled right off. By Christmas, I'd lost 65 pounds. I probably ought to have written a diet book or something."

— He said he has lost between $50 million and $60 million during 12 years of heavy gambling, and owed $4 million to casinos until he won the 1995 British Open, which enabled him to pay off the debt. Daly says Callaway Golf took care of a $1.7 million gambling debt when he signed an endorsement deal in 1997, after his second stint in alcohol rehab.

The second trip to rehab was the Betty Ford Center. For those wondering, Daly's next child was a boy.

No doubt, the book is causing great consternation at PGA Tour headquarters, where commissioner Tim Finchem rarely misses the chance to talk to players about upholding their clean image. Finchem called Daly on Monday to discuss the book. Daly called their conversation "positive," whatever that means.

"It's tough to match what the tour wants with what the publisher wants," Daly said.

Finchem said Monday that nothing in the book violates PGA Tour regulations. The only violation in question falls under "conduct unbecoming a professional," although such conduct isn't spelled out in the players' handbook.

Even if it were, Daly has an answer for that, too.

"My life is unbecoming of a professional," he said. "It's hard to state it in anybody else's words."

Daly's lifestyle borders on depravity. His actions lie somewhere between irrational and irresponsible.

He has trashed hotel rooms in South Africa and Florida, and stood in the kitchen of his Colorado home breaking everything he could touch. Given handsome appearance fees to play around the world, he has rewarded tournaments by tanking rounds or getting disqualified. It is rare to see him without his gut hanging over his belt and a cigarette dangling from his lips.

Yet he remains one of the more popular figures in golf. Perhaps people relate so well to Daly because everyone has flaws, and everyone knows about his. In an era when celebrities deny anything that might be remotely disparaging, Daly hides nothing.

Will the book cost him any fans?

"I hope not," Daly said. "I might gain some."

The book is sure to put him in demand, and perhaps he can use the money to support his gambling habit. Daly says he lost $1.65 million in five hours — mostly on a $5,000 slot machine — after losing in a playoff against Tiger Woods at a World Golf Championship last year in San Francisco.

Pedrick guides McCormick to the top

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

You could really start this story anywhere. Pick a time and place. Whether it's a snowy late February afternoon atop one of Worcester's famed Seven Hills, inside the exhilarating confines of Syracuse University's Carrier Dome, or even Garber Field's own unforgiving Astroturf, this story practically writes itself on current merits alone.

High School All-American. Freshman sensation. Superstardom forthcoming. Re-written record book to follow.

But what you really need to do is dig deep and go back 12 years to Saratoga Springs, a medium-sized suburb of Albany in upstate New York where nine-year-old Rory Pedrick had just moved into town.

He eventually moved onto a street called Sherwood Trail across from pal Kayt McCormick before seventh grade, and the two became close friends shortly after.

Kayt had an older brother, Brendan, who hung out and played sports with Pedrick (Rory is a year older than Kayt) and as a result, she started to tag along with the group. Turns out she was able to hold her own with the boys, whatever sport they were playing.

Then one day, sitting in the McCormicks' kitchen with Kayt — then a seventh-grader — and her mother, Rory pitched them an idea: why not drop soccer, the sport she was currently involved in, and pick up a lacrosse stick?

"I told her, 'Kayt, I'll teach you how to play,'" Pedrick said. "She was like 'What's that?' like she didn't even know. I said, 'You've got to play lacrosse.' My older sister played, so I went across the street, said 'Come throw with me,' and she did. I was whipping the ball at Kayt, and she was catching it like it was nothing. She just picked it up so quick."

Things soon blossomed on the field. As a lacrosse player at Saratoga High School, McCormick's height and frame gave her serious advantage on attack, but was constantly subject to double-teams and face-guards. Yet in spite of all this, she fought off defenders with the intensity of a bull and the ease of flicking a bug, earning career marks of 202 goals and 65 assists for 267 points. In addition to being a field hockey All-American, she became the first player in school history win Player of the Year and U.S. Lacrosse All-American twice each.

Flashes of a mean competitive streak were evident early. Pedrick reminisces about a soccer tournament ages ago when McCormick would race him, Brendan and their teammates to see who was faster. The winner was — yep — McCormick, who was two years the junior of most of the kids on Pedrick's team.

When Pedrick told her to make sure she was good at throwing either left or right, she aced it. Everything she was taught from the boys, she adapted to quickly. Very quickly.

McCormick isn't hesitant to credit her style to playing around with Pedrick and the boys ("I guess that's where I get my aggressiveness from," she laughs).

But more importantly to be noted is Pedrick's role to the McCormick family. When Kayt was a sixth-grader, her father died of cancer, leaving her without a true father figure in her life. Leave it to Brendan and Pedrick, who gave her assurance that she always had someone to turn to across the street — anytime she needed help with anything.

"She looked out for me, and I was always on the lookout for her, trying to tell her the right thing to do as far as sports," Pedrick says. "Socially, she held her own, but as far as decisions [on the field] and how she could get better, she looked to me."

One might even argue that Pedrick's influence extended to the fateful choice of which college to attend — and she had plenty of choices. Being the lacrosse hotbed that it is, scouts swarm to upstate New York on a yearly basis, and McCormick was no exception, garnering looks from big-time schools such as Johns Hopkins, Northwestern and Duke.

Funny thing — well, considering recent history, probably not — is, she almost went down to Durham, N.C., to matriculate and compete at Duke.

"Had I gone, I probably would have transferred," she says when asked of her reaction to the recent men's lacrosse scandal. "It disgusts me. I think about it, and I'm [thinking], why is one of the top programs, one of the top schools academically ... it just triggers my mind that kids with such higher class would stoop so low. If I were on the women's team, I definitely would have transferred out of there."

Pedrick signed with Massachusetts in 2004, and as a freshman last season, he scored just one goal in seven games at midfield. This season, Pedrick has evolved from sparse role player to 12th man, ranking third on the team in points (22 points on nine goals and 13 assists) despite making no starts through 13 games.

When word got around that UMass women's lacrosse coach Carrie Bolduc — an Albany native who attended one of Saratoga's rival schools, Albany Academy for Girls — was interested in her, Pedrick had some words of encouragement for Kayt that proved beneficial in Bolduc's recruiting plan.

UMass rained out

Minutewomen to take field against BC today

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Miserable, rainy weather and cold temperatures forced the cancellation of Tuesday afternoon's doubleheader between the Massachusetts softball team (32-13, 12-2 A-10) and Maine. Because the matchup was a non-conference meeting, no rain date was set to make up the games.

The extra day off may be a blessing for the Minutewomen, who were slated to play three days in a row, including two doubleheaders. The team is coming off a sweep of Rhode Island (20-25, 8-10 A-10) on Monday that included 30 hits for the home team.

Freshman Whitney Mollica continued to dominate at the plate with five hits of her own. The third baseman also tied the Atlantic 10 single-season RBI record with a six-RBI performance against the Rams, moving her total to 56. Mollica now needs just one RBI to take sole possession of the A-10 RBI record. She is currently tied with Fordham's Laura Klaiber, who knocked in 56 runs a year ago.

The Minutewomen hope to return to the field today for the second half of their home-and-home series with Boston College (21-24). BC is struggling in their first season in the Atlantic Coast Conference. They are currently in last place in the ACC at 6-15.

UMass is now 37-4 all-time against the Eagles after winning the first meeting of the season in Chestnut Hill, 6-0, behind a seven-strikeout performance by freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter.

Senior KJ Kelley is chasing an RBI mark of her own. The catcher for the Minutewomen is five RBIs short of breaking UMass's all-time RBI record, currently held by Scooter Wheeler. Kelley also recently claimed the career walks record for UMass when she drew a pair of walks last week against Central Connecticut.

Another UMass batter lighting it up at the plate is junior Candice Molinari, who has hit safely in 20 straight games. Hitting out of the two-spot in the UMass lineup, the centerfielder has a .522 batting average, scoring 26 runs during the streak.

Samantha Salato is also thriving on offense. The freshman is currently hitting .455 as the Minutewomen's primary pinch-hitter. In 50 at-bats this season, Salato has 18 hits, 3 home runs and 15 RBI. She is also second on the team behind Mollica with a .680 slugging percentage.

The Minutewomen currently hold the top spot in the A-10 and would be the No. 1 seed in the conference tournament if the season ended today. They hold a two-game lead on A-10 newcomer Charlotte (38-11, 13-3 A-10), but the final week of the regular season could shake things up in the final standings.

The 49ers have a virtual game-in-hand on the Minutewomen coming down the home stretch of the regular season. UMass will make its final A-10 stop Friday at St. Bonaventure (19-19, 11-5), currently in fourth place in the conference. Meanwhile Charlotte will host third-place Temple the same day before closing out its season at home against Saint Joseph's on Sunday.

The Minutewomen will conclude their season on Sunday as well, when UConn visits the UMass Softball Complex for the second half of another home-and-home series. Sunday is also Senior Day for the Minutewomen, where seniors Kelley, Jenna Busa, Kristi Stefanoni and Lesley Ferrara will bid goodbye to their home field.

Dietz brings crew to prominence

By Joey White
Collegian Staff

Trivia question: Can you name the most dominating team in the Atlantic 10 Conference?

The answer is the Massachusetts women's crew team. On April 22, UMass won its 11th consecutive A-10 Championship. The 11-championship title streak is the longest in any sport in A-10 history.

The Atlantic 10 was the first conference to have a women's rowing championship, starting in 1996, which means that the Minutewomen have won every single title.

Quite the big accomplishment. And to whom does the program owe a great deal of gratitude for its success?

Head coach Jim Dietz, who has been the only crew coach in UMass history, even before it came to be a varsity sport here.

Dietz joined the existing program in 1995, which had been a club team since the 1970s, with intent of making the leap into the varsity world.

"Basically, UMass made me an offer I couldn't refuse," Dietz said. "It was on the onset of women's rowing taking off as an NCAA varsity sport."

It was former UMass athletic director Bob Marcum and Tom Carhart, a big supporter of the club team, who approached Dietz with that "offer he couldn't refuse."

In his previous nine years before making the move to Amherst, Dietz was the head coach of the Coast Guard Academy program. He was in charge of the overall program, which consisted of over 90 student-athletes.

Dietz is not only known in college competition, but is also known worldwide.

His rowing experience started in 1964 when he competed for the New York Athletic Club. This is where his life's successes in rowing started.

In high school he won all the United States and Canadian Scholastic championships from 1964-67, and he also won the first Junior World Championship in single sculls in Ratzeburg, Germany in 1967.

In all, Dietz has won 45 United States and 37 Canadian national championship titles.

He was a member of the 1972, 1976 and 1980 U.S. Olympic teams and coached the U.S. Olympic teams in 1988, 1992 and 2000, all of which, he admits, has added to his success for UMass.

"[All those accomplishments] helped teach me to be a better coach," said Dietz, seven-time A-10 Coach of the Year. "And to not be controlling, but to sit back and watch."

He does more than watch, as most of his athletes have never rowed before, and he has led some of girls to Olympic status.

Both Sara Jones (1996) and Sarah Lauritzen (1997) competed on the 2000 and 2004 U.S. Olympic teams.

With his experience and accomplishments and his athletes' inexperience, Dietz still strongly believes that the girls who compete for him are the biggest reason for the success of the Maroon and White.

"I think it's the type of person you get coming to the University of Massachusetts," Dietz said. "Ninety-seven percent of our team are walk-ons. They were good high school athletes in other sports — never rowed before — that have been able to make the transition."

These athletes, whom you may never see because you are sleeping, are up at 4:30 every morning to train. Commitment is a strong word, a backbone, to these girls.

"It's a sport that's driven by the athletes," Dietz said. "I think all of our coaches have a real sense of what it takes to win and can teach the technique that it takes to win, but it's the athletes that push themselves to achieve that success.

"They don't want to be the team that loses the first A-10s."

No Minutewoman team has failed that task yet.

But Dietz's Minutewomen not only succeed in the waters; they also succeed in the classroom.

The crew team has consistently added up 28 percent of UMass's A-10 Commissioner's Honor Roll selections. The program has also produced a league-leading 21 A-10 Academic All-Conference performers, nine Collegiate Rowing Coaches Association National Scholar Athletes who have earned a total of 15 citations and four U.S. Rowing Association Academic All-Americans.

UMass is in prime location for success in crew, as it's only seven miles away from the Connecticut River, and — depending on traffic — only a 12-minute commute to the boathouse.

"We have a perfect training venue where we're not interrupted all the time," Dietz said.

"Our geographical location also adds to the success of the program. We don't have to travel far to face good competition. I wouldn't want to be like Texas and have to fly to all our races."

New England is big in rowing history and is where you'll find a lot of your competition.

"I think my time here at UMass has been very fruitful. We've brought UMass women's [crew] to a level of prominence," Dietz said.

The only failure that Dietz is upset about in his 12 years in the program is the lack of a new boathouse for the team.

"We're recruiting against Harvard and BU ... we drive down to their boathouses, and we look like we're still a club program."

The lack of support hasn't stopped the success of the Minutewomen yet, who will be defending their Eastern College Athletic Conference title this weekend in Worcester.

Maybe sometime in your stay here at UMass, you could make the short drive to the river and check out the best team the University has to offer. And maybe you would like to be part of something special, a winning family, and join the Maroon and White.

"I think after 12 years and your alumni start showing up at your races pushing baby carriages — I think that adds to the success of your program," Dietz said. "Not only have they made the transition of being good athletes, but now are doing great things."

Senators plan major changes to SGA system

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association President Elvis Mendez and Speaker Sean Bliss are calling for a massive transformation of various procedures in the senate, most notably the senate election process.

In an effort in improve the level of productivity throughout the SGA, senators approved a bill that cuts the Senate from 80 senators to 49.

"Look at this senate," said SGA speaker Sean Bliss. "This senate has been half-full since last semester. There should be 92 senators here. The SGA is a joke right now."

Bliss complained that some senators were able to be elected with as little as one vote and that having fewer senators would create healthy competition in elections.

"For many senators, there's no respect for the senate seat," said Bliss.

Bliss said the motion would also create more accountability for senators.

"Fewer seats will make sure that the students that do get in really want to be in," Bliss added.

Mendez was in full support of the slash in the number of senators.

"The SGA is in need of a massive re-haul," said Mendez. "We need to change the way we do our budget, the way we allocate space and change the way senators get into senate."

Mendez feels that having fewer seats would force senators to hold a higher sense of accountability for their 500 constituents.

"We want people that will appreciate their place and feel as though they have to truly represent their constituents," said Mendez.

Senators also approved the 2006 Fiscal Year Budget for Registered Student Organizations and agencies.

Chairman of the Ways and Means committee Shawn Robinson said that he felt it was important to substantially fund RSOs and agencies and students should be ready to see an increase in their $81 student activities fee.

"By passing this budget we're accepting the reality of a student activities fee increase within the next two years."

Police execute Coolidge drug bust

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Officers from numerous police departments searched the rooms of five residents of Coolidge dormitory shortly before 5 a.m. yesterday and made four arrests on charges of drug trafficking and drug possession.

Gregory G. Warfield, 19, of 619 Falmouth Road in Hyannis, was arrested for possession of a Class D substance (marijuana); Evelyn F. Alejandro, 23, of 63 Sheridan Street in Chicopee, was arrested for possession of a Class D substance (marijuana); possession of a Class B substance with the intent to distribute and trafficking in cocaine; Jose A. Molina, 22, of 655 Ash Street in Brockton, was arrested for trafficking in cocaine and possession of a Class B drug with intent to distribute; and Harrison J. Ogbunzie, 21, of 120 Abbott Street in Springfield, was arrested for trafficking in cocaine and possession of a Class B substance with the intent to distribute. The arrests were made at approximately 4:50 a.m.

According to a press release issued by University of Massachusetts Police Chief Barbara O'Connor, the arrests "concluded a nine month investigation into the distribution of drugs on the Amherst campus with the service of five search warrants." Officers from different police departments and divisions were present in the investigation, including UMass Police, Hampshire-Franklin Gang & Narcotics Task Force, the Amherst Police Department, K-9 units from the Ludlow and Southwick Police Departments, and the Massachusetts State Police Narcotics Unit of the Northwestern District Attorney's Office.

Police confiscated approximately 38.7 grams of cocaine with an estimated street value of $2,000, marijuana, narcotics packaging, cash, and drug paraphernalia.

After the arrest, the accused four appeared in Eastern Hampshire County District Court, in Hadley, where they all received a continuation of a pre-trial hearing to June 6. Warfield was released on personal recognizance and Alejandro posted $1,000 bail, while Ogbunzie and Molina were held on $5,000 and $10,000 bail, respectively. Ogbunzie and Molina were both transported to Hampshire County House

Fraternity collects donations to benefit shelters

By Steve Stafford
Collegian Correspondent

The national service fraternity, Alpha Phi Omega is sponsoring its annual "Fill-a-Bus" event this week to gather a bus-load of donations for charity.

The co-ed fraternity is seeking donations of clothing, money, non-perishable food, camping equipment and small appliances. These donations will then be given to Broderick House and Main Street shelters in Holyoke.

Daniel Lachar, Service Vice President of Alpha Phi Omega, said that often these two shelters have been neglected.

"Amherst and Northampton are two very generous communities," he said. "But Holyoke often gets overlooked. And there are a lot of poor people in Holyoke and in Springfield. There really is a large demand for help."

Lachar also stressed how much he wants to encourage students to donate whatever they can Lachar said that donations have not quite met expectations, but should improve.

"We'll be at the Student Union on Friday, and that should really get the word out. We're hoping for some good donations," said Lachar.

Other members of the fraternity also expressed their concern about the lack of donations thus far.

"We really need more people to bring things in," said freshman Heather Forte, a biology major. "The rain has put a damper on the event so far, but

Moussaoui sentenced to life in prison

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A federal jury rejected the death penalty for al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui on Wednesday and decided he must spend life in prison for his role in the deadliest terrorist attack in U.S. history.

After seven days of deliberation, the nine men and three women rebuffed the government's appeal for death for the only person charged in this country in the four suicide jetliner hijackings that killed nearly 3,000 people on Sept. 11, 2001.

The verdict came after four years of legal maneuvering and a six-week trial that put jurors on an emotional roller coaster and gave the 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent a platform to taunt Americans. The judge was to hand down the life sentence Thursday morning, bound by the jury's verdict.

It was the sixth case in a row since the death penalty was restored in 1976 in which federal prosecutors failed to obtain an execution in this courthouse — all the more striking this time because the Pentagon is just miles away.

In their successful defense of Moussaoui, his lawyers revealed new levels of pre-attack bungling of intelligence by the FBI and other government agencies. By the trial's end, the defense team was portraying its uncooperative client as a delusional schizophrenic.

They argued he took the witness stand to confess a role in Sept. 11 that he never had — all to achieve martyrdom through execution or for recognition in history.

They overcame the impact of two dramatic appearances by Moussaoui himself first to renounce his four years of denying any involvement in the attacks and then to gloat over the pain of those who lost loved ones.

Using evidence gathered in the largest investigation in U.S. history, prosecutors achieved a preliminary victory last month when the jury ruled Moussaoui's lies to federal agents a month before the attacks made him eligible for the death penalty because they kept agents from discovering some of the hijackers.

But even with heart-rending testimony from nearly four dozen victims and their relatives — testimony that forced some jurors to wipe their eyes — the jury was not convinced that Moussaoui, who was in jail on Sept. 11, deserved to die.

The case broke new ground in the understanding of Sept. 11 — releasing to the public the first transcript and playing in court the cockpit tape of United 93's last half hour. The tape captured the sounds of terrorists hijacking the aircraft over Pennsylvania and passengers trying to retake the jet until it crashed in a field.

This artist's rendering shows confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui sitting in the U.S. District Court in Alexandria, Va. as Judge Leonie Brinkema instructs the jury.

Debt keeps graduates from public service

By Sara L. Smith
Collegian Correspondent

More than 33.3 percent of all four-year public college graduates have too much debt to manage on a starting salary for a Massachusetts teacher, according to a new Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) report.

The report suggests that unmanageable debt may discourage students from choosing careers in public service, such as teachers and social workers.

The report titled "Paying Back, Not Giving Back: Student Debt's Negative Impact on Public Service Career Opportunities," was released by 20 state PIRGs as part of a nationwide effort to draw attention to the issue of undergraduate student loan debt.

"Public servants like teachers and social workers are vital to the success of our communities," said Jaime Jee of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy at UMass. "Unfortunately, high student loan debt can prevent many students from embarking on these critical yet low-paying careers."

"This report shows the risk of pushing the cost of college onto the backs of students and parents," said Jee. "We need states and the federal government to strengthen their investment in higher education by increasing grant aid and making loans more affordable."

MassPIRG's report estimated more than 33.3 percent of all four-year public college graduates and 50.6 percent of private college graduates have too much debt to manage as a starting teacher in Massachusetts Nationally, 37 percent of public and 55 percent

Students awarded national scholarships

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Correspondent

The Truman and Goldwater scholarships have been called some of the most competitive and prestigious national scholarships. This year three University of Massachusetts students were selected to receive these scholarships.

Mari Mazzilli, a computer science and physics double major, and John DeBardeleben, a physics and astronomy double major, both received the Goldwater Scholarship. Kunal Malhotra, a political science and history major, received the Truman Scholarship.

To rise to the top in these national competitions is an extraordinary achievement, said Susan Krauss Whitbourne, director of the Office of National Scholarship Advisement.

"These are outstanding undergraduate students, and to have three selections in one year is a testimony to the high quality of teaching and learning that occurs at UMass Amherst."

DeBardeleben, Malhotra, and Mazzilli were all nominated by their professors to begin the application process, which Malhotra described as "arduous." The nominees passed through several levels of selection both at the university level and nationally.

"I felt I was a real long shot, but it would be silly not to apply for it," said DeBardeleben. The Goldwater is more than about the money, any way. "I'm pumped to win mainly because of the doors it opens for me in the future."

According to Web site for the Goldwater Scholarship, the award is a federally-endowed program that began in 1986 in memory of Senator Barry M. Goldwater to foster education in math, science and engineering. Over 1,000 students were nominated nationally this year for the scholarship that covers tuition,

Harvard author's book deal canceled

By Hillel Italie
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A Harvard University sophomore's debut novel has been permanently withdrawn by the book's publisher and her two-book deal canceled after allegations of literary borrowing piled up against her.

Little, Brown and Co. will not publish a revised edition of Kaavya Viswanathan's "How Opal Mehta Got Kissed, Got Wild, and Got a Life" nor will it publish a second book, Michael Pietsch, Little, Brown's senior vice president and publisher, said in a statement Tuesday.

Little, Brown, which had initially said the book would be revised, declined to comment on whether Viswanathan would have to return her reported six-figure advance.

The decision caps a stunning downfall for Viswanathan, 19, a Harvard sophomore whose novel came out in March to widespread attention. Viswanathan, who was 17 when she signed the deal, did not immediately return calls seeking comment Tuesday.

The novel had modest sales initially, but interest in used editions of the book remains strong enough that it was the No. 58 seller on Amazon.com on Tuesday afternoon.

Meanwhile, The Record of Bergen County said that it will review the news articles Viswanathan wrote for the 180,000-circulation daily paper in northern New Jersey while an intern in 2003 and 2004.

Editor Frank Scandale said The Record, which has written several of its own articles about the plagiarism allegations, will hire a service to vet the dozen or so features she wrote while one of about 15 interns at the paper.

"To us she was a bright young kid that seemed to have the makings of a good writer. There were no alarms, nobody had ever questioned any of her stories," he said. "We have no reason to believe there's anything wrong with her copy. But in light of what's going on, we thought we should check her stuff out."

Little, Brown pulled "Opal Mehta" after extensive similarities were discovered to two works by Megan McCafferty, "Sloppy Firsts" and "Second Helpings." But until Tuesday, the publisher had not said whether the book would be canceled altogether or simply revised, as originally planned.

we're hoping for a better turnout on Thursday and Friday."

"We try to make it convenient for the students," Lachar added. "Kids are about to move out, and they're going to be throwing a lot of things out. That's why we wait until the very end of the year to do this; we're just trying to make it easy on the students. The last thing that we want is to turn our back on someone who is willing to donate."

Lachar emphasized that contributions of all sizes are welcome.

"We just hope that when they think about throwing something out that they think about donating it and putting it to use," said Lachar. "A lot of what we would throw out is a treasure to some people, even something as simple as a pair of shoes. It's really easy to take for granted simple things like that, but it really makes a big difference to these people."

Members of other fraternities have said that they feel inspired by Alpha Phi Omega's charitable events.

"I think what they do is fantastic," said Sigma Phi Epsilon member Andrew McCandless. "They do so many service events; we really should see more like this from the Greek community as a whole."

This is the fifteenth year that Alpha Phi Omega has sponsored the fill-a-bus event. Additionally, they have participated in several other charitable events, such as the recent Relay for Life, in which they raised fifteen hundred dollars. Chapters of the Alpha Phi Omega fraternity have sponsored service events around the country for over fifty years.

of Corrections, in Northampton.

Alejandro, Molina and Ogbunuze are all residents of the 22nd floor of Coolidge. It is unknown as of press time if Warfield, whose contact information does not appear in the UMass Student Telephone Directory and only offers a room phone number on People Finder, lives on that floor.

Almost all students living on the 21st and 22nd floors were either unaware of the arrests or refused to comment. One resident, however, reported hearing the K-9 dogs and said that students were not allowed to leave their rooms during the arrests.

According to Massachusetts General Law chapter 94c section 32e, persons convicted of trafficking between 28 and 100 grams of cocaine face a mandatory five-year sentence in prison and could serve up to 20 years. Persons convicted of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute face a mandatory one-year sentence with a maximum sentence of 10 years.

Coolidge Resident Director Michele Wisdahl declined to comment on the arrests and no party representing the Southwest Area Government was made available for comment at press time.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano did not have a comment to make "at the time," according to his secretary.

Asked what typical disciplinary action is taken for students committing crimes of this nature, Ed Blaguszewski, Director of News and Information at the University, replied, "I don't know off-hand. Certainly if someone is convicted of an offense like this, they will face significant sanctions, and would likely be penalized under the code of student conduct. That could range from a reprimand to a suspension to an expulsion."

"There is a due process involved. The Dean of Students will reveal the cases and make any decisions," he added.

When asked if the four will still be considered students at the University during the case, Blaguszewski said that he had not spoken with the Dean of Students as of the moment, and said the cases will be reviewed under the code of student conduct.

Warfield is a sport management major. Alejandro is a social thought and political economy major. Molina and Ogbunuze are both resource economics majors.

Government continues to plan for bird flu pandemic

U.S. Secretary of Agriculture Mike Johanns (center,) Secretary of the Interior Gale Norton (left,) and Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael Leavitt, address issues surrounding the possibility of a bird flu pandemic in the U.S.

By Lauran Neergaard
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush's plan for dealing with a flu pandemic warns that the federal government won't be able to bail out communities reeling from illness and economic upheaval, and calls on businesses and individuals to take steps now to keep vital services running.

The updated plan, released Wednesday, stresses basic human needs such as medical care and food, but doesn't address some major hurdles — how to meet those needs if massive absenteeism stops transportation by closing oil refineries, or crashes the Internet so workers can't telecommute.

"Our efforts require the participation of, and coordination by, all levels of government and segments of society," Bush said in a letter to Americans unveiling his updated national pandemic response strategy.

"No less important will be the actions of individual citizens, whose participation is necessary to the success of these efforts."

Influenza pandemics strike every few decades when a never-before-seen strain arises. It's impossible to predict when the next will occur, or its toll. But last fall, amid concern that the Asian bird flu might lead to one if it starts spreading easily from person to person, Bush proposed a $7.1 billion, multi-year strategy to prepare for the next pandemic.

At the plan's core: stockpiling enough bird-flu vaccine for 20 million people, plus anti-flu medications and other key medical supplies, to provide some protection while manufacturers race to brew a pandemic-specific inoculation.

Wednesday's report updates Bush's initial plan, outlining exactly which government agency is responsible for some 300 additional tasks. It also provides details, beyond health care, of changes Americans could expect in how they travel, work and conduct day-to-day activities during a severe pandemic.

The report's big message: "Local communities will have to address the medical and nonmedical impacts of the pandemic with available resources." That's because the federal government won't be able to offer the kind of aid expected after hurricanes or other one-time, one-location natural disasters, it says.

U.S. borders won't be sealed after outbreaks abroad, the report says. That would fail to keep out a pandemic — people can spread flu a full day before they show symptoms. Instead, the goal will be to slow influenza's march, starting by screening international travelers for signs of infection and quarantining possibly ill passengers.

As U.S. infections mount, people will be asked to stay away from crowds, and cancel nonessential travel. Patients' families would be temporarily isolated. Schools in affected communities would close.

Employers would be urged to let people telecommute, regularly clean buildings — flu viruses can live on hard surfaces for 48 hours — and advise workers to avoid shaking hands and stand 3 feet apart, out of sneeze range.

"I want to be careful not to panic people," cautioned Frances Townsend, Bush's White House homeland security adviser. "First of all, a human pandemic has not begun, and we cannot say whether or not a pandemic will begin."

But by assuming a worst-case scenario — up to 2 million U.S. deaths, and up to 40 percent of the work force off the job for several weeks — the government hopes to have enough contingency plans to limit social and economic chaos if a severe pandemic strikes, and to energize private sector preparations.

The scholarship also opens up priority admissions to some premier institutions and special internship opportunities within the federal government.

The recipients have demonstrated strong interest in their respective fields as well as in interesting avenues of research.

Debardeleben was nominated by his Physics department after he gave a presentation at the Five College Physics Symposium about what he had learned during a summer internship at the Princeton Plasma Physics Laboratory in 2005. He has also been working with Professor Mark Tuominen's nanophysics group to explore alternative energy research.

"Burgeoning international populations and higher energy demands, especially in China, make this development imperative," said Debardeleben.

Marzilli, who said it was an honor to just be nominated for the award, plans on using it to help defray the cost of a fifth year at UMass in order to complete his double-major. Marzilli has been working on research projects with his professors over the past few semesters both in the physics and the computer science departments.

Malhorta worked on the John Kerry Presidential Campaign and interned with the League of Conservation Voters, and worked in cultural out-reach programs between the Hindu and Muslim communities in the Washington, D.C. area. He hopes to use the scholarship to obtain a joint law degree and M.A. in Public policy to work in environmental law.

Romney says he will discuss religion if he 'goes national'

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney, confronted almost daily with questions about how his Mormon faith would affect a potential run for president, said Wednesday he envisions mimicking John F. Kennedy and explaining his little-known religion if he decides to "go national."

The Republican chief executive envisions a speech evolving out of inevitable curiosity about his faith and its potential impact on presidential decision-making. He has already said that while his religious beliefs are integral to his life, they do not unduly influence his political judgments.

"I think if I decided to go national that there will probably be a time when people will ask questions, and it will be about my faith, and I'll have the opportunity to talk about the role of religion in our society and in the leadership of our nation," Romney said after attending a charter school event in Boston.

Kennedy, then a Democratic senator from Massachusetts, took the same approach in September 1960 when he was attempting to become the first Catholic president. He told the Houston Ministerial Association, "I do not speak for my church on public matters and my church does not speak for me."

Kennedy added, "I believe in an America that is officially neither Catholic, Protestant nor Jewish ... and where religious liberty is so indivisible that an act against one church is treated as an act against all."

Romney's rise from governor to one of the leading potential 2008 presidential contenders has been mirrored by a growth in questions about whether his faith will be a benefit or detriment to his potential candidacy. The governor, who is not seeking re-election this fall, has said he will likely announce whether he is running sometime next year.

Most of the questions have centered on whether conservative Christians, including southern evangelicals, will support a Mormon. Some have labeled the faith a "cult," and it once had unorthodox practices such as polygamy.

Just last week, conservative columnist Robert Novak wrote, "Prominent, respectable evangelical Christians have told me, not for quotation, that millions of their co-religionists cannot and will not vote for Romney for president solely because he is a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints."

Novak added, "If Romney is nominated and their abstention results in the election of (Democrat) Hillary Rodham Clinton, that's just too bad. The evangelicals are adamant, saying there is no way Romney can win them over."

But some evangelicals disagree. Kurt Keilhacker is a California venture capitalist who helped arrange support for Romney in a straw poll at the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in March. He said people like Novak do not speak for a new generation of evangelicals, such as himself.

"I understand people saying that, but one of the things that people don't understand about our subculture is we're really moving onto Evangelism 2.0," Keilhacker said. "A lot of the media tend to associate evangelicals with people like Pat Robertson. We have nothing in common with him except the Bible."

Romney has argued that his faith has not improperly affected his work as governor of Massachusetts. He also has noted that the top Democrat in Congress, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, is also a Mormon.

The governor said he expected questions similar to those faced by Kennedy and Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, D-Conn., when he attempted to become the first Jewish vice president when he ran on the 2000 Democratic ticket with Al Gore.

"I think it's true our faiths are not as well known," Romney said. "So I think people will ask questions about something about which they're less familiar."

Power manager appeals for Cape Wind project

HOLYOKE, Mass. (AP) — New England's electricity manager wants federal lawmakers to reconsider a plan threatening to sink a Nantucket Sound wind farm proposal.

A congressional panel last week approved a measure that would allow Gov. Mitt Romney to veto the proposed wind farm project.

The bill still needs approval by the House and Senate, which will be on spring recess over the next two weeks.

But Cape Wind spokesman Mark Rodgers has promised to fight the veto provision that was OK'd by the House Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation.

And earlier this week, a head of ISO New England, which operates the region's electricity grid, sent a letter to the lawmakers on the committee asking them to reconsider.

"Our region is in need of both new generation resources and a diversification of its generational base," Stephen Whitely, ISO New England's senior vice president, wrote in a letter to the lawmakers. "This is important for both the economy and electric system reliability. To the extent we continue to rely on natural gas, we will continue to see higher costs for the region and a less reliable system."

The congressional measure would give veto power to Romney, a strong opponent of the project, or his successor. Four of five gubernatorial candidates oppose the project as well.

The legislation would also permit the Coast Guard commandant to veto the project if it is a hazard to navigation.

Cape Wind says its proposed $800 million wind farm would be an environmentally friendly boon to the region's rising energy needs, providing up to 75 percent of the power for the Cape and nearby islands of Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard.

Study: students justify cheating in many ways

By Neal Morton
Sacramento (U. Nevada-Reno)

RENO, Nev. — For her media ethics class, Donica Mensing instructed her students to construct their own subjective ethical model for decision-making in moral dilemmas. Ironically, this proved too hard a task for one student, who ended up copying a nursing organization's suggestions for ethical conduct.

"She just lifted that and changed a few words but not the key ones," Mensing said. "This was even in making ethical criteria with no real right or wrong answer."

Even though every semester brings at least one cheater into her ethics class, Mensing said she does not think cheaters are necessarily immoral people.

Neither, apparently, do the students.

According to a recent study by a University of Arkansas accounting professor, students who cheat regularly create several strategies to "ethically distance" themselves from the act.

Professor Tim West's study showed that many students justified cheating by saying it was a social norm, they actually learned something by resorting to cheating or other things they could have done were relatively worse actions.

One University of Nevada, Reno psychology major who admitted to cheating said these reasons are obviously dishonest.

"I think [the reasons for cheating] are all cop-outs," the 20-year-old sophomore said. "The social norm argument could be used since so many people do cheat and continue to cheat regularly, but still...you're getting grades you don't deserve. It's immoral."

After discovering that 73 percent of his introduction to managerial accounting class had cheated on a take-home midterm exam, West teamed up with three professors at Iowa State University to research how students excused cheating.

One excuse students used was mentioning how prevalent cheating is. According to the Center for Academic Integrity, out of 50,000 surveyed undergraduates, 70 percent did admit to some form of cheating.

Tim Dodd, executive director for CAI, said study after study proves cheating is a bigger problem than ever in America and said the reasons cited in West's study were invalid.

"We know cheating in this country has increased and that self-reported cheating is at an all-time high," he said. "None of [the reasons] are valid. They are flimsy justifications for failures of integrity."

Serena Proudfoot, a 23-year-old senior, agreed and said just because a majority of students cheat does not make it OK.

"The fact that other people are doing it is too easy an excuse. A lot of it is just laziness," said Proudfoot, a computer information systems major. "They're lazy and scared of not doing a good job."

Meanwhile, the UNR psychology major said laziness is a major reason for cheating. In his case, he said being too busy drove him to copy his roommate's papers for nutrition, biology and sociology, which he is currently enrolled in.

"On students' parts, it's more laziness than anything," he said. "I just ran out of time. It was a bad judgment call, and it's just stupidity on my part."

In another example, students tried to divorce their personalities from their behavior.

"The reasoning here is 'that I did the action, but I am not the kind of person to do the action,'" West said in a release. "Focusing on this differentiation allows the actor to avoid personal responsibility and distance themselves from the behavior."

Sophomore Jacqueline Gentry, a biology major, said she could not buy such an excuse.

"It reminds me of President Clinton saying, 'I did not have sexual relations with that woman,'" said Gentry, 19. "No one's taking responsibility and they word things in a way to lie but not really, cheat but not really. Our ultimate goal here is to learn, so what's the point of going to a college if you're not getting an education?"

But Mensing said students who cheated did not see anything bad in themselves.

"Students I have talked to believe they are honest people and good people," she said. "They weren't trying to purposefully misrepresent themselves or be purposefully dishonest."

Insurgent attacks continue in Iraq

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Sunni insurgents boldly attacked fellow Sunni Arabs on Wednesday, the latest in a growing campaign against those who cooperate with the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

A suicide bomber cloaked in explosives killed two policemen and 13 police recruits gathered in Fallujah, a city surrounded by U.S. Marine checkpoints. In a nearby town, three Sunni soldiers from the U.S.-trained Iraqi army were found slain.

The suicide attack outside the main police station in Fallujah occurred a day after the governor of Anbar province, which includes Fallujah, narrowly escaped assassination. A suicide bomber exploded his vehicle near Maamoun Sami Rashid al-Alwani's convoy in Ramadi, killing 10 people. The governor was not injured, U.S. officials said.

U.S. and Iraqi officials have been urging Sunni Arabs to join the police and army, which has been dominated by the rival Shiite Muslim sect and ethnic Kurds. Sunni community leaders says the presence of Shiite and Kurdish troops in their areas raises sectarian tensions and undermines confidence in the government.

Training and recruiting Sunni Arab police and soldiers is part of a broader strategy by U.S. and Iraqi authorities to establish a political role for selected Sunni insurgent groups. The goal is to split more moderate elements from the Saddam Hussein's fanatic loyalists and extremists such as al-Qaida in Iraq, led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Last weekend, President Jalal Talabani said officials from his office met with insurgent representatives and he was hopeful about a deal.

U.S. officials also acknowledge contacts with Sunnis who have ties to the insurgency. But American diplomats have not confirmed a report this week in a leading Arabic newspaper, Asharq Al-Awsat, that said U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad had met seven times since Jan. 16 with representatives of 10 major insurgent groups.

"Negotiations with armed groups will reduce violence" and "alienate the terrorists," Talabani's security adviser, Lt. Gen. Wafiq al-Samarrae, said Wednesday on Iraqi state television. "Consequently, no one will be able to say we are resistance groups,' only that they are foreigners, kidnappers and groups that carry out kidnappings, robberies and killings."

Violence shows little sign of abating. Instead, it has shifted from mainly attacks against U.S. and Iraqi forces to carefully targeted murders of Iraqis.

On Sunday, nearly 1,000 soldiers graduated from army basic training — the first all-Sunni class. Two days later, four of them were slain in Ramadi. Three more of the new soldiers were found dead Wednesday in Khalidiyah, just north of Fallujah, police said.

Reprisal killings between Sunni and Shiite militias continue unabated.

The bodies of 20 Iraqi men were found in several areas of the capital, apparent victims of death squads that kidnap civilians of rival Muslim sects, torture them, and dump their bodies. They included 14 bodies discovered near the gates of an amusement park in a mostly Shiite area of northeast Baghdad, police said.

In Wasit province southeast of Baghdad, masked gunmen broke into the home of a Shiite family, killing the husband, two of his sons and his sister, police said. The wife was spared and told police her husband disregarded warnings, presumably from Sunnis, to leave the area.

UMass likely to see student fee increase said Robinson.

The University hasn't had an increase in student activities fees in four years, but according to Robinson, students will likely see an increase of at least $20 over the next two years.

"We've funded RSOs and agencies more than ever before. But while this barely reaches the need of what they need, we've used as much as we possibly could."

The budget also showed a number of popular RSOs that had not even been given a budget proposal to the committee.

"A lot of groups had seniors ready to graduate that never took the time to show the underclassmen how to go about getting a budget," said Robinson.

Vatican reconsiders ban on contraception

By Brian Murphy
Associated Press

Pope Benedict XVI has shown willingness recently to re-examine church attitudes toward issues such as in-vitro fertilization. Recently, AIDS activists have asked that the Vatican also reconsider its stance on condom use.

A Vatican study on whether it could permit condoms to battle AIDS has a very narrow scope: married Roman Catholic couples in which one partner has the virus. But its theological underpinnings are centuries old, and could lay the groundwork for an end to the church's blanket ban on contraception.

The principle of "double effect" entered mainstream Catholic debate more than 300 years ago and draws on questions about the "lesser of two evils" raised by theologians such as St. Thomas Aquinas in the 13th century. The concepts broadly ask: Can a questionable act be morally justified when the good effect outweighs a bad consequence?

Answering the question with an empathic "yes" are scholars, health professionals and others who want a change in the Vatican's stance that abstinence is the only acceptable way to prevent the spread of AIDS. They have argued for years that condom use as a defense against HIV infection, under specific circumstances, does not contradict the Catholic ban on artificial birth control.

Some groups, including the Southern Africa Catholic Bishops Conference, have even given a tacit nod to condoms for married couples with one partner infected. The Vatican — however tentatively — now could be moving to formally recognize that position.

"It's a reality that's finally moving into a wider arena," said Sister Alison Munro, coordinator of the AIDS project for the Southern African Bishops Conference.

There's no chance the Vatican would fundamentally revise its opposition to contraception, which has been reaffirmed and reinforced since the famous 1968 encyclical "Humanae Vitae."

But even the targeted discussions under way are further evidence of Pope Benedict XVI shedding the traditionbound reputation he earned during more than two decades as the chief doctrinal watchdog for his predecessor, John Paul II.

Benedict, a widely respected theologian, has shown a willingness to re-examine church attitudes toward advances in genetic engineering and in-vitro fertilization. But none approach the sensitivity of whether to open the door — even a crack — for condoms.

"The Vatican is like a submarine. On this one, it has put up its periscope, looked around and submerged again," said the Rev. James Keenan, a moral theologian at Boston College. "It's still not clear at all what — if anything — the Vatican will eventually say on the subject."

Helen Hull Hitchcock of Women for Faith & Family, a traditionalist group based in St. Louis, predicted it could be "deeply confusing" for Catholics if the church made any concessions.

"People would say, 'Now wait a minute. If it's OK for this couple to use it, why can't another couple use it,'" Hitchcock said. "We think that it would be very worrisome."

Cardinal Javier Lozano Barragan, who heads the Vatican's office for health care, would only confirm a "dialogue" is under way as part of a larger examination of bioethical issues. The study on condoms only concerns married couples in which one partner has the virus, his office said.

Notably, there have been no official announcements of an upcoming document or details of the discussions. But a possible signal came last month from retired Milan Cardinal Carlo Maria Martini, who was quoted by the Italian newsweekly L'Espresso as saying condoms were the "lesser evil" in combating AIDS.

Martini, once considered a top papal contender, was not the first Catholic leader to make this connection. The timing, however, was widely interpreted as a hint of the Vatican's leanings.

"Martini was not reprimanded or asked to correct himself," said the Rev. Michael Fahey, a professor of theology at Marquette University. "This seems to say that the Vatican is moving in this direction or at least wants to send a trial balloon."

If the Vatican allows condoms as an AIDS control measure within a marriage, it would open the way for Catholic groups to take a more direct role in anti-AIDS campaigns in ravaged places such as Africa, where the virus is often transmitted from husbands to wives. Catholic charities in Africa offer health care and many other services to AIDS sufferers, but come under sustained criticism for their refusal to distribute condoms.

Sub-Saharan Africa accounts for more than 60 percent of the 40 million people infected with HIV worldwide.

In 2001, more than 30 bishops from southern Africa denounced the use of condoms, but noted that married couples should "listen to their consciences" — widely viewed as recognition the "lesser of two evils" scenario.

The Vatican initially came down hard on such nationales. But it gradually retreated as influential theologians and clergymen made the case that condom use — in cases such as between an HIV-infected person and spouse — would fall under the "double effect" rubric, which says a good intent (not passing the virus) has a bad consequence (using the condom).

The principle is often used to rationalize causalities in a "just war" or a procedure to end a pregnancy to save the woman's life.

The related "lesser of two evils" views boil down to moral damage control. A priest should always advise against doing "evil," but encourage a "lesser evil" if they can't stop the act.

In 2000, Monsignor Jacques Suaudeau of the Pontifical Council for the Family wrote an article in the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, strongly supporting sexual abstinence to control AIDS, but noting specific cases where condom use could be considered a "lesser evil" — including prostitutes in legal brothels.

The idea since has been echoed by even more powerful figures. Belgian Cardinal Godfried Danneels has said an HIV-positive person would be committing a sin by having sex without a condom.

"Let's hope the Vatican brings some clarity to this issue," said theologian Keenan. "It would finally take the stigma off the condom. Then it's all over. The condom will be freed of this whole, heavy moral debate."

Financial debt limits grads' job choices of private college graduates might have unmanageable debt as starting social workers.

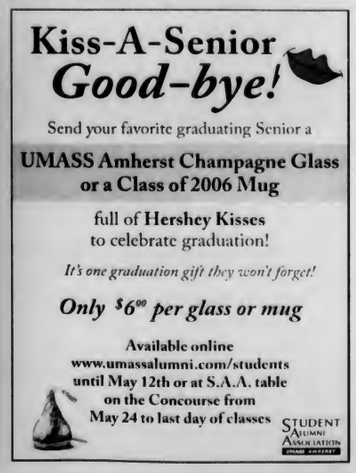
The report examined the student debt of recent college graduates compared with starting salaries of public service careers. Unmanageable debt was calculated with an economic formula developed by two higher education economists to determine the salary-to-debt thresholds where individuals are able to repay their loans with significant economic hardship.

As graduation approaches, students are apprehensive about choosing public service jobs, even if it's what they really want.

"I'll have about $30 thousand in loan debt by the time I graduate," Adam Corl, a UMass sophomore said.

"I wanted to go to grad school and then into relief work as a registered nurse, but I won't be able to pay off my loans on a non-profit salary. College is becoming less affordable and without better student aid, students like myself are kept from going into the non-profit sector," Corl said.

Sean Bliss, the speaker of the UMass Student Government Association said, "The government and schools should provide students with the opportunity to pursue their interests and apply their skills, even in fields that have low salaries."



"Students are accruing so much debt from loans and the interest that it forces them into jobs that provide enough financial support to pay off their loans, instead of the public service positions they might otherwise take," Bliss added.

The report was issued after the largest cut in history was made to student aid programs. In February, Congress passed a $12 billion cut to student loan programs that will result in students paying a fixed 6.8 percent interest rate on their loans starting on July 1, 2006.

Deal with real world issues

Zach Oelschlegel

One of my Monday rituals is waking up around 10 in the morning and going straight to the computer to read Peter King's Monday Morning Quarterback column. King is the senior NFL writer for Sports Illustrated, and his MMQB column is so popular the magazine had him start writing a Tuesday edition on the Website SI.com. King includes just about anything in his columns, from NFL analysis to his obsession with coffee to his daughter's softball games. He can be endearing, and a large reason many read his columns is no doubt due to his big heart.

But he proved himself to be the poster boy for American ignorance of foreign matters during his last column running Tuesday. Preceding his usual e-mail bag, he wrote a lengthy section regarding the state of New Orleans, and how not much has changed since Katrina wiped it out eight months ago.

King exclaimed how furious he was at our country for not doing more to clean up the Gulf Coast considering the resources we have. He lambasted those with "Katrina fatigue," those tired of hearing about the suffering people on the coast endure. During the middle of the column, he wrote "More Katrina news! Give me more! Give it to me every day on the front page! Every day until Washington realizes there's a disaster here every bit as urgent as anything happening in this world today — fighting terrorism, combating the nuclear threat in Iran."

I hate to break it to you Peter, and any other American out there, but we know jack squat when it comes to true human suffering. King has apparently never been to Africa, or has never read the news, for that matter. Calling Katrina cleanup as urgent as any matter in the world today is downright embarrassing.

In Sudan, millions have been made refugees in the last three years, while hundreds of thousands have been cleansed in genocide, all while the rest of the world sits, watches and does little. What's worse is that we know it's occurring, we know the situation and still nothing is done.

Americans think only American matters actually matter. You see this in news reports of plane crashes, with hundreds feared dead, including two Americans.

I am reminded of the movie "Hotel Rwanda," after Joaquin Phoenix's character tapes footage of people massacring one another with machetes. Don Cheadle expresses hope that this footage will get the rest of the world to care and intervene, and Phoenix replies most will simply say "Oh my God," and continue eating their dinner.

Americans think only American issues actually matter. You see this in news reports of plane crashes, with hundreds feared dead, including two Americans. We ignore the rest of human suffering in the world and are unable to comprehend the extent of it. Biloxi mayor AJ Holloway commented after Katrina first hit that "this is our tsunami," insinuating an astounding 226,000 Americans had been killed in the day of fury Katrina gave to the Gulf. In terms of human lives, he was only off by a factor of a couple hundred.

Peter King didn't have to look far to take an honest look at the state of the world today. His own colleague, Rick Reilly, who is probably the most famous sports writer in America today, took a break from writing his usual weekly commentary on sports to focus on the real problems of the world. Reilly urged his readers to buy mosquito nets for African children, seeing as how 3,000 kids die each day from malaria, according to the World Health Organization. Katrina's problems don't come anywhere close to 3,000 kids dying from a preventable disease daily.

My time abroad in Denmark last semester was a real eye-opener, and one of the biggest realizations was how little I knew, or most Americans for that matter, about the rest of the world. My Danish friends would regularly send money to third world charities, and every time I stepped on campus or into the center of Copenhagen I was approached by volunteers to give money. I wasn't aware so many charities existed.

One of my lasting memories of my time there will always be sitting around the kitchen table late at night with my Danish roommates, drinking tea and talking about life. One night the conversation shifted to world health, something very intriguing for my roommate as she is a med student. We talked about AIDS, malaria and other diseases common on the continent of Africa. She ended the discussion matter of factly, stating "Africa is fed."

Too bad we are blinded by our own problems, which are miniscule in comparison, to see where the true suffering is occurring. Even sadder, when confronted with the issue, no one gives a damn.

Stop tainting debates

Alex Maslow

Ask Liberals about America, and most will say it is losing its morals. Ask Conservatives, and they will probably tell you the same thing. Conservatives believe Liberals are helping the terrorists, and Liberals believe the Conservatives are doing the helping. Similarly, Liberals often complain of a Conservative bias in the media. The Conservative stand point? You guessed it: same thing but reversed.

This phenomenon has always struck me as odd. How can the media have both a Liberal and Conservative bias? Is one group lying? Then it hit me: the media is a very encompassing term. The media includes Fox news, MSNBC, ABC, CNN, The Washington Post, NPR, The Daily Collegian, The Boston Globe, the BBC, The Harvard Crimson, The Wall Street Journal and the list just goes on and on and on.

In grouping all these different outlets under the term the media, a connection is implied that does not, in reality, exist. Even within the small sample I listed above, there is very little connection between, say, NPR, MSNBC, The Daily Collegian and The Wall Street Journal.

The media has many facades — thousands, at least. Some are Liberally biased while others are Conservatively biased; in fact, I challenge anyone to find me a media source without bias. However, overall, I believe the bias of the media is negligible. What I mean is this. For every bias, there is an equal and opposite rebias (that's Newtonian Media for you). If you're watching a news station that you feel is being bias against you, chances are someone on the other side of the political spectrum is watching another station they call bias against them.

If you're watching a news station that you feel is being bias against you, chances are someone on the other side of the political spectrum is watching another station they call bias against them.

While I am a moderate on American politics, I am not quite so even-handed everywhere else. I am a Jew who grew up in a Liberal town and was taught that Israel has the mandate of God and can do no wrong. While I do not believe it, it has been battered into me so many times it has become an instinct. Whether I like it or not, I am pro-Israel.

This gives me an interesting perspective. In media on American politics I see no bias (overall). In media about Israel, however, I see biases everywhere — I even find myself (against my will) searching for biases to discredit an article if I don't like what I'm reading. If an article takes a stand against Israel, it must be lying. If an article is in favor of Israel, it cannot be wrong.

Of course any reasonable person, including the more objective part of myself, can immediately see how ridiculous my point of view is. Unfortunately, I find that those same reasonable people do the same thing on American politics. If an article praises Bush, Liberals claim the author was paid off by the administration. If an article decries Bush, Conservatives claim the author has been brainwashed by Liberal propaganda. Herein lies the problem.

The first amendment of our constitution guarantees freedom of speech. You can say and believe anything you want, regardless of the facts. Having an opinion is encouraged, even if that opinion blinds you to reason. After all, isn't love nothing more than a very strong opinion about someone?

The danger is in how one uses it, if the opinion is confused as a fact. For myself, I have very recently decided never to participate in a debate about Israel. Why? A debate must be based on facts, not conclusions. That is to say: you must be willing to use the facts to reach the proper conclusion, not to use the facts to reach the conclusion you have already decided upon.

Liberals have already decided there is a bias against them, as have Conservatives decided there is a bias against them. Their efforts are, therefore, not at figuring out where the bias is but, rather, where it is against them. When one picks and chooses (read: manipulates and filters) the facts, so as to fit their needs, the debate becomes an effort to prove a point, not to find the truth. When one picks and chooses the facts so as to prove the point they've decided upon, their goal is to prove a point, not to find the truth.

In "The Republic," Socrates talks about the three levels of the soul. Passion, desire and reason. He says reason must rule the others and keep them in check. Similarly, reason must rule in debates and keep them in check. You can believe (which is a result of passion) what you want, no matter the facts; this is your right as a human being. However, to debate without facts is to research without sources. It is fundamentally flawed.

In Judaism, there is something called argument for the sake of heaven, which is also known as the Socratic Method. The idea is, quite simply, the pursuit of truth. One does not argue to prove a point because that point may be wrong. Rather, one argues to find the point. Basically, all the facts are laid out. Nothing is ignored; how can the truth be found if the argument is incomplete? Then, given all the facts, the most logical conclusion is given. No bias. No spin. Just facts and conclusions, in that order as well. First, the facts, then the conclusions. Anything else is a disgrace to thought.

The American Deutschland

World Perspectives
Ben Duffy

The teenager standing on the street corner is wearing a baseball cap. Sadly, it bears the symbol of baseball's evil empire: the New York Yankees. I roll my eyes. He's probably the 20th German I've seen today with a similar Yankees baseball cap.

Germany wasn't always like this. The first time I lived here, between 2001 and 2003, I rarely ever saw a baseball cap on the street. In fact, wearing a baseball cap was one of the easiest ways to give one's self away as an American. When I came back to Germany in September 2005, I discovered that baseball caps, particularly those bearing that horrid Yankee insignia, were all the rage. In the brief time that I was away, fashions had changed.

Germany has been undergoing a gradual cultural change known as "Americanization" for quite some time now. Certainly, the American occupation of Germany directly after World War II was a significant milestone in the Americanization of Germany. The same American soldiers who rebuilt this country and held the line against the Soviets during the Cold War also brought with them some of the comforts from home: rock and roll, Coca-cola and comic books. Young Germans soon adopted the styles of their occupiers, and the process of Americanization was in full swing.

Not all Germans are thrilled with the change. Immediately following the war, (as well as in the present age), some Germans rejected (and continue to reject) American culture. For some of these people, the very idea of Americanization elicits a great animus towards its assumed nation of origin: the United States.

Believe me, no one wants to see German culture survive more than I do. I've fallen in love with this country precisely because it's different. I love German music, German food and the German lifestyle. I like my little student city of Freiburg just fine the way it is; I don't want to see it turned into some clone of Cleveland or Tulsa.

I'd much rather do my shopping in one of Germany's many pedestrian zones, than in the ubiquitous American strips of endless Applebee's, Wal-Marts and Home Depots. That's not a swipe at the United States either. America is a great country, but that doesn't mean that every other country needs to remake itself in our image.

You will see young Germans in hip-hop gear, ravenously scarfing down Big Macs. In McDonald's parlance, they're "lovin' it."

Sometimes the accusations of Americanization almost seem to get personal. Some Germans "cop an attitude" of look what you Americans are doing to us Germans.

German essayist Winfried Fluck said it best when he wrote, "We are not being Americanized. We are Americanizing ourselves." I completely agree. Germany is becoming more American because the Germans themselves choose our movies, music, food and fashion over their own. No one is forcing it upon them. Exporters of American culture are doing nothing more than responding to the demands of the market.

If you want to see what I mean, just visit the McDonald's by the train station here in Freiburg on a Saturday night. Heck, go there at four o' clock in the morning, when the discotheques are closing, and the young party-goers are looking for something to eat. The place will be mobbed, I guarantee you.

You will see young Germans in hip-hop gear, ravenously scarfing down Big Macs. In McDonald's parlance, they're "lovin' it." Did someone point a gun at their heads and tell them that they had to eat there? Is there nowhere else to get a quick bite to eat? Not at all. They eat there because they think American fast food is the greatest thing since sliced bread.

It's really quite the paradox. On the one hand, they love all things American. On the other hand, they hate us for giving it to them. I just don't understand it.

My solution to Germans who don't like the Americanization of their society is quite simple: stop consuming American culture. It's not that a few scattered Germans rejecting American culture would have any effect on the prevailing trend, but these Germans need to see that it is their own countrymen, not some shadowy American cabal, that are changing the face of Germany.

I'm not sure that the process of Americanization is reversible, and it might be futile to try, but Germans who are concerned that they are losing their culture in the rush to Americanize are really missing the point. The changes are internal, and they can only be fixed from the inside. If Germans ever want to see their culture revived, then here's my advice: go see a German film, go read a German book or go listen to a German musician singing in German. Oh yeah, and ditch the Yankees hat.

Ryan Montbleau Band set to shine at Iron Horse

Ryan Montbleau is frontman of the soulful jazz ensemble the Ryan Montbleau Band, which originally hails from the Boston area and has a growing grass-roots fan base.

By Morgan-ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

An up-and-coming musical group, The Ryan Montbleau band, will be playing at the Iron Horse Music Hall this Friday, May 5 at 10 p.m. The show costs $10 in advance and $13 at the door.

The band has proven to be one of the most promising live acts to emerge from the northeast in recent years. Hailing from the Boston area, the Ryan Montbleau Band plays a variety of songs that are often compared to Stevie Wonder & Paul Simon. Friday's Iron Horse show celebrates the release of their new album, the self-released CD "One Fine Color," which was recorded at Applehead Studios in Woodstock, N.Y. and released this past Valentine's Day.

The Ryan Montbleau band has been cultivating a grass-roots fan base with its unique blend of blues, Americana, folk, ragtime, 70's and soul sound. It seems all too suitable that the band is hitting up Northampton — a place of sublime eclectic musical interest.

Montbleau's band played a show in fall of 2005 at the Iron Horse. After attending the show, it seemed that the venue's laid back, mahogany setting was a perfect site for this creative sub-mainstream ensemble. At the venue patrons can sit and relax with a drink at a table, or get up and dance to the buoyant beats Montbleau's musical direction is known to take.

The band released their new self-supported album "One Fine Color" on Valentines Day of 2006.

The front man for the band of course is Ryan, who started off doing small performances at coffee houses, and folk venues.

As an on-the-rise solo artist, fans began to take notice of the musician's infectious, percussive, finger-picking guitar style that is reminiscent of guitar-based jazzy folk legends like Martin Sexton, David Gray and Ray Lamontagne.

As the leading man in front of the microphone, and not to mention guitarist extraordinaire, Montbleau is only one part of the eclectic ensemble that bears his name. In addition to Ryan with his voice, acoustic and electric guitars, the band is also home to Matt Giannaros, who plays acoustic upright bass, electric bass, and contributes to the vocals.

Giannaros bears an extra-special feature to those of us in the Five College area. The bassist earned a bachelors degree in jazz performance from UMass Amherst, where he was trained by the world renowned bassist Salvatore Maccia. Giannaros studied both jazz and classical music while at UMass.

Since graduating from UMass, he has moved to the Boston area and has integrated himself with a variety of musical projects, ranging from big band, funk, rock, to contemporary jazz. Giannaro adds to the bands dynamic fusion by contributing the creative energy he puts into his modern musical sound.

To complete the quintet, there is Laurence Scudder on the viola, while Jason Cohen plays the piano, organ, clavinet, and Rhodes, and James Cohen works the drums.

The resulting sound that emerges shows a striking resemblance to that of Van Morrison or Jack Johnson, only with its own unique touch of upbeat "rootsy" energy. Ryan's evocative lyrical ability and distinctive voice will deliver to the audience a positive response, while the instrumentals will surely get everyone out of their seats and grooving to beats.

Since the release of their album "One Fine Color," Ryan Montbleau Band has continued its journey around the proverbial radar, without the assistance of label support, distribution or funding of any sort. The musicians are achieving success on the road that may well rival or exceed that of many of their signed, better financed and supported contemporaries.

It seems the record attributes this success to its classic album format which has a seamless flow and a consistent artistic vision that adamantly resists today's emphasis on singles. Thanks to their growing and loyal fan base, "One Fine Color" sold nearly 1000 units within two weeks of its February 14 release.

For more information on the Ryan Montbleau band you can check out their website at www.ryanmontbleau.com. Parker House & Theory are opening up for the Ryan Montbleau band at the Iron Horse at 8 p.m. on Friday night.

Scar Symmetry doesn't impress with new 'Pitch Black Progress'

By Ian Jones
Collegian Staff

If you threw a handful of metal clichés into a box and shook them up, you'd probably be left with Scar Symmetry. Not that they're bad, it's just that when listening to them you can't help but compare them to numerous other bands; their influences are rather transparent. Some of this is good, and some of it is bad, but the first thing you'll probably think when you hear their latest, "Pitch Black Progress," for the first time is that you've heard this somewhere before.

The drumming is formulaic double bass, and although it's done quite cleanly, there are times when you'll find yourself wishing that drummer Henrik Ohlsson would play something that didn't conform to the general metal mold. He comes close on the album's title track, but it just seems like he's a better drummer than he gives himself credit for on this album.

The vocals really run the metal gamut. The album opens with the "disgruntled bear"-type "singing" featured on many death metal albums — that guy from Black Dahlia Murder is my favorite — and moves into a more dramatic, clean (as in, not screaming) voice. Of course, a Cradle of Filth-inspired nasal shriek is there as a balance between the two. At least the vocals never get boring.

Guitarists Jonas Kjellgren and Per Nilsson seem to have been listening to a lot of Dream Theater. The rhythm is chunky and powerful, and the leads show a lot of Dream Theater guitarist John Petrucci's style throughout the album — which is definitely a good thing — although occasionally they appeal to more angular shredders like Steve Vai, although there are times when it sounds like they're drawing a bit from '80s hair metal guitarists like George Lynch, as well.

Overall, Scar Symmetry is a bit hard to place. They seem to be trying to strike a balance between death metal and power metal, and it doesn't always work. Their influences shine through too easily for the mixture to be entirely smooth and, although they are all excellent musicians, their songs are often unfortunately forgettable. The fact that each song takes up nine tracks is interesting and worth mentioning, but I still haven't figured out whether or not there's any meaning to it.

All in all, "Pitch Black Progress" is worth a quick listen, but it isn't something that will stay with you. It will leave you hoping that Scar Symmetry can find more of their own voice on their next album; all of the elements are there, they just haven't entirely figured it out yet.

The band Scar Symmetry released their new album "Pitch Black Progress" to little avail.

The album features songs that balance between death metal and power metal.

Hisssss on Hollywood: 'Snakes on Plane' giving reptiles a bad rep

By Lisa Gutierrez
Knight Ridder Newspapers

You're sitting on an airplane.

Suddenly, the overhead oxygen-mask door pops open and down drops a...

Snake!

In your lap!

Hissssssssssss.

It could happen this summer — in "Snakes on a Plane," a terror movie about poisonous snakes slithering around a 747 flying from Hawaii to Los Angeles.

Samuel L. Jackson plays an FBI agent escorting a trial witness whom assassins are trying to kill by setting free hundreds of poisonous, creeping creatures on the plane.

Early buzz is a roar on the Internet. Eager bloggers who've created "Snakes on a Plane" T-shirts, posters and songs have all but guaranteed cult status for the film, which opens Aug. 18.

Frankly, it gives us the willies thinking about being trapped on a plane with snakes.

And it brings up a slew of slithery questions.

Could a snake really get a boarding pass?

No. Several major airlines don't allow snakes on a plane, as cargo or as passengers. Some, like Southwest, don't let any animals fly, coach or otherwise.

"No, we do not let snakes in the cabin of an aircraft," said American Airlines spokesman Tim Wagner in Fort Worth, Texas. "We allow cats and dogs only. There are some exceptions for guide and service animals — but no snakes."

"No snakes," said US Airways spokeswoman Valerie Wunder in Tempe, Ariz.

Whew! But what if through some weird fluke — or some mobster hit man — you do find yourself on a plane with a snake?

"If you're lucky, a herpetologist will be on the plane and come to your aid. And if you're not, what can I tell you?" said snake expert Joe Collins in Lawrence, adjunct herpetologist with the Kansas Biological Survey.

"In this day and age, there will probably be someone on a plane that will walk over and say they're harmless. If I were on the plane, I would tell people to move to another area.

"If they're poisonous I would look for an umbrella or golf club or something to manipulate them. The problem is people injure themselves getting away from snakes. It's just crazy to watch."

So I'm supposed to remain calm when I'm face-to-face with a snake? No way. I'm screaming.

"If it makes you feel better," said Charlie Lee, extension wildlife specialist at Kansas State University in Manhattan. "It's not going to scare the snake off."

Yeah, it will make me feel better. Snakes are scary!

But people scare snakes, Collins said. Venomous snakes live on the ground and, "You look like T. rex to them. You're 5, 6 feet above them and mostly they think you're going to step on them.

"These are not animals that wait in trees waiting for you to walk by and fling themselves at you. They don't really want to do that because you're a big mammal and they don't want to throw themselves at a big mammal that can hurt them."

But if I meet one face-to-face?

The best offense is a good defense. Many human-snake accidents happen because the human wasn't paying attention, snake experts say.

The best recommendation: "Avoid putting yourself where the snake feels threatened. In most cases, they're going to crawl and hide from you," Lee said.

That means don't carelessly put your hands or feet in places that would harbor snakes — tall grass, brush piles, rock piles, hollow logs. "It's best to watch where you're walking," Lee said.

And never, ever, pick up a snake unless you know it's not venomous.

Say a poisonous snake bites me and I'm trapped on an airplane?

Chances are, "You won't die from a snake bite in six hours," Collins said. "You're going to get to L.A., and some of the most sophisticated treatments in the world are going to be available there.

"... That of course shoots down the whole whoop-dee-doo of the movie. But you can stretch to give it a good whirl. Venomous snakes loose on a plane? The premise is interesting. But what it's going to do is cause panic among people rather than death."

So I wouldn't necessarily die from a poisonous snake bite?

"You have good life insurance?" Lee asked, just kidding.

"With the snakes in the United States we have very few fatalities because of snake bites. It depends on the type of snake and the amount of venom injected.

"Sometimes you're bitten by a snake, and it doesn't mean you've been injected with a full dose.

"The best thing is to simply stay calm, transport yourself or have someone transport you to the nearest hospital."

So how'd they get those snakes to be scary on command?

"For one thing, it's not like you could train a snake to respond on cue," Collins said.

"They don't train well. ... You can't train them to hold everyone against the wall. They're just going to run around and try to find a place to hide."

So once again, snakes are portrayed as the bad guys?

"It will give a bad name among those who don't know snakes," Collins said. "It simply reinforces what people want to believe about snakes, despite the fact that they are incapable of doing what they show them doing.

"As the subject of movie fiction, snakes are not a good choice. They spend most of their lives sitting around watching the rest of the world go by, then try to cross a road and get killed.

"Life for snakes was a lot simpler when people weren't around."

New Orleans offers Jazz Festival

By Thor Christensen
The Dallas Morning News

NEW ORLEANS — To get into the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival, you walk past flood-damaged houses marked with red spray paint: "LB" means Katrina survivors were found inside; "DB" means workers found a corpse.

At this year's festival, "Let the Good Times Roll" means something different altogether than in the past.

"In New Orleans, we dance in the streets when someone has died," Jazzfest director Quint Davis said Saturday. "That's what we're doing now. The mourning is over and now it's time to dance."

So far, this strange celebration has been a success, with big crowds turning out Sunday for Bruce Springsteen, Saturday to see the Dave Matthews Band and Friday to hear Bob Dylan sing the flood-themed "High Water (for Charley Patton)." The audiences have been mixed with festival veterans, curious first-timers, and locals wearing "Returnee" T-shirts.

But while Davis is calling the 37th annual event "The Miracle Fest," the miracle hasn't been controversy-free.

Several prominent New Orleans musicians are boycotting the event over what they call unfair performance fees. Cyril Neville, who lost his house in the flood and now lives in Austin, Texas, says he was offered less than half what he earned at previous Jazzfests.

"How can you ask a Katrina victim to come back and play for less than what you made before?" he told The Dallas Morning News last month.

Davis called Neville's claim "categorically untrue," but says that some performers did "voluntarily" offer "fee breaks."

Blues singer Etta James has some fun with a member of her Roots Band on the second day of the Jazz Festival in New Orleans.

Etta James, Herbie Hancock and Lionel Richie "really aren't getting paid anything" beyond expenses, he said.

"And Ani DiFranco said 'I don't care if you're paying me or not — I want to be there.' That's what made it possible to put this together so fast. In January, this festival wasn't even on."

Another thorny topic is the question of how toxic the ground is at the Fair Grounds Race Course, which flooded when the levees broke. Aaron Neville, who suffers from asthma, has decided not to perform out of health concerns. His son Ivan is playing May 7 but worries what might be in the ground or in the air.

"Unless they dig seven feet down and replace the dirt with other dirt, it still might not be safe," he told The Dallas Morning News in March.

Some festgoers complained of chest heaviness Saturday after 15 mph winds blew dust around the grounds. But Davis said he wasn't worried about potential health problems, and some musicians agreed.

"I can't let that affect me. You have to take some risks," said trombonist Andy Pizzo of the New Orleans Afro-Latin band Vivaz.

"We lost our equipment, our houses, our gigs. Playing Jazzfest this year is super-important for us."

Despite the flooding, the Fair Grounds appear normal aside from some broken tree limbs and a few boarded-up windows in the Grandstand building. Fifty-five of 64 food vendors have returned this year, and all but one stage is back. More than 350 acts will take part in the six-day event, including Paul Simon, Jimmy Buffett and Springsteen, who made his Jazzfest debut on Sunday.

Most of the New Orleans-based acts are simply elated to be back. "We here! We here! We havin' fun again," New Orleans piano legend Eddie Bo yelled as he launched into the Professor Longhair classic "Big Chief."

"The whole thing has been surreal, like being a stranger in your own hometown," Subdudes singer Tommy Malone said. "But then this festival comes along and you feel connected again. You no longer feel displaced."

Characters die on prime time

By Virginia Rohan
The Record (Hackensack N.J.)

Is anyone safe on TV series anymore? Does the Grim Reaper have no regard for even regulars on hit shows?

Prime time, as you've probably noticed, has become an increasingly dangerous place lately. And not just on dark-alley dramas where you'd expect to encounter violence, like "The Sopranos."

This past season has been an unusually bloody one. A number of main characters have met their maker — and the body count will no doubt rise again in the coming days, as May sweeps meets cliffhanger season finales. There will be, for example, shootouts on "ER" and "Conviction," and several other dramas are issuing vaguely ominous warnings about the imapending loss of "one of their own."

Blame the trend on a number of factors — shortened attention spans, a reality-show mentality and the age of interactivity. What's clear is that the old rules no longer apply.

Although no major character has died so far on "Sopranos" this sixth and final season — surely bound to change soon — the list of this season's dead on network TV series is long. It includes:

—Shannon (Maggie Grace), "Lost": She was fatally shot in November by Ana Lucia (Michelle Rodriguez), who mistook her for one of the dreaded Others. Soon "Lost" fans were calling for Ana Lucia's head.

—Jonathan Kent, "Smallville": Clark Kent's dad (John Schneider) suffered a fatal heart attack in January.

—Monica Mancuso, "Las Vegas": Reed-like Lara Flynn Boyle's character essentially got blown off a casino rooftop in November.

—About half the cast of "24": Kiefer Sutherland's thrill-a-minute drama takes the cake here. Never a show to spare an innocent life, "24" has killed off an amazing number of good guys this season. In the season opener, an assassin's bullet felled President Palmer (Dennis Haysbert), and Michelle Dessler (Reiko Aylesworth) was mortally wounded when her car exploded. Her husband, Tony Almeida (Carlos Bernard), also injured, lingered for a while, bent on revenge, only to have a terrorist plunge a hypodermic needle in his heart.

Since then, presidential adviser Walt Cummings (John Allen Nelson) was found hanging (a staged suicide to cover his murder, possibly by President Logan himself). The beloved Edgar Stiles (Louis Lombardi) died when exposed to nerve gas at CTU headquarters. The following week, Lynn McGill (Sean Astin) met the same fate. And last week, Secretary of Defense James Heller (William Devane), about to be killed by terrorists in a helicopter, deliberately drove off a cliff and into a lake.

That's not even counting the evildoers Jack Bauer has justly dispatched to hell. And as the show approaches the conclusion of its deadliest season, the plot line will surely claim more victims.

What gives?

One factor is television's new interactivity. Fans post reviews of series on countless Web sites, registering kudos, gripes and conspiracy theories. Producers often read these comments and sometimes even post their own messages (or red herrings). Presumably, they also take valid criticisms to heart. "Lost" co-creator Damon Lindelof has said that the fans' reaction has affected the pace at which the show's writers reveal answers to some mysteries.

When it comes to dramas dealing with life or death issues, series writers argue that it heightens realism if viewers think that at any moment anyone could die. That scenario is certainly more lifelike than credulity-stretching story lines where characters miraculously rebound from life-threatening injuries or — no offense, Tony — linger in comas for purely creative reasons.

This we-know-not-the-hour approach may keep viewers on their toes and perhaps, more important, keep cast members on edge — possibly deterring diva-like tantrums or salary-related sickouts.

But is the whole trend an exciting or unwelcome development?

That depends on the show — and the character.

In the serialized realm, the "Lost" death of troubled Shannon, just as she was becoming more likable and had found love with Sayid, was sadder than the first-season death of her stepbrother, Boone. Still, it would grieve me far more to lose Jack, Kate, Sawyer, Locke, Sun or Jin.

On "Desperate Housewives," I still miss the meddling Mrs. Huber but would shed no tears if a tornado hit Wisteria Lane and carried away the Applewhites' house. (That dead-end story line is supposed to cease at season's end.)

On the other hand, killing off a beloved character could really backfire.

"24" producers have conceded they were taken aback by the outraged reaction to the decision to kill off chubby, lovably awkward Edgar Stiles, who had terrific chemistry with the prickly Chloe O'Brian (Mary Lynn Rajskub). Was his death really necessary?

I decried the hit-and-run death of Tommy Gavin's son, Connor, on "Rescue Me" last fall. But of all the scripted deaths in the past few years, the most heartbreaking was the execution of Adriana (Drea de Matteo) in Season 5 of "The Sopranos." The show isn't just not the same without her.

Writers have little choice, of course, if a valuable actor dies, as Nancy Marchand did after only one season of "The Sopranos" for the unexpected deaths of "Law & Order: Trial by Jury" star Jerry Orbach and John Spencer of "The West Wing." But couldn't Adriana have just disappeared, leaving open the possibility of a return after the inevitable demise of De Matteo's NBC comedy, "Joey"?

What's for sure is that we're in for more mayhem.

On "Everwood," it's rumored that a longtime resident will die, and people close to main characters appear to be in grave danger on "CSI: Miami" and "CSI: Crime Scene Investigation."

And then, of course, there's "The Sopranos," which has dispatched a few minor characters but is long overdue for a really big whacking.

Expect the blood to flow this month.

'Beep' song gives band exposure, but opens up to mixed reviews

By Neil White
Knight Ridder Newspapers

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Be careful when you turn on your TV these days. There's a car ad that's sitting on the horn.

If you've seen it — and heard it — you definitely know which one it is. It's the Ford Mustang commercial that features a hip little ditty called "Beep Beep."

One of those songs that's impossible to get out of your head, "Beep Beep" is done by an Atlanta-based band called 13 Stories, which also has a performance role in the sleek commercial that has been running during prominent network times throughout the Southeast.

The high-octane dance pop quartet — with Cheri D on vocals, guitarist Cat, bassist J3 and drummer Max — has been compared to the B-52s, Blondie and No Doubt — no doubt because they have female members. The band has a new CD called "FunkyPopSexyHouseRap."

Response to the ubiquitous ad has been strong.

"The commercial has become a water-cooler conversation piece. It's unbelievable," said Randy Sadd, the band manager who originally got the ball rolling by sending a copy of the song to Ford's ad agency, JWT.

Not only did the agency love the tune, but it developed an ad around the song that featured the band's dynamic stage presence.

Cheri D — who said her group puts on "a 1,000-calorie show. We burn a lot of calories" — still couldn't quite believe, however, that the band would be in the ad along with their original tune. And now that it's airing nonstop, they really can't believe it.

"There's my mug, as big as it could be," said Cheri D, who adds that reaction to the ad has pushed awareness of the band from zero to 60.

The ad is generating its share of Internet buzz in both the love-it and hate-it camps. On the Web site, www.awfulcommercials.com, feelings about the song are clear. Here's what a few message-board posters on that site had to say:

—"Whoever thought this commercial was a good idea should die a horrible death ASAP. The commercial should die, too. Muting is not good enough. I will literally change the channel and watch something else."

—"While I'm not in the market to buy a car right now, I flat-out refuse to buy a Ford anything until they pull this commercial. They should probably offer a public apology as well. The maniac who decided that the song would make a good commercial (and somehow sell cars by annoying people) should be fired on the spot."

Even the people who don't mind the tune feel guilty about it.

—"Yeah, I've seen it a ton. Hated it at first, but now I don't know. I think I kind of like the song and that scares me."

—"I think I'm going to have nightmares about this song. Save me! It's so addictive in a horrible way."

But Cheri D laughs at the mixed reviews.

"That's so funny. How can you hate it so much? I think that means you secretly like it," she said, with a big laugh.

And Sadd has no problem with the folks who claim it drives them crazy. "No matter who likes it or doesn't like it, everyone is going to remember it. That's the key right there," he said.

Fisher believes Ford hit the mark with this ad because it stands out. And it reaches younger viewers who might be in the market for a car like the Mustang.

"I like it as a car ad because it's different. It's a good, infectious little tune, but I like the approach. Car ads can suffer from sameness — pretty footage of automobiles in a pretty setting," Fisher said.

"It's what I call breakthrough value. It breaks through the advertising clutter, especially the automobile advertising clutter."

But Paige, who has played her share of jingles over the years, isn't sure how well it works. She believes that it helps to have an entertaining commercial, but she also feels the most effective ad tunes are the ones that include the company's name. And in this case, the "Beep Beep" ad didn't hit the mark for her.

"I remember the commercial, but I didn't remember who it's for. I didn't know it was for a car dealership," she said.

She does think, however, that a catchy song in an ad can assist a young band in getting its music heard by a broader audience.

(It's the opposite of companies using a big-name artist's well-known song to sell a product, such as Microsoft did with the Rolling Stones' "Start Me Up" and Chevy trucks did with Bob Seger's "Like A Rock.")

But unknown bands never know how people will respond to a snippet of their music. In the case of 13 Stories, it's a real split.

"I give it a 93. It's got a good beat and you can dance to it," Fisher said.

Paige, though, didn't want to pass along a harsh judgment.

"I don't want to hurt anybody's feelings," she said.

Sadd believes the band's raised profile can withstand contrasting opinions about their music. He calls the ad campaign a real boost.

"As an indie band, you've got to view it that way. You've got to look at opportunities for exposure. It's a win-win situation for the band and a win-win situation for Ford," Sadd said.

The ad so far has helped with bookings for the band and there is hope it will lead to additional radio airplay for the song. Cheri D hopes it can serve as a door opener for the band.

But here's where she really wants the ad to lead them.

"We want it to lead to a big shiny bus so we can go all over the USA and beep for everybody."

Scientists work to fatten up soybeans with the 'good stuff'

Ginger salmon filets carry healthful omega-3 fats and can be served with vitamin-packed bok choy.

By Rachel Melcer
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

CHICAGO — With the luxury of time, and support from the agricultural biotech industry, researchers at the University of Maryland say they can make a case in favor of genetically modified, nutritionally enhanced foods.

It will be years before the first of these products hit the market.

But if the evidence and technology stack up as developers — including Creve Coeur, Mo.-based Monsanto Co. — hope, consumers will get the heart-health benefits of Omega-3 fatty acids from soybean oil instead of fish. Other products, such as vitamin-enhanced produce or grains, may come further down the line.

In the meantime, researchers are gathering evidence to prove health benefit claims to the Food and Drug Administration and win over consumers.

Biotech seed producers such as Monsanto, food processors and health organizations must join forces now in order to achieve these goals by the time the products are ready for store shelves, said Richard Forshee, deputy director of the Center for Food, Nutrition and Agriculture Policy at the University of Maryland.

He and Maureen Storey, director of the center, presented a model for quantifying the public health benefit of genetically modified foods during a panel discussion at April's Biotechnology Industry Organization, or BIO, 2006 conference.

Their work is funded by the Council for Biotechnology Information, whose members include all of the major biotech seed producers. Forshee and Storey also intend to submit it for scientific peer review and publishing in a reputable journal.

They studied the effects of adding Omega-3 fatty acids to soybeans or canola, which provide cooking oils used in processed foods ranging from potato chips to salad dressing. They followed methods that have been used to measure health benefits of nonbiotech enriched foods, such as milk with added vitamin D and calcium-fortified orange juice.

The early results show there is much promise, but a lot more work needs to be done.

Fish is the best dietary source of Omega-3 fatty acids, which have been shown to improve heart health and decrease the risk of death from irregular heartbeats. But only 17 percent of consumers surveyed say they eat fish at least twice a week, as recommended by the American Heart Association, Storey said. About one in 10 people said they never eat it.

"We have a lot of room for improvement" in the American diet, Storey said. "And that's where (agricultural) biotechnology can help."

Seeing a market opportunity, companies including Monsanto and BASF Plant Science are taking genes from algae consumed by fish — the essential ingredient that gives fish flesh its high Omega-3 content — and adding them to food oil seeds.

Monsanto has grown high-yielding, Omega-3-enriched soybeans, extracted the oil and shown that it has a pleasant taste and no fish odor that might turn off food companies and consumers, said Robb Fraley, chief technology officer. If the oil proves to be stable enough for use in processed foods, which must sit on store shelves without spoiling, and gains regulatory approval, he sees it appearing some time after 2010 in salad dressings, soy milks, margarines, yogurts and other foods.

"We have a lot of excitement about this," he said. "We now can open the door to a whole new way of delivering Omega-3s in the diet through food" rather than supplements in pill form.

Food manufacturers are hungry for ways to add positive health claims to their products, which can boost sales.

their last chance to do it, and they gave it to me and let me run with it."

UMass upset Rutgers that day, 9-6.

Reid has always commanded respect by his actions on the field and his leadership capabilities off of it. His shtick isn't by any means unwarranted, and his teammates love that he has the ability to bring their games up a level as a result.

"Jack has been one of the most influential leaders in my life," freshman goalie Doc Schneider says. "He is always calming me down in the game. He talks to the team very well, but he is more of a leader by example. You follow his lead because he goes hard all the time and says the right things. You want to play for him because he plays so hard."

Jack Reid doesn't have any other gear. He is always moving full steam ahead, laying the wood like a linebacker in football — one of the many positions he played during his four-year high school career on the gridiron — and suffocating any attackman looking for a spare breath on the field. In the rare case he gets burned, his recovery speed has been merciless, and he has been known to go games at a time without letting his assignment score on him.

Reid jokes that no one remembers what defensemen do on the field, as playing good defense is expected and giving up a goal is looked upon as a mistake, even though that may not always be the case.

But he is a defenseman at heart. It's been the case since he was a sixth-grader looking for his lacrosse niche.

He split time with his best friend and current Maryland goaltender Teddy Murphy between the pipes, but he laughs when he remembers that he flinched every time someone took a shot on him.

He started a game in net one day, and his opponents ran up the score on him in the first half. When Reid's coach pulled him in favor of Murphy in the second half, Reid ran around relentlessly on defense, taking a hack at everyone within an arms length.

"It worked really well, and we almost came back and won it," Reid says. "It felt great because I released all this anger from my days in net. After that, I didn't play any more goalie or any other position. It was just defense from there on out."

It was practically the perfect script. It took that one moment on the lacrosse field to change his mindset forever. He knew his purpose, and he engaged it wholeheartedly.

While most kids grow up wanting to be the one who scores the game-winning goal that crowns their team as national champions, Reid was the antithesis.

He wants his team to have the lead in that situation with the opposing attacker heading in his direction as the clock winds down to zero. And as the final buzzer sounds, Reid wants that attacker on his back, looking straight up at No. 18, the man who kept him from scoring.

"The tangible attraction to me is being able to deny somebody else of what they want to do," Reid says intently of his passion for playing defense. "There is something in my personality that says, 'You want to get to the goal? No way, you have to get past me.'

"In football, you want to score a touchdown, and I don't even want to let you gain a yard. For whatever reason growing up, that's always how it's been. I like denying people what they want to get on the field. It's just something that I've related well to."

It was that drive that helped the Minutemen squeak out a final-minute, thrilling win over Fairfield on April 25. The Stags' Greg Downing had the ball in his own end with 90 seconds left, but Reid and long-stick midfielder Dan Whipple didn't allow Downing to even sniff any free space, as they clamped down on him and stole the ball, which ultimately led to a three-goal outburst over a span of 29 seconds and a 7-6 victory.

Heading into last weekend's highly anticipated matchup with Syracuse at the Dome, Reid had set himself a lofty goal. He wanted to strip Joe Yevoli — Syracuse's third-highest scorer and one of the best stick handlers in the nation — of the ball, but not in any ordinary way.

"As risky as it is for me, and it has cost me so many goals in the past, I love laying the over-the-head check on a guy," Reid says. "I told myself that I couldn't go over Yevoli's head because he has great stick protection. I watched him on film just fly right by like four or five different guys who tried going right over his head. During the game, I saw my shot and said I'm going to do it. I got him over the head and was just laughing all the way up the field because I told myself I couldn't do it."

Same story, different day.

Jack Reid's stock was soaring out of high school. He was a state champion and an All-American in Glastonbury, Conn., and he could have played at Yale — where he would have been a familial legacy — Syracuse, Penn State or Georgetown, which actually wanted him for both football and lacrosse.

But he wanted UMass — for its blue-collar attitude which best fit his personality, for its in-your-face atmosphere at Garber Field and for coach Greg Cannella, who has long had the reputation for being one of the best people in the lacrosse world.

Cannella and Reid have been able to play off one another masterfully over the last four years. Cannella has been driving his senior captain to constantly step up his game, but it has been Reid's willingness to bring his top-notch work ethic to the field everyday that has made that possible.

"He came in [to UMass] as a mature and well-adjusted man, and he has just gotten himself better," Cannella says. "It's hard for someone — if you're already there — to see that huge, huge jump. Jack was there when he got here, and he has pushed himself as a person and as a player each and every year. It was more that it was expected from him and certainly from us."

Cannella's expectations don't stop when his players step over the white lines at Garber Field. He holds his men to higher standards in social settings as well as game situations.

For Reid to be the player he is, he always has to play the game right along that infamous edge. He has to play with that acclaimed tenacity that puts fear in his opponents' eyes, but he can't let himself slip across that edge to the boundaries of becoming a "dirty" player.

It's a natural struggle for any athlete, but Cannella has worked with his prodigy to keep him even-keeled.

"Cannella really builds great character," Reid says. "He has worked on things like weaknesses in my personality; controlling my temper, being able to handle losing, being able to handle and relate to people and understanding your situation in life. You've got to be able to understand your role and how to relate to people below you and above you. I think he has really helped me develop all that."

Reid laughs when he realizes some of the things that have rubbed off of Cannella and onto him.

"Three years ago when we lost in the Dome, I punched a dude in the face," he says with a wry smile. "This year I didn't accept [the loss] but realized that punching someone in the face wasn't going to help my cause any. That was all Cannella because I'm sure I wanted to do it, but he taught me better things than that. There are more graceful ways of handling a situation."

In no way is Cannella trying to take the physicality out of Reid's game. He has no desire to. He just wants to make sure all of the extra curricular stuff remains as just that — out of the curriculum of the game.

But with UMass holding a 10-6 fourth-quarter lead over Hobart on April 15, the two briefly butted heads after Reid picked up a one-minute illegal body checking penalty after drilling Patrick Meade from behind as he was catching a pass. Reid defends his actions but understands he may have crossed that line just a bit.

"At first when that happened, [Cannella] was pretty furious with me on the sidelines because it was a pretty bad hit and there was a penalty," Reid says. "It was definitely from behind, and I knew it. I felt justified because I knew if I didn't do that and I went for his stick and missed it, then he was going to score just from where he was going to catch the ball.

"When I saw [Meade], I thought there was a pretty decent chance he was going to turn into the hit, but he apparently saw me coming and turned away. I was handcuffed. I took the option of hitting him and took all the crap that came with it like everybody else saying it was a dirty shot. I wasn't intending to injure or hurt him, but I just wanted to make sure he didn't score."

"Lacrosse is a physical game so if you're going to go out there and compete, you have to be physical," Cannella says. "Sometimes you're going to have to knock somebody down, and Jack is never afraid to do that. If he hits them too hard or too high, then we'll have to live with it. We'll send our man-down [unit] out there and kill it."

Reid is by no means a dirty player, but he has earned the reputation of being an intimidator. Every opposing offensive player wants to know exactly where he is at all times and for good reason. If they don't, they're liable to get a good view of the clouds that particular afternoon.

Reid's style of play fits the UMass lacrosse attitude to a "T". He chose to play in the Pioneer Valley because of the "it's us against the world mentality," and in a way, that is what he is going for when he ducks away from everything behind his headphones and sunglasses.

He doesn't underestimate a soul, so it takes that sort of pre-game preparation to get his mind set for an afternoon slugfest, even after a week of hard work. Before he throws on his maroon and white, it's him against the world, but once he takes the field, everything he does is for the name on his chest.

It's that kind of senior leadership that everyone raves about, especially Cannella, who feels strongly that this is Reid's finest year, despite the daunting task of having to handle some tough senior obligations — not the least of which was having to groom a new set of starting defensemen.

Not surprisingly, Reid has taken it all in stride.

"With every senior, there is a challenge because it's your legacy. It's how you want to be remembered," Cannella says.

So how will Jack Reid be remembered in Amherst?

"As one of the best who has ever played here," Cannella says. "Undoubtedly."

bed, unable to feel his legs or feet, his bodily functions affected.

"We talked, but it was more like, 'Look what both of us got ourselves into,'" Hendricks said. "We didn't dwell on it."

Doctors told Solis — who had never missed more than 3 1/2 months — that he would be out a year.

He wasn't even sure he wanted to return. He gulped pills to deal with the searing pain, and many times woke up in the wee hours feeling scared.

Beating doctors' predictions, he climbed back in the saddle seven months later.

"It was very clear in my mind that I could be hurt or killed doing anything else," Solis said. "If I don't go back and do what I love, I'm going to be disappointed and upset with myself."

Hendricks endured his own tortured moments — asking himself why he went riding that day, why he had to get hurt, why things couldn't return to the way they were before.

"But then I look, and I did it to myself," he said.

With the help of his wife and three sons, Hendricks moved into a one-story house — across a golf course from Solis — and bought a van he could drive using hand controls.

Two months later, he returned to running his barn. Someone else saddles his horses, although he can still reach down and feel their legs for any worrisome injuries.

Hendricks had a dry sense of humor before the accident, and he's maintained the same demeanor, at least publicly.

"After sitting six weeks in a hospital not doing much of anything, you get a little more patient and mellow about things," he said.

Solis sees life differently than he did before.

"I'm more grateful," the father of four said. "Something horrible like this had to happen for you to get an understanding of what life means, to do the best that you can and have fun with it."

No longer does he tear from one race to the next without pause. The night he won last month's Santa Anita Derby aboard Brother Derek, Solis opened a bottle of wine and watched the replays for three hours.

"I make sure I enjoy it and savor what I did," he said.

Solis learned something from Hendricks, too.

"He always tried to be the same person he was before and that was an inspiration that gave me a lot of strength," the jockey said.

Solis' wife Sheila still tears up thinking about the accidents, and how Brother Derek's success has brought joy to both families.

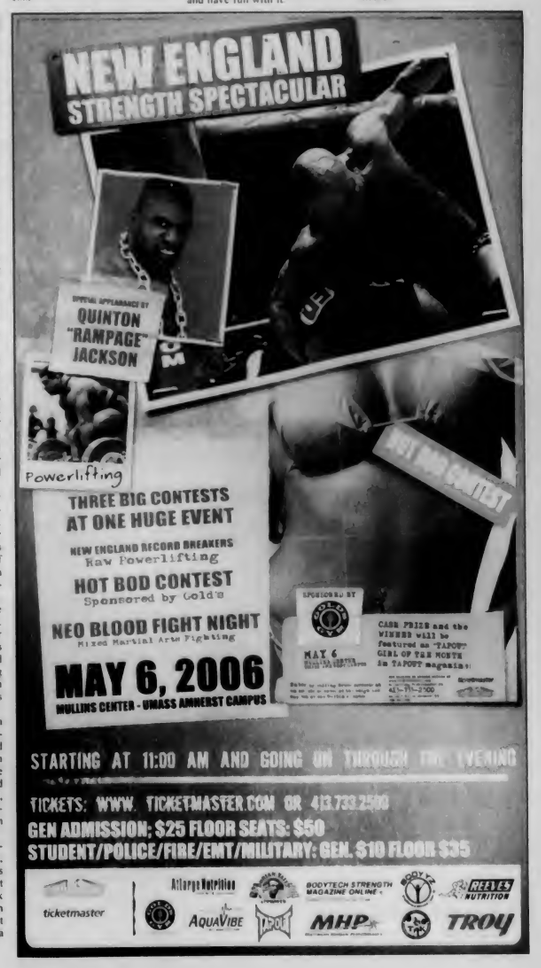
"It's such an incredible story. We're living a dream right now," she said. "It makes me really happy to see Dan be in this position. It gives him a new light on life, which everyone needs."

The 47-year-old Hendricks has never been to the Kentucky Derby with his own horse.

The 42-year-old Solis has never won in 14 previous Derby rides dating to 1983 — the longest drought for a jockey. He has finished second three times and third once while twice riding the favorite.

One year, after another losing effort, Solis retreated to his corner of the jockeys' room. "I was so sad that I wanted to cry," he said.

Pat Day, who went 0-for-9 before winning his only Derby in 1992, and Jaffit Pincay Jr., who lost 10 times before winning in 1984, encouraged Solis, telling him, "There's one for you there."



"It gave me a lot of inspiration to keep trying," he said.

Hendricks won't give his friend any instructions in the paddock at Churchill Downs on Saturday, when Brother Derek will try to change their lives again, this time in a good way.

"I got the horse here," he said. "I'm laying it all on him now."

Solis welcomes the pressure, which is nothing compared to what he and Hendricks survived.

"Dan and I have come a long ways," he said. "I'm praying to God that Brother Derek is the horse."

Woods loses father

to Raising a Winner in Both Golf and Life."

Woods gave his son freedom to develop a love for golf on his own, not letting him play unless his homework was done, making him call his father at work to ask if they could practice. Along with the games they played, Woods taught him to be mentally strong by jingling change in his pockets and warning him of water hazards when his son was in the middle of his swing.

It all worked.

Tiger Woods set records that might never be broken by winning three straight U.S. Junior titles, followed by three straight U.S. Amateurs. At age 30, he already has won 48 times on the PGA Tour with 10 major championships, and he set a PGA Tour record by going seven years and 142 consecutive events making the cut.

In the forward to his father's book, Woods said: "In retrospect, golf for me was an apparent attempt to emulate the person I looked up to more than anyone: my father. He was instrumental in helping me develop the drive to achieve, but his role — as well as my mother's — was one of support and guidance, not interference."

PGA Tour commissioner Tim Finchem said Woods will be remembered for providing Tiger every opportunity "to become the world's best golfer and an outstanding representative of the game and its values."

Foremost for Woods was raising a son who could influence life beyond golf. Woods was black and his wife, Kultida, whom he met during one of his tours to Vietnam, was Thai and Chinese.

Tiger Woods won twice in his first seven PGA Tour events after turning pro in 1996 at age 20 and was named Sports Illustrated Sportsman of the Year. Woods predicted greatness for Tiger on and off the course, telling the magazine that his son "will do more than any other man in history to change the course of humanity."

"He's the bridge between the East and the West," the father said. "There is no limit because he has the guidance. I don't know yet exactly what form this will take. But he is the Chosen One. He'll have the power to impact nations.

Tiger Woods has become the most dominant golfer in the game today thanks largely to his father Earl, who died yesterday morning of cancer.

Not people. Nations. The world is just getting a taste of his power."

Perhaps the lasting image of Earl Woods came the next spring, at the 1997 Masters, when he stepped onto the 18th green and wrapped his arms around a 21-year-old son who shattered records at Augusta National, a watershed victory that changed the appeal of golf and sent him to the greatness his father had always predicted.

Earl Woods was born March 5, 1932, in Manhattan, Kan., the youngest of six children. His parents died by the time he was 13.

His father wanted him to play for the Kansas City Monarchs in the Negro Leagues, and his mother stressed education. Woods wound up going to Kansas State, graduating in 1953 with a degree in sociology.

Woods did two tours during the Vietnam War as a member of the U.S. Army Special Forces, rising to the rank of lieutenant colonel. It was his second tour that shaped the latter part of his life.

He met Kultida Punsawad, who was working as a receptionist in Thailand, and married her in 1969. He fought alongside Lt. Col. Nguyen T. Phong of the South Vietnamese army, a friend he nicknamed "Tiger" because of his courage and bravery. Woods promised Tiger Phong that he would name a son after him.

Eldrick "Tiger" Woods was born Dec. 30, 1975.

Earl Woods moved to Cypress, Calif., — to the house where he died — and set up a makeshift practice range in the garage with a mat and a net, placing his son in a high chair as he practiced.

The education went beyond swinging a club.

"I tried to break him down mentally, tried to intimidate him verbally, by saying, 'Water on the right, OB on the left,' just before his downswing," Woods once said in an AP interview. "He would look at me with the most evil look, but he wasn't permitted to say anything. That's the frustration. He couldn't say a word, but he always had an escape word. He never used it.

"One day I did all my tricks, and he looked at me and smiled," Woods said. "At the end of the round, I told him, 'Tiger, you've completed the training.' And I made him a promise. 'You'll never run into another person as mentally tough as you.' He hasn't. And he won't."

Woods was proud of saying he never left his son with a baby sitter, but his goal was to eventually let Tiger run his own life.

"I had pulled back, one item at a time," Woods once told the AP. "Instead of going to several tournaments, it was a couple of tournaments, then one tournament. All of a sudden, he was running everything. I stood there and watched it happen. Because that was my job — to prepare him to leave."

Besides his wife and Tiger, Woods is survived by three children from his previous marriage.

Time for U.S. to take next step

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Plucky sounds just about right. That was the word the rest of the world affixed to U.S. soccer players who ventured abroad in the last 15 years, and it was about as welcome as a cold plate of porridge. It meant most Yanks were brave but overmatched; tough and athletic but lacking the necessary skill set; and that when gathered together on a field somewhere, they were very beatable.

The World Cup squad U.S. coach Bruce Arena unveiled Tuesday night still is. That's the bad news.

On the flip side, he has a goalkeeper, Kasey Keller, who could start for any team in the tournament. The same is nearly true about his two young attacking midfielders, DaMarcus Beasley and Landon Donovan, and maybe even aging U.S. captain Claudio Reyna, who distributes the ball well enough to have played soccer's version of point guard for big-time clubs in Germany, Scotland and England.

Striker Brian McBride is the best of another half-dozen or so players holding down spots in topflight European leagues, and three kids Arena will bring to Germany — Oguchi Onyewu, 23, who has the frame and speed of an NFL wideout; along with Clint Dempsey, 23; and Eddie Johnson, 22 — have the potential to break out as stars.

Regarding their chances when the ball is kicked off for real June 12 against the Czech Republic, Arena said, "With a good training camp, good preparation games and the right mental approach our team will be a team that's going to challenge anybody on the field in this World Cup."

It's both the curse and blessing of his job that most Americans don't emerge from a four-year slumber until right around World Cup time and ask why, with just about every kid in the country playing rec league soccer, their team is still not a major power. And this time around, Arena is going to be facing more of those questions than ever.

According the FIFA world rankings, the Yanks are a major power — at No. 4, propped up mostly by their stunning run to the quarterfinals in 2002, and trailing only defending champion Brazil, the Czech Republic and the Netherlands. But Germany, Spain, Italy, England, Argentina and a half-dozen other teams are still better on most days.

Arena certainly wishes his countrymen were paying attention in the meantime, noting the incremental progress, rather than looking in only during final exams. But that disinterest has bought the U.S. effort time to build a domestic league, send more players to the finishing schools in Europe, then scout, nurture and forge that emerging talent into a cohesive unit.

When the U.S. team played the Czechoslovaks in 1990, marking their first appearance in a World Cup in 40 years, they gave away two penalty kicks, almost had their goalie knocked out by the post, featured maybe three players who could sit on the bench for somebody else, and got embarrassed 5-1.

This team is better — better prepared, better coached, deeper, faster, more skillful, experienced, fit and committed than any previous team the United States has fielded. It also has more corporate money behind it and more television exposure ahead. But it will need plenty of luck to enlarge the small dent it registered in America's sporting consciousness four years ago.

These players still lack the collective skill to play keep-away end to end, like the Brazilians, or string passes together with speed, like the Spanish. They can't match the Germans' maniacal work rate, the set-piece and finishing skills of the English, the explosiveness of the Argentines ... and so on. They only wish they had a tradition to refer to, a shared playing style and past to celebrate, instead of always looking for a new one.

But pluck might not such a bad quality to build on.

"You can't go into a World Cup timid, and you can't go into it shy thinking, well, it's just 'I'm happy to be there and let's get out and play,'" Donovan said. "You're there for a reason, and we're there to win."

Arena has proved masterful in previous coaching stints at assessing his players' strengths, drawing up game plans to maximize them, and getting them to sacrifice unflinchingly for each other. At the last World Cup, his team absorbed more than its share of attacks, then hit back with a series of counterpunches orchestrated by Reyna and John O'Brien from the midfield and finished off by a corps of fast, opportunistic forwards.

The saying in soccer is the way you play is the way you are, that the reason the World Cup is sport's greatest drama is because we watch a team trying to validate its national character. Arena's players won't be quiet as heavy underdogs this time, but from the first whistle to last, they'd better play that way.

Midfielder Landon Donovan (right) is one of the leaders of the U.S. soccer team which will be looking to contend for the World Cup.

Accidents change jockeys' lives

By Beth Harris
Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Two accidents 16 days apart on their favorite types of horses forever altered the lives of jockey Alex Solis and trainer Dan Hendricks.

A horse named Brother Derek has changed things, too, giving both men a chance late in their careers to win their first Kentucky Derby. The colt carries a four-racing winning streak and two families' hopes into America's greatest race Saturday.

Solis got tossed from the saddle when his horse clipped heels and fell in a race at Del Mar on July 7, 2004. He remembers it as "a stupid little fall."

Barely two weeks later, Hendricks came flying off a jump at his favorite California motocross course and crashed. The self-described "small" jump was one he had successfully made hundreds of times before.

"We were both in bad shape," Solis said. "It was a really tough time."

Hendricks, though, had it worse.

His spinal cord was severely damaged, paralyzing him from the waist down. He had surgery to insert a plate in his spine and a cage around his injured vertebrae, followed by weeks of therapy and rehabilitation.

"Sometimes I wake up and I just can't believe that I'm paralyzed and that this is how it's got to be," he said.

Solis broke his back, but had no spinal damage. During a nine-hour operation, doctors inserted two, 5-inch-long titanium rods and eight screws in his back.

One of the first things Solis did after being released was to visit Hendricks, who was still hospitalized across the street from where the jockey had been.

"It was very hard to see him the way he was," Solis said, "but the most important thing was that he's still alive."

They were quite the pair — Solis wearing neck and back braces and Hendricks laid up in

'You have to get past me'

Reid continues to lead defensive corps for UMass

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

He sits in his own little world — in the midst of a crowd but completely by himself — away from his teammates, his coaches and anything on the outside that may cause distraction.

The drums of Lars Ulrich, vocals of Rob Zombie and guitar solos of Tom Morello reverberate through his head while he hides behind a pair of silver Oakleys.

It's almost game time.

Jack Reid stays intensely focused seven days a week. But this is different. This is the day he takes it to another level. This day is the culmination of the six others that preceded it.

Lacrosse is the ultimate team game, especially at UMass. But during the morning leading up to the 60-minute battle that is about to take place, Reid prefers to do things his own way.

"I usually have my headphones and glasses on because I don't want to interact with too many people," he says. "I just hide behind the glasses and stay in my own little world. The guys bust [me] all the time for wearing my glasses, like in Georgetown where it was pouring rain and I had my glasses on all day. I just like kind of sitting behind those until I start getting dressed up."

He has yet to see the field, but he readies himself for that first sight — whether it is the hill adjacent to Garber, the metallic glow that surrounds the field turf at the Carrier Dome or the Harvard playing surface that fits comfortably next to Storrow Drive — by filing through his play list that perfectly suits his personality.

Reid begins to "Ante Up" with M.O.P., sings a familiar tune of his opposition with Metallica's "Unforgiven" and preludes his playing style with White Zombie's "More Human Than Human."

But as game time grows closer, his headphones blast out a different ring. Ten minutes before it's time to take the field, Reid makes the switch to The Derek Trucks Band and "Sahib Teri Bandi — Maki Madni."

"It's so anti what you think I would be listening to," he says. "It's not Metallica, it's a jam band with people clapping and moving along. I just like to hang out and listen to that by myself. I try not to be too overly intense of a guy."

Reid has found that perfect medium, the exact mix he needs to bring out the appropriate frame of mind it takes for him to jump onto the field and dominate.

And "dominate" may serve as an understatement. He has been the best defenseman on the field for each of the 13 games the Minutemen have played in 2006, and he is being called the best defenseman in the country right now.

For Jack Reid, game days are his rite of passage.

When Reid takes the field for pregame warm-ups, he begins to remove himself from that early morning shell. He opens himself up to the rest of the world and takes notice of his surroundings, particularly to the team on the other side of the field.

"Usually before we stretch, I go off a little bit about what subject really ticks me off about the other team," Reid says. "There have been some good speeches that have come through that. Any chance I get to smash something, I usually take it."

It is this form of Jack Reid that those in the stands know best. This is the fiery competitor his teammates love and his opponents hate. It makes one wonder why anyone on the other sideline would give Reid any incentive to bring even an ounce more of motivation onto the field — why anyone would give him the bulletin board material that becomes his lifeblood.

He remembers one instance vividly.

UMass went into its last game of the 2004 season against Rutgers with a disappointing 6-7 record. It was a season in which the Minutemen were marred by injuries, while Rutgers had it all moving perfectly in the right direction.

The Scarlet Knights were No. 10 in the country and rolling towards the NCAA Tournament. It was Senior Day at Garber Field, and the Rutgers players seemed more concerned with their own vanity than the upcoming game.

Though just a sophomore at the time, Reid saw the ideal opportunity to rally his troops.

"When I went out for warm-ups, I saw a couple guys from Rutgers laying out on our field and sunning themselves with their shirts off on our benches," he recalls. "I asked the senior captains if I could speak before the game. We all came together after the stretch, and I just went off about how disrespectful it was for them to be out there taking us so lightly like that.

"That is one of my favorite ones. I was still a young guy at the time, but I had the respect of my teammates. The seniors let me speak on their Senior Day; it was my mentor and perhaps my greatest support system. Earl was all of that to Tiger," he said.

UMass senior captain Jack Reid has used a combination of athletic ability and intensity to establish himself as one of the best defensemen in the country during his four years in Amherst.

Reid was selected as an All-American following the past two years and was named a Preseason First-Team All-American prior to this season.

UM on tourney path

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

In typical fashion, Massachuetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella refuses to classify this Saturday's regular-season finale with Rutgers as a big game.

Cannella is a firm believer that there is no such thing as a big game; that each contest counts the same in the standings. Granted wins over highly-ranked opponents do boost a team's profile, but essentially Cannella's stance is accurate — at the end of the day a win over Hofstra or a win over Sacred Heart is worth the same in the win-loss column.

But if ever there was a game that challenged Cannella's outlook, it would be this Saturday's 3:30 p.m. matchup with the Scarlet Knights (5-8, 2-4 ECAC).

First off, the game — which will be nationally televised on ESPNU — will have a major impact on the No. 11 Minutemen's postseason aspirations. A win on Saturday will almost assuredly clinch an at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament — which would be the fourth tournament berth in the past five years for UMass — while a loss would force the Minutemen (9-4, 4-2 ECAC) to sweat out Sunday's Tournament Selection Show, which takes place at 10 p.m. on ESPNEWS.

In addition to the postseason ramifications, Saturday is Senior Day, with six UMass seniors — captains Sean Morris, Jack Reid and Jake Deane, as well as classmates Clay Stabert, Jamie Yaman and Dane Collins — playing their final game on Garber Field.

All of these outside factors could distract a team, but Cannella believes that by treating every game the same, his squad's focus shouldn't be affected.

"We've said it all year — every game is a big game," Cannella said. "This game won't change that. We'll try to focus more on the game itself and everything else will take care of itself if we do that. You don't change now the way you think or what you say because of what's on the line."

Cannella is aware that there does tend to be more emotion during Senior Day games, but he hopes that his leaders will be able to channel their enthusiasm.

"You have to be careful with Senior Day," Cannella said. "Sometimes guys have too much emotion going into the game. You just hope those guys play their best game in their last game on Garber Field."

A key for UMass will be having its attack return to its early season form. The Minuteman offense was ranked No. 3 in the nation as recently as last week, but in the last three games has only averaged 6.7 goals per game, and has fallen to No. 9.

Not coincidentally, the Minutemen have lost two of the three games, and Cannella believes that his squad must regain its swagger.

"You can't win nine games against good teams without confidence, so it's there," Cannella said. "Now we just have to bring it back out."

On paper it appears that Rutgers may be the perfect opponent for the Minutemen to snap out of their recent struggles, but despite a sub-.500 record, the Scarlet Knights have been in almost every game, especially lately.

In the past four weeks, Rutgers has lost to top-15 teams Georgetown, Syracuse and Penn State by just a goal apiece, with two of the losses coming in overtime.

"They're playing as good as anybody," Cannella said. "The common fan may look at it and say 'Oh, [UMass] should kill them because they're 5-8.' That's not the way we look at things because we know they're good. We know they're going to be tough."

A tough opponent combined with tournament implications and Senior Day won't change Cannella's approach and he certainly won't label it a big game, but he does concede that Saturday's matchup is significant.

"When you get to play on Garber Field in May," he said, "you know it's an important game."

Midfielder Brian Jacovina will be one of six seniors honored as part of Senior Day on Saturday when UMass hosts Rutgers at 3:30.

Earl Woods dies at 74 of cancer

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

Earl Woods, who was more determined to raise a good son than a great golfer and became the architect and driving force behind Tiger Woods' phenomenal career, died yesterday morning at his home in Cypress, Calif. He was 74.

"My dad was my best friend and greatest role model, and I will miss him deeply," Tiger Woods said on his Web site. "I'm overwhelmed when I think of all of the great things he accomplished in his life. He was an amazing dad, coach, mentor, soldier, husband and friend. I wouldn't be where I am today without him, and I'm honored to continue his legacy of sharing and caring."

A habitual smoker who had heart bypass surgery in 1986, Woods was diagnosed with prostate cancer in 1998 and was treated with radiation. But the cancer returned in 2004 and spread throughout his body.

Last month, he was too frail to travel to the Masters for the first time.

The last tournament Woods attended was the Target World Challenge in December 2004, when his son rallied to win and then donated $1.25 million to the Tiger Woods Foundation that his father helped him establish. The Tiger Woods Learning Center, another vision inspired by his father, opened in February.

Woods decided not to play in the Wachovia Championship this week in Charlotte, N.C. Two of his best friends on tour, Mark O'Meara and John Cook, withdrew from the tournament and flew to California to be with him.

Jack Nicklaus, who also was 30 when his father died, said he had long "admired and related to the close bond" shared by Tiger and Earl.

"My father was my best friend, my mentor and perhaps my greatest support system. Earl was all of that to Tiger," he said.

Earl Woods was more than a golf dad, more than a zealous father who lived vicariously through his son's achievements.

He had played catcher for Kansas State, the first black to play baseball in the Big Eight Conference, and he had been a Green Beret for two tours in Vietnam. But he felt his true purpose was to train Tiger, and he watched his son evolve into the dominant player of his time — the youngest player to win the career Grand Slam — and one of the most celebrated athletes in the world.

"I knew Tiger was special the day he was born," Woods said in a May 2000 interview with The Associated Press.

Woods introduced Tiger to golf by swinging a club as his son watched in a high chair. Tiger appeared on the "Mike Douglas Show" at age 2, played exhibitions with Sam Snead and Nicklaus, and his television appeal was solely responsible for quantum gains in PGA Tour prize money.

Even so, Woods said he never intended to create a champion golfer.

"I make it very, very clear that my purpose in raising Tiger was not to raise a golfer. I wanted to raise a good person," Woods told Golf Digest magazine about his book, "Training a Tiger: A Father's Guide

Journalism program holds panel discussion

Director of the Committee to Protect Journalists Ann Cooper and Legal Studies professor David Mednicoff.

By Kristina Tedeschi
Collegian Correspondent

The Journalism Program Lecture Series on Broadcast and the Media presented a panel discussion last night in Bartlett Hall featuring Executive Director of the Committee to Protect Journalists Ann Cooper and Legal Studies professor David Mednicoff, who specializes in international law and current issues in the Middle East. The presentation was funded by David '79 and Teena Kantor and mediated by Journalism professor B.J. Roche.

The discussion, entitled "The Journalist in Iraq, 2006", focused on the realities of everyday life for journalists living and reporting in Iraq, as well as the tremendous contributions they make to society while risking their lives to tell the story.

For the journalism department, University of Massachusetts' alumna and former war hostage Jill Carroll was the inspiration for the discussion's topic.

"We're dedicating this night to Jill," said Roche. "She is a writer with courage and compassion."

The event was also a way to raise money for the family of Carroll's translator Allyn Enwiyah, who was killed in January 2005 when Carroll was kidnapped. Enwiyah was survived by his wife and two children, who, according to Roche, have been removed from Iraq. Carroll and the Christian Science Monitor, for which she works, set up the fund for the Enwiyah family in hopes that it could eventually bring them to the United States.

The topic then switched to the relationship between the government and journalists in Iraq. According to Mednicoff, the government sometimes forgets that the press works for the people, not for them.

"Governments try to use journalism to get their message across," he said. "Jill was the last person who should have been taken hostage."

Cooper said she and the CPJ work hard to stay in touch with journalists over in Iraq every day and document every attack on their freedoms that they can. She expressed her gratitude for journalists like Carroll who risk everything to report from Iraq.

"I don't want to have to rely on Pentagon press releases to tell me how it's all going," Cooper said. "I want to hear from...reporters who do their best to report independently on this story."

According to Cooper, $320 billion dollars of U.S. taxpayers' money will have gone towards the war in Iraq by the end of this year. According to a BBC news source, 2,314 Americans and a staggering 33, 885 Iraqis have been killed since the war began in March 2003. Since that time, 68 journalists have been killed, two of them American, and 23 media workers have been killed, most of them Iraqi. In some instances, journalists have been killed by friendly fire.

"At this point, here is what we can say about the 14 cases where journalists have been killed by U.S. fire," said Cooper. "In most of those cases, the military has either not investigated them at all, has not conducted a serious investigation, or has not made its inquiries public."

A former soldier, Bob Hyde, a senior Isenberg School of Management major, shared his feelings about the war in Iraq.

"When I first went over, I felt like I was helping the world," he said. "Now, I feel like I was used and lied to."

Cooper stressed the importance of learning, through independent reporting, what the government may not want us to know.

"Getting real news and seeing beyond what the U.S. military sees is important," she said.

Rising tuition increases hit home

MASSPIRG report shows fees costly climb

By Anna Dolianitis
Collegian Staff

A report released early last month by the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) addressed a correlation between increasing student debt and the amount of students able to pursue careers in civil service.

The report, entitled, "Paying Back, Not Giving Back," addressed the issue of recent graduates incurring what they called "unmanageable debt," saying that "loan payments would have a measurable and burdensome impact on their lives and would likely hinder their ability to pay for basic necessities."

Those who choose to enter into civil service careers such as teaching, social work, and any non-profit work, are most susceptible to facing unmanageable debt, as they receive the lowest salaries, according to the report.

Allia Matta, a teaching assistant in the Women's Studies department, estimated her student loan debt after finishing her graduate studies at approximately $65,000-70,000, "on the low side."

"Students are unable to go into the career of their choice," said Kate Gilbert, the campus organizer of MassPIRG at UMass.

According to the report, "recent graduates with very low salaries — about half of the median individual income in the U.S. — cannot manageably repay their student loan debt while meeting other needs."

The study found that in 2004, two-thirds of all four-year college graduates left school with student debt, compared with less than one-third in 1993.

The increase in student debt comes primarily as a result of increases in tuition and loans, and decreases in grants.

On February 1, Congress reauthorized the Higher Education Act, originally enacted by President Johnson in 1965, "to strengthen the educational resources of our colleges and universities and to provide financial assistance for students in post-secondary education."

The reauthorization of the bill called for a $12 billion cut in student federal aid, and beginning on July 1, the interest rates on Stafford loans, the main source of federal student loans, will move to a fixed rate of 6.8 percent, according to the report.

Gilbert called this development, "the biggest cut to federal student aid in American history."

With tuition rapidly increasing nationwide, the impact on college students is becoming even more severe.

Chancellor John Lombardi said, "Tuition and fees have been increasing across the country in all states as the public has chosen to shift much of the burden of paying for college from the taxpayers to the students and their families."

"Because I am the first person in my family to go to college, my parents didn't know what to do, and I sure didn't either. We just thought you fill out the FAFSA and it would be all set. Well, it was, except I have paid for my college education thus far in loans," said sophomore Richard Kennicy, who plans to pursue a career as a history teacher.

"I don't think it's fair, but unfortunately, because of this country's education policy or lack thereof, many students are forced to deal with it if they really want to receive an education," said Matta.

Sophomore, Lindsey Farina, who plans to pursue a career in education said, "I feel that our communities will ultimately suffer the most. With these heavy financial burdens, students are often not able to give back as much

BET's Jeff Johnson speaks at UMass

By Sesugh Nomishan
Collegian Correspondent

Jeffrey Johnson, of Black Entertainment Television's "Cousin Jeff Chronicles," delivered an intense sermon-like lecture Monday at the Campus Center Auditorium discussing issues plaguing the black community today.

Johnson, known by many as "Cousin Jeff," expressed his strong viewpoints on the state of black leadership in relation to the current hip-hop generation. Johnson said there is a "leadership void" in traditional foundations for black leaders such as the black church, the black electorate, and organizations like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

"The NAACP does not do their job," Johnson said. "They say that there are jobs but they don't train you how to do the jobs."

Johnson also accuses black church leaders, such as T.D. Jakes of steering away from social and political issues and black Democratic Party candidates, such as Barack Obama for being lethargic and lacking political sophistication.

Johnson said this void in leadership leads youth to look towards hip-hop artists to lead. He said the community does not need the hip-hop industry to improve itself.

"Families will make communities better, not artists," Johnson said. "We can't look for the hip-hop industry to lead because hip-hop leaders don't know who they are."

Johnson said that hip-hop has lost its true identity, and people are more concerned with cars, clothes, and jewelry rather than using the culture as a form of progressive expression. He says that hip-hop is failing in uplifting women and settling with the perpetual objectification of women.

"They [artists] have created a damaged image and prefer that damaged image...so much so that now they're in love with a stripper," he said.

Johnson said that hip-hop as a language is useful and individuals of the hip-hop generation should embrace it rather than change it.

"You should never lessen who you are just to make other people feel more comfortable," he said.

Johnson said young people are ready to make changes in their communities, but leaders are needed to steer them in the right direction. He said solving these issues involves challenging the churches, the electorate, and institutions into being better leaders for the community.

"There's youth in the community that believe they have to be a hip-hop artist or in sports in order to succeed," Johnson said. "Leaders have to tell them they have the ability to do other things and then show them how."

Black Student Union activities coordinator Malcolm Gray believes Johnson tying hip-hop into his lecture is beneficial in encouraging students on campus.

"It's a good fit to have such a profound black leader discuss issues of hip-hop," Gray said. "We need an overall unification of the minority population to form an action plan. We need to become active and have a voice."

Johnson said that aspiring black leaders must empower the campus and community by talking to students, engaging students, and strategizing.

"You have to have a vision," Johnson said. "Tell them it's possible and show them how to do it."

This event was part of Hip Hop Week 2006 sponsored by BSU.

Jeffrey Johnson, of BET's "Cousin Jeff Chronicles," said that hip-hop is failing in uplifting women and settling with the perpetual objectification of women.

Moussaoui offers last diatribe in court

By Michael J. Sniffin
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui was sentenced Thursday to spend his life in the country's strictest prison, scolding Americans on the way for missing a chance to learn from him why they are hated by al-Qaida terrorists.

Capping four years of legal maneuvering and a two-month trial, U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema sentenced the unrepentant 37-year-old Frenchman to six life sentences. She told him he would "die with a whimper," isolated from the world and not in the glory of martyrdom.

In a parting shot, Moussaoui, the only person charged in the U.S. in the nation's deadliest terrorist attack, accused Americans of "hypocrisy ... beyond any belief."

Special rules at the federal super maximum-security prison in Florence, Colo., where Brinkema sent Moussaoui, will bar the voluble if ineffective terrorist from contact with the outside world for the rest of his life.

Putting aside the abusive epithets and clownish comments he became known for, Moussaoui sought to offer a sober explanation of his hatred for the United States and chastised America for refusing to listen.

Moussaoui directed what may be his last public words to three relatives of victims killed on Sept. 11, 2001 — relatives who moments before stood in court, faced Moussaoui and described loved ones lost the day four hijacked jetliners crashed into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field.

He said Americans feel only their own pain and wondered if they would ever consider "how many people the CIA has destroyed." He called the trial "a wasted opportu-

Rumsfeld heckled by former CIA analyst

By Shannon McCaffrey
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Protesters repeatedly interrupted Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld during a speech Thursday and one man, a former CIA analyst, accused him of lying about Iraq prewar intelligence in an unusually vociferous display of anti-war sentiment.

"Why did you lie to get us into a war that caused these kind of casualties and was not necessary?" asked Ray McGovern, the former analyst, during a question-and-answer session.

"I did not lie," shot back Rumsfeld, who waved off security guards ready to remove McGovern from the hall at the Southern Center for International Studies.

With Iraq war support remaining low, it is not unusual for top Bush administration officials to encounter protests and hostile questions. But the outbursts Rumsfeld confronted on Thursday seemed beyond the usual.

Three protesters were escorted away by security as each interrupted Rumsfeld's speech by jumping up and shouting anti-war messages. Throughout the speech, a fourth protester stood in the middle of the room with his back to Rumsfeld in silent protest. Officials reported no arrests.

Rumsfeld also faced tough questions from a woman identifying herself as Patricia Roberts of Lithonia, Ga., who said her son, 22-year-old Spc. Jamaal Addison, was killed in Iraq. Roberts said she is now raising her young grandson and asked whether the government could provide any help.

Rumsfeld referred her to a Web site listing aid organizations.

President Bush seldom faces such challenges. Demonstrators usually are kept far from him when he delivers public remarks.

Rumsfeld has been interrupted by anti-war demonstrators in congressional hearing rooms as he has delivered testimony to lawmakers in recent months, and at some speeches around the country.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has had direct confrontations overseas. These include demonstrators who called her a murderer and war criminal in Australia in March, and throngs of anti-war protesters who dogged her every move in northern England in April.

Demonstrators were kept far away from Rice during a visit last week to Greece, where riot police confronted a violent street mob that smashed shop windows in protest of U.S. policies and Rice's role in the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

More than half of Americans say the war in Iraq was not worth the cost financially or in loss of life, recent public polling has found. Just over one-third of those surveyed say they approve of Bush's handing of the war. Public sentiment about the war has been at those low levels since fall.

Just over one-third of the public says Rumsfeld is doing an excellent or pretty good job, according to polling in March, while six in 10 said fair or poor.

In the run-up to the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, the Bush administration repeatedly spoke of evidence that Saddam Hussein had acquired weapons of mass destruction. No such armaments have been found.

nity for this country to understand ... why people like me, like (hijacker) Mohamed Atta and the rest have so much hatred for you."

Moments later, Brinkema refused to be interrupted by Moussaoui as she disputed his declaration Wednesday that "America, you lost. ... I won."

She told Moussaoui that after the proceeding everyone else in the room would be "free to go any place they want. They can go outside and they can feel the sun, ... smell the fresh air, ... hear the birds. They can eat what they want tonight. They can associate with whom they want."

She went on: "You will spend the rest of your life in a super-maximum security prison. ... It's quite clear who won ... and who lost."

"You came here to be a martyr in a great big bang of glory," she said, "but to paraphrase the poet T.S. Eliot, instead you will die with a whimper."

Generals call for Rumsfeld resignation

Officials also spoke about connections between Saddam and al-Qaida that critics say remain unproven.

In recent weeks, at least a half dozen retired generals have called for Rumsfeld's resignation, saying he has ignored advice offered by military officers and made strategic errors in the Iraq war, including committing too few troops. But he has received strong backing by Bush, who repeatedly has indicated he will keep Rumsfeld at the Pentagon.

When security guards tried removing McGovern, the analyst, during his persistent questions of Rumsfeld, the defense secretary told them to let him stay. The two continued to spar.

"You're getting plenty of play," Rumsfeld told McGovern, who is an outspoken critic of the war in Iraq.

Responding to another protester who also accused Rumsfeld of lying, the secretary said such accusations are "so wrong, so unfair and so destructive."

Antiwar protester Gloria Tatum, left, is restrained by an unidentified woman after she disrupted a speech by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

MASSPIRG report shows UMass is 'critically underfunded'

as they would like, or are forced to switch to different, more high paying positions."

Matta said, "Some states have decent teaching rates for teachers from K-12 and some universities also offer decent salaries but this is such a conditional issue. The faculty salaries depend on whether one selects a private school over public. I so feel that because teaching is not completely valued across the board, for many, the impetus to raise salaries is practically non-existent."

The study found that, "23 percent of public college and 38 percent of private college graduates would have unmanageable debt as a starting teacher," and "37 percent of public college and 55 percent of private college graduates would have unmanageable debt as a starting social worker."

Farina said, "In the past, I never questioned not teaching because of the salary. However, as I am getting closer to graduation, I am beginning to see the burden living off a teacher's salary would be. This does concern me."

Brian Boissvert, a teaching assistant in the Spanish and Portuguese Studies Department, who will face an approximately $40,000 debt upon graduation, said, "We're all slaves to the capitalist system in which we live. I'm not advocating free tuition for students, but I'd like to be paid for what I actually do, which is work more hours than what my paycheck says. I see myself as a graduate student who teaches the equivalent of a high school teacher, yet gets maybe a third of the pay." Boissvert acknowledged, however, that he himself "made the decision to be technically impoverished by being a graduate student."

"The low pay does cause me to question this career path, but overall, my career decision is going to be made by how happy I am at what I am doing," said Kenney.

"The loan burden for most students at most public institutions such as UMass is still within affordable ranges, but if the public continues to refuse to support higher public education, we may find it increasingly difficult to sustain the quality most students and parents expect from their public higher education institutions," said Lombardi.

"UMass is critically under funded," said Gilbert, "and state legislature needs to step up and fund it like it should."

The report poses possible solutions to prevent unmanageable student debt. "The federal Pell grant, which helps students with lower incomes, has been stagnant at $4050 a year for the past four years, while college cost has soared."

The report also cites fair and affordable loan repayment policies, limits on loan interest rates, and the establishment of incentives to colleges to keep tuition low as ways to decrease the prevalence of unmanageable debt. MassPIRG is a student organization which aims to "deliver persistent result-oriented public interest activism that protects our environment, encourages a fair, sustainable economy, and fosters responsive, democratic government," according to their mission statement.

The organization works with experts to lobby the state legislature and has won victories in such areas as student loan debt, the environment, and hunger and homelessness.

The "Reverse the Raid on Student Aid Act," a proposal to cut the interest rate on student loans in half and increase student aid, went before Congress on April 13, but was defeated by two votes. Students at UMass are taking action to see this bill passed, contacting their Congressmen and circulating petitions.

"Each time we lose an essential public service, the cost to the public rises because the problems previously addressed by a public service go unresolved," said Lombardi. "Failure to fund public services is usually a poor financial bargain, saving a small amount in the short term and costing the public large amounts in the long term."

Gilbert concluded, "For a country in which people are always saying how we need more teachers and we need more people working in government, they're not really putting their money where their mouth is."

UMass President John Lombardi said that The loan burden for most students at most public institutions such as UMass is still within affordable ranges.

Cheesism not the way

In this day and age, jokes are taken way too seriously. 'Learn to let stuff go in favor of a good joke.'

Duncan Devlin

I am a guy. My dad was a guy. I come from a long line of Irish guys. By, "guy," I am referring to a basic cat pizza, drink beer, watch action flicks, make sarcastic comments, and look at pretty women kind of man. I grew up in an environment where anything and everything was fair game. We made fun of every ethnic group, race, gender, sexuality, flavor of cheese, anyone for whom you could find a slur, and above all others, ourselves. When I left that environment and came to UMass, I was in shock that people were not as accepting as my family.

Yes, that's right, I said, "accepting." Sure, UMass has some hundred organizations on campus, waving a flag for everything from women's rights to the best flavors of cheese. This is a good thing, as many of us do not always have the opportunity growing up to broaden our horizons. Some people have just taken things too far. The concept of the good joke has been outlawed due to fear of being labeled racist, sexist, homophobic, heterophobic, classist, ageist, cheesiest or whatever else you got.

Once upon a time, when someone told a tasteless joke, possibly using the infamous c-word, n-word or p-word, there would be a few gasps and a lot more laughs. Now there is that constant fear that the [insert oppressed group's name here] brigade will smash through the windows of Worcester Dining Hall and drag the comedian off to prison, or worse, an episode of "Dr. Phil."

Now, personally, I can only think of a few groups that I really hate. Ex-girlfriends for starters (mostly mine), and then lawyers, and insurance salesmen, moving on to editors and whiners. I have no issue with cheese. People different than myself have given me many new perspectives on life, often taking a chance in doing so. Still, the group I hate most of all are those who are offended by any and every word that can have a negative connotation.

Still, the group I hate most of all are those who are offended by any and every word that can have a negative connotation.

I have often been strolling along, telling many good jokes and had someone feel the desire to completely cut the humor (sometimes they are in the group, and sometimes not), to say excuse me, but I find that word offensive. I have one final word that I would like to add to the Oxford Western Massachusetts Dictionary of Offensive Words That No One Can Ever Say in Daylight: offensive.

Legally, the only compliment a man can now give to a woman about her appearance without fear of sexual harassment charges is, "you look sharp." Your average white guy no longer has any clue what to call anyone of a different race or gender without having someone jump down his throat.

Just let it go. Stop killing the joke, moment, mood or whatever, in order to chime in your two cents about a group you don't even belong to. When we founded this country, "All Men Are Created Equal," meant all white male Anglo-Saxon Protestants, etc. Now, some sort of moral majority feels so guilty about the last 200 years that anyone who is not a W.A.S.P. is now oppressed. Certainly, I do not propose an end to the women's or civil rights movements, or advocate discrimination based on race, gender or cheese, but sometimes, people just have to learn to let stuff go in favor of a good joke. We're all Americans; get over it.

"The Man Show" has been cancelled, and men are afraid of liking high heels, hockey shirts, weird flavors of cheese or whatever their tastes may be. Women are afraid of men breaking down or getting too overemotional as we become more in touch with our feelings. "Friends" gets criticized for having too many white characters, and the WB gets criticized for having too many black characters. Michael Jackson may be the only American comfortable with both gender and color.

This is the level of fear that I have come to live in while being at UMass. I went from an environment where everything was brushed off as being a joke (sometimes as a defense mechanism) to a place where I have to look over my shoulder, just in case someone around me finds Cheese Flavored Pepsi offensive, and is ready to jump down my throat for it.

You see my picture at the top of this article. When you see me on campus, I want you to let out everything you've got against me. I'm Irish, so that should help you find some slurs, if that's your thing. Make fun of me for my sarcasm, my world views, or the fact that I prefer DC food to home cooking. While you're at it, think of a similar joke that could be made about yourself, and stop taking yourself so seriously. I leave with the words of the great drunken Irish philosopher, Mark Devlin, "Closed minds will always try to close other minds."

Suggestions for a better UMass

Kevin Dooley

Lately, there has been kind of a push on this campus for some rules not to be enforced because they're not necessary. That may be the case, but I think there are some rules that are not written down anywhere, which need to be enforced as of now. Don't get me wrong; I'm not some Conservative who thinks we need more rules in the realm of moral matters. Trust me; these rules are going to make everyday life easier for everyone. Not just for the 20,000 Liberals on campus, but also for the two Conservatives as well.

First, I know you have all thought about this occurrence before. You're walking to class or maybe back to your dorm building, and when you're about 100 feet away there is someone there keeping the door open for you. Thus, you have to sprint for the door because you feel obligated for this kind person who holds doors open for people a mile away. There should be a rule saying you can't hold the door for someone if it's going to take them longer than 10 seconds to get to the door. I'm all for being nice to everyone, but this is not necessary.

One minute before class is supposed to get out, someone raises their hand with a question, or God forbid, an insightful point that may drag the lecture on. What should be the punishment for this heinous act? I say the hurliing of textbooks at the guilty party.

Second, there needs to be an official rulebook on sneezing. I'm sorry, but if you sneeze more than three times in succession, don't expect a "God bless you" to follow that third sneeze. Also, if you hear someone sneeze from the other side of the room, don't be the person that shouts "God bless you." And above all else, if you sneeze and someone says, "God bless you" make sure you say, "Thank you." There is not a more awkward situation than when you don't thank someone for the "God bless you."

Say you see someone drop their tray. It makes a loud noise and, thankfully, interrupts a conversation you're having, which you want to get out of. I understand the natural reaction to look to see where the noise came from, but is the 20-second stare-down of that unfortunate person really necessary? It's like we're expecting that person to start crying or do a back flip. The only time you need to applaud a person who drops their tray is if, in fact, they do a back flip.

Here's one we can all relate to; it's Friday afternoon, and you're sitting in hell (translation: lecture hall). One minute before class is supposed to get out, someone raises their hand with a question, or God forbid, an insightful point that may drag the lecture on. What should be the punishment for this heinous act? I say the hurliing of textbooks at the guilty party. Don't let the punishment end there. I say we need to uproot all the chairs in lecture hall, and chuck them at that person. That will teach him or her not to critically think about something on a Friday afternoon. There should be no thinking allowed from Friday afternoon until Monday morning.

This is a rule which needs to start getting enforced. We all know that there is nothing that ticks people off more (not even the sound of flip-flops in the library) than having to repeat something more than three times. You know it's true. No one should be obligated to repeat something more than three times. I could be telling someone I have found the cure for cancer, and if that person needs me to repeat that same thing more than three times, I'll tell him to just forget it.

I think the most important rule which needs to be implemented is the speed at which girls walk together. I've done some calculations here (thanks to Math 100), and I have figured out that if two girls are walking together, in addition to one of the girls talking on the cell phone, it will take that pair of girls three hours to cover the same distance it takes me three minutes to cover.

I don't know if it's because you slow down when you're talking or because of the flip-flops. The more girls in pairs are told they need to walk faster than the three hours to three minutes ratio, the better.

Exam stress relievers

Do you remember the wonders of our childhood? The amazing things in your life that not only count as memories, but possibly a reflection of everything good you ever tasted, watched or played. Let us start on a journey that will ease the pain of finals.

Candy:

Did you live in a small town or a big city growing up? No matter which one, I'm sure you found time to visit, if not the local 5&10, then the convenience store down the street. Pixie sticks were the ideal candy in my town. When I used to go on trips to New Hampshire, we could find the three foot pixie sticks that would leave me high on sugar for hours.

Those highs didn't last long, and so the double-sided lollipops – that had blue and pink pastel colors and were really chalky – were always available. They were always five cents and really good no matter how chalky they were. Plus, you could buy a boatload with your allowance.

How about those candy necklaces and the candy button paper that were always in those goody bags you had as kids? Those were awesome, weren't they? No matter how much you tried, you always ingested some paper and necklace along with the sweet satisfaction of the candy.

Television:

How many of your little lives were planned around your important television shows? "Traggle Rock," for example, was one of my favorites. I knew the theme song and all their names. I have seen almost every episode, and I loved every one.

Who remembers Face from "Nick Jr." "All," "Sesame Street" or "Rainbow Brite," which I rented every time I went to the video store. It was one of the movies that my mother should have just bought instead of renting it 50 times. Maybe you remember "Power Rangers" or "Carebears?" "The Muppets" and "The Muppet Babies" where the nanny always had those huge socks, but you never got to see her face. I'm not sure if many of you remember "Alvin and the Chipmunks" the movie with the hot air balloon, but it was a classic.

If you're a girl and you never played dress up, that, to me, is a sin. If you're a boy and played dress up, awesome.

Playing:

Maybe television wasn't your thing, and you spent countless hours outside playing with your friends. It really didn't matter what you were doing as long as you and your pals were together using your imaginations.

Who played house? Everyday we would cast a mom, dad and kids. There was always a new situation, and sometimes when the boys didn't want to play, we had a single mom family living in the clubhouse in my swing set. I always wanted a cool name like Crystal, and I had to beg to be cast as Crystal because there were always three girls and one really cool name.

We climbed trees, and found places to hide from our parents when we were being called for dinner. We rode our bicycles everywhere and never wanted to drive a car because we weren't even double digits – which is by far the best birthday ever. Cops and robbers was a favorite amongst the boys, and we played that game a lot. We would always switch sides and teams, the girls trying their hardest to be on their crushes' team, while the boys would run as far away as possible.

If you're a girl and you never played dress up, that, to me, is a sin. If you're a boy and played dress up, awesome. I conned my little brother into being my princess all the time. I have blackmail pictures that will last him until he's through with college, which is 10 years from now.

Dress up was amazing. You always had those ugly, plastic Barbie shoes – that never fit right and were always slipping off your feet – with a matching plastic purse and fake pearls. The wooden spoon microphone was the perfect last minute accessory that topped off your Madonna-esque singing career.

Toys:

Maybe playing with your imagination just wasn't your thing. Possibly, you needed some real live entertainment. Lincoln Logs, Candy Land, Shoots and Ladders, Play-Doh, Barbie and Ken, G.I. Joe, action figures and of course, coloring and puzzles.

All in all, toys, playing with your friends, coloring alone, watching television and eating too much candy were a fun part of your childhood. This week and next, while finals creep up and school is beginning its end, look around for those simple things that used to excite you. Try to relax, and find something from your childhood. Maybe it will make you smile and do that much better on your final exam. Good luck everyone.

Filthy hypocrisy

With gas prices at $3 to the gallon and the 20th anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster having come a few weeks ago, energy is all over the news. The president has recently proposed measures to kick our oil habit and others to curb the cost of fuel over the short term. The perennial debate about the viability of nuclear power has heated up slightly, and other alternative energy sources are getting attention. I've even heard that there's going to be a prize on campus for the dorm that reduces its energy usage the most.

Andy Martin

This brings me to something that should annoy Massachusetts residents particularly. Our own Teddy Kennedy, a supposed maverick senator who is unafraid to go against the grain in the name of progress, persists in his transparently selfish opposition to the Cape Wind project, which could generate enough power for most of Cape Cod and the islands. He has slipped the language that would block this project into another unrelated bill, although evidence against Cape Wind's proposal is rather thin.

One argument is that it might interfere with radar. Forgive me, but this seems like a relatively inconsequential problem for engineering to solve, certainly not enough to sideline such a potentially beneficial power source. Besides, other countries are getting along fine with large, offshore wind farms.

The other major consideration, and the only plausible reason Kennedy would want construction prevented, is aesthetics. The senator doesn't want to see a blip on his pristine and valuable horizon when he gazes out to sea from his compound in Hyannis.

Now, I'm the last person to argue for industry over aesthetics, but this seems like a case in which the arguments for construction are stronger than those against. The location has what may be America's most consistent wind, and the project stands to produce a huge amount of completely clean power. The hypocrisy of Kennedy, a self-styled proponent of alternative energy, is appalling, and I'm embarrassed for him.

Here's an aesthetic and a practical public safety issue that no one ever really questions: high-tension power lines. They're ugly, in fact, they make wind turbines look like public art, and they're everywhere. There is never any debate when more need to be built because people recognize that we need them. There are also still questions as to how much negative impact they may have on the health of people living nearby.

There seems to be an attitude that wind power is somehow optional, or maybe extra credit because it is so virtuous, but I don't understand this. It seems like an essential part of the effort to secure more sustainable energy. I won't even go into the aesthetic impact of oil drilling rigs and power plants.

Even the president and his Republican Party, darlings of the oil industry, are making Kennedy look bad as they call for a repeal of certain tax breaks in light of the obscene profits made by oil companies recently.

I'm the president and his Republican Party, darlings of the oil industry, are making Kennedy look bad as they call for a repeal of certain tax breaks in light of the obscene profits made by oil companies recently. Of course, this is probably a political move more than anything intended to bolster support for the party in the upcoming elections, but still, Republicans wanting to take money from oil companies is pretty radical.

Nuclear power is also an issue these days, as we hear from the industry that new technology makes plants foolproof, and from environmentalists and others that the benefits of nuclear electricity can never match the environmental costs and the health and safety risks. I don't know much about the new technology that's been mentioned, but in the case of a contaminant as dangerous and insidious as radiation, I'd say a zero percent failure rate would be the only acceptable one, and I'm pretty sure that doesn't exist.

It's probably true that with America's technology we would be incredibly unlikely to ever face a catastrophe on the scale of Chernobyl, which will end up killing thousands and has left huge swathes of land uninhabitable. However, with enough human error and a small engineering glitch just about anything can happen.

Back to the question of alternative, clean energy. It's the opinion of this columnist that Sen. Kennedy has a superb opportunity right now to show what progressive-minded people stand for by making a personal sacrifice for the benefit of society and his own professed principles.

I am not a Democrat, but I will admit that I'm even less of a Republican. Regardless of party lines however, I do not want to live in a one party state. I don't think anyone who is not a rabid partisan would.

Unfortunately, though, for most purposes that's what we have today, and it seems to be up to the Democrats, such as they are, to impose some balance on our system. They are presented with numerous opportunities to make a stand, and always squander them through what can only be politically motivated cowardice combined with lack of a cohesive vision of how to improve the government.

Oh well, if you're unhappy at having sat through another 800 plus words of political whining, I apologize.

Roots sprout for Spring

BY DAVID PESSAH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sunday, for many students here at UMass, is a day of recovery. Recovery from a weekend of shenanigans, facebook picture taking, and things unmentionable in print.

This Sunday is different though, as the party continues with the Mullins Center playing host to the annual Spring Concert. This year's show will feature a blend of Hip-Hop and Alternative Rock, as The Roots meet Dashboard Confessional and play back to back sets. The Roots last blazed through Amherst for Amherst College's Spring Concert in 2003, rocking crowds to their recently released "Phrenology." This is Dashboard Confessional's first stop in Amherst, one that should not be missed.

When Chris Carraba started Dashboard Confessional — as a solo acoustic side project to his then band Further Seems Forever — he never envisioned the sort of success that is now synonymous with the Dashboard moniker. Then, when Dashboard's first recording, the three-song "Drowning EP," was met with praise, he quickly followed it with two more mostly acoustic albums "Swiss Army Romance" and "The Places You Have Come to Fear the Most." The albums, full of heartfelt songs of breakups, longing and lonesomeness struck a chord with fans, building a strong grassroots buzz fueled by file sharing and internet message boards. During this time Carraba parted ways with Further Seems Forever, to focus on Dashboard full time.

Dashboard Confessional began touring and something interesting happened. With no radio or TV exposure fans began showing up to his show and being able to sing along to every song. Chris embraced this, and it soon became a staple of his performance, with the audience singing as prominently as the artist, turning the shows into intimate sing-alongs.

This phenomenon was captured on Dashboard's "Unplugged 2.0" performance, which MTV2 taped and aired on the heels of the band's breakthrough song "Screaming Infidelities" in 2002.

The four years since the "Unplugged" performance have only seen Dashboard's star rise even higher. Carraba recruited a band which helped expand his sound, and released the successful album "A Mark, A Mission, A Brand, A Scar." The album brought Dashboard's music to arena worthy levels while keeping the same depth and sincerity in the songwriting that initially hooked listeners. Songs like "Hands Down," about the best day Chris ever had — a discreet night with a lover — and "Hey Girl" are detailed snapshots into the beginnings of a relationship. Others, like the bitter "Carve Your Heart Out Yourself," resonate of the emotional baggage left after a love has ended. This album was followed in 2004 by the smash hit "Vindicated," a song of self revelation and redemption off the "Spider-Man 2 Soundtrack."

The Roots, in turn, began their career as an underground rap crew from Philadelphia who gained instant artistic credibility for attending the prestigious Creative and Performing Arts high school (CAPA). They entered the rap scene in 1994 with "Do You Want More?!!??!," an album with a jazz-funk sound that was less derivative and more original than many other rap acts at the time. The album received an influx of critical acclaim and the release of two more impressive albums, 1996's "Illadelph Halflife" and 1997's "Organix." Their first mainstream hit came with "You Got Me," a song off 1999's "Things Fall Apart" featuring a captivating hook from soulful singer Erykah Badu.

The Roots' music can be described as more organic and experimental than most other rap acts. They are not solely a DJ/MC combo — though they employ both — and create much of their music with live instruments instead of behind a mixing board. This allows them the freedom to create musical backgrounds that shift and change with the rapping, instead of sticking to a single loop. This experimentation was abundant on 2002's "Phrenology," serving up hooming rhythm courtesy of drummer ?uestlove with other touches only a live band could accomplish. With 2004's "The Tipping Point" the group toned it down slightly and focused on creating a tight and crafted hip-hop album, in the process scoring the hit "Don't Say Nuthin'."

The live show put on by this band is nothing less than spectacular. Concerts are riddled with instrumental solos, along with the rapping and freestyles. They sound clearer, change tempo more, and rock more than your standard rap show — rock show even. It is nothing less than an experience.

The Roots and Dashboard Confessional are both very good on record, but best experienced live. Their music resonates with fans and is expanded on in concert, providing and experience you can't get out of a speaker. Expect this year's Spring Concert to please all who attend. The Spring Concert will be opened by artists The Gradual and Swati.

Teen writer fall elicits sympathy

BY CATHERINE HOLAHAN
THE RECORD (HACKENSACK, N.J.)

HACKENSACK, N.J. — A few smug smiles were to be expected, maybe even some cynical whispers of "I told you she wasn't so hot."

After all, the Bergen County (N.J.) Academy for the Advancement of Science and Technology is a place where "A-plus" and "A" students compete for entry into the nation's top universities. So, it might seem natural that some students would feel self-satisfied that one of the high school's star pupils — Kaavya Viswanathan, the wunderkind author and Harvard student who sold a debut novel for a half-million dollars before her 18th birthday — had her book snatched from shelves after admitting to unconsciously plagiarizing another teen-chick-lit author.

But, instead of "schadenfreude", students at the author's alma mater expressed the opposite sentiment Monday — sympathy.

"The teachers said she was a really, really good writer," said Jennie Choi, a 17-year-old junior who returned to the high school's Hackensack campus Monday after spring break.

Based on recommendations, Choi had planned to buy Viswanathan's debut novel "How Opal Mehta Got Kissed, Got Wild and Got a Life." But the book was pulled from stores Thursday, after Viswanathan said she read best-selling author Megan McCafferty's two books, unconsciously committed parts to memory and then roughly regurgitated some passages as her own writing.

Viswanathan's movie deal also went south, according to the Los Angeles Times.

McCafferty's publisher alleges that at least 40 passages in "Opal Mehta" have marked similarities with parts of McCafferty's books.

"When I'm writing, what I read stays in my mind," Choi said in Viswanathan's defense. "I think it's kind of sad what is happening to her."

Such sentiments were echoed by students and faculty alike. Those who knew her recalled a gifted student and writer who seemed unlikely to plagiarize material. They expressed sadness and anger about her treatment in the press.

"She is an extraordinarily talented young woman," the Academy's Principal Pat Cosgrove said. "She possibly made a mistake."

Viswanathan's world literature teacher, Richard Weems, said he read pieces Viswanathan submitted to the N.J. Governor's School of the Arts with her application to an intensive summer writing program awarded to only about a dozen students annually.

Viswanathan wrote prose and poetry about summer love, a subject that Weems said sometimes makes him cringe because teenagers don't handle it well. Viswanathan's writing, however, was solid and tight, he said. Though she was not accepted into the program, she was chosen to be an alternate.

"I thought they were great pieces," Weems said, adding that he hopes Viswanathan continues to develop her own voice and write.

"I'm still very confident that she does have talent."

Does Weems think she consciously plagiarized?

He said he didn't want to speculate, but noted that she came from an academic background where plagiarism is a serious transgression.

Student work at the high school is vetted via a Web site, turnitin.com, which scans copies for similarities to known work. First offenses can result in zero grades, and a third offense can lead to suspension.

School administrators typically do not take into account psychological explanations for plagiarism, Weems said.

In Weems' afternoon classes, several students brought up Viswanathan's story. Many were shocked by the allegations and saddened by her treatment in the press.

Kim Farrales, 17, said she felt had for Viswanathan when she heard that "Today" show host Katie Couric grilled her.

"I thought it was really mean," the senior said.

Abbie Ortiz, 15, a sophomore from Garfield, added that she felt badly for the alumna, even though she said some evidence indicated Viswanathan knew what she was doing.

"People want to succeed so much here that they would go to any lengths," Ortiz said. "The whole thing is very sad."

Pearl Jam's self-tilted 8th wonder

BY STEVEN KEPPLER
THE HEIGHTS (BOSTON COLLEGE)

CHESTNUT HILL, Mass. — On its eighth studio release, Pearl Jam has chosen for the first time in its career to embrace a popular music trend: The self-titled, non-debut album. Personally, I dislike this trend. You're a band; just be creative and come up with a good album title. After listening to this disc, however, I applaud the band for their decision.

Pearl Jam has developed a very unique sound over its decade-and-a-half career, and the band pulls together all the best parts of it here. It is a perfect compilation of me-against-The-Man opposition rock, touching ballads, and a little of the in-between. The songs are familiar, yet it still feels as good as new. The opener, "Life Wasted," explodes out with a punk-influenced rock reminiscent of Pearl Jam's early days. The first single, "World Wide Suicide" recalls its classic "Do the Evolution," but with more meaningful lyrics to accompany the heavy guitars. It is three and a half minutes of unrestrained frustration that highlights the first half of the disc. Although no names are mentioned, the lyrics of these opening tracks are lined with anti-war imagery, something we haven't truly seen from Pearl Jam, since, well, the last war. Front man Eddie Vedder has never made his political views a secret, and he does not shy away here either, pointedly shouting, "It's a shame to awake in a world of pain/ What does it mean when war has taken over?"

Just as they showed throughout the mid-'90s, however, the band quickly changes tone. "Marker in the Sand," possibly the most well-written song of the bunch, alternates from a distorted guitar pattern to a melodic chorus. By the end, it takes off into a series of upbeat shouts that are downright happy (I can already see the concert sing-a-long now). The guitars go in every direction on this record — from the quick stop-go on "Comatose" to the lullaby single notes on "Come Back," both Mike McCready and Stone Gossard display incredible range. The solo at the end of "Come Back" may not be ready to overtake the finale of their fan-favorite "Yellow Ledbetter," but that doesn't mean it can't be good.

Vedder displays his vocal lyrical range as well, which has come to be expected from what may be the most-remembered lead singer of our generation.

His music-over-money, fans-over-fame attitude has probably backfired into well-deserved yet unwanted recognition, but his leadership of the band is evident on "Inside Job," an overly long, yet solid closer. The band members build around his voice to create an uplifting finish.

A band of many sounds, they are all displayed here. They have built a diverse repertoire of styles, and the self-titled album makes sense when one realizes how each style is highlighted on the disc.

Theaters lure back moviegoers

BY GLENN LOVELL
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Moviegoers are an endangered species. They need to be coaxed back into the dark, away from their computers and HD-TVs.

That's the call to action from the people who track box office figures for the movie industry.

After 2005's disappointing ticket sales — the lowest in eight years — theater owners have gotten the message, and are adding more customer-friendly amenities, including reserved seating, live preshow entertainment and alcoholic beverages served at your seat.

They're even addressing what the National Association of Theatre Owners (NATO) calls the filmgoer's "No. 1 complaint" — cell phones.

"Movie-goers have so many more options today that the movie-going experience has to be better than ever," said Paul Dergarabedian of Exhibitor Relations, a box-office tracking service. "It's no longer just about the movie; it's more about the total experience, the movie theater as destination, not just a stopover on the way to somewhere else."

In November, the Camera Cinemas of San Jose surveyed 2,000 of their customers. Overwhelmingly, patrons replied that they wanted their local theater to be more personal, more interactive — more special.

"Over and over we heard, 'Please make it more than just coming in and watching a movie,'" said Jack NyBlom, co-owner of the chain.

"Now we're doing some major rethinking," he added.

Theaters around the country — from the funky University Mall Theatres in Fairfax, Va., to the luxurious ArcLight Cinemas in Hollywood — are doing the same. The University Mall has Kid Packs (candy, drink, popcorn and small toy for $3.25), spot audience surveys and a company that acts out cult films in front of the screen. For those willing to pay a higher admission price ($11 to $14), movies at the ArcLight come with reserved seating and the promise of no commercials.

NyBlom and his partners have taken note. When their Camera 3, closed since 2004, re-opens in the winter, it will offer live entertainment (music and improvisational comedy), interactive programs (patrons will get to vote on their favorite trailers), and — the most ambitious new venture — in-theater dining with, if you so choose, beer or wine.

Cinema Draft Houses, as the spirits-and-show auditoriums are known, are already a hit at American Multi-Cinema locations in Columbus and New Orleans.

A number of developments have caused theater owners to become more assertive:

- last year's almost 9 percent drop in ticket sales, which translated into a $54 million drop in revenues for Hollywood.
- last year's spate of bad movies, which included such heavily hyped duds as "Bewitched," "Dukes of Hazzard," "Alexander" and "Elektra." ("We'd be crazy to not be concerned," said NyBlom, clearly exasperated. "The movies last year pretty much stunk.")
- the shrinking "window" between a film's theatrical debut and its arrival on DVD. The old window of four months has, in some instances, shrunk to just over two months. Steven Soderbergh's "Bubble" premiered simultaneously in January in theaters and on disc.
- the dramatic drop in price of home-entertainment components. Three years ago, a 50-inch plasma TV cost $10,000. They're now available for less than $3,000.
- teens, Hollywood's most reliable audience, are not going to the movies like they once did. Instead, they are spending more time and money on computer games and MP3 players, and, though it's illegal, some of the more tech-savvy are downloading first-run pirated movies off the Internet.

Eddie Vedder, the lead singer and guitarist for Pearl Jam, has brought a unique grunge sound to audiences since early 1990.

Author writes a success, yet again

BY MARTA SALIJ
DETROIT FREE PRESS

DETROIT — Sometimes the good guys win.

Sometimes the good guys star in great little novels, and sometimes good guys write them.

And that sums up the world-view and the prescription for success of Alexander McCall Smith, he of the wildly popular No. 1 Ladies' Detective Agency series of books about good people.

Six of the books have been published since 1998, and the seventh, "Blue Shoes and Happiness," was just released.

How wildly popular? About 6 million copies of the series are in print in the United States alone, says his publisher.

So why are McCall Smith's books so wildly popular?

They are books about good people doing the right thing starring the unforgettable Precious Ramotswe of Botswana. Mma Ramotswe (that title is pronounced "maa" and means, roughly, "madame" or "mother") is a woman of "just the right age," which means she has seen a little bit of life.

When the series starts, Mma Ramotswe has taken her inheritance after the death of her beloved father and opened a little detective agency. People bring her their problems — love problems, job problems, money problems — and she solves them with forthright common sense, often over a cup of rooibos (red bush) tea.

It is lovely to be in the presence of the wise Mma Ramotswe, as it was lovely to be in the presence of Agatha Christie's sharp Miss Marple, say, and that goes a long way toward explaining why the No. 1 Ladies' Detective Agency books have besotted so many readers.

"Most problems could be diminished by the drinking of tea and the thinking through of things that could be done while tea was being drunk," Mma Ramotswe thinks to herself early in the new book. "And even if that did not solve problems, at least it could put them off for a little while, which we sometimes needed to do, we really did."

How could you not love a friend like that?

Alexander McCall Smith is a charming person to interview, even by phone from his home in Scotland, so one quickly suspects he might be a good friend, too.

Even if one must first fight down the envy of what seems to be a charmed life. McCall Smith was born in 1948 in what is now known as Zimbabwe and was then the British colony of Rhodesia. His father was a public prosecutor. McCall Smith grew up loving southern Africa and its people.

At age 18, he moved to Scotland for his studies, but continued to return to Africa often. He became a law professor, married a doctor and reared two daughters.

McCall Smith wrote fiction when he could and had some success with children's books in Scotland. Then in 1996, the character who became Mma Ramotswe came to him.

"That obviously was a moment which changed my life," he says with a chuckle. "I wish I remembered it more clearly!"

McCall Smith started by writing a short story about precious Ramotswe and then realized he didn't want to part with her.

"She is a nice woman, and I suppose what I was doing, not in any calculated sense, I suppose I found myself wanting to write about the sort of person I had met in Botswana, that one can meet in Botswana and elsewhere in suh-Saharan Africa, very nice people, people of great generosity of spirit," he says. "She was just typical of that sort of person."

Here comes the envy part. Not only has McCall Smith written seven Ramotswe novels in the past decade, apparently without the angst that dogs even writers of short newspaper profiles, but he's also written novels for three other series in the same time: A series set in Scotland, starring another female problem solver, Isabel Dalhousie; a series of academic satires and a series set in a boardinghouse.

That's 13 published books, and others in the pipeline. And no, he finds he seldom has to rewrite. The words just tend to come out in finished form.

"I very much enjoy writing," he says, so nicely one instantly forgives him his talent, his industry and his lack of neuroses. "And I find that I have a number of series going at the moment. So I just have slipped into this, I suppose, this habit of writing three or four books a year. Well, what can one say?"

By 2002, the writing had pushed law to the side. McCall Smith took an unpaid leave, which became a retirement.

A nice retirement. He wrote much of "Blue Shoes and Happiness" in 10 days in India in view of the Himalayas. He wrote the next book in the Dalhousie series this January and February while sunning in the Cayman Islands.

Gosh. I can even forgive him that. I know Mma Ramotswe would approve.

Alexander McCall Smith, the wildly popular author seen above, completed his seventh book, "Blue Shoes and Happiness" this year.

Jewel is leaving 'Wonderland'

BY LOUIS TULLO
THE HEIGHTS (BOSTON COLLEGE)

CHESTNUT HILL, Mass. — "Goodbye Alice in Wonderland" represents a return to an acoustic pop sound for Jewel, who has remained dormant since her 2003 release, "0304." This offering, while marked by this star's folk-tinged yet sweet voice, is mediocre, filled with too many mid-tempo songs and ballads. The album opens with the first single, "Again and Again," which is pleasant enough to listen to, yet the repetition of the hook "Again and again and again" quickly becomes annoying. The message of the song, which is "There is no giving up in love," is clearly stated in the chorus in a disappointingly obvious way.

In the series of tracks following, Jewel exhibits a sardonic attitude, as she mocks culture in the title track "Goodbye Alice in Wonderland," as well as the spoken-and-sung "Good Day."

With lyrics in the latter like "As it is, I might watch TV/ 'Cause it's nice to see people more messed up than me," she attempts to achieve a passive take on her criticism but is not very convincing.

Tracks like "Only One Too," "Words Get In The Way," and "Drive To You" that follow take the album in better direction, combining acoustic and electric guitars to make songs that have an emotionally moving quality that is lacking in some of the other songs on this album. While all of these chronicle her feelings about love, this is where Jewel sounds best.

Musically, the drums used in "Where You Are" are a departure from what Jewel usually uses in her songs. It gives the song an edge that emphasizes the song's lyrics, which say, "In the darkness you cannot always find your way To where I am." The standout ballad "1,000 Miles Away" closes the album quite appropriately, monopolizing the tenderness of Jewel's voice, and she plays the guitar along with piano, in a minimally produced setting. It has a certain quality that would translate well into a great live performance. The words "Oh God, what do I do?/ I'm a thousand miles away, and lying next to you," are sure to strike a powerful chord in listeners.

While Jewel may be disillusioned with life after leaving her own little wonderland, it seems as if her journey that is told through this new album is a bit rocky. The end shows promise that maybe after venting her frustrations, we may be able to be reacquainted with the powerful lyricist who brought us powerful tracks like "Hands" in the past. The question is, now after going through the looking glass, what will Alice do?

Movies winning back crowds

"With everything that's going on, audiences last year seemed to be making an exodus away from movie theaters. And who could blame them?" observed Dergarabedian.

Attendance in the first quarter of 2006 was "virtually dead even" with last year, said Dergarabedian, but in the last month it has risen by 4 percent and is expected to surge in May with the release of "Mission Impossible III," "Poseidon" and "The Da Vinci Code."

But blockbusters come and go. More important is what the public thinks of their neighborhood cineplex.

And the news isn't good.

According to an MPAA study released in March, almost a fifth of 3,000 movie-goers surveyed said they didn't think they were getting their money's worth at the theater, and nearly a third said they felt their living room provided "the ultimate movie-watching experience."

This is why theater owners can't become complacent. They need to continually raise the bar and think competitively, as they did in the 1950's to battle television. The dramatic drop in attendance in the postwar era gave rise to 3-D, CinemaScopes and giveaways (of everything from dishes to sewing machines).

Locally, this has meant upgrades to megaplexes and mom-and-pop operations, and the hiring of additional staff to monitor auditoriums. NyBlom is just back from Portland, Ore. and Austin, where he looked at customized theater tables. San Jose's CineLux Theatres is adding stadium seating to its Plaza 4 in Campbell, Calif. The five-theater chain offers discounted tickets ($5) all day Tuesday and free popcorn on Thursdays.

"Last year's drop in attendance carried over to us," acknowledged CineLux's Paul Gunsky. "Because we don't have 20 screens, we're playing up the neighborhood experience. It's like it used to be at our theaters. You see neighbors talking to each other."

The mantra at ArcLight Cinemas in Hollywood is "ease, comfort and control." Besides reserved seating, the 15-screen complex has online ticketing, art exhibits, a gift shop, and 21-Plus Screenings, where, if you're 21, you can bring alcohol into the theater.

"People complain about sticky floors, dirty bathrooms and zombie staff," said the ArcLight's Robert Brugeman. "To get their attention, you have to offer a premium product, an experience that really stands out."

Yes, they're pricey ($14 on weekends), but "it's an affordable luxury," said Brugeman. "For an extra dollar or two, you don't have to worry about the jerk who took your parking place or have your wife hold your seat when you go to the bathroom."

Theater owners are also taking aim at cell-phone users, the rudest of the rude who disrupt by taking calls and text messaging. NATO in Washington, D.C. has made solving the cell-phone problem a "high priority" and, as part of a multi-step strategy, is looking into jamming or intercepting cell-phone signals.

Currently, jamming cell phones is against the law, said NATO president John Fithian Sr., for now, exhibitors will continue to rely on public-service announcements to get movie-goers to turn off their phones. If this doesn't work, they'll petition the Federal Communications Commission for new legislation. France and Japan already have laws that allow theater owners to block cell phone reception.

According to Exhibitor Relations, the accelerated theater-to-disc or theater-to-cable arc is an even bigger problem. "If you shorten that window by so much people will just say, 'I'll just wait for the DVD,'" said Dergarabedian. "You diminish the value of a movie when it's available in every format right away."

UM wraps up season

SOFTBALL from page 8

UMass, as well as home runs in a season by a freshman. She can break the A-10 RBI record today with a single run batted in. Mollica is also closing in on the A-10 record for home runs in a season. Teammate KJ Kelley and Fordham's Katie Davis currently hold the record at 14. Mollica has hit 10 homers so far this season.

The two players Mollica has brought in the most are the No. 1 and No. 2 batters, Amanda Morin and Candice Molinari. Since moving to the top of the order, Morin has hit .434 and scored 34 runs. Molinari will look to extend her career-high 20-game hitting streak on Friday. She is batting .522 and has scored 26 runs during the streak.

Freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter earned another A-10 honor this week when she was named A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week. Balschmiter shared the honor with Fordham's Gina Capardi. Balschmiter won the award for her performance last week when she went 2-1 with a 0.00 earned run average. Her one loss came against Saint Louis in a 1-0 pitcher's duel, a game in which no earned runs were scored.

Balschmiter is 23-7 on the year with a 0.71 earned run average, the ninth best ERA in the nation. In the last 85 innings she has allowed just three earned runs.

The Minutewomen are 41-41-2 all-time against long-time rival UConn, their opponent on Sunday, so a win on Senior Day would give the program a one-game lead in the all-time series against the Huskies.

Senior K.J. Kelley and the Minutewomen finish their regular season this weekend. UMass can clinch the A-10 regular season title today.

second UMass run of the inning with an RBI single down the left field line that scored Dellaire from second.

That would be all the scoring, however, as the teams battled for two scoreless innings to close out the game and the win for the Saints. Afterwards Stone commented on yet another comeback effort that fell short.

"We got two runs across there [in the seventh] and just didn't get anything after that. We just didn't do enough," he said. "In a lot of ways we didn't do enough. We didn't do enough and as a result they scored runs."

A bright spot in the game for the Minutemen was the performance by their starter, Tom Cote. The freshman kept the game close for the 4 1/3 innings he was on the mound. Cote was dealt a no-decision after he scattered six hits and surrendered just three runs.

"He did a pretty good job and executed some pitches," Stone said. "He's a young kid and we need to give him some starts and some experience and a chance to feel good about getting out there."

that same momentum going into tomorrow's game."

The Minutewomen are coming off of two thrilling victories over Duquesne and George Washington that just barely got them into the postseason. Now, with so many underclassman playing vital roles in the offense, Bolduc hopes her four seniors can help them handle the pressure.

"There aren't many players on our team that have been to the tournament," Bolduc said. "It's new to a lot of them, which is a good thing, and both a positive and a negative. Right now, every game is treated the same, and they know what they need to do to win."

The Minutewomen are hoping that their fate is the same as the Richmond team of a year ago, but UMass will need strong performances on both offense and defense if it wants to win its first A-10 Championship since 2000.

"You always hear that cliché, 'Defense wins championships,' and we need to have a good team defensive performance tomorrow," Bolduc said. "They have a lot of threats on their attack. They have a rookie of the year and offensive player of the year. But our defense is aware of them, and they know who they are. Our defense is going to need to have a good day, and our attack is certainly going to need to finish on their keeper because she's one of the better keepers in the A-10."

De La Hoya seeks redemption

to watch on TV in the comfort of your living room.

It's for a title that used to mean something, but now is just one of several for sale by the various con men who run boxing organizations. Mayorga somehow holds the WBC 154-pound crown, which he was deemed worthy enough to fight for after being knocked out on his previous fight.

Some might think De La Hoya is doing the conning by manipulating people to spend money on watching this affair. Mayorga is a dangerous puncher but he's an undisciplined fighter and De La Hoya should be able to shake off enough ring rust to outbox him. In the process, he'll add another $8 million or so to the $200 million he's earned in the ring.

The money's big, but De La Hoya already has plenty of it. He owns businesses, his own promotion company and even a high-rise office building in Los Angeles.

Nobody will be holding benefits for him when he's older. That doesn't mean it's wise to him to risk punishment in the ring when he doesn't have to.

Which brings us back to Leavander Johnson.

De La Hoya promoted that fight. He visited Johnson in the hospital, consoled his family afterward.

He feels a certain sense of guilt about the whole thing.

"We were part of it. It's a nightmare," he said. "I have feelings and I feel for his family. I feel really bad we were involved in that fight."

Still, De La Hoya discounts the possibility something like that could happen to him. It doesn't happen to top-level fighters, he says, because they train properly and understand how not to get hurt in a hurt business.

The survivors of Benny Paret might argue with that. He was 25 and had beaten Emile Griffith six months earlier when he was killed in their 1962 middleweight title fight. Jimmy Garcia was 23 and fighting for the 125 pound title when he died in the ring against Gabriel Ruelas, and the list goes on.

De La Hoya claims this is two fights and out. Assuming he beats Mayorga, he could fight Floyd Mayweather Jr. in September and call it a career.

Fighters, though, seldom follow their own plans. Muhammad Ali should have retired after beating George Foreman or even Joe Frazier in the Thrilla in Manilla — and he did retire after winning the title back from Leon Spinks.

But he came back to take a beating from Larry Holmes and lost one last desperate bid to Trevor Berbick.

The accumulation of punches caught up with Ali. The same thing isn't likely to happen with De La Hoya, who has carefully chosen his opponents and avoided any real ring wars.

But why take the chance? Is it really a last memory for fans, or simply a last gasp from a fighter who can still remember what he once was?

Only De La Hoya knows.

And, ultimately, his opinion is the only one that really matters.

players to come in and take some of the burden off the guys that are still here," said Brady, who knows he may have to adopt more of a leadership role. "As much as you'd love to keep everybody, when you have success, people are going to go out and say, 'let's go get that guy.' Who wouldn't want David Givens? Who wouldn't want Willie? Who wouldn't want Adam?"

McGinest and Vinatieri played on all three Super Bowl-winning Patriots teams over the past five seasons. Givens was on two of them. New England's chance for an unprecedented third straight title ended in Denver.

The Patriots did add two outstanding young players with their first two picks in last weekend's draft, running back Laurence Maroney from Minnesota and wide receiver Chad Jackson from Florida. But Brady cautioned against expecting too much from rookies.

"To expect Chad Jackson to be David Givens, I don't think that's fair to Chad. David's an awesome player," Brady said.

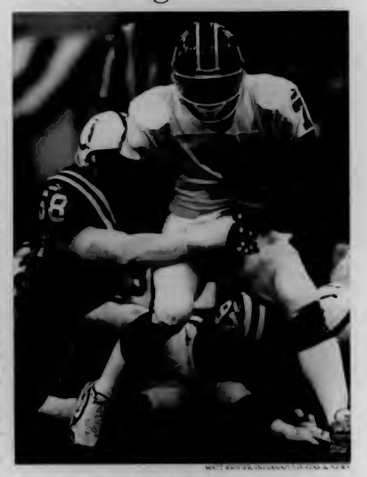
Maroney could share playing time with Corey Dillon.

"My dad calls me," Brady said. "He's like, 'can you believe this? We got all these great players.' I said, 'Dad, Dad, these guys are rookies. These guys have a lot to learn.'"

Deion Branch returns as one starting wide receiver. Caldwell, who has been working out with Brady for about a month, could be the other.

Brady, a three-time Super Bowl winner, has been working out regularly at Gillette Stadium and said, "I feel great. There's no restrictions" on his exercise routines.

"I don't ever feel like I'm obligated to be here" for off-season workouts, he said. "I feel it's part of my responsibility."



Brady prefers to look ahead rather than back to the loss in Denver in which the Patriots had five turnovers. One of them was Champ Bailey's 103-yard interception return that led to a touchdown and a 17-6 Broncos lead.

Brady recently watched television before going to sleep and saw his last news conference before that game in which he watched himself answering a question about Bailey.

"I said 'every time I throw over there I'm really going to make sure that I'm careful when I throw in his direction,'" Brady said with a laugh. "Sure enough, Champ, 103 yards, that's going to sit with me for a long time."

Until, perhaps, he wins another Super Bowl.

"Every time I sign an autograph on one of those Super Bowl pictures, it's like, 'we're going to get back there,'" Brady said. "There's nothing that matches that."

Doug Flutie has yet to decide if he will retire or return for another season as the backup quarterback of the New England Patriots.

Wie aims to show she can cut it

INCHEON, South Korea (AP) — Playing in a country that regards her as one of its own, Michelle Wie is in position to make the cut in a men's tournament for the first time.

She showed a good touch on the greens yesterday in shooting a 2-under-par 70 that left her five strokes off the lead in the first round of the SK Telecom Open.

"I felt like I played good and bad," Wie said. "I felt like I made some putts where I had to and there are a couple of more days to go, so it will get better."

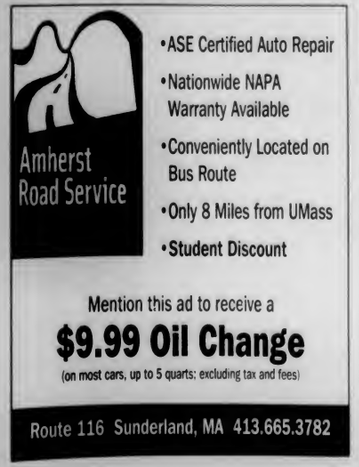
The 16-year-old star from Hawaii had four birdies and two bogeys in her eighth attempt at making it to the weekend in a men's tournament. Adam Le Vesconte of Australia led after a 65 in the Asian tour event.

Wie, whose parents were born in South Korea, finished third in March at the Kraft Nabisco Championship, the first LPGA major.

If she makes the cut after today's second round, she will be the second woman to do so at a Korean tournament. Se Ri Pak tied for 10th at the KPGA Tour's SBS Pro-Golf Championship in 2003.

"I do not have a specific strategy for tomorrow, but if I hit my irons well, I'll be all right," Wie said. "I'd love to play well and put up a strong challenge. Whatever it is, I'll have a calm and cool approach to the game."

Wie birdied the opening hole at No. 10 and made three more birdies, including two after the turn on Nos. 1 and 2. She said she could have had a better score but her approach shots failed her.



"I just got really bad lies, like on the 16th I had a really bad lie and on the par-5 18th," Wie said. "So it was just kind of bad luck on the chips, but I felt like I putted very well coming back."

Wie had the first of her two bogeys when her tee shot on the par-4 17th nestled beside a rake, which had to be removed. Her approach shot sent the ball rolling down a hill and into a water hazard. Her penalty drop was placed on the slope and she chipped within 2 feet to salvage bogey.

Minutemen lose heartbreaker

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the first time in a week the sun was able to break through the clouds and allow the Massachusetts baseball team to play its previously postponed contest against the Siena Saints.

In a close game, the Saints (20-25-1, 9-9 MAAC) were able to fend off a late surge by the Minutemen (10-23, 8-10 Atlantic 10) and take the non-conference matchup, 5-4.

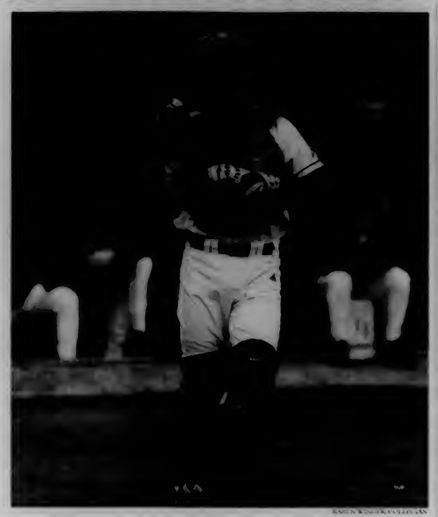
UMass will host division foe, St. Bonaventure, this weekend in a three-game set. The start time for today's game is 3 p.m. while Saturday and Sunday's games will begin at noon.

In the top of the seventh yesterday, the Saints extended their lead to 5-2 over the Minutemen with a pair of runs. Leftfielder Gabe Perez led off the inning with a bang. The senior belted a high fly ball that sailed over the fence and into the shrubs at Earl Lorden field for a solo home run, his 10th of the season.

Next to the plate was Scott King. The designated hitter grounded the ball back to the pitcher, Aaron Smith, who then threw the ball away from first baseman Bryan Adamski. King was given a single on the play and advanced to second on the throwing error by Smith. He then advanced to third when Jake Willis flied out to right field.

With one out in the inning, and King just 90 feet from home, shortstop Chris Klepps singled in the second Saints run of the inning. That prompted UMass coach Mike Stone to pull Smith in favor of Ryan Walczak.

The freshman got the job done as Klepps was caught stealing second and Phil Cahill grounded out to end the Siena seventh.



The Minutemen struck right back with two runs of their own in the bottom of the inning.

UMass' seventh began with a little controversy as it appeared that Charles Kelly was hit by pitch. Initially the home plate umpire ruled that the ball hit Kelly's bat, and not his forearm as the left fielder had contended. To sort things out the first base umpire was called in discuss the play and ultimately ruled that the ball had struck Kelly on the arm.

Frank McPherson was the next batter and he forced a full count before being walked. Pinch runner Marc Dellaire was then called in to run for McPherson. Kelly then advanced to third on an error by the catcher.

With men on first and third, Travis Munsey laid down a sacrifice bunt that scored Kelly and advanced Dellaire to second. After a Ryan Franczek groundout, Lou Proietti stepped to the dish. The shortstop plated the

UMass looks to clinch top seed

The Massachusetts softball team (32-13, 16-2 Atlantic 10) hopes to finally get back on the field today after a pair of games were cancelled due to rainy weather. The team travels to St. Bonaventure (19-19, 11-5 A-10) today for the final Atlantic 10 meeting of the regular season. With a sweep, the Minutewomen can clinch the A-10 regular season title.

UMass will close out its regular season Sunday, the team's Senior Day, when they host UConn for the final game of the home-and-home series. The A-10 Tournament begins next Thursday and will run through Saturday.

The Minutewomen are coming off of a sweep of Rhode Island on Monday that saw a total of 30 hits by the Maroon and White. Games against Maine and Boston College this week were cancelled due to weather conditions.

It seems the only thing that can slow down the Minutewomen is the weather, however, as the team is currently riding a six-game winning streak and has won 23 of its last 25 games. UMass will be looking to extend another winning streak as well. The Minutewomen have never lost to the Bonnies, and are 37-0 all-time against their A-10 rival.

The Bonnies have plenty to play for however, as they currently stand in fourth place in the conference, the final spot in the A-10 tournament. UMass is currently first, and is looking to hold on to that spot through this weekend.

Second-place Charlotte and third-place Temple will also square-off today, so there is certain to be plenty of maneuvering at the top of the A-10 standings in the final week of the regular season.

Freshman phenom Whitney Mollica continued her string of dominance Monday when she tied the A-10 single season RBI record when she knocked in six runs against the Rams, bringing her to a total of 56. Fordham's Laura Klaiber set the mark last season.

She has already raised the bar for RBIs in a season for

UM facing No. 1 seed

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The last time the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team faced Richmond (14-3, 6-1 Atlantic 10), things were not going well for the Maroon and White.

The Minutewomen (7-10, 4-3 A-10) lost 15-5 to the Spiders on April 9, and what had promised to be a successful season was looking like anything but. UMass began the year with a 3-9 overall record, and an 0-2 conference record after its loss to Richmond.

Since that debacle in Virginia, the Minutewomen have gone 4-1, boosting themselves into the fourth and final spot in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

UMass will have a chance for revenge when it takes on No. 11 Richmond in the A-10 Semifinals at 1 p.m. in Washington, D.C. And even though the previous meeting is still in their memory, UMass coach Carrie Bolduc knows that the Spiders will be dealing with a different team this time around.

"It's a completely different game," Bolduc said. "We have to treat it differently. We're a different team than we were when we played Richmond the first time around. It's mainly more mentally than anything. We obviously have more confidence."

Richmond is coming off of a record-setting season in 2006. The Spiders set a school-record with 14 wins this year, and as a result, won its first A-10 regular season title.

The Minutewomen's 2006 season can be compared to that of the Spiders' campaign in 2005. Richmond started the 2005 season with an 0-4 record, and lost its first two conference games. After squeaking into the postseason as the No. 4 seed, the Spiders dominated the A-10 Tournament and were crowned conference champions.

UMass has had a similar story in 2006, and as the No. 4 seed in this year's tournament, the Minutewomen are hoping for the same ending.

"We mentioned it to them yesterday," Bolduc said of Richmond's 2005 A-10 Championship. "I was reading their media guide today and looking at their season last year. You can draw so many parallels with their team last year to ours, and I expect that we will carry

Crew team eyes ECAC title

BY JOEY WHITE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's crew team will finish its season tomorrow in Worcester when it goes for its fourth consecutive Eastern College Athletic Conference Metro championship.

Last year, the Minutewomen only needed their varsity-eight victory as every event (except for the lightweight-eight) was cancelled due to poor weather conditions. They won the varsity-eight race by more than seven seconds and set a course record at the Regatta Point State Park with a time of 6:33.69.

"I think [our chances] are really good," UMass assistant coach Lizzy Boyle said. "There's going to be some good, tough competition, but I think we've made some good improvements since the A-10's."

With those improvements came changes in the varsity-eight boat. Starting last week in Princeton, N.J., Amanda Mawn replaced Rachael Nealer and junior Ellen Maskrey took over the stroke seat as she did a year ago.

"There seems to be a really good flow in the boat right now," said Boyle, who sat in the varsity-eight boat that started the ECAC title streak in 2003, and also won in 2004.

The Maroon and White faced all 12 of their opponents in the Knecht Cup April 8-9, where they finished first out of 26 teams.

The schools attempting to stop UMass's streak at three will be Boston College (second last year), Colgate (third), Rhode Island (fifth), Villanova (sixth), Holy Cross, Fordham, Marist, St. Joseph's, Buffalo, Temple, Delaware and New Hampshire.

"As long as we show up and are ready to race, then we can definitely outperform the other boats there," said sophomore Sarah Marsan, who will be rowing in the fifth seat tomorrow.

Besides Maskrey, Marsan and Mawn, the remainder of the crew will be as follows: sophomore coxswain Dana Pulda, Gabrielle Papineau, Stephanie Hopf, Hannah Brewster, Katie Berger and Catherine Gariepy.

"I think we might have felt comfortable going into the A-10's ... I think we're confident as far as the steps we've made in the last couple of weeks," said Boyle, who also swam for UMass for four years and was on the 2003 squad that broke, and currently holds, the 200-yard medley relay school record.

For the main event, the first varsity-eight competition, there will be two heats, one will have six schools and the other will have seven. The top three squads from each heat will advance to the Grand Final. There will also be a Petite Final to determine places seven through 13.

Temple was one of three boats at the Atlantic 10 Championships that upset UMass's varsity-eight boat.

Marsan, who transferred from Mercyhurst College in Erie, Penn., and finished second at the NCAA Division II Championships last year in her one year of rowing at Mercyhurst, said that she feels her team may have gone into the A-10's overconfident.

"I think that might've been a little bit of a problem A-10's weekend, but I think we're not going into [the ECAC Championships] too confident ... I think we have the strength to do it," she said.

The Minutewomen will also be competing in all of the other events in an attempt to collect enough points for their fourth straight crown. The other races for the point's title include second varsity-eight, lightweight-eight, novice-eight, second novice-eight and the varsity-four.

The novice-eight, second varsity-eight and varsity-four will have similar heats, with the top three from each heat advancing to the finals. With the second novice-eight and lightweight-eight events having few schools competing in it, four and seven boats respectively, there will only be a finals.

"I think our varsity-eight is always strong – they always row really well," Boyle said. "I think our novice team is really strong this year [and] how they do will give us a preview on how well we'll do next year."

NOTES: Senior Abby Lively has been named the Atlantic 10 Student-Athlete of the Year in women's rowing Wednesday.

Lively, who is from Rowe, Mass., was a member of the UMass lightweight-four crew that won at the A-10's to help bring the Maroon and White its 11th consecutive A-10 title.

Lively is a Kinesiology major and maintains a 3.95 grade point average.

Joining Lively on the Academic All-Conference Team are Minutewoman Hannah Brewster and Catherine Gariepy.

Brewster, a junior from Plymouth, Mass., is also a Kinesiology major and has a 3.8 GPA.

Papineau is a senior Exercise Science major from Ottawa, Ontario, and has a GPA of 3.7.

Both Brewster and Papineau have rowed in the first varsity-eight boat that won the Knecht Cup and Yankee Cup the last two years, and the A-10 and Eastern College Athletic Conference Metro championships last year.

The Collegiate Rowing Coaches Association also named Brewster and Papineau National Scholar-Athletes last year.

With three selections in 2006, this now marks 24 Academic All-Conference selections for UMass women's rowing since the award was started in 1996.

De La Hoya knows the risks

BY TIM DAHLBERG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAS VEGAS — Oscar De La Hoya was sitting at ringside last September when Leavander Johnson took the punches that cost him his life.

De La Hoya always knew boxing was, as Mike Tyson likes to say, a hurt business. On that night, he saw up close the fine line between life and death in the ring.

It left a deep impression. It caused him to think.

It didn't stop him from wanting to fight again.

"The tragedy that happened with Leavander Johnson is on my mind all the time," De La Hoya said. "It's scary but that's why you train yourself, your mind and your body, to make sure it doesn't happen to you."

Doctors would debate that. They're not sure why some boxers are hurt or killed while others aren't, but it likely has little to do with training.

The thing is, it doesn't have to happen to De La Hoya.

He's rich beyond belief, married to a Puerto Rican singing star and the father of a new baby boy. At age 33, he's in the prime of his life and should be working on his golf swing instead of his left hook.

Instead, he goes back into the ring Saturday night for the 42nd time in his illustrious career, risking getting his brains bashed in — or something worse — for attention he says he doesn't crave and money he surely doesn't need.

The question is simple. Why?

The answer isn't much more complicated.

"I'm fighting because I just can't live with myself picturing me lying on that canvas," De La Hoya said. "I can't end my career that way. I don't want my fans to remember me like that."

For those who don't, the last time De La Hoya was seen in the ring he was on his side, writhing in pain after a body shot from Bernard Hopkins stopped him in the ninth round of their middleweight title fight.

That was 20 months ago, a long time for any fighter to be off. Even longer for a fighter who is 1-2 in his last three fights, with the one win coming on a charitable gift from the ringside judges.

De La Hoya the fighter isn't what he once was, though that hasn't stopped De La Hoya the promoter from marketing his fight against a crazed Nicaraguan by the name of Ricardo Mayorga as a premium event worth a $50

Brady wants Flutie to return

BY HOWARD ULMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. — Tom Brady wants Doug Flutie to return for a second season as his backup. Like plenty of Patriots and Flutie fans, he's still waiting for the 43-year-old quarterback's decision.

Flutie is considering retirement after a career that includes a Heisman Trophy from Boston College, three pro football leagues and his status as a hometown icon who started in the Boston suburbs at Natick High School and could end in the town of Foxborough.

"I love Doug and Doug's just an awesome guy so I would love for him to be here," Brady said Thursday. "He adds an awful lot so I don't know how that's going to work out."

Flutie, who has been a hero in New England since his heroics for Boston College more than 20 years won him a Heisman Trophy, has said he does not want to play anywhere else. Last season, Flutie was the No. 2 quarterback for New England but played sparingly in five games, completing 5 of 10 passes. No. 3 quarterback Matt Cassel, a seventh-round draft pick last year from Southern California, is the only other quarterback on the Patriots who was with the team last year.

"My role is to play quarterback and it's not to make personnel decisions," Brady said. "I think coach [Bill] Belichick knows how I feel about each player on the team."

Flutie's agent, Kristin Kuliga, did not return calls seeking comment after saying Monday she thought Flutie's decision probably would be made this week.

The Patriots have already lost three players who had much bigger roles than Flutie. Kicker Adam Vinatieri, linebacker Willie McGinest and wide receiver David Givens all left as free agents after the Patriots lost to Denver 27-13 in their second playoff game last season.

"We've lost a lot. There's a lot of value in those guys," Brady said in his first news conference since that loss. "It's obviously tough. You're sitting there at home and it's the off-season and you see other guys getting signed other places and you're kind of looking in and you see some of your core guys getting taken away."

The Patriots moved more slowly than other teams in signing free agents. They added receiver Reche Caldwell from San Diego and former Tampa Bay kicker Martin Gramatica.

"Hopefully, we find other

Professor discusses reaction to disasters

BY ANDREW TRULL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts Environmental Lecture Series was concluded last Tuesday with a speech about disasters and public policy.

Rutherford H. Platt, Professor of Geography and director of the Ecological Cities Project, addressed UMass students, faculty, and community members in a lecture titled, "Learning from Disasters: The Synergy of Geography and Public Policy."

Professor Platt had been researching methods of national disaster recovery long before the recent damage done to the Gulf Coast during Hurricane Katrina, the U.S.'s deadliest and most costly hurricane in over seventy years. Platt visited the area in order to observe recovery strategies and since then has come to a number of "troubling" conclusions regarding the federal government's response in the aftermath.

Police say fatal fire may be homicide

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) Police are treating a fatal fire at a city-run elderly housing complex as a possible double homicide.

The bodies of Edelmira Miranda, 67, and Milagros Rosario, 69, were discovered Friday morning after a suspicious fire gutted their apartment at the Carpe Diem Homes complex.

Police Capt. William Noonan said Saturday that police were treating the deaths as homicides until the medical examiner determines how the couple died. He declined to comment further on what investigators found at the fire scene.

Noonan said police are trying to determine if there's a link between the fire and an armed robbery at a nearby supermarket about an hour earlier.

The couple's deaths and the robbery, combined with an unrelated gang shooting, prompted police Commissioner Edward Flynn on Friday to order a 25-percent increase in police patrols on Friday and Saturday nights during the summer. The Republican of Springfield reported.

Flynn said the increase was part of a summer deployment plan which he decided to implement early.

Miranda and Rosario were found after firefighters at a station across the street noticed the blaze and tried to force their way into the apartment. The flames were too intense, and they were forced back.

The woman was confined to a bed, and he served as her caretaker, Rivera said.

Students gather for 'Sex on the Lawn'

BY ANNA DOLIANITIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Hundreds of students attended the first ever "Sex on the Lawn" event, hosted by VOX: Students for Choice, on the Student Union lawn last Thursday.

According to junior Jessica Parker, the president of VOX, the purpose of the event was, "to promote safe practices, comprehensive sex education, ways for people to become informed about and involved with issues pertaining to women's rights, and to celebrate sexuality."

VOX is a nationwide organization in which college students collaborate to "organize events on campus to raise awareness about reproductive health, work with and support their local Planned Parenthood health centers, and mobilize advocates of reproductive rights," according to the organization's website.

"We asked different student organizations to come and express their points of view on the topic," said sophomore Stefanie Golish, one of VOX's two program directors. Tables were set up across the lawn, manned by representatives of various organizations. Tapestry Health, Planned Parenthood, the Not Ready for Bedtime Players, and the UMass PRIDE Alliance were just some of the organizations who gathered to help promote awareness about safe sex.

Upon arriving at the event, students were greeted by "Captain Condom," a student dressed in a condom costume, spreading the word to "be safe, guys!"

Freshmen Cassie Brown and Kaitlin Baker attended "Sex on the Lawn" after hearing about it from the fliers which they saw posted throughout campus.

"This is very effective," Baker said. "In high school, we were just told, 'Practice safe sex!'

More problems could be in store for Big Dig

BY STEVE LEBLANC
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Concrete that was delivered late or mixed with additional water could weaken faster than expected and cause premature corrosion to structural elements of the massive Big Dig highway project, concrete experts warned Friday.

"Those rules are there for a reason," said Dean Frank, director of industry standards for the National Precast Concrete Association. "Once it starts setting up and you don't have it in place you can have trouble."

On Thursday, prosecutors charged six current and former employees of Big Dig concrete supplier Aggregate Industries of delivering concrete that exceeded a 90-minute time limit or adding water to older mixed concrete to make it look fresher.

Investigators said concrete trucks that had been rejected by project inspectors were re-routed back to the project. To conceal the fraud, according to the indictment, the current and former employees would add excess water and other ingredients to make the concrete appear newly mixed.

Lawyers for Aggregate Industries on Thursday defended the quality of the concrete and said the company never delivered any that did not meet strength specifications called for in its state contract. The company said it would cooperate in the investigation.

On Thursday, public officials tried to reassure the driving public. U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan said the safety of the project is not threatened and long-term maintenance problems for the Big Dig's miles of tunnels and ramps are the most likely effect of using the substandard concrete.

Part of the concern, according to Frank, is that the concrete could end up being more porous than it would have if it had been mixed with the correct amount of water and poured in the correct amount of time.

The more porous the concrete, the more susceptible it is to potential contamination from harmful elements such as carbon dioxide or chlorides found in road de-icing salts, he said. Those contaminants can cause the metal structures of the tunnel to corrode and rust.

"When steel rusts, it expands and can cause the concrete to crack," he said. "But for people driving through are chunks of concrete going to start falling off now? No."

That may not be the case 10 or 15 years from now, however, he said.

Michael W. Grutzeck, a professor at Pennsylvania State University specializing in the chemistry of cement and concrete, echoed those concerns. He said adding too much water to concrete can weaken it, since the excess water was like empty spaces, much like air pockets in a loaf of bread.

"If you add more water to thin it out then ... the water will ultimately make it weaker. The more water you add to concrete, the weaker it will get," he said. "My gut feeling is said it's not a good thing. I wouldn't do it."

Grutzeck, who said he would feel a "a little queasy" driving through the tunnels, said inspectors could take

Senators move to protect Cape Wind project

BY H. JOSEF HEBERT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration and two influential senators weighed in Friday against a provision that would block a 130-turbine wind farm off Cape Cod, where some of Washington's most powerful have vacation retreats.

The wind farm, which would be located in Nantucket Sound about six miles off shore, has been a focus of controversy for five years. Developers won favorable environmental reviews and hoped to have it completed in 2009.

A provision tucked into a bill authorizing activities for the U.S. Coast Guard would give Massachusetts' governor a veto over the project, although the turbines would be located in federal waters. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney opposes the project.

Energy Undersecretary David Garman on Friday called the provision "unwise" at a time when President Bush and many members of Congress are trying to spur the development of wind turbines as an alternative for generating electricity.

The Republican chairman and the top Democrat of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee vowed to block the Coast Guard bill unless the provision is removed.

Sens. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., said interfering in the project in this way and at this late date would have a chilling effect on investments in renewable energy and conflicts with the need to develop alternative energy sources.

"It sets a terrible precedent" to allow governors to veto such projects, Domenici said.

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, added the provision during negotiations with the House on a final version of the Coast Guard bill.

Stevens consulted with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., whose family retreat is eight miles from the proposed wind farm. Kennedy and other members of the Massachusetts congressional delegation oppose the project, but he has voiced that personal considerations are involved.

Kennedy spokeswoman Melissa Wagoner said Kennedy views the project as "a sweetheart deal for a developer" and continues to oppose it. She said "he wasn't involved in crafting the language" in the Coast Guard bill but that he and Stevens discussed it. She said Kennedy long has maintained the governor should have a say on the project.

Aaron Saunders, a spokesman for Stevens, said the Alaska senator viewed it as a matter of state's rights. "He and Senator Kennedy spoke about the issue. Senator Kennedy expressed his opinions on them and Senator Stevens agreed."

The closest wind turbine to the Cape Wind site is about 50 miles north, built on-shore at Hull, Mass., overlooking Quincy Bay. This turbine produces enough electricity to power the streetlights of Hull.

Scholars call for simplification to FAFSA process

BY JENNA YOUNGS
THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

COLUMBIA, Mo. — If two Harvard University scholars have their way, the Free Application for Federal Student Aid, commonly known as the FAFSA, could be shortened.

Professors Susan Dynarski and Judith Scott-Clayton claim in a working paper that because the form is so cumbersome, it keeps some lower-income families from realizing how much financial aid is available.

"Some of the problems are that low-income students are much less likely to have a parent or sibling who has gone through the process, and they are much less likely to have Internet access at home so they have to use the paper FAFSA, which takes longer to fill out and process," Scott-Clayton said in an e-mail. "They may not have the luxury of being able to make a decision about attending college before they know how much it will actually cost."

In their paper, Scott-Clayton and Dynarski state the FAFSA would better serve families if it were a short form.

"We would like to see federal aid based on a much smaller subset of financial information," Scott-Clayton said. "Ideally, the aid formula would be simple enough that it could be explained to high school students in a sentence or two. The simpler the formula, the easier it will be to communicate to people much earlier in the college preparation process."

Financial Aid Office Director Joe Carrille said he sees both sides of the FAFSA form argument.

"More low-income students and their families would probably complete the simplified FAFSA and thus receive aid," he said.

Carrille said a negative aspect to the plan is that some families might not have to report some assets and non-taxable income under current tax laws. He said their adjusted gross income might allow higher-income students to receive aid they wouldn't be allowed to with the current FAFSA.

"This could cause a political backlash from average folks who cannot reduce their AGI and who see these people as undeserving of aid, and in my opinion they are not needy," he said. "Awarding aid to these types of families could put these aid programs in political jeopardy."

Scott-Clayton said shortening the form would eliminate the redundancy between tax forms and the FAFSA.

Parents sue school for teaching about homosexuality

BY JAY LINDSAY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Ever since her 5-year-old brought home a book from kindergarten that depicted a gay family, Tonia Parker has felt that her parenting has been under attack in the only state that allows same-sex marriage.

She and her husband, David, didn't want to discuss sexual orientation yet with their son, and were shocked that the book was included in a "diversity book bag" last year. David Parker subsequently got arrested for refusing to leave a Lexington school after officials refused to meet his demand that he be notified when homosexuality was discussed in his son's class.

Now the Parkers and another couple have sued school officials in federal court, claiming Lexington officials violated their parental rights to teach morals to their own children.

The way they and other opponents of gay marriage see it, the 2003 ruling that cleared the way for same-sex weddings has emboldened Massachusetts gay rights advocates to push their views in schools and ignore those who feel homosexuality is immoral.

"In many parts of the United States, we could have presented our concerns and our objections, and it wouldn't have been a problem," Tonia Parker said.

Glenn Kroeber, executive director of the Massachusetts Association of School Committees, said there is no pro-gay campaign in the schools, just isolated cases exaggerated by anti-gay marriage activists who suffer from "narcissistic activist personality disorder."

Carisa Cunningham, spokeswoman for the Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, said school curriculums haven't changed, just the reaction to them by gay marriage opponents. "Maybe the impact of the law is that it has made people much more defensive and much more afraid," she said.

In Massachusetts, like most of the nation, there is no official education policy on when or how to discuss homosexuality in the classroom.

"It's done purposely to make sure local school boards reflect the values of the local district," said Martha Kempner, a spokeswoman for the Sexuality Information and Education

Lawsuit calls for parental rights

LAWSUIT from pag 1

Council of the United States.

Just 10 states have laws that deal with teaching sexual orientation, two of which require some teaching of it and eight of which put restrictions on how it's presented, according to the New York-based SIECUS.

Massachusetts guidelines say only that teachers should define the different sexual orientations by the fifth grade. Each school district decides how to do that, and in the past year, Lexington has emerged as the center of debate.

Officials there say that since same-sex marriage is part of life in Massachusetts, it comes up naturally and that it's impossible to notify parents every time the issue is discussed.

"It certainly strengthens the argument that we need to teach about gay marriage because it's more of a reality for our kids," said Paul Ash, superintendent of schools in Lexington. "The children see married, gay couples."

An "opt out" provision in state law requires parental notification and the chance to remove their kids from the classroom if the curriculum "primarily involves human sexual education or human sexuality issues." But same-sex marriage comes up in current events classes and other forums where it's not the primary focus and, educators say, not subject to the "opt out" law.

CHRISTOPHER ALT

David and Tonia Parker discuss the lawsuit they filed against the district in federal court.

Kris Mineau of the Massachusetts Family Institute, which opposes gay marriage, says educators are using the perceived loophole to bypass parents. Since the marriages began in May 2004, his organization has compiled about 20 reports from media and parents in towns from Medford to Newton that highlight what his group feels is inappropriate teaching of homosexuality.

Among recent incidents: Parents Joseph and Robin Wirthlin joined the Parkers in the federal suit after a second grade teacher in Lexington read to her class the fairy tale "King and King," which tells the story of two princes falling in love.

Last April, a sexually explicit pamphlet aimed at helping gay men avoid sexually transmitted diseases was distributed at a Brookline High School conference on gay and lesbian issues. School officials said the booklet was mistakenly displayed.

Brian Camenker of the Article 8 Alliance, which opposes gay marriage, said there's been a striking change in tone by gay marriage proponents since marriages started.

"It's like you're dealing with people from Mars, people who feel they're so superior they can use your child's mind as a sandbox for their own personal ideologies," he said.

Suspect concrete could cause more headaches for Big Dig borings of the areas where the questionable concrete was poured to determine if its strength was compromised.

BIG DIG from pag 1

Others were less worried.

It is possible to go past the 90-minute time frame without serious problems, according to Avi Mor, of Dr. Mor & Associates, a California-based consulting firm specializing in construction defect analysis. He also said it's common practice to sometimes hold back some water from the mix and add it when the concrete arrives at a construction site.

"Concrete is always delivered with a wide margin of error," he said.

The best way to put people's minds at ease would be to track down exactly where the concrete was poured and test it, Frank said.

According to the indictment, out of 135,000 truckloads of concrete delivered by Aggregate, at least 5,000 truckloads did not meet specifications. The company was paid $105 million for the concrete. The faulty concrete was used in walls and roof slabs in the Interstate 93 tunnel, parts of the Interstate 90 tunnel and the sea walls of the Fort Point Channel, among other places.

Sullivan said that some of the bad loads ended up in tunnel panels that subsequently leaked, but it was too early to draw any conclusions.

"Is there a connection between the leaks and bad loads? At some point in time, technical engineers are going to have to make that judgment," he said. "The question is, is that causing the leaks, or are there other factors?"

A spokeswomen for the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, which oversees the Big Dig, did not immediately return a request for comment about whether the agency planned to conduct any inspections of areas where the suspect concrete was poured.

Last year, Big Dig investigators checked construction work on every panel along the project's Interstate 93 tunnel after small leaks appeared. They found problems in 169 of about tunnel's 2,000 panels. Most required minor patching.

Study: most rapes are not reported

By Steven Wright
Daily Mississippian (U. Mississippi)

OXFORD, Miss. — A person is raped in the United States every two minutes, but most occurrences are not reported, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. Rape of all types is a constantly growing crime in the United States, with the Federal Bureau of Investigation estimating that 72 out of every 100,000 females in the United States, according to the Uniform Crime statistics published by the U.S. Department of Justice.

The majority of these crimes never end up being reported to authorities because of fear of retaliation and embarrassment. The U.S. Department of Justice estimates that only 26 percent of rapes and attempted rapes are reported to police.

Assistant Chief of Oxford Police Mike Martin said that rape is much more common than most people believe, and that the majority of the victims seem to talk themselves out of reporting the crime because it would continue with an investigation process that victims do not want to discuss.

"In Oxford, we usually receive less than 10 rape charges a year," said Martin. "I'm positive the actual numbers of incidents are much higher, but it's a crime that very few people are willing to report.

"In the majority of rape cases reported, the victim does not even know who the assailant was. People who know who the assailant is are much more hesitant to report it, because of fear for their reputation," Martin said.

Even though victims are much more hesitant to report cases of rape if it involves someone they know, the majority of rape happens with someone the victim is familiar with.

"Approximately 28 percent of victims are raped by husbands or boyfriends, 35 percent by acquaintances, and 5 percent by other relatives. Only 32 percent of victims reported that the offender was a stranger," said the U.S. Department of Justice.

While rape can happen almost anywhere, including a college town such as Oxford, Miss., the most common place for rape to happen is at a social gathering where heavy drinking is involved.

"Parties are the most common places for rape to occur in Oxford," said Martin. "After heavy drinking a person may pass out in a more secluded place, in which an assailant could take advantage of the barely conscious or unconscious person. If both parties are equally intoxicated, and one claims rape it would be up for the courts to decide. People can be victimized even without drinking heavily because of the abundance of date rape drugs such as Rohipnohl. Many rapists will slip one of these pills into a victim's drink, which causes extreme memory loss and leaves the drugged person barely able to function."

University of Mississippi student Buie Halford has seen first-hand the effects of date-rape drugs. Halford said that seeing someone in that state is terrifying and he could not understand how a person would resort to drugging another person.

"At a large party, my roommate was fixing his first drink of the night for himself and his female friend in a room filled with unknown males. After fixing the drinks he accidentally left the drinks unattended for a few seconds with the strangers, and drank his beverage, but the female had forgotten hers in the room. Soon after drinking it, he could not talk, walk, and his eyes were rolled in the back of his head," Halford said. "It was obvious he had been drugged and I immediately got him medical attention. I believe the people who had drugged him had thought that his female friend was going to end up with the drugged drink, which is a very chilling situation.

"The incident proves that an attempt at rape can happen anywhere and at any time. My friend is lucky that both he and his friend were both not drugged. If that had happened, the end result could have been much worse," Halford said.

While the majority of rape victims happen to be female, there are instances in which males have become victims as well. Male rape is not recognized by the FBI in rape statistics, which has led to an outcry by many. One in 33 males in the United States has experienced an attempted or completed rape in his lifetime, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

While rape is a very brutal crime in itself, the aftereffects can be just as bad. These can include infection with sexually transmitted diseases and HIV, increased chance of chronic headaches, sleep disturbance, sexual dysfunction, and depression.

Victims of date rape are 11 times more likely to be clinically depressed and six times more likely to experience social phobia than non-victims, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

A ray of hope for victims is that there is now an abundance of rape crisis hotlines. Through these programs, the victims can let out bottled-up emotions and tell the story without judgment. This can be the first step to reporting a rape, and may even stop another person from being victimized.

There are things that can be done to lower the number of rapes, such as not being afraid to turn in a rapist, because if the attacker has done it to one person, there's no reason they would not do it again to another.

VOX uses event to entertain and teach sexual awareness

VOX from pag 1

Now we're being given more information... Nobody is going to listen if they're not having fun."

Students visited the various tables, spoke with representatives, and obtained condoms and safe-sex literature. The pamphlets and fliers distributed by the various organizations addressed issues including abortion, sexually transmitted infections, forms of birth control and the proper use of contraception.

Diana Huet, a representative of Planned Parenthood, attended the event at VOX's request, because she believes "awareness about safer sex is always important." She said that she had seen a student claim to know how to properly put on a condom, but when asked to explain the procedure, it turned out that he was misinformed.

"The majority of college students are sexually active, or they will be in the near future. Students have a right to know about how to protect their bodies," Parker said.

The idea for "Sex on the Lawn" originated at the University of Florida, and VOX decided to try the event on the UMass campus.

"We want to make this our annual spring event and have it grow each year. Next year we would like more student organizations to be involved," said Colish.

Baker added, "I would like to see it expand, and maybe take over the entire lawn."

VOX has been active in many projects this year, including the Hanger Project, which raised awareness about the women who suffered through self-induced abortions before Roe v. Wade legalized abortion in 1973.

Students interested in becoming involved with VOX: Students for Choice should contact the organization at voxumass@yahoo.com.

"The turnout was way better than we ever expected," said Parker.

Speaker stresses need for disaster legislation

SPEECH from pag 1

lated areas inevitably result in considerable damage and loss. While direct prevention can be difficult or impossible in some cases, there is an urgent need for comprehensive analysis of disaster response in order to improve the efficiency and expediency of the recovery process.

Emphasizing the importance of "learning how to learn from disaster," Platt employed historical examples that either offered similar circumstances to Katrina's aftermath or led to significant public policy changes.

Among the disasters discussed were the Triangle Shirtwaist Fire of 1906, an industrial disaster responsible for the deaths of 146 factory workers which eventually led to legislation changes in safety standards, and the 1911 San Francisco Earthquake, which led to thousands of displaced citizens much like those struggling to move on after Katrina. Tragedies such as these, said Platt, bring to light insufficient policies and practices.

A number of politicians and professionals have expressed dissatisfaction regarding the current administration's reaction to disaster. FEMA, the Federal Emergency Management Agency has come under considerable criticism since Katrina, and is singled out for its delayed response to the situation.

A week ago Senator Susan Collins of Maine called FEMA a "bumbling bureaucracy" and, along with other high-ranking officials, called for its dismantling. Platt said he would be hard-pressed to disagree with her suggestion, claiming that FEMA, a once respectful government agency, has become "buried in Homeland Security, political appointees, and non-professionals."

Calling the agency "demoralized and politicized," Platt called for the kind of public policy changes that will prevent future natural disasters from escalating into large-scale tragedies as he said Katrina and its aftereffects did on the Gulf Coast.

Platt is also concerned about the lack of a "non-political expert panel" assigned to analyze the recovery process. The Bush administration, although it has conducted a number of investigations, has yet to establish an independent panel capable of coming to more objective conclusions, said Platt.

Platt said that while the involvement of the federal government in these matters is absolutely essential, there is a danger that bureaucratic politics can prevent the accurate analysis of such situations and complicate efforts to change insufficient practices.

Teach our kids thoroughly

Chris Eckel

Until recently, I knew Lexington, Massachusetts, for three things: the American Natural History Museum, to which my Mom loved taking the family; Mario's Restaurant, a freezing cold indoor track; and that war that apparently started on the town green or something.

Recently, however, Lexington has become the setting for a story that has gained nationwide attention. Two sets of parents have sued the school district, claiming that school officials violated their parental rights to teach morals to their children. So what did those bastardly Lexington teachers do to raise the ire of these nurturing parents?

They discussed the presence of gay people in society by reading a piece of children's literature. Folks, this isn't just a Lexington problem, either. The Massachusetts Family Institute has compiled about 20 reports from media and parents in towns from Medford to Newton that highlight what they feel is the inappropriate teaching about homosexuality.

Now, this isn't a gay marriage debate — I've already gone that route somewhere in the past. I'm more concerned with what is and is not being taught in the public schools, and furthermore, what sort of influence parents should have on curriculum planning.

According to an article in The Boston Globe, one of the litigious parents, Tonia Parker, said, "In many parts of the United States, we could have presented our concerns and our objections, and it wouldn't have been a problem." Actually, Tonia, it'd be a huge problem if your request was granted.

As the son of two lifelong educators, I know full well that the best teachers introduce children to a wide variety of viewpoints and ideas and allow each child to draw his/her own conclusions, and it sounds like that is exactly what is going on in Lexington. I haven't heard that any teachers have started a "Gay marriage rocks!" chant yet; it sounds to me like they are simply informing their students about what is going on in the world.

Ignoring a significant percentage of the population is nothing short of lying to children about the world. The fact is, gay marriage and gay families are realities in Massachusetts. The sooner that students are prepared for that fact of life, the easier the adjustment will be to the wonderful mix of differences that form American society.

I mean, heaven forbid that kids actually have some idea of what's out there in the world. If we're going to disregard teaching about homosexuality, we might as well just teach children that there is only one school, one town and one country, and ignore everything else.

However, the nature of the debate isn't the only problem with this lawsuit. I don't see any teachers showing up at parents' workplaces and telling them how to do their jobs, probably because teachers recognize that they are not experts in all other fields. By the same token, parents should not attempt to insinuate themselves into a discussion of how teachers should operate.

Caving into these litigious parents and ignoring gay people means beginning a walk down the slippery slope of catering to the whims of whiny parents. These parents, without a doubt, are whiners. David Parker, the husband of wannabe superintendent of the world Tonia, was arrested for refusing to leave a Lexington school after officials refused to meet his demand that he be notified when homosexuality was discussed in his son's class.

It turns out that, legally, there is no need to do so, and apparently when David found this out, he had a little temper tantrum. The only thing that he probably succeeded in accomplishing was turning the playground conversation from "Golly gee, homosexuality sure is the coolest thing since Big League chew" to "Wow, that creepy man is crying louder than my little sister did when her hamster died. His son must have been thrilled at having the cool dad."

I know it's been a while since you've been in school, David, but did you really expect that being a little crybaby would work with schoolteachers? They get whining every day from kids who are a lot cuter than you, and as far as I'm aware, teachers rarely give in to whining. Here's one former public school student who sincerely hopes that another person accustomed to whiners, the judge that hears this case, has the respect for the relative autonomy of educators to decide what should be taught in their classrooms.

If parents don't like it, they can always take time out from their busy protest schedule to home school their kids about what definitely, absolutely isn't going on in the world all around them. If you want to talk about it all, hunt me down at Bowl Weekend where I'll be enjoying all the great movies, music and games under the sun — hope to see you there.

It was lunchtime. I was with a cluster of my friends and we somehow initiated conversation about a woman's period. The women at the table were partially surprised that I barely knew anything about a woman's period. I was engaged in conversation, asking questions and receiving in-depth answers and explanations. As we were touching on the subject of pads and tampons, it just so happened that one of women had an extra tampon in her purse.

I examined it with great interest, because, well, frankly, I have never ever seen a tampon before. I saw a glossy white miniature bullet-like casing with a piece of twine attached at the end. I asked my friend, "So you stick it up there, and it collects all the blood?"

She answered with a nod and explained to me the tampon expands with blood and will then need to be replaced every couple of hours. My mouth dropped, and my eyes widened with disbelief that, well, it bleeds so much down in that region.

My friend knew I was completely engaged in this topic and decided to end it with a huge climax. She took the tampon and removed the plastic tube surrounding it. She lifted it with her three fingers and let me take a thorough examination. The actual tampon looked like a condensed gauze strip you'd use to bandage a wound.

> To tell you the truth, the visual demonstration might have been the most disturbing thing I've witnessed in a long time. I concluded that it just plain sucks being a woman.

I am a big fan of cranberry juice and prefer it to orange juice. That day I was aimlessly drinking cranberry juice during the entire discussion. She took my glass, and with a stern, empowered voice said, "This is what we go through every month."

The tampon fell into the cup of red cranberry juice and it just exploded in size. No words could describe the range of feelings coming when I saw the tampon blow up. I jumped from my seat screaming with disgust; my eyes, which had been widening with intrigue, became as slanty as slants can be. I was screeching at how that little thing just expands in a woman's body during her period.

To tell you the truth, the visual demonstration might have been the most disturbing thing I've witnessed in a long time. I concluded that it just plain sucks being a woman. I having to go through that every month — dealing with the blood, cramps and bloating. I have to give women props.

The kind of pain women go through must be like a man being hit in the groin every month, or possibly worse. I can imagine the striking pain after the initial blow to the groin and feeling it spread all around your stomach, immobilizing you for a long period of time. It must be hard for women. I know I would have mood swings every month if I continually got that pain.

Ladies, I am trying to relate to your pain and suffering, but I know I am not alone when I say this. I find it really difficult to buy pads and tampons for women. My dad, who has been happily married to my mom for over 20 years, even has a hard time buying sanitary napkins and makes me do it all the time. As one male student bluntly testified, "It's just gross, a feeling many men of all age ranges express."

When forced, I will buy pads and tampons, but I really prefer not to. I guess it's hard to buy a product because I'm delving into the abyss of the unknown.

Like I really hate going into car accessory shops because I don't know what more than 75 percent of the products on the shelves are. If I need new windshield wipers for winter, then I'll head into a car shop that sells windshield wipers. It's the same with pads and tampons. A man might feel uncomfortable buying pads and tampons because, frankly, we are not familiar with a woman's period.

Buying tampons and pads might not only be about delving into the unknown, but a public admittance that this man is put in check or a slave to the whims of a woman. The character Maria Portokalos from the movie "My Big Fat Greek Wedding" summed it up the best when she said, "the men may be the head of the house, but the women are the neck, and they can turn the head any way they want."

No matter how much we try and fight being whipped or put in check, the fact is, we are eventually going to have to submit. I know it's a shame losing face, but we're just going to have to deal with it — even if it makes us do uncomfortable things, like buying tampons and pads. If you're placed in the situation of buying pads and tampons, my two pieces of advice would be:

1) Make sure you get the right one: pads and tampons come in different sizes with different absorbent ratings. If you mess up, you're likely to have to make an other trip to the store and get her extremely irritated.

2) Buy in bulk. Do not just purchase one, buy at least five or six boxes. It might be awkward buying in bulk, but stocking up means fewer trips to the store and gives you more time to enjoy the finer things in life.

Good luck and Godspeed.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

QUALITY OVER QUANTITY

You, today, can help alleviate poverty and create better lives for millions of people in the developing world. Too good to be true? It's simple: just choose the Fair Trade Label.

Fair Trade is a positive way to harness the power of the global economy for development. Artisans and workers in developing countries producing things we consume every day on campus are being lifted out of poverty by Fair Trade. Though coffee is perhaps best known, the list of available Fair Trade products is growing and includes things like chocolate, fruits and vegetables, rice and even clothing.

Fair Trade works by ensuring a fair price and a level playing field for producers in the Global South. Without Fair Trade, producers fall prey to the inequitable distribution of power in the world trading system. With Fair Trade, workers are empowered to earn a decent standard of living while investing in improved working conditions, environmental sustainability, education and health care. Currently, an estimated 1.1 million developing country producers participate in Fair Trade.

Yes, Fair Trade costs more: about 10 cents per pound of coffee buys a decent standard of living and environmental stewardship. But coffee is traded in a highly competitive global commodity market, and only a fraction of this cost shows up in retail prices. Regardless, consumers are showing a strong taste for Fair Trade products, with Fair Trade coffee sales growing 72 percent on average annually since its introduction to the U.S. market in 1999.

Fueled by growing consumer demand for better quality and by growing awareness of how communities like Amherst are linked to people in the developing world through global commodity chains, people across the country are joining the burgeoning Fair Trade movement to step in where trade policies made by governments and international organizations are failing to deliver economic development.

Joining the Fair Trade movement is simple: just choose products certified with the Fair Trade label — your assurance that a product meets the rigorous International Fair Trade Standards as defined by Fair Trade Labeling Organization International.

Consumers beware: not all products claiming to be fairly traded meet these standards. For example, local roaster Dean's Beans forgoes the essential certification process, but claims fair trade status on its packaging. So look for the Fair Trade label, because only it ensures your purchase goes to support sustainable social and economic development.

Currently, UMass for Fair Trade — a group of students, faculty, staff and other members of the UMass Amherst community — is working to expand the use of Fair Trade products on our campus and beyond. Fair Trade coffee is already available from People's Market in the Student Union and at Pura Vida at the Blue Wall.

We are working to make the University's Dining Commons 100 percent Fair Trade and to raise awareness through our First Annual Fair Trade Festival on May 8th from noon to 3 p.m. on the Student Union lawn. For more information on Fair Trade, visit http://www.umassfairtrade.blogspot.com.

Reporters not being fair

World Perspectives
Ben Duffy

The poster on the wall offered a lecture from the Carl Schurz German-American House entitled "Year 6 of President George W. Bush and the Midterm Elections: Should we have hope or despair? An American reporter's perspective." I sighed. It's that liberal media bias that I keep hearing doesn't exist. In fact, I'm told there's a conservative media bias; just ask that leftist clown Noam Chomsky. Incidentally, I'm currently reading Chomsky's "Manufacturing Consent," a Marxist cliché about corporate media ownership, and I must say it's a real hoot. Every page or two gives me a good chuckle.

The lecture was everything I thought it would be. Veteran reporter David DeKok, of the Pennsylvania-based Patriot-News, stood before an audience of like-minded young liberals and spouted off every leftist platitude in the book.

"Sometimes I wonder if we have become less a democracy than a theocracy," he said at one point. "Ever since then, they [the Republicans] have been milking the terrorist issues among the most fearful of the voters," he proclaimed.

When the time came for questions my hand shot up in the air. I asked how he can operate as a journalist when he is so obviously not objective. He told me that he puts his political biases aside when he's on the job.

Oh, really? A bias as large as Mr. DeKok's isn't easy to just "put aside." Keep in mind that he describes himself as a "liberal-leftist," and he wants to see the resurrection of that yahoo from Vermont, Howard Dean, to be our next president.

And even if Mr. DeKok puts his biases aside (or thinks he does), the news industry, as a whole, does not. One of the main manifestations of the liberal media bias is how conservatives and conservative ideas are depicted in the media. Reading between the lines of the big news stories, it isn't difficult to discern what most reporters think about us. We're racist and sexist; we're irrational Bible-thumpers who want to conquer the world in some kind of holy crusade; we're not very bright (probably because our parents had the same last name before they got married), and we love hate radio and Fox News.

Incidentally, this description was not that different from how Mr. DeKok described us. At one point, he told us the story of the Dover,

> The CNN employees, thinking no one was listening, had such harsh words for Bozell that they cannot be reprinted here. Let's just say that "fascist" and "Nazi" were among them.

Pennsylvania school district, which voted in 2004 to teach intelligent design side by side with evolution in its biology classes. He then referred to the Christian conservatives who supported the decision as the "Dover Taliban." I guess he thought that was funny.

I wasn't laughing. I'm not really sure where I stand on the whole intelligent design controversy, mostly because I don't find it important enough to get excited about it either way. But to call its supporters the "Dover Taliban" is absolutely outrageous.

This is what I have always believed that reporters say about conservatives when they think we're not around. Media critic Brent Bozell recalls a time when CNN invited him onto their show, "Reliable Sources," to provide a conservative voice concerning the media's coverage of religion. Bozell believes that CNN handled it well on the air, "but those in the control room were not so respectful. I know, because when I went on the air, in my earpiece I could still hear everything being said in the control room. CNN had forgotten to shut off the transmission. Oops."

The CNN employees, thinking no one was listening, had such harsh words for Bozell that they cannot be reprinted here. Let's just say that "fascist" and "Nazi" were among them. After the show, Bozell went to the control room and tossed his earpiece on the desk. "Next time, don't forget to turn it off during the show," he said. They sat there bug-eyed.

Is that what reporters really think about conservatives? We conservatives think so, but when we press them about it, they deny all charges and accuse us of paranoia. But we're not paranoid. We aren't treated fairly in the news media, and we're sick of it. We're sick of reporters who think that they can put their biases aside, even when writing about people whom they so obviously despise. We're sick of the outrageous denials of liberal media bias, and the even more ludicrous counter-charge that the media is actually very conservative.

Sorry, but Noam Chomsky is as wrong about the so-called right-wing of the media as he is about just about everything else. The press is maliciously liberal, and they do a poor job of hiding it.

Tom Cruise's antics drop him to celebrity mags' B team

By Lucinda Hahn
Chicago Tribune

Tom Cruise may be A-list in Hollywood, but in the hyper-competitive world of celebrity magazines, he has slipped to the B team.

For Cruise, whose last film, "War of the Worlds," grossed nearly $600 million at box offices worldwide and whose new film, "Mission: Impossible III," has just been released, the task of moving $1.99 magazines would seem like a mission most possible.

But Cruise's behavior in recent months — public stances against anti-depressants and psychiatry; his whirligig wooing of the younger Katie Holmes; his devotion to Scientology, silent births and all — have many magazine editors loath to put him on their covers for fear he has alienated their women readers.

"He was such a stud; my generation dreamed of marrying him," said Debra Birnbaum, editor in chief of Life & Style Weekly, whose readership is 99 percent women. "Now, he's turning women off. I wouldn't put him on (the cover) without Katie, that's for sure."

Few people thrive on the woes of Hollywood stars like the editors of celebrity magazines. Controversy sells: Last year's top-selling People and Us Weekly covers featured Jennifer Aniston embroiled in a nasty split from former husband Brad Pitt, with the blurbs "Jen Breaks Her Silence" and "Enough," respectively.

What's more, high-selling covers are crucial to a magazine's success. Newsstand sales are highly profitable, because, unlike subscribers, people buying the magazine off the shelf pay full price.

At the same time, picking covers that sell is as much instinct as science — and for the moment, Cruise isn't stirring the guts of many editors.

Us Weekly's editor in chief, Janice Min, said sales of Cruise and Cruise-Holmes covers do "just average" among the magazines 70 percent female readership.

"Women who are buying Us would like to get swept up in and vicariously experience this glamorous life they think celebrities lead," she said. "There's not a lot of women who want to vicariously experience what's going on" in Tom and Katie's lives.

Michelle Lee, executive editor of In Touch Weekly, hasn't put Cruise on the cover in 2006, though she is not against it. "Speaking as a woman, I'm completely turned off by him," she said. "But that doesn't mean I don't find him totally intriguing — in a way because of his outrageous behavior. I'll read any story about him, and I loved looking at all those pictures of Katie and her belly — is it real or fake? It's still fascinating."

Min cited the exchange Cruise had recently on "Prime Time Live" with Diane Sawyer, in which he claimed he hadn't had a cold in as long as he could remember — because of Scientology.

"The world is not black and white in the way it's presented in the Tom Cruise universe," Min said. "This sort of infallibility he projects doesn't make him relatable to women, who like to see some human unveiling in their celebrities."

Another problem, Min added, is the infamous Cruise control. "He's been so effective at keeping the private life he and Katie have secret," she said. "People buy magazines to find out things they don't know. We did a cover story that went into his Scientology beliefs ... but that's about the extent that anyone can scratch the surface of Tom and Katie."

Lovebirds Pitt and Angelina Jolie are the cover draws of the moment, Birnbaum said. "Angelina Jolie has created this image of a happy family (with Pitt)," she explained. "This is a great love story, you feel. Tom Cruise, he's traveling around the world promoting ("Mission: Impossible III") just after Katie's given birth. It's a negative story that people can't relate to."

Cruise's "Q Score," a widely used tool in the entertainment industry that measures a performer's popularity, indicates Cruise hasn't endeared himself to the public, and especially women, in recent months.

Generated by Marketing Evaluations Inc., Cruise's Q Score ranged from 27 to 30 percent in studies done in 2000, 2002 and 2004. His negative rating — the percentage of people who said their opinion of him was "fair" or "poor" — ranged from 12 to 14 percent.

But in 2006, his Q Score dropped to 19 percent, and his negative rating soared to 31 percent.

Steven Levitt, president of Marketing Evaluations, added that Cruise's Q Score among women has plummeted, though he declined to give exact figures.

"He's turned off people and especially women, because of the topics he's chosen to speak out about," Levitt said, citing Cruise's public criticism of actress Brooke Shields' use of antidepressants in treating her postpartum depression.

Still, Levitt has no doubt "Mission: Impossible III" will be another blockbuster. "In real life, he's turning people off. On the movie screen, he's involved in being someone else."

Tom Cruise, seen here playing the hero in "Mission: Impossible III," stars as Ethan Hunt in the action-packed thriller.

Cruise's character trains new IMF agent Lindsey Farris, played by Keri Russell in the film "Mission: Impossible III."

This week in movies

Wondering what's playing in theaters this week?

"Mission: Impossible III"

Tom Cruise returns as Special Agent Ethan Hunt, who faces the invasion of his life in "Mission: Impossible III". J.J. Abrams directed this action flick, bringing his unique blend of action and drama to the billion-dollar franchise.

"Hoot"

After moving from Montana to Florida, a boy becomes aware of a threat to a local population of endangered owls. Together with his new friends, he takes on corrupt politicians in a fight to protect the birds.

"An American Haunting"

John and Lucy Bell are landowners in 1817 Tennessee. When John is found guilty of swindling a neighbor, his victim curses the Bell family.

Still playing in theaters are...

"RV" starring Robin Williams, Jeff Daniels, Kristin Chenoweth.

"United 93" starring David Alan Basche, Richard Bekins, Susan Blommaert.

"Stick It" starring Jeff Bridges, Missy Peregrym, Vanessa Lengies.

"Silent Hill" starring Radha Mitchell, Laurie Holden, Sean Bean.

"Scary Movie 4" starring Anna Faris, Andre Benjamin, Regina Hall.

"The Sentinel" starring Michael Douglas, Kiefer Sutherland, Kim Basinger.

"Ice Age: The Meltdown" starring Ray Romano, John Leguizamo, Denis Leary.

"Akeelah and the Bee" starring Keke Palmer, Laurence Fishburne, Angela Bassett.

"The Wild" starring Steve "Spaz" Williams. An animated family comedy.

"The Benchwarmers" starring David Spade, Jon Heder, Rob Schneider.

Look for these movies, coming to theaters next week...

"Poseidon" Opens May 12, 2006. Starring Kurt Russell, Josh Lucas, Jacinda Barrett.

"Just My Luck" Opens May 12, 2006. Starring Lindsay Lohan, Samaire Armstrong, Chris Pine.

"Goal! The Dream Begins" Opens May 12, 2006. Starring Kuno Becker, Alessandro Nivola, Stephen Dillane.

"The Da Vinci Code" Opens May 19, 2006. Starring Tom Hanks, Audrey Tautou, Ian McKellen.

ABC's online experiment 'Lost' & 'Desperate'

By Steve Johnson
Chicago Tribune

As a glimpse into the future, the ABC Web site's new offering of fresh TV episodes, free of charge, is both tantalizing and maddening.

It's tantalizing because it's high-level television, plus "Commander in Chief," which you no longer can watch on television.

It's maddening because ABC.com's execution of the concept isn't nearly so sparkly and high-end as it first appears.

The most pressing issue: The episodes, in my trial Monday, the experiment's first day, loaded slowly or not at all and could not be induced to play all the way through.

The same was true for other users at the Chicago Tribune, but ABC said this was likely an issue caused by corporate security firewalls designed to protect the computer network. All the initial reports of problems came from corporate environments, the network said, or from people running older, slower computers.

For "Commander in Chief," of course, a limited play is a bonus: A quarter-hour is sufficient to answer the question of what "The West Wing" would be like if it were written in crayon. But for "Lost," say, even last week's highlight episode was compelling enough to keep me on the edge of my ergonomic task chair.

ABC is conducting a two-month trial offering of four series, the Geena Davis-as-president drama plus ABC's biggest guns, "Lost," "Desperate Housewives" and "Alias." Considering that the only cost to the viewer comes as four "unskippable" 30-second ads, it's the most aggressive effort yet by a network to bring old-school television to the Internet.

If it shows enough promise for ABC to bring it back in the fall, as the network is now pledging to do, it will stand as another threat to the traditional model of TV delivery, joining, for instance, iTunes and Google Video's sale of viewing rights to other network programs (including "Desperate" and "Lost"). And you can get most of the best moments of Comedy Central's great "The Daily Show" and "The Colbert Report" online, without paying a dime to a Comcast.

There is a long road and many new pieces of home equipment to go, of course, before the computer-viewing experience becomes as comfortable as the living-room one that viewers have fashioned around their TV sets.

But it's not hard to imagine Internet delivery of TV soon enough fouling networks' relationships with their affiliates, causing viewers to take an even dimmer view of their cable companies, and generally doing more damage to the old business model than the powerful but surprisingly unpopular recording and ad-skipping machines such as TiVo.

CW, the new network being lashed together from the wreckages of the WB and UPN, would be smart to invest heavily in its Internet viewing options from the outset. If it wants to appeal to young viewers, it needs to try to meet them on their own screens.

But ABC limits you to a choice of two smallish viewing windows, about one-eighth (small) or one-quarter (large) the size of my 19-inch monitor.

The shows appear in a kind of movie theater metaphor. It's well executed, with four screens, one for each show, appearing to surround the viewing position. Click on the series you want to bring to the fore, then press the play button that appears. (A menu button also gives you the option of choosing an episode other than the default, latest one.) The show loads — theoretically — and begins playing — for a while.

It's also frustrating that as you watch, faint images of two of the other shows remain on either side of the screen.

Still, as with all the video now being offered on the Internet, this is an early-stages experiment, and the potential is probably what counts most. Moving forward, it's safe to presume that ABC and corporate IT departments will find a way to better work together on these things.

Or they won't, and some of us will have to accept the fact that we just aren't meant to watch 43 minutes of Jennifer Garner drop-kicking bad guys on the computers we're supposed to be using for work.

ABC's internet broadcasting is causing frustration because shows are loading slowly or not at all, a problem most likely caused by security firewalls.

"CSI Miami" cast heats up show with gore, grit and glory

Emily Procter and Adam Rodriquez, cast members of the show "CSI Miami," work on a scene at Brickel Bay for the show's upcoming season.

By Glenn Garvin
Knight Ridder

MIAMI — Who says educational television is dead? Rex Linn has learned a lot of stuff since joining the cast of "CSI: Miami." Right at the top of the list: When his acting career is over — as it could be any minute; more on that in a few paragraphs — he'll go to work emptying garbage or patching potholes or just about anything but being a crime-scene investigator.

"We romanticize it in the show," says Linn, who plays Detective Frank Tripp on CBS' loving tribute to South Florida psychosis and homicide. "But it's tricky work. And it's gross, too."

Linn has done more scenes than he can count with headless torsos and shark-gnawed limbs, but the day it really got to be too much, he and series star David Caruso (playing Lt. Horatio Caine) were supposed to discover the bullet-riddled corpse of a teenage boy in an abandoned cemetery.

"His head is bloody and there's maggots all over his face and mouth — 'real' maggots — and I don't know what it was, but I just couldn't get my lines out," Linn recalls, not at all fondly. "All I had to do was lean over and say, 'Looks like an exit wound,' but every time, I'd start laughing."

"After a while, David asked me, 'Is there something about maggots you find funny?' The corpse guy, who was a real actor, wasn't digging it too much."

Linn, Caruso and the rest of the "CSI: Miami" cast have just wrapped up a week of shooting. Most of the show is produced in Southern California, but about five episodes a year are done in South Florida to catch what Caruso (who actually lives in Miami) calls "the power of the city, the seduction of the city."

"The real fans know the difference between the episodes shot in studios and those done on location," Caruso says. "It's obvious to them."

So there they were recently, imposing law and order on the anarchic, rapacious mayhem of the Brickell neighborhood's condo canyons for an especially grisly season finale that will spill across two episodes on May 15 and 22.

Though the Mala Noche street gang was basically leaving Brickell knee-deep in corpses, the real nemesis of the "CSI" team seemed to be the passing airliners that disrupted scene after scene while the actors wilted in 90-degree heat.

"Any time you have a noise or an interruption or something that startles an actor, you've gotta start over," said Duane Clark, the director, slightly hoarse from yelling "Cut!" so many times. Finally he gave up and announced that any futzed-up dialogue would be rerecorded ("looped," in TV jargon) in the studio. "We stop for no man or plane!" Clark shouted. "We go, plane or shine."

That was fine with Linn, whose shiny pate was visibly pinkening under the sun.

Not that he's complaining. As a guy who joined the cast for what was supposed to be a one-episode guest appearance and somehow expanded it into a regular role, he's just happy to be here — happier still that the "CSI" writing staff competes to see who can come up with the most sarcastic lines, known on the show as "Trippisms," for his cynical character. (All-time crew favorite: when Detective Tripp barked at a reluctant witness, "You stuck on stupid?")

Linn's one-time appearance as a cop whose suspicious wife hired a floozy to see if he could be tempted, grew into nine episodes the first season, 13 the second, 19 the third, and finally a regular this year. He has already started laying the groundwork for an expanded role next season — he gave Frank Tripp a divorce.

"I just took off my wedding ring and started doing scenes without it," Linn confides. "Toward the end of the first episode, a producer noticed it. 'Where's your ring?' she asked me. 'I'm divorced,' I told her. 'I moved out of the house into an apartment.' 'Umm, maybe you should put the ring back on and we'll try to work around what we've already shot,' she said. I told her, 'That's a lot of footage to work around. I've been shooting seven days without it.' And nothing more was ever said."

"But Rex, isn't that kind of risky?" wonders a reporter. What if you make the writers mad? Aren't you afraid they'll, say, have a sniper shoot you? The question makes Linn go a little pale — unknown to the reporter, there is a sniper in the "CSI: Miami" season finale, and at least one cast member ends the year in a pine box.

"I try to do everything I can to stay on the show," Linn swears. "I love the show. But yeah, there are those paranoid moments when you open up a script and say, 'God, I hope I don't get run over by a milk truck this week.'"

Aside from snipers and milk trucks, "CSI" cast members must worry about reporters, who are always trying to snake something incriminating out of them. Caruso, for his part, gave away what passes for a state secret in the "CSI" universe when he revealed that next season, "My jurisdiction widens and we begin our fifth season internationally."

Cancer studies focus on early detection

By Jacob Goldstein
Knight Ridder

The survival calculus for many cancers is simple: Find the cancer early on, you live. Find it late, you die.

Yet since Richard Nixon declared "war on cancer" a generation ago, the lion's share of attention has gone to figuring out how to treat existing cancers, not working toward earlier detection.

That may be changing.

In recent years the National Cancer Institute has funneled tens of millions of dollars into early detection research. A $144 million program to fund nanotechnology and cancer research will go largely toward searching for new ways to catch cancers early.

"As you begin to look in detail at the genetic makeup of a disease as it evolves, you can see the disease quite a bit before there are any clinical symptoms," says James Heath, a California Institute of Technology chemist who studies systems for early cancer detection. "Can we develop a diagnostic test that you would do on a really regular basis, even in the home, to catch this?"

A test like this won't be on the shelf anytime soon, but Heath and others are building prototypes. They rely on "biomarkers," specific proteins that show up in the body when cancer is present.

The ideal biomarker would be easily detectable, and both sensitive and specific — that is, it would always be present when a particular cancer was present, and it would always be absent when that cancer was absent. Alas, the ideal biomarker probably doesn't exist.

"The challenges facing any biomarker are: Is it sensitive enough to detect cancer early enough to make a clinical impact?" says Dr. Karen Armstrong, whose Harvard lab is searching for breast cancer biomarkers. "Is it specific enough that when it's abnormal it detects cancer and not something else? And does it really add value to the existing tests that we have?"

Prostate-specific antigen, more commonly known as PSA, is the most important biomarker in use today, and the debate surrounding PSA is indicative of the problems biomarkers can present.

"What PSA lacks is specificity," says Dr. Mark Soloway, chairman of urology at the University of Miami. In other words, men may have a high PSA but not have cancer.

Another problem with PSA that may plague other biomarkers: Many of the cancers it detects are slow-growing, and not likely to present a problem in older men. That puts many patients in the awkward position of knowing they have a cancer that is best left alone.

Indeed, one recent study found that men who had a PSA test didn't live any longer than men who skipped it, prompting some experts to question the test's overall value. That study notwithstanding, Soloway suggests the test has served to heighten men's awareness of the disease.

"It has clearly changed the pattern if not the face of prostate cancer," he says. "It's gotten thousands and thousands of men in the door ... In the days before PSA, in order to detect men with prostate cancer early, you had to do a digital examination. Men are not too excited about that."

Other biomarkers are in development. A study published earlier this year in the Journal of the American Medical Association found a urine test for a bladder cancer biomarker outperformed the standard techniques of searching for that disease.

And researchers are investigating a biomarker for ovarian cancer, which often progresses undetected.

What will ultimately be necessary, Heath suggests, is a battery of biomarkers that, taken together, present a more comprehensive, clear picture than any single marker — not only of the presence or absence of a cancer, but also of its stage of development. That will require not only determining which proteins are key, but also developing a mechanism to detect the proteins, which occur in mind-bendingly low concentrations in the blood, something like one part per hundred billion.

Toward that end, Heath and his colleagues are developing tiny circuits, with transistors a billionth of a meter thick. Each transistor can be attached to an antibody, a biological molecule specially designed to attach to a biomarker. When the antibody binds to the biomarker, the transistor's ability to conduct electricity changes slightly signaling the biomarker's presence.

The long-term goal is to build a circuit — think of a microscopic computer chip — that can detect hundreds or thousands of biomarkers in a single test that could catch early cancers that would otherwise go undetected.

"Many existing therapies for some of the worst-case diseases can be quite effective if you can apply them very early," Heath says. "Many people die of cancer largely because they didn't even look for it."

Country Griggs working on fourth record

By Brad Barnes
Knight Ridder

After three hit records and 11 songs on Billboard's hit list, country singer Andy Griggs has parted ways with RCA Records.

But that's nothing but a challenge for the 32-year-old native of Monroe, La.

"I've been writing a whole lot and getting ready to make album No. 4," says Griggs, who's excited to be in control of his own destiny in the studio and plans to shop the record to other majors.

In the meantime, he's hitting the road hard. "If you don't love getting out there and playing the music, man, you chose the wrong profession," he says with a chuckle.

Here's what else he had to say:

Q: You're about nine years out from your debut record. What has a decade in the business taught you?

A: Man, it's taught me all kinds of things. There's good and bad with your dreams, just like anything else, and that makes you value your music so much. I guess the music business will teach you that, man. The only thing you want to hold onto as tight as you can is the music, and not necessarily the music "business." Let everybody else worry about the music business.

Don't get caught and carried away in the shuffle, and you just stay focused on the songs.

Q: You were a preacher for a while. So how hard a choice was it for you between ministry and music?

A: I always asked God for him to make the choice and not me. I just knew the direction I would go would be his decision. Things just started opening up for me in music as soon as I said that prayer. And by no means did I turn my back to the ministry and church. I just changed jobs, that's all. I'm still a God-fearing Christian. God and family and church are still huge priorities in my life. I just swapped paychecks.

Q: I was a little surprised that you and RCA split ways. The last record spawned two Top 10 hits ("She Thinks She Needs Me" and "If Heaven") and went to No. 7, just like the record before.

A: I think their vision and my vision were two different things, and that just comes with the territory. There's no hard feelings or anything like that. It was just a lot of, the direction I was wanting to go was a different direction from them, and vice-versa.

Q: That sort of frees you up for this next record.

A: I'm finally doing music and writing and recording it the way I want to record it, singing it the way that I want to sing it. So, man, it's a brand new chapter, a brand new season in my life.

Q: How frustrating is it, how much people are fixated on the business side of country music?

A: It's only as frustrating as you let it be. It depends on which way you look at it. Every person is different. I've seen a lot of artists get so frustrated that they literally throw in the towel and leave town. And I've also seen lots of different people that grin and bear with it and roll their eyes and keep going.

Country music star Andy Griggs is writing new songs and has signed with Creative Artists Agency.

UM splits with St. Bonaventure

SOFTBALL from page 8

fifth inning. With two outs and two runners on base, Samantha Salato, pinch-hitting for Kristi Stefanoni, singled to right field, scoring Stacy Cullington and moving Proctor over the third.

Morin walked to load the bases, and Candice Molinari followed with another walk to bring in Proctor from third. Mollica then put herself in the A-10 history books with a two-run single that gave her sole possession of the A-10 single-season RBI record (58).

Kelley followed suit with a single of her own, adding two more runs to the total, making it a 12-0 lead for the Minutewomen.

Brandice Balschmiter closed out the game with a 1-2-3 fifth, giving UMass the win by mercy-rule Balschmiter had yet another one-hitter, just missing her first career no-hitter. She struck out eight while walking two.

Morin was on fire in Game 1, going 3-for-3 with four RBIs and a run scored. Proctor also played well, going 2-for-2 with two runs scored and an RBI.

The Minutewomen entered Game 2 knowing a victory would clinch the A-10 regular season championship, and the top seed in the playoff tournament.

However, pitcher Jenna Busa and the Minutewomen fell behind early and could not recover. In the bottom of the second, the Bonnies began to exact revenge on their first game blowout.

After one run was scored in the first, the Bonnies grabbed four in the second. The bases were quickly loaded with no outs, and St. Bonaventure's Brianna Bricker singled up the middle, driving in a run. A second run was scored on an errant throw by Molinari from center field.

Busa made a quick exit from the game, as Balschmiter replaced the senior in the circle with no outs in the second.

The pitching change did not stop the bleeding, however, as the Bonnies would score two more in the inning. The first came on an error by Mollica at third. Then a fielder's choice to get a force-out at second allowed another run to score. Balschmiter struck out Lauren Krieger before any more runs were scored, but the damage had been done, and UMass trailed 5-0 after two innings.

The Minutewomen got one back in the third when Holness, pinch-running for Amanda Acampora after a single, advanced to second on a sacrifice bunt by Lesley Ferrara. She reached third on a wild pitch, and scored on another.

UMass got two more in the third when Acampora hit a bases-loaded, two-run single, scoring Mollica and Cullington. The hit cut the deficit to 5-3, but that would be all the offense the Minutewomen could muster.

The Maroon and White got just one more hit in the next four innings before falling to the Bonnies 5-3. Balschmiter faced 19 batters in relief and struck out four while walking none. Busa finished with one strike out and two walks. She gave up five runs, though only two of them were earned.

There are three times fighting for the final two spots in the tournament. Fordham (33-21, 11-5 A-10) finished their A-10 schedule yesterday as well against George Washington. A sweep would have clinched the third seed for the Rams.

St. Bonaventure and Temple (22-23, 12-6 A-10) are currently tied for the fourth and final spot in the postseason and both teams have completed their conference schedules. If Fordham drops two to George Washington, both Temple and St. Bonaventure will advance, but if the Rams split the series with the Colonials, all three squads will be tied at 12-6, and the final two spots will be decided by tie-breakers as well.

Senior Lesley Ferrara played in her final home game yesterday, an 11-3 win over UConn. UMass will be the No. 2 seed in the A-10 Tourney.

Loss ends season in first round

more than us," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said. "They're obviously a great team, with the Rookie of the Year [Mandy Friend] and Offensive Player of the Year [Caroline McGuire] on attack. They're tough to stop, we did real good job Defensively I felt we played a really great game."

The sense of urgency no doubt fell upon the Minutewomen following the free position goal, which might explain an unheard-of six yellow cards in the second half alone. Bolduc said the officiating was at times "a little sketchy," but was careful not to place blame on them for the outcome.

"I hate to blame anything on officials and never will," she said. "Some of them were deserving, some of them were called a little tight, but it's over and done with. You can't dwell on that."

UMass also registered 18 fouls, including the six yellow cards, to Richmond's 12. While that's still a far cry from numbers put up earlier this year, it allowed for continuation of some Spider possessions.

McGuire scored the next two goals, an unassisted shot at the 10-minute mark and a free position shot with six minutes to go, before Jenna Hubbard scored on an Allison Nuzzi pass to give Richmond three more goals and close out the game with the 10-5 score.

Friend scored her first of two goals off a pass from Nuzzi to go up 5-1 with nine minutes left in the first half. At a time when some youth-laden teams need a bit of inspiration, Bolduc kept it simple.

"Nothing really like that," Bolduc said when asked if something special was said to them. "The girls were very well-prepared for the game. We knew what to expect from them defensively and on attack, and on our attack we knew what was necessary to score goals. The only thing I told them was to anticipate a few seconds earlier to get chances going early."

The Minutewomen then went on a 4-1 run on two goals from Jeanette Villapiano and one goal apiece from Meghan Reddy and Typadis to close the gap to one.

Finale brings out emotions

Cannella and his players have a very close relationship, and the Minutemen could certainly tell from Cannella's reaction how much the gesture meant to him.

"He was really emotional," senior captain Sean Morris said. "It's all about coach — he's our program. He's our leader."

Cannella wasn't the only one to get emotional before the game, as the seniors were also moved by the notion of playing their last game at Garber.

"I was trying to take in a little bit of everything so I could remember it down the road," Reid said. "It was just a special day, and knowing that it was probably my last one on Garber I just wanted to remember it and enjoy it. I took some time all day long to think about the whole journey that we've been on."

The journey that Reid and his classmates have made has been a highly successful one. The class of 2006 has made two appearances in the NCAA Quarterfinals, and has put itself in position to receive an at-large bid to this year's tournament. (The selection show took place last night after the Collegian went to press).

The win on Saturday was the group's 43rd in their four years at UMass, a number that means a lot to the program. The Minutemen wear the No. 43 on their helmets in honor of Eric Sopracasa, a former player who died on May 5, 1999 after being struck in the chest by a ball during practice.

For the seniors to win their 43rd game almost seven years to the day of Sopracasa's death added meaning to the day for Cannella.

"We talked about them having 42 wins going into this one and 43 was a big one for these guys, with the timing of the game with Eric and the number we wear on our helmets," he said.

With all of the emotions tied into the day, there was still the matter of playing lacrosse and, as was the case with the rest of the day, things went perfect for the Minutemen. They dominated from the outset and cruised to a 10-5 win.

Reid couldn't have imagined a better script for his final game at Garber.

"This was the perfect ending," he said. "It was sunny, there was a great crowd, it was a fantastic environment. It's one of those experiences you'll remember for the rest of your life."

UMass coach Greg Cannella received a plaque from his players prior to Saturday's game with Rutgers.

Minutewomen look to next year

The youth-laden UMass ladies lost every single one of those games, were sitting at 3-7 heading into A-10 play, and lost their first two conference games to two more talented teams (No. 11 Richmond, St. Bonaventure), but something finally caught on. They fought close with most of these teams before bowing out late, which meant everything when it came down to the wire.

Couple the big-game experience with how much they've jelled as a team and fed off of each other, and you have a game. The fun team won. The momentum from that comeback victory bowled over into the final regular-season game two days later, where they handled George Washington in another one-goal nail-biter.

Why need all this be mentioned?

Because it's the beginning of good things to come. Very good things.

After losing to Richmond in the first round of the A-10 Tournament on Friday, ending a UMass run in which they had won four of five heading in, UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said that she plans on booking another schedule loaded with top-notch programs. Having experienced such a tough schedule for such a young team, expect a few upsets.

And while senior Kerri Connerty will be missed sorely on the attack — she concludes her tenure at UM with 131 career points, eighth-best all-time — she will be made up for without problem. The Minutewomen return nine starters, including sophomore Kathleen Typadis and freshman Kayt McCormick — who together accounted for more than a third of the scoring.

"It's remarkable how much potential there is on this team. It's awesome," Bolduc said. "I think the girls really recognize that — you saw how well we finished the season — they really know what they're capable of."

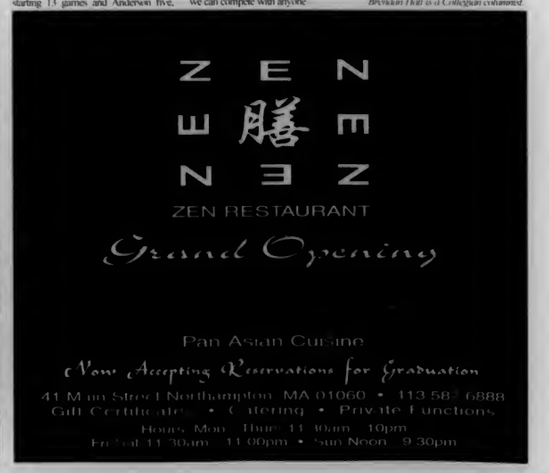
In fact, the only problem heading into next year might be who will be starting in goal. Junior Lauren McCarthy and sophomore Krissy Anderson shared time between the pipes, with McCarthy starting 13 games and Anderson five, and always came in to bail the other out when they were struggling. Freshman Jamie Whiteway, an All-American while at Billerica High, didn't see a minute of action this year and will retain a year of eligibility. The fall exhibition season might help shape the decision of who to start.

A return to .500 form is a safe bet, but one thing is clear: Bolduc is exuberant about these ladies.

"I love working with these girls," she said. "They really believe in the program. They're great athletes, great competitors, totally believe in women's lacrosse. We really can beat anyone now; we know we can compete with anyone."

Sophomore attacker Kathleen Typadis is one of nine starting players who will be returning next season for the Minutewomen.

Player profiles in several game programs throughout the season have a player saying they would like to play a team like Northwestern, who is currently ranked No. 1, to see what they can do against a top-ranked team.



You say, it's all coach-speak, but don't think for a second that the thought hasn't seriously crossed their minds.

One thing is for certain: come 2007, the Minutewomen will be fully stocked, foaming at the mouth and rearing to go. And whoever it is they're going against — name the time and place — they're going to jump on it, jump on it, jump on it.

Seniors lead Minutemen to victory in their final game at Garber Field

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

(Eds. Note: Collegian press time on Sunday was before the NCAA Men's Lacrosse Tournament selection announcement. Be sure to check tomorrow's Collegian for full coverage of the future of the 2006 UMass men's lacrosse team.)

Everything went according to plan.

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (10-4, 5-2 ECAC) wanted to send its seniors out on the right note, impress the NCAA Tournament selection committee and — which would take care of both accounts — dispose of Rutgers in front of a season-high 2,938 fans at Garber Field on Saturday.

The Minutemen knocked off the Scarlet Knights (5-9, 2-5 ECAC) by a 10-5 score in their regular season finale and put themselves in as good of a position to earn a spot in the 16-team playoff field as they could have possibly hoped for.

Senior attackman Sean Morris led the way with three goals and an assist on the final day he'll ever play at Garber Field.

"I'll always remember this day," Morris said. "It was real emotional. Guys had tears in their eyes. I had tears in my eyes before the game. It was a really emotional game. We really wanted to get this 43rd victory for our team."

Junior midfielder Andrew Recchione crashed the senior party with his first career hat trick, scoring all three of his goals in a stretch of just 16:05 in the second half.

"[Saturday] was huge," Recchione said. "We win or we're out. This was a playoff game for us. We didn't want to end our season tonight."

Recchione wanted to make sure the six seniors — Morris, Jack Reid, Jake Deane, Clay Stabert, Jamie Yaman and Dane Collins — were sent out on the right note.

"Those guys are my brothers," he said. "We came out here for them today. We wanted to get one more win for those guys. We wanted one more week with them."

Morris' second goal was one of the nicer ones of the lacrosse season. Brian Jacovina, who has fast become the best passer on the team, hit Morris as he was cutting towards the net. Morris caught the ball left-handed, wrapped it around his head and pinged the bottom-right corner of the cage to give the Minutemen a 4-0 lead at the 3:34 mark of the first quarter. It was his second goal in just 30 seconds.

"I came off the pick and really didn't have much of an angle. I just wanted to slide it in the bottom corner. It was kind of fun," Morris said of his SportsCenter-worthy cameo.

That goal helped UMass jump out to a quick 5-0 lead in the first quarter, a giant advantage against a goalie like Greg Havalchak, who settled down and made 21 saves to keep the Scarlet Knights within striking distance throughout most of the game.

"We were able to get out to a good lead, scoring five goals in the first quarter, which was really important for the confidence of our offense," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "We kind of cruised from there. It got a little bit harder to score, but we felt like we were in control of the game the whole day."

Havalchak's counterpart, UMass freshman Doc Schneider, only had to make seven saves on the afternoon, but all seven were of the jaw-dropping variety.

Senior captain Jake Deane and the Minutemen beat Rutgers 10-5 in the regular season finale on Saturday. Deane was dominant on face-offs, winning 14-of-18 draws.

Emotional day for UM

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Despite his best efforts, Greg Cannella couldn't hide his emotions while he watched the six seniors on the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team being honored prior to Saturday's regular season finale against Rutgers.

Cannella, the coach of the Minutemen, tried to conceal the tears that were welling in his eyes as he watched one of the most successful classes ever at UMass take Garber Field for the final time.

And Cannella may have been able to get away with it — as all of the attention was focused on the players and their parents and not him — but when the players turned the tables and paid tribute to their coach with a plaque commemorating his 100th win earlier this year, Cannella couldn't help being overcome with emotion.

"I was pretty emotional watching the seniors with their parents," Cannella said. "[The plaque] threw a monkey wrench in it and I kind of had to smile; I couldn't hide my eyes anymore. I was very emotional with those guys stepping out there with their parents in the beginning of the game in their last game on Garber Field, and then that hit me right in the face. I was really surprised. It was great; it was a very classy thing by those guys."

Senior captain Jack Reid said that the seniors had been planning on giving Cannella the plaque since he captured his 100th win on March 11 against Harvard. The biggest challenge for Reid and the seniors was preventing Cannella from finding out about their plan, because they knew that Cannella would shun any individual attention.

"We had to keep it under the radar from him, because he never would have allowed it," Reid said. "They were recognizing the seniors, and we thought it was a good time to recognize Coach for getting to a milestone this early in his career and just the wonderful job he's done with all of us."

UMass falls to Bonnies

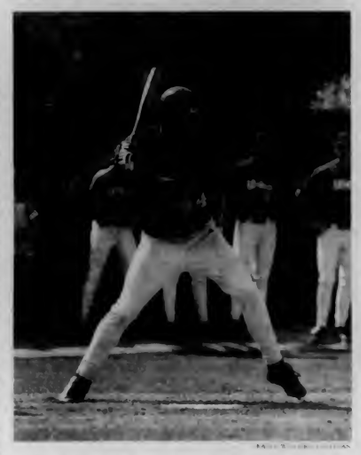
By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team dropped the first two games of a three-game series against St. Bonaventure (22-16, 14-5 Atlantic 10) this weekend at Earl Lorden Field. The Minutemen (10-25, 8-12 A-10) lost 7-3 on Friday afternoon and 10-2 on Saturday. UMass was on a four-game losing skid going into yesterday's game, and is 1-7 in its last eight.

It was a weekend of missed opportunities for UMass, while St. Bonaventure thrived on its solid pitching from its starters. The Minutemen got on the board first on Friday when center fielder Derrick Durepo hit a two-run home run in the bottom of the fifth inning to give the Minutemen a 2-0 lead. St. Bonaventure then answered with three runs of its own in the top of the sixth. The Bonnies would add four more insurance runs in the eighth and ninth innings to seal the deal on their 7-3 victory.

St. Bonaventure starting pitcher John Zimnicker had quite a day for the Bonnies. Zimnicker picked up his fifth win of the season while allowing only one earned run on seven hits in seven innings of work.

Durepo's home run in the fifth got UMass's bats going. Following the round-tripper, third baseman Ryan Finnicek singled, and advanced to third after second baseman Adam Tempesta doubled to left-center. Junior Bryan Adamski was walked to load the bases, but Zimnicker was able to get out of the jam and keep UMass's lead at 2-0.



The Bonnies responded in the top of the sixth inning with three runs of their own to take a 3-2 lead, from which they never looked back. The Minutemen had the bases loaded once again in the bottom of the eighth, but failed to produce any runs. St. Bonaventure scored four more runs in the eighth and ninth innings to come away with the 7-3 win.

Saturday brought about the same result for the Minutemen, as they lost their second consecutive game to the Bonnies, this time by a score of 10-2. Once again, St. Bonaventure pitching was solid, with Cody Vincent throwing a complete game. Vincent picked up his fifth win of the year, and let up only two earned runs on 12 hits.

St. Bonaventure took control of the game when left fielder Joe Rizzo crushed a three-run home run to deep right field in the top of the third inning to give his team a 3-1 lead. Rizzo went 2-for-5 on the day with four RBIs.

UMass starting pitcher Chris Lloyd kept the game close, but his bullpen could not do the same. Lloyd allowed four earned runs on only five hits in seven innings of work. The junior pitched well enough to keep his team in the game, but the Minutemen offense gave him little help, leaving 12 runners on base in the loss.

The Bonnies' offense feasted on Minutemen relief pitching in the eighth inning. Three different pitchers allowed six runs on five hits to give St. Bonaventure a commanding 10-2 lead, and the win.

Junior first baseman Bryan Adamski and UMass lost twice to St. Bonaventure this weekend before winning the series finale yesterday.

Minutewomen fall in first round

By Brendan Hall

Friday afternoon, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team closed out the 2006 season as it has been known to close out tight games at times this year: not enough to get over the hump.

After falling behind 5-1 to the No. 11 and top-seeded Richmond Spiders (15-3, 6-1 Atlantic 10) midway through the first half in last weekend's A-10 Tournament in Washington, D.C., the fourth-seeded Minutewomen (7-11, 4-3 A-10) dug deep, caught a second wind and made a game out of it.

A platoon of underclassmen cut the deficit to one, but as was the case for most of the season, there was simply too much firepower to overcome. The Minutewomen lost, 10-5, to end their '06 campaign.

Richmond played Temple yesterday afternoon in the A-10 finals.

After a groundball was picked up by midfielder Sam Sepulveda and a subsequent successful UMass clear attempt, Kathleen Typadis took a feed from Kerri Connerty and found the back of the net for her second goal of the game. The goal cut Richmond's lead to 6-5 with 17:33 to go in the game —ample time for a flourishing overtake of the lead — but the Spiders' defense put its shoulder to the wheel and did not allow another UMass score for the remainder of the game.

Senior attacker Lindsay Cassell's career ended with a 10-5 loss to Richmond in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament on Friday.

Meanwhile, the Spiders' attack got busy busting out substantial proof for its recent Rookie of the Year and Offensive Player of the Year accolades. At the fifteen-minute mark, officials issued a yellow card to Sepulveda, yielding a Richmond free position shot. Mandy Friend (two goals) proceeded to capitalize, whipping it by UMass goalie Lauren McCarthy for the free position goal and a 7-5 score.

Richmond held a 33-18 advantage in shots, including 13-5 in the second half.

"They had the ball on attack

Bright future for Bolduc's squad

Every now and then there comes a team that is encouraging in play before play even begins.

Bear with me.

April 28 was supposed to be the day to end all days for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team. With their backs against the wall and one more loss equaling certain doom, the Minutewomen's 4 p.m. home matchup with Duquesne had all the importance of, for all intents and purposes, a fourth-quarter Super Bowl drive. A save opportunity in Game 7. An inbound pass with less than 10 seconds to go in the playoffs.

The Dukes, based on superb defense, were the favorites to spike the punch on a day that was celebrating the final home game of four seniors. With an Atlantic 10-loss eight goals allowed per game to solidify their winning records both in and out of conference play, it was their game to lose as much as the Minutewomen.

Whoever won was in. Whoever lost was out.

It was as if the game was being played in an oven.

An announcement on the loudspeaker at a men's lacrosse game a few days prior even described this game using words such as "pivotal" and "monumental."

Yet here were the Minutewomen on the sidelines, doing something just about unthinkable for a team with 17 underclassmen to be doing — dancing.

A fast-paced funk beat blared over the loudspeakers, prompting a handful of players to straddle their sticks and gyrate their hips, imitating the moves of a cowboy.

The Dukes stood. And stood. And stood.

The beat played on. The singer sang on. The ladies danced on.

"Jump on it, jump on it, jump on it, jump on it ..."

It was like Bugs Bunny kissing Elmer Fudd, or the T.C. Williams Titans singing in unison during warm-ups. The Minutewomen approached this, the most important game of the year, with a free-spirited attitude like they've been here a million times.

And they jumped on it, jumped on it, jumped on it, pulling off an amazing 11-10 overtime win after being down four goals with 10 minutes to go in regulation.

But after the grueling non-conference schedule the Minutewomen have endured this year, any moment is a moment to let loose and break out into a dance. They played four teams that were ranked at the time (Boston University, Dartmouth, Syracuse, Boston College), and a fifth one, Hofstra, is currently ranked No. 17 in the latest polls.

Anyone, anywhere, anytime. Sound familiar?

UM fails to lock up top seed

By Jeremy Rice

The Massachusetts softball team (33-14, 17-3 Atlantic 10) missed its chance to lock up the top seed in the Atlantic 10 Tournament on Friday, when the Minutewomen split their final A-10 series with St. Bonaventure (20-20, 12-6 A-10). After running away with the first game, 12-0 in five innings, UMass couldn't keep the Bonnies at bay, losing 5-3 in Game 2.

The loss put the Maroon and White in a virtual tie with Charlotte (40-11, 15-3 A-10) for the top spot in the conference. Charlotte finished their conference schedule yesterday with a doubleheader against Saint Joseph's. If the 49ers sweep the Hawks, the regular season title will be decided by tie-breakers, but if they lose one game, the Minutewomen will clinch the top spot.

UMass started off strong against the Bonnies in the first game. First baseman Amanda Morin sparked the offense with a two-out base-clearing triple that gave the Minutewomen the 3-0 lead.

Then in the third, the Bonnies began to beat themselves. A pair of errors put Whitney Mollica and KJ Kelley on base with no outs. A passed ball then allowed Mollica to score and Michea Holness, pinch-running for Kelley, advanced to third. Lauren Proctor then took advantage of the Bonnies' miscues with a sacrifice fly that scored Holness, giving UMass the 5-0 advantage.

After another run scored in the fourth, the Maroon and White put the game out of reach with six runs in the top of the

UMass sees return of Judicial Advisors

By Donald Rando
Collegian Correspondent

The Judicial Advisors Program — missing from the University of Massachusetts for a year-and-a-half — was brought back this semester to help students facing University discipline charges.

The Judicial Advisors Program was created by the Student Government Association and the Dean of Students Office to "help undergraduate students navigate the judicial process by giving information, advice, and support to students charged with a violation of the Code of Student Conduct," said Sarah Stern-O'Connor, the Deputy Attorney General of the SGA and Judicial Advisor.

When students are written up, they are sent a "Notice of Charge" letter from either their Residence Director or from the Dean of Students Office. They will now also receive a letter from the program telling them to come to their office to get free advice and information about the charge and possible sanctions.

Since its re-inception midway through the spring semester, the program office has advised students about an array of charges, including alcohol and drug violations, noise policy, refusal to identify oneself, physical assault, endangering behavior, and theft. Students also have the option of having a Judicial Advisor accompany them to conferences and hearings with University officials. Although the advisor cannot address the Hearing Board, Procedural Advisor, or witnesses directly, they may whisper or pass notes to advisees.

"The entire program is student run. We work in conjunction with the Dean of Students Office as well as Student Legal Services, but the office is staffed by Judicial Advisors, who are all undergraduate students," said Stern-O'Connor.

The students, Stern-O'Connor added, are all well prepared for their positions as advisors; all Judicial Advisors are trained by the Legal Services Office and the Dean of Students Office before assuming their roles in the office.

The major goal of the program right now, said Stern-O'Connor, is to get word of its existence out to the UMass population. There are, on average, 4,000 charges of breaking the Code of Student Conduct each year, yet Stern-O'Connor estimates that only about 25 to 30 students came in for advice since the program's re-initiation this semester.

The program currently has five advisors and two will be returning in the fall semester. They are now actively recruiting for more advisors from the UMass undergraduate population.

"We seek any student who expresses interest in helping fellow undergraduates

Authorities say fatal fire set to cover murders

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Two people whose bodies were discovered following a fire last week at a city-run elderly housing complex died of stab wounds, not the fire, authorities said Monday.

The bodies of Edelmira Miranda, 67, and Milagros Rosario, 69, were found Friday morning after a fire gutted their apartment at the Carpe Diem Homes complex.

Hampden District Attorney William Bennett said autopsies determined that both died of stab wounds, and authorities believe the fire was set after the two were killed.

"The fire had nothing to do with their deaths," Bennett said at a news conference.

Bennett said authorities are investigating a possible connection between the killings and the robbery of a supermarket that occurred about an hour before the fire. The complex is located about a quarter mile from the Big Y supermarket that was robbed at about 8 a.m. Friday.

A man who police said was seen running from the store was arrested Saturday. Brian Cavitt, 23, of Springfield, was charged with armed robbery while masked, assault by means of a dangerous weapon, and carjacking, for allegedly attempting to steal a car after the robbery.

Moussaoui asks for withdrawl of his guilty plea

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP) — Convicted Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui says he lied on the witness stand about being involved in the plot and wants to withdraw his guilty plea because he now believes he can get a fair trial.

In a motion filed Friday but released Monday, Moussaoui said he testified March 27 he was supposed to hijack a fifth plane on Sept. 11, 2001, and fly it into the White House "even though I knew that was a complete fabrication."

A federal court jury spared the 37-year-old Frenchman the death penalty last Wednesday. On Thursday, U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema gave him six life sentences, to run as two consecutive life terms, in the federal supermax prison at Florence, Colo.

At sentencing, she told Moussaoui: "You do not have a right to appeal your convictions, as was explained to you when you plead guilty" in April 2005. "You waived that right."

She said he could appeal his sentence but added, "I believe it would be an act of futility."

Moussaoui's court-appointed lawyers told the court they filed the motion even though a federal rule "prohibits a defendant from withdrawing a guilty plea after imposition of sentence." They did so anyway because of their "problematic relationship with Moussaoui" and the fact that new lawyers have yet to be appointed to replace them.

Bush chooses Air Force general as new CIA chief

By Katherine Shrader
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush's nomination of Gen. Michael Hayden as CIA chief ignited a confirmation fight Monday over the intelligence veteran's ties to the controversial eavesdropping program and his ability to be independent from the military establishment.

With Hayden at his side, Bush urged senators to promptly approve the former National Security Agency head, who one year ago was confirmed unanimously to be the nation's first deputy director of national intelligence.

"Mike Hayden is supremely qualified for this position," Bush said in the Oval Office. "He knows the intelligence community from the ground up."

CIA Director Porter Goss announced his resignation last week after tussling with Hayden and his boss, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte, about the agency's autonomy and direction.

Even before Hayden's nomination became official, Republican as well as Democratic lawmakers had begun questioning whether he was the right choice to head the spy agency.

Hayden is credited with designing the NSA's warrantless surveillance program. Disclosure of the program late last year sparked an intense civil-liberties debate over whether the president can order the monitoring of international calls and e-mails in the U.S. without court warrants.

California Rep. Jane Harman, the House Intelligence Committee's top Democrat, joined colleagues in saying Hayden had become part the "White House spin machine" though intelligence professionals typically eschew partisan politics.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has said that he would use a Hayden nomination to raise questions about the legality of the eavesdropping program, and he has not ruled out holding up the nomination in the meantime.

It will fall to Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., to keep order on the panel as it considers Hayden's confirmation. But even Roberts has acknowledged there is concern about someone from the military heading the CIA. Several Republicans, including House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., have called Hayden's military background troublesome in this case.

Hayden, 61, would be the seventh military officer to head the CIA since 1946. But his nomination comes at a time when lawmakers are particularly concerned about the influence of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

With Hayden's installation, active duty or retired military officers would run all the major spy agencies as well as the intelligence hub, the National Counterterrorism Center.

Air Force General Michael Hayden was nominated by President Bush to be the new head of the CIA after former CIA Director Porter Goss resigned last week.

Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who is chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said Hayden has been candid even when his judgments differed from Rumsfeld. Still, she called on Hayden to consider retiring from the Air Force after more than 35 years "to send a signal of independence from the Pentagon."

Seeking to ease concerns about military leadership at the CIA, Negroponte said a retired veteran of the agency's clandestine service, Steve Kappes, is a leading contender to replace the CIA's current deputy director, Vice Adm. Albert Calland III.

Kappes left the CIA in 2004, after conflicts with Goss' top aides, nicknamed "the Goss-ings" by detractors.

Many of those top aides were expected to soon leave the first to go: Executive Director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, who is retiring, an intelligence official said Monday.

The FBI is investigating whether Foggo's friend, defense contractor Brent Wilkes, provided prostitutes and hotel suites to a California congressman jailed for taking bribes in exchange for government contracts. Foggo is also under federal investigation in connection with the award of CIA contracts, according to a federal law-enforcement official who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the probe is under way.

Hayden's associates expect him to try to smooth feelings within the troubled CIA, which has experienced an exodus of veterans in the past 18 months and has struggled since it lost its top spot among all other spy agencies in mid-recent intelligence changes.

Healey seeks establishment of sex crime court

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

BOSTON — Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey wants Massachusetts to establish separate courts to handle sex crime cases in an effort to improve how victims are treated and sex offenders are monitored and to drive down the number of new crimes committed by known offenders.

Healey, who has served in the Romney administration as the point-person on criminal justice issues, made the announcement Monday outside the Boston Municipal Court, which has implemented a pilot program to train and educate judges and other court officials who deal with sex crimes.

The lieutenant governor was joined by Andrea Casanova, whose daughter, Alexandra Zapp, was killed by a convicted sex offender at a highway rest stop in July 2002.

"We need to have a court that understands the plight of the victim, that understands how to deal with sex offenders and disposes of these cases appropriately," Healey said.

Nearly 340,000 Massachusetts women report having been raped at least once during their lifetime, but only a small percentage of sexual assaults ever end up in trial and conviction, Healey said.

She said dedicated courts, modeled after specialty courts that deal with drug and domestic violence cases, would result in more appropriate sentences for offenders. They also would enhance judicial monitoring of sexual predators and would help protect victims because court officers and judges are better informed about the complexities of these types of cases, Healey said.

"Having dedicated personnel who are familiar with a particular case maintains the offender's visibility and history," Casanova said.

Casanova, who created a charitable foundation after her daughter's death that advocates for specialty courts and other measures to prevent sex crimes, said a sex offender court would not be an alternative to incarceration.

Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey has called for the creation of a separate court to handle cases of sexual crimes.

Study finds drop in newspaper circulation

By Seth Sutel
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Daily circulation fell 2.5 percent at U.S. newspapers in the six-month period ending in March, according to data released Monday, reflecting the industry's ongoing struggle to retain paying customers amid competition from the Internet and other media outlets.

The Newspaper Association of America, analyzing data from the Audit Bureau of Circulations, also reported that Sunday circulation fell 3.1 percent at the 610 newspapers reporting those figures. The 2.5 percent decline in average paid weekday circulation was based on data from 770 newspapers reporting to the Audit Bureau.

The overall decline in both weekday and Sunday circulation were approximately the same as those given in the previous six-month reporting cycle for the period ending last September.

Newspaper circulation has been in general decline for years as many people, particularly young adults, turn to other media outlets including cable TV and the Internet for news and information. Also, tougher rules on telemarketing have forced newspapers to find other ways to attract new readers.

Despite the decline in paid copies, newspapers are seeing a greater number of visitors to their Web sites. The NAA also reported Monday that newspaper-run sites had an overall 8 percent increase in viewers in the first quarter.

The data from Nielsen NetRatings found that newspaper Web sites averaged 56 million users in the period, or 37 percent of all online users in the period, the NAA said.

Revenue from online advertising is growing quickly — about 25 percent to 30 percent a year — but still makes up a relatively small portion of newspapers' overall advertising revenue at about 5 percent, John Kimball, the chief marketing officer of the NAA, told reporters on a conference call.

On the whole, most newspapers are showing declining circulation. John Murray, the NAA's vice president of circulation marketing, said on the call that just one in four newspapers showed increases in weekday circulation in the latest reporting period, while one in five had gains on Sunday.

The largest newspapers held up relatively well, with Gannett Co.'s USA Today notching a 0.09 percent gain to 2,272,815 copies, remaining the top-selling newspaper in the country. The Wall Street Journal, published by Dow Jones & Co., was second with 2,049,786, down 1 percent, and The New York Times was third, with an increase of 0.5 percent to 1,142,464 copies.

Several other major papers reported declines, with the largest by far coming at the San Francisco Chronicle, where average paid weekday circulation fell 15.6 percent to 398,246.

Patricia Hoyt, a spokeswoman for the Chronicle, said the newspaper began cutting back on certain kinds of circulation at the beginning of last year such as copies paid for by advertisers and then distributed for free. The cutbacks involve copies that "advertisers didn't value, were quite costly and essentially had no impact on our readership."

The Chronicle, which is owned by Hearst Corp., reported a similar decline in paid circulation for the previous six-month reporting period that ended last September.

Several other top newspapers reported declines, including Tribune Co.'s Los Angeles Times, down 5.4 percent at 851,832; The Washington Post, down 3.7 percent at 724,242; the New York Daily News, also down 3.7 percent at 708,477. News Corp.'s New York Post slipped 0.7 percent to 673,379.

Among other large papers, The Boston Globe fell 8.5 percent to 397,288, and The Atlanta Journal-Constitution fell down 6.7 percent to 365,011. The Globe is owned by The New York Times Co. and the Journal-Constitution by Cox Enterprises Inc.

Besides USA Today, a handful of other major newspapers also reported modest circulation gains: Tribune's Chicago Tribune, up 0.9 percent at 579,079; and The Star-Ledger of Newark, N.J., up 0.9 percent at 398,329. The Star-Ledger is owned by Advance Publications Inc.

Bush urges peace agreement and increased aid for Darfur

Women carry wood to their homes at a refugee camp in Chad for people from the Darfur region of Sudan. Hundreds of refugees arrive each week, trying to escape the violence on the Chad-Sudan border.

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush called on Monday for the United Nations to take over peacekeeping in the Darfur region of Sudan and promised to expedite food aid. He welcomed a proposed peace accord as "the beginnings of hope" for Darfur's poverty-stricken population.

Bush said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would go to the United Nations on Tuesday to press for a new U.N. resolution increasing peacekeepers.

"Darfur has a chance to begin anew," Bush said.

He also urged Congress to act on a request for $225 million in emergency food aid for Darfur, and said he was ordering the emergency purchase of 40,000 metric tons of food and was dispatching five ships to carry food to the region.

Bush telephoned Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir seeking his support for a large U.N. peacekeeping force, but he did not get a firm commitment, Cindy L. Courville, his special adviser on Darfur, said in a telephone interview with reporters.

The aim is to nearly double the 7,200 African Union peacekeeping force on the ground in Darfur and put the expanded force under U.N. control.

In New York, John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the Security Council would meet Tuesday on Darfur. Bolton said the United States was circulating a proposed resolution that would extend the U.N. peacekeeping in southern Sudan to the Western Darfur region.

That 10,000-strong force is monitoring a January 2005 peace accord that ended a 21-year civil war between the Sudanese government and southern rebels that cost millions of lives.

"America will not turn away from this tragedy," Bush said, standing alongside Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, just back from Darfur where he played a role in arranging a Darfur cease-fire. Bush invited other countries to also do more to help relief famine in Darfur.

The president sought to build momentum for a peace agreement reached by Sudanese authorities and Darfur's main rebel group. The deal could help end a conflict that has killed about 200,000 people in three years and displaced some 2 million.

He praised the agreement as "a step toward peace."

"We're still far away from our ultimate goal, which is the return of millions of displaced people to their homes so they can have a life without fear," Bush added. "But we can now see a way forward."

The agreement signed Friday was between the government and the main rebel group, the Sudan Liberation Army. Two smaller rebel groups refused to sign.

On Saturday, the president called Olusegun Obasanjo, the Nigerian president who hosted talks on Darfur, and Denis Sassou-Nguesso, the president of the Republic of Congo and head of the 53-nation African Union.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan wants Sudan to grant visas to a U.N. assessment team so it can visit Darfur and start planning for a peacekeeping force to take over from the African Union troops. Sudan has refused to allow the team to visit.

"An African Union force of about 7,200 from the region has done all it can to keep order. But they're patrolling an area nearly the size of Texas and they have reached the limits of their capabilities," Bush said.

He said the United States accounts for more than 85 percent of the food distributed in Sudan by a world food program. "But the situation remains dire," Bush said.

"The government of Sudan must allow all U.N. agencies to do their work without hindrance. They should remove the visa and travel restrictions that complicate relief efforts. And all sides must cease attacks on relief workers," the president said.

Web site posts top job for graduating college seniors

By Tony Sapochetti
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

NORMAL, Ill. — Accounting, teaching and consulting are a few of the jobs featured on careerbuilder.com's list for the top nine jobs for graduating seniors.

The jobs were selected based on the demand for that job, annual salary and rate of promotion. Many business-related jobs are featured, but education and engineering were also selected as jobs that would greatly benefit graduating students.

The list, ranked in descending order includes private accounting, entry-level management trainee, sales, design or construction engineering, financial and treasury analysis, public accounting, project engineering, teaching and consulting.

The article said the job market plans on hiring 14.5 percent more college graduates than last year, so students may also be getting higher salaries.

Gerald McKean, Illinois State University College of Business accounting department chair, said it is no surprise that two types of accounting are featured on the list, and said accounting has recently been featured on several different types of "best job" lists.

"The Bureau of Labor and cnnmoney.com in February listed the top five jobs and accounting was in that list," McKean said. "We are expecting above average growth in the field."

McKean said the demand for an accountant is especially high right now and said there are several jobs available because of the recent scandals with Enron and World-Com.

These events have sparked the implementation of new requirements in the field of accounting.

Since there are two types of accounting, McKean said there may be differences in why private accounting is number one while public accounting is lower on the list. He also explained why these jobs are considered good for recent graduates.

"Public accounting is a firm that sells its services to other companies while private accounting is if you work for a specific company," McKean said. "Either way, its very lucrative financially, has top paying jobs for recent graduates and there is plenty of room for advancement."

McKean said ISU is also well known for its accounting students, as they are nationally sought and have a high pass rate.

Josh Stevens, a senior accounting major, said it is interesting to see how careerbuilder.com rated the different accounting jobs.

"I was surprised that public accounting is not higher than private," Stevens said.

"Private accounting may have more opportunities for a graduate to experience a wide scope of employment."

Though a majority of jobs listed were in the business field, other jobs such as teaching and counseling were also put on the list because of the opportunities for advancement they provide.

Letter from Iran suggests 'new solutions'

By Nasser Karimi
Associated Press

TEHRAN — Iran's president wrote to President Bush proposing "new solutions" to rising international tensions, a move announced Monday in an abrupt about-face apparently timed to blunt the possibility of eventual sanctions over Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has spent months vilifying Washington and its allies as bullies trying to wrongly deny the Iranians the right to enrich uranium to fuel civilian nuclear reactors. The U.S. and Western allies are concerned the program is a cover for making nuclear weapons.

The U.S. is pushing for a U.N. Security Council vote this week on a resolution that could eventually lead to punishing sanctions against the Islamic regime.

The Ahmadinejad letter was the first from an Iranian head of state to an American president in 27 years and may signal a demand that Tehran be treated as an equal in finding a way out of the prolonged dispute over its nuclear program.

The Bush administration said it had no knowledge of the letter and reiterated its demand that Iran suspend its nuclear activities.

The Iranian government spokesman who disclosed the communication did not mention the nuclear standoff and said the missive spoke to the larger U.S.-Iranian conflict — which dates to the 1979 hostage crisis. The linchpin to any better understanding between Washington and Tehran, however, would be movement toward a solution on the nuclear issue.

The United States has publicly sought renewed contact with Iran, saying its ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, had been authorized to speak to Iranian officials about security in Iraq. The talks, which U.S. officials in Iraq say have not yet taken place, were to be limited to Iraqi issues but also would provide an opportunity to broaden discussions about the U.S.-Iranian relationship.

In Turkey, Iran's top nuclear negotiator said the letter "could lead to a new diplomatic opening" but also warned it contained no softening in Iran's position.

Ali Larijani refused to give details of the letter's content, but said, "Perhaps, it could lead to a new diplomatic opening. It needs to be given some time."

"There is a need to wait before disclosing the content of the letter, let it make its diplomatic way," Larijani said in an interview with Turkey's NTV television.

He said Tehran wants a peaceful solution to growing tensions with the United States, and was in neighboring Turkey, a key U.S. ally in the region, as part of efforts to rally support for Iran's nuclear program ahead of possible Security Council action.

Larijani warned against any U.S. attack on Iran.

"If they have a little bit of a brain, they would not commit such a mistake," he said. "Iran is not Iraq. Iraq was a weak country, it did not have a legitimate government. Iran is a powerful country."

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki delivered the Ahmadinejad letter to the Swiss ambassador on Monday, ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi told The Associated Press. The Swiss Embassy in Tehran houses a U.S. interests section.

In the letter, Ahmadinejad proposes "new solutions for getting out of international problems and the current fragile situation of the world," spokesman Gholam-Hossein Elham told a news conference.

Elham declined to reveal more, stressing "it is not an open letter." Asked whether the letter could lead to direct U.S.-Iranian negotiations, he replied: "For the time being, it's just a letter."

Bush's National Security Adviser, Stephen Hadley, said Monday that he was not aware of any such letter, and he reiterated the administration's position on Iran's nuclear program.

"The international community has been very clear to Iran what it needs to do," Hadley said on NBC's "Today" show. "It needs to return to the suspension of its nuclear activities in order to open the door for a diplomatic resolution."

Ahead of a visit by Ahmadinejad, Indonesia said Monday that it supported Iran's right to pursue peaceful nuclear technology.

Asked about Iran's nuclear program, Foreign Minister Hassan Wirajuda said: "Our position is that we support nuclear development for peaceful purposes, specially energy, but we consistently object to nuclear weapons proliferation."

Bush said Friday he was paying close attention to threats made against Israel by Ahmadinejad, who recently questioned Israel's right to exist and said the country should be wiped off the map.

"I think that it's very important for us to take his words very seriously," he told the German newspaper Bild, according to a transcript released Sunday. "When people speak, it is important that we listen carefully to what they say and take them seriously."

Legal advisors give students judicial advice

in regards to the university judicial system and process. No prior experience is necessary. Judicial Advisors are trained by qualified Dean of Students and Student Legal Services staff before meeting with and advising students. At the moment, we are looking to hire Judicial Advisors for the next academic year, 2006-2007. We will review each application very thoroughly to ensure that we find students who will best fit with the mission and goals of the program," said Stern-O'Connor.

Students seeking judicial advice within the University judicial system should go to the Judicial Advisors Program office in the Student Government Association, room 420 in the Student Union. The Judicial Advisors Program can also be contacted through e-mail at sga.jaad@sfsat.umass.edu, or by calling 413-545-1272. Advisors are available for appointments Monday through Friday from 10:30 a.m. until 5:00 p.m.

Students seeking legal advice outside of the University system should go to the Student Legal Services Office in room 922 of the Campus Center.

Students wishing to apply to become a Judicial Advisor themselves can contact the Program in the same way. An application and more information about the program can also be found under the Judiciary section of the SGA website at http://www.umass.edu/sga/judiciary.html.

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, MAY 9, 2006

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

What are we waiting for?

Last Monday in the United States we witnessed people taking to the streets in record numbers to support immigrants and their rights as citizens. Some people walked out of their jobs while others didn't even bother to call out at all. For all involved, it was a monumental effort of solidarity in the face of the strong change in immigration policy beginning to sweep U.S. law books.

Josh Wilder

The issue of immigration is multi-faceted to say the least, as members of both viewpoints hold their own justifications. In spite of your own personal opinion on the matter, I believe that we all must take our hats off to compliment the incredible bravery and savvy of all who turned out to support the cause. In Chicago, one of more than a dozen cities which saw massive amounts of protestors, close to 300,000 people flooded the streets. Watching the coverage on television made most people think, "Gee, I can't remember the last time I've seen a turnout like that for something…except for American Idol."

Sadly enough, that statement is actually the truth for the state of affairs here in America lately. Can't remember seeing a protest like that? Well that's probably because we haven't been alive long enough to see anything closely resembling the turnout last Monday. In an age where materialism and apathy have become the norm, it was refreshing and uplifting to see people actually stand up for what they believe in and fight back against a system they feel is unfair.

Ironically enough, these illegal immigrants demonstrated 'The American Way' in a more stunning and effective manner than the citizenry has mustered up in quite some time.

After all, since America is a place where the government is supposed to listen to the people and act accordingly, what better way is there to be heard than to take to the streets? The thousands of immigrants who took part in "A Day Without Immigrants" by skipping out on work took a big gamble; they put all their chips in the pot without looking at their hand first. They put the rights of their people in front of monetary stability and job security, without knowing the end result. How many big time executives and corporate cronies would put anything above money as a priority in this country nowadays? Not many.

Will these marches sway law-maker's minds on the issue and work to benefit immigrants across the states? Maybe last Monday was the initial spark needed to set off a chain reaction of immigration reform leading to some sort of happy medium or compromise – or maybe politicians will once again turn a deaf ear and ignore the situation. Nobody can say for sure, nothing is set in stone. But the fact remains that these protestors felt strongly enough about the cause that they literally put their lives on hold in order to try to make a change.

Whether you agree with them or not, we should all appreciate their dedication to being a presence on the streets and the news. Ironically enough, these illegal immigrants demonstrated "The American Way" in a more stunning and effective manner than the citizenry has mustered up in quite some time.

Watching the news coverage of the protests I couldn't help but begin to think about the anti-war movement of the sixties, where college students across the country came together to fight the oppressive warmongers sending the youth off to die. The government will ignore the people when it feels it can get away with it, and unfortunately that has been the recent story in this country.

Instead of taking an avid concern in current events, many Americans, college students especially, have become obsessed with the most trivial of interests. Facebook, My-Space, American Idol, MTV Cribs, Nanny 911, YO MTV Raps and many, many more mindless distractions are all the rage, while going to a protest or a rally have become lame and pointless. It seems like there are so many hot button issues right now that it is almost overwhelming, it's hard to decide where to begin.

The war in Iraq, global warming and the abuse of planet Earth and the massacres in Darfur are just a few of the problems facing the world right now. People feel strongly about these issues but prefer the route of sitting around and complaining instead of being proactive and actually doing something about it. All Americans should take a page out of the book of these immigrants and stand up for something they believe in. This is a country that allows you to stand up and fight for what's right…so what are the rest of us waiting for?

How to advertise at UMass Amherst

Sanam Hakim

There are over 200 student organizations on this campus, which are constantly doing event planning. There's pretty much something happening every night at this school: diversity events, political speakers, or just celebrations. However, every event usually has the same crowd. Why? I blame advertising. Similar to the tactics of national corporations, student run groups don't advertise to the whole school, they advertise to target audiences.

Take Tent State University and the Republican Club as examples:

Posters were placed all over UMass advertising something called "Tent State University" with the caption: "Teach in. Camp out. Take action." The whole poster is just covered with little pictures of tents. There was no information regarding the goals or the message of this event. It was a call to action over the images of a bunch of tents. You know who this poster appeals to? People who planned the event and hippies that just want to camp out in the middle of campus. You know who attended? People who planned the event and hippies that just wanted to camp out in the middle of campus.

The Republican Club recently put up a poster advertising a talk by Ward Connerly, founder and chairman of the American Civil Rights Institute. On top of the poster, in huge letters, it says, "Stop racism in college admission", and points to the words "Affirmative Action". The American Heritage Dictionary defines racism as "The belief that race accounts for differences in human character or ability and that a particular race is superior to others." In other words, this poster is saying, "Attention all white people who feel oppressed by Affirmative Action." Guess who attended? Mostly white people who were against Affirmative Action.

Advertising on this campus is like a mathematical equation. If you want mostly colored people at your event, make a poster with lots of colors, graffiti-style text, and make it look cluttered. If you want mostly white people at your event, use basic fonts like Times New Roman and Arial, make everything parallel with only one or two neatly positioned graphics, and if you want to make the event seem really exciting, make your text bold. Then there's the smaller, more specific details: If you want some Jews, put a Star of David on it somewhere. If you want Christians, slap on a Bible quote.

If you don't believe me, head to the campus center and look at all the posters made by students. Most of them match my theory.

The unfortunate thing about this is that diversity becomes a myth on this campus. Yes, we have an Asian club. Yes, we have a Black Student Union. Yes, we have a Cannabis Reform Coalition. But when the Asian club has an event—how many non-Asians attend? Not many.

When you plan a cultural event, its purpose is not only building a strong cultural community within the culture, but to enrich the culture of the greater UMass community. Yet when the majority of the people going to cultural events are students of that culture or a similar culture, one of the main purposes is defeated. Why does the Office of ALANA rarely flyer in Orchard Hill? Because an overwhelming majority of Orchard Hill residents are white and don't attend the events. Isn't that more reason to gear advertising towards Orchard Hill residents?

The unfortunate thing about this is that diversity becomes a myth on this campus. Yes, we have an Asian club… But when the Asian club has an event—how many non-Asians attend? Not many.

The same thing applies to political parties on campus or political movements. Political activists are always trying to spread messages and educate the masses, but the message attracts the same groups of people. One of the purposes of coming to college is becoming exposed to new ideas, questioning your own views, and establishing or reaffirming a belief system.

I think that the only way the diversity on this campus will increase on campus is when groups start mixing together more and begin advertising to a wider range of people. Here are some ideas: all the religious groups should come together and plan an outdoor carnival with information about each religion and its customs. The religious kids go out of their way to find religion.

All the ethnic groups should come together and plan an event in the bowl in Orchard Hill, the least diverse area on campus. Minorities and people interested in minority issues go out of their way to find diversity events. Why not plan diversity events in a place like Orchard Hill, filled with people who don't look for diversity events? Residents are more likely to go to a diversity event if it's right outside their windows.

All the political groups, especially during elections, should bring up important issues and educate students about both the candidates and party platforms. During elections, all we ever really see is "Vote Democrat" or "Vote Republican". What does that even mean?

To anyone who's in a group on this campus: your purpose isn't just to build an internal community. You're part of a bigger community. Share your culture, your views, and your religions. If people don't know what it is, they won't look for it. Let's start building some bridges out of the walls that keep us apart…then maybe we can all wear white linen clothes and frolic merrily into the sunset while holding hands.

No use fighting over spilled beer

Jon Brant

Rage is everywhere, especially on this campus. Whether it's the drivers avoiding kids jumping in front of their cars, the stress of classes and exams, or just plain old testosterone built up, everyone gets mad. It happens, so it's nothing to be ashamed of, but there has to be limits to the destructive behavior that is a result of this pent up rage.

Every weekend you'll find broke n windows in the dorms, trash all over the place, and hear of fights breaking out over the stupidest things. As far as I'm concerned, there's nothing wrong with fighting. It cleans out the system of anger and allows people to find out how they handle themselves in tough situations. I'm not saying we should be fighting all the time. But when you have the opportunity to fight in a controlled situation, the benefits can be great. This is why I am proposing the idea of a fight club at UMass.

I'm not talking about one modeled after the movie. It would not be something illegal, held in beer soaked basements. I'm thinking of the bigger picture here. We could hold battles in the Mullins Center every week, and those involved in the league could challenge other fighters in their weight class. Friday Night Fights at the Mullins Center, presented by [insert beer company here] could potentially generate tons of money for our school. I'm sure ticket revenues would bring in a good amount. At the very least we could expect the same crowds we get for our hockey and basketball games. Then there could be endorsements and sponsorships. And, because these are average students, not athletes performing, more kids would go to see their friends get destroyed.

We're not talking about blowing up buildings, just stopping people blowing up at parties.

No one wants their good time to be interrupted by a party being busted because of a fight that reeks of weak sauce.

I know what some of you might be thinking. Fighting is wrong; you're setting a horrible example to the community, blah blah blah. Stop crying. Fighting is natural. It's what humans always resort to. No matter how far society has come or how advanced we think we are, there is still an urge to get down with fists and knuckles and duke it out. Fighting teaches you a lot of important things, like how to handle yourself in tough situations, and what it's like to be backed into a corner with just your primal instincts. These are things we don't get to engage in often these days, but they are important nonetheless.

How many times have you been a party and some dude (definition: toolbag with popped collar who acts like a dumb jock from "Saved By the Bell") starts a fight over nothing? How many perfectly good beer bottles have been smashed in anger? How long must we deal with this, UMass?

Here's a picture of a typical fight at a party. Someone (dudus drunkus) spills a beer on someone else (dumbassis toughguyis). After a minute or two of big talking and pretty good zingers, mostly starting with F, a fight will break out. This is an extremely dangerous situation for several reasons. Most notably, of course, is the risk of other people spilling their beer during the commotion. Also, no one wants their good time to be interrupted by a party being busted because of a fight that reeks of weak sauce.

These fights have got to stop. Not because I'm worried about anyone getting hurt, but because they suck. It's often so one-sided I have to wonder how the loser is still standing, which, often times they aren't. I expect better out of the only fights I'm going to get to witness in person. With a fight club, fighters would be evenly matched, and the fight would be stopped before anyone got really hurt. Because after all, no one wants to see someone get totally demolished. That's partly why fighting has such a negative connotation these days.

Whatever happened to the good old days when everyone would gather around to watch the fight? Little kids used to look up to heroes like Muhammad Ali. Now they have no one to look up to. The fighting business is in a low place without well known fighters that can really draw a crowd. A fight club can prepare a new generation of fighters, and this time they'll learn how to do it right, unlike those kids at parties.

Not only is fighting good for individuals, but it can be good for the community also. Think about it—when the Black Panthers walked around waiving their guns, no one tried to start trouble with them. If everyone knew how to fight, and would fight, there would be fewer incidents. Knowing that the guy next to you could potentially beat your ass is a deterrent from starting trouble. Just a few fights every now and then, and you can be guaranteed it won't be over stupid things like spilled beer or bumping into someone.

My dream is simple. UMass needs a fight club, or just a regular boxing program at the very least. I know there are plenty of students out there who would be interested in taking self-defense classes, or at least knowing what to do if they were ever cornered. No one likes to see a dirty brawl, but most people can enjoy a good clean fight. And you know what? If you don't like this idea, say something to my face.

Conspiracy theories

There comes a point in speculation when you go too far a-field. When that happens, you stop, check your position, then retract. If not, if you reach the point of no return, where you have convinced yourself so entirely of the outlandish conclusions drawn out of excitement and too much marijuana, you risk losing forever the kind of credibility that serves lucid, rational people.

Luke Bloomfield

There are the followers of conspiracy theory who believe that no one ever walked on the moon. This seems preposterous. We've all seen the video footage and heard those words of a small step for man, a clearly larger one for mankind…someone clearly walked on the moon. But then again, why is the flag blowing? People love to plant that seed of doubt that blossoms into a PBS special.

We've all met this kind of person. In fact, maybe the better of you are; because sometimes I think the wild speculation may be closer to the truth than spoon-fed media garbage.

Osama bin Laden accused the West of being at war with Islam. He said Muslims are justified in killing American civilians because they are the enemy. Honestly, that is scary. I don't plan to never leave the safety of the homeland. I want to live elsewhere, but I won't be able to do that comfortably with a price on my head. Look what happened to Daniel Pearl.

Then he told me the entire war on terror is a complete U.S. fabrication, like that fictive war south of the border created by the newspapers back in the day. I told him to blow it out his other end.

What is even scarier is that Osama bin Laden didn't even issue that statement, or so my friend, a practitioner of conspiracy theory, tried to convince me. He said bin Laden is rotting in a CIA prison somewhere in Eastern Europe and has been for the last three years. I tried to tell him that bin Laden is wily and clever. "How long after America invaded Iraq was Sadam Hussein caught?" he asked. "Iraq is a huge (expletive deleted) desert, and the U.S. found him in a (expletive deleted) hole! Don't think we didn't catch Osama two weeks after we invaded Afghanistan. We're not called a superpower for nothing."

Then he told me the entire war on terror is a complete U.S. fabrication, like that fictive war south of the border created by the newspapers back in the day. I told him to blow it out his other end. Then he showed me an article in the BBC published two months after 9/11. The headline read, "U.S. appoints terror war spin doctor."

In November, Charlotte Beers, a Madison Avenue executive, became Under Secretary of State for public diplomacy so that the government could "market America to hostile Muslims abroad." That was the blurb for the online American journal, Businessweek.com. Why, then, would the BBC say her purpose was for propaganda? Ms. Beers quit for health reasons in 2003, but not before she set the ball rolling, I'm sure.

My friend then tried to convince me that the only reason why America has not tied off this fetish with freedom and democracy in the Middle East is because it is profitable for the wealthy ten percent of America, the small demographic that gets catered first and foremost. Major contractors are getting no-bid contracts in the Middle East and reaping in a boatload of cash while the rest of the country is puttering about in fear delivered by the government. Wait, contractors don't have to bid for contracts anymore? As long as Dick Cheney, whose income comes primarily from stocks and hedge funds gets his cut, it's all gravy.

The U.S. is marketing fear. You may have heard that before. With the address by bin Laden (who, I am convinced, is still on the lamb, despite what my friend says), American citizens will not want to travel abroad. They will spend their vacation at Yellowstone or Mount Rushmore instead, or they will go to the capitol and visit the Lincoln Memorial. Keep those dollars in America is the argument for quarantining Americans by fear and manipulate them in every social domain. It's a good argument too for those who don't like to travel.

'Free Spirits' in a free world

By DAVE MASTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON — On the evening of Saturday, May 6, a line extended for two blocks outside of the Academy of Music, spilling into the busy streets. People tried cutting in line and nervously tapped their thighs, while some talked on their cell phones, all anxiously waiting for the front doors of the Academy of Music to open.

"Free Spirits," a film written and directed by UMass professor Bruce Geisler, debuted this past weekend. The film is a feature-length documentary that recalls a once blossoming commune in Western Massachusetts.

"I wanted to preserve the memory of a marvelous experiment in human relations that might have succeeded, but that went badly wrong," says Geisler. "The history of the commune shows the very best and very worst of our natures."

The film primarily focuses on Michael Metelica Rapunzel, high school dropout and founder leader of the commune, and how his attitude affected the commune. He started the Brotherhood of the Spirit with a tree house in Leyden in 1968. The Brotherhood grew dramatically over the next five years, with numbers increasing to the hundreds.

Associate Producer and UMass graduate Adrian D'Errico was at the right hand of Geisler throughout the production of the film. D'Errico is a current professor at UMass Commonwealth College.

The ideals of the Brotherhood of the Spirit began with no drugs, alcohol or smoking. Michael Metelica Rapunzel desired a pure, aesthetic lifestyle in which he envisioned attainable harmony and peace. All religions were welcome — Hindus, Buddhists, Christians, Jews, it didn't matter.

"When I visited in the summer of 1970," says Geisler, also an ex-member, "I felt the tremendous love, vitality and energy that the members exhibited. It was infectious and it got me on a natural high." The Brotherhood focused on a spiritual environment, with Michael Metelica Rapunzel as the shepherd, but instead of a staff, he led by the spirit.

With the humble beginnings of a tree house, Michael started toward his purpose, which he received during an out-of-body experience. He wanted to share it with the world, and even change the world. Iron Horse Magazine put it best – "This 20th century Tarzan [Michael] had his shit together." Michael simply stated that his vision was in effort, "To find myself. The Brotherhood is a place where we [members] can find ourselves in a comfortable and natural environment."

"Promiscuity is in the eyes of the holder" – The Free Spirits practiced freedom of the spirit in its many forms. "Some of the most beautiful love affairs lasted only about five to 15 minutes," said Anne Baker, ex-member of the commune, with a chuckle.

The commune stirred up some bad vibes from the townsfolk. "They lacked a work ethic and were pushy" according to some of the local business owners. The tree house was later burnt down by some of Michael's fellow classmates from high school. They found a small, destined to be condemned building that the Brotherhood, with a little love and community effort, renovated into primitive living space. "We had no idea what we were doing," says one Brotherhood member. "Whoever was willing to use a wrench was welcome."

With the growing popularity of the commune, primitive living was not suitable for the group's needs. "We were living in poverty," says Anne Baker, "surviving on potatoes, squash and rice."

Michael found a suitable property in Warwick, Massachusetts. With a beard that looked like an upside-down fro, he was not permitted to buy the property. The Brotherhood had to ask two 40-year old working-class people to front for them. Eventually, the commune did gain possession of the property and lived happily ever after, until drugs and rock 'n' roll were introduced.

The commune gained so much popularity that Brotherhood of the Spirit was on the front cover of Look! Magazine. The next day, after being published, 150 people walked up to the commune in hopes of joining. There were so many people that a plastic tent was erected for prospective members.

A new dormitory had to be built in order to house the masses. While the building was in process, someone felt a bad vibe. The entire project had to be put on hold. Michael made the workers meditate until the bad vibe went away, and then got back to work in peace and harmony, and they were well-rested.

At one point, the commune was attacked with kerosene bombs. Despite the attacks, the Brotherhood remained to live without retaliation. With a bathroom full of seven toilets in a semi-circle, who would want to act violently? The members shared very intimate actions together, as one spirit should.

After relocating to Warwick, Michael had the idea of incorporating music into the commune's spiritual growth. They sang songs together in harmony, spiritual hymns of the hippie age. The sing-a-long evolved into a rock band called Spirit in the Flesh, with Michael as the lead singer. Spirit in the Flesh toured and made money, resulting in real-estate in four Massachusetts towns, including a whole business corner in Turner's Falls. Michael developed a cocaine habit because of a spiritual need. He started drinking and smoking, but he smoked Salem's – they were a spiritual cigarette.

As the commune grew, Michael made it mandatory for everyone to get jobs and give him their paychecks to help maintain the properties. For a while, this was met with little or no opposition. Soon enough, the members realized that they were being manipulated by Michael in order to support his lifestyle. Little by little, people started leaving the commune.

The commune became The Renaissance Church to avoid government harassment. The Brotherhood even shook becoming what it opposed. Despite its "no I" to consumer mentality, "it was male-dominated," says Anne Baker.

The brotherhood saw the inevitable end in 1988, when Michael decided to walk away from the multiple properties. His ego had gotten the best of him and his members knew it.

The Saturday showing of the film set an attendance record for an afternoon performance. Filling the 800 seats in the theatre, and an overall attendance record for the weekend as a non-Hollywood film. "The standing room was after the 4:15 screening on Saturday," says Geisler. "It lasted five minutes and practically brought tears to my eyes." Over 200 ex-members showed up for the film for a rare experience of remembering the past. "They responded so incredibly positive that it made me think, 'maybe I did my job right.'" continues Bruce.

This film is a story of a minor Julius Caesar – power corrupts even the purest of souls. And when the going gets tough, the faithful get out.

Due to the overwhelming demand, The Academy of Music Theatre is bringing "Free Spirits" back starting this Friday evening at 6:30 through next Thursday (except Saturday, due to a concert). Tickets are going to be showing at the Media Arts Center in Northfield on Friday, May 19th and Saturday, May 20th.

Rock fan Jose Cassella's call for tinnitus awareness rings true

By JIM ABBOTT
THE ORLANDO SENTINEL

ORLANDO, Fla. — If it's too loud, the saying goes, you're too old.

That's the kind of macho attitude that keeps rock fans from using earplugs, despite mounting evidence that the volume at concerts could lead to permanent hearing damage.

Jose Cassella, an Orlando filmmaker and former rock drummer, understands that image problem. But he also knows about the consequences of tinnitus and wants to share his story with others while they can still hear it.

So Cassella, 32, is looking for rock stars willing to participate in a series of public-service advertisements that he will be producing in coming weeks at Full Sail Real World Education, where he is an instructor. He hopes that the spots will educate fans about something he learned by accident after attending a Motley Crue concert in September.

The next morning, the cumulative effect of a lifetime of loud music yielded a distracting hiss in his right ear that will never go away.

Exposure to loud noises can damage and even destroy hair cells, called cilia, in the inner ear and cause tinnitus, a permanent ringing, buzzing or hissing in the ear. Once damaged, hair cells cannot be renewed or replaced.

The American Tinnitus Association, in Portland, Ore., estimates that more than 50 million Americans suffer from tinnitus to some degree.

"The reality is that I will never hear sounds the same way again," he says. "I just want to get the word out there. I don't want another soul to have to go through this again."

Cassella, a photography director on numerous music videos in a career that has taken him from Boston to Los Angeles to Orlando, has contacted Queen's Brian May to be a voice of the campaign and already has a commitment from jazz guitarist Al DiMeola and funk icon Bootsy Collins.

His wish list also includes Sting, the members of Pearl Jam and Bono. It will take major stars, he says, to make people listen.

"If somebody had told me about this before the Motley Crue concert, I wouldn't have done anything," Cassella admits. "That's the problem. But I want to make the word tinnitus famous in 2006."

It might happen.

The issue was the subject of a story in the December Rolling Stone, which included comments from rock stars about the industry's "dirty little secret." Apple recently released volume-control software for its iPod MP3 players after a federal lawsuit was filed against the company.

"Every other musician I know has some form of problem with their hearing," Garbage singer Shirley Manson told the magazine. "All the guys in my band have weird schisms that come from being around really loud music."

Of the total number of tinnitus victims, about 2 million are seriously debilitated, the tinnitus association estimates.

"It's a very difficult condition to make people aware of because it's invisible," says Barbara Tabachnick Sanders, the group's associate director. "People ask me if there are many musicians who have it. I say, 'Do you know any musicians who don't?' It's getting them to step forward."

Former musician Kathy Peck, who has hearing problems, has been offering services and information about music-related hearing loss for 15 years through Hearing Education and Awareness for Rockers, a San Francisco group aimed at fans and musicians.

H.E.A.R. lobbied for a law that requires Bay Area clubs to provide a bin of earplugs at every show. Such efforts have led to exposure of the group and its issues in Rolling Stone and Newsweek.

An awareness campaign featuring Pat Benatar and Mick Fleetwood also generated a lot of media exposure. Peck says that the best approach is grass roots because access to major media outlets such as MTV and VH1 is difficult.

"We use the Internet a lot, but it's mostly word of mouth still," Peck says. "More and more people are starting to think about it, but there are still people I've known for years who don't think about their hearing until it's too late."

That's what happened to Cassella, who would be happy to see boxes of earplugs at concerts for fans who might want to avoid his fate.

"I don't want the rock to stop," he says. "I just don't want people being blasted by music literally without protection."

Jose Cassella became active trying to raise awareness for music-related hearing loss after his own was permanently damaged.

Writing the final show

By Chuck Barney
Knight Ridder Newspapers

When "Friends" producers Marta Kauffman and David Crane met more than two years ago to pen what was supposed to be the final scene for their wildly popular sitcom, they ran headlong into an impenetrable case of writer's block.

Try as they might, they sat for days, but the right words and tone just wouldn't come. "We kept pitching line after line, and ultimately we just decided not to do it," Crane said at the time. "We finally looked at each other and said, 'Well, obviously it can't be written.' So we lopped off the final scene. It was just too hard."

Harder than some might imagine. When it comes to putting the finishing touches on a popular television show, producers and writers often find it extremely difficult to do goodbyes — and even more difficult to do them well.

There's intense creative pressure to not only satisfy the expectations of fans who are emotionally invested in a show, but also the demands of network executives who crave the kind of big-event programming that will deliver substantial ratings.

"I think there's a temptation to do something clever — something unexpected," says Tim Brooks, a television historian and co-author of "The Complete Directory to Prime Time Network and Cable TV Shows." "The problem, however, is that by now we've all watched so many of these finales that it's very difficult to do anything that feels truly original. There's a whole list (of finales) everyone's got to compete with."

May, of course, has become the season for farewells. This month, seven prime-time shows, including NBC's groundbreaking "The West Wing" and "Will & Grace," will sail into the sunset. Other shows on their way out include "7th Heaven," which may get a reprieve (The WB), "Malcolm in the Middle" (Fox), "That '70s Show" (Fox), "Alias" (ABC) and "Charmed" (The WB). Unlike "Seinfeld" (1998) and "Friends" (2004), which were riding high in the ratings when they bid adieu, this season's crop of departing shows are all past their Nielsen prime. That means there will be considerably less blaring hype and fanfare attached to their farewells.

Still, these shows do have their intensely loyal followers, and in their heyday they were valuable pieces of property for their networks. So their production teams all will be hoping to put together a quality swan song and go out on a high note.

This wasn't always the case. For decades, TV shows didn't concern themselves with the grand finale. Every episode — even the last ones — would play out like the others. The conventional thinking was that building to some kind of climax would diminish the show's value in syndication.

"Even shows that erred out for an ending — say, like 'Gilligan's Island' — never ended," says Robert Thompson, a pop-culture professor at Syracuse University. "When that series went off the air, nothing had changed. Gilligan and the others were still stranded on that blasted island."

In the summer of 1967, ABC's serialized action series "The Fugitive" became the first show to demonstrate the seductive power of a finale. At last, Richard Kimble (David Janssen) caught up with the one-armed man who murdered his wife, and proved his innocence. The show-stopper was seen by more people than any single episode of a regular series up to that time.

"It was such a huge success that you would have thought television programmers would have jumped on that bandwagon like crazy," says Thompson. "But they didn't."

It wasn't until 10 years later and "The Mary Tyler Moore Show," with its weepy farewell and heart-tugging group hug, that the finale floodgates finally opened. Kauffman still regards it as the "gold standard" of TV finales, and Thompson says it was the episode that changed everything.

"At that point it finally clicked in the brains of TV executives. If you're going to live with these characters for so many years, it's only natural to want some kind of closure," he says. "When longtime neighbors decide to move, you throw them a farewell party. You just don't let them pass into the night."

And thus the era of the "big-event" finale began. In February 1983, 125 million viewers tuned into the 2-hour swan song of "M*A*S*H" — the largest audience ever for a single episode. In the years since, finales for series such as "The Cosby Show," "Dallas," "Cheers," "Seinfeld," "The X-Files," "Friends," "Sex and the City" and "Everybody Loves Raymond" have been treated like major pop-cultural events.

But as the TV finales pile up, it has become clear that the truly beloved ones are few and far between. While the hilarious and totally unexpected dream ending of "Newhart" may be fondly recalled, the surreal finish of "St. Elsewhere" probably turned off as many viewers as it pleased.

The key to creating a satisfying sendoff, says Brooks, is to avoid self-indulgence and stay true to the spirit of the show. "You want to tie up some loose ends and make it feel like a natural fit," he says. "Too many shows try to be overly clever and cutesy in their desire to go out with a bang. Audiences see right through that."

Thompson agrees. He says the era of the "throw-'em-a-big-curveball" finale has faded, and that understated farewells such as the one "Everybody Loves Raymond" produced last May will most likely become the norm.

"There was nothing particularly memorable that stands out with that ("Raymond") episode, but in many ways it was the perfect ending," he says. "It was a touching episode that stayed consistent with what the show is all about."

Four in 10 Americans play video games

By Matt Slagle
Associated Press

(AP) — Rather than reach for the television remote control when she wants to be entertained, Karalyn Valente goes online to play "EverQuest," "Ultima Online" and other video games — a gaming habit shared by millions in the United States.

Valente, a 29-year-old graphic artist from York, Pa., said she devotes about 30 hours a week in vast online worlds and spent more than $1,500 on games last year.

"I watch less and less TV. I turn it on and the shows are just idiotic," Valente said. "When I play the games, I actually look through the character's eyes. I actually become the character."

According to a new AP-AOL Games poll, 40 percent of American adults play games on a computer or a console. Men, younger adults and minorities were most likely to play those games.

Among those who describe themselves as gamers, 45 percent play over the Internet. And more than a third of online gamers spent more than $200 last year on gaming, compared with nearly a quarter of those who don't play games online.

Online gamers also spent more time playing those games.

Forty-two percent of online gamers said they spent at least four hours playing games during an average week, compared with 26 percent of those who don't play online. About one in six online gamers play more than 10 hours a week.

The survey results come as Sony Corp., Nintendo Co. and Microsoft Corp. prepare to push their new consoles this week at the Electronic Entertainment Expo in Los Angeles. All three are hoping to make broad online features such as multiplayer games, video conferencing and downloadable content a core element of the video game experience. Casual games like board or card games were the most popular, followed by strategy games, action sports, adventure, first-person shooters and simulations, the poll found. Casual, strategy and role-playing games were most popular among online gamers.

And that game playing can be expensive.

Cameron Wright's gaming cost more than $4,500 last year, most of that on upgrades to two of his four PCs.

More than a fourth of gamers say they spent nothing on that hobby last year and slightly more, 31 percent, spent $100 or less.

Only 11 percent spent more than $500 last year. Online gamers are more likely to have spent more than $500 last year compared with gamers who don't play online. Six in 10 hardcore gamers — those who play three or more hours per week — spent $200 or less on games last year.

Although Wright usually spends about two hours a week on gaming, he said he sometimes makes extra time for adult-themed military strategy games like "Command and Conquer," which he plays online with friends.

"Once you start, they get quite intricate," said Wright, a 44-year-old investment manager from Indianapolis. "You're looking at four to five hours a night."

Of those who play online games, nearly one in five said they had formed ongoing friendships or relationships with fellow gamers they did not know before, the poll found.

Valente said she met her roommate and her boyfriend in online games and regularly uses special computer software called TeamSpeak to talk with teammates and friends in the game worlds.

"I've met a lot of strangers online and become friends with them," she said. "I have friends that have been online for years."

Wright, meanwhile, said the family PlayStation 2 has become the center of entertainment for him and his four young children.

"With the PS2 we find ourselves sitting down and passing it around from one person to another doing round-robin tournaments," Wright said. "The kids just eat that up. The big competition is who gets through that level first."

The AP-AOL Games poll of 3,024 U.S. adults, including 1,046 gamers, was conducted by Ipsos, an international polling firm, on April 18-20 and 24-27. For the gamers, the poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Musician and activist Neil Young, shown here supporting his "Prairie Wind" album, has recently released a new, politically charged album, "Living With War," which listeners can hear for free at his Web site.

Can anti-war songs awaken blase fans?

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

So Neil Young is streaming — for free, at neilyoung.com — his scathing yet thoughtful new album, "Living With War," which arrives in stores Tuesday. Meanwhile, Pearl Jam, which briefly backed the aging mentor in the '90s, has just issued a tight, fierce work (self-titled, which to some signals a new chapter) led by the group's fastest-rising single ever, the ripping anti-war tirade "World Wide Suicide."

Great. How do I write about that without diving into the political stinkpot hip deep?

As ever, I must tread lightly, lest I be censured for forgetting I'm just a rock critic, no more a Randi Rhodes (of Air America Radio) than a Randy Rhoads (of Ozzy Osbourne's early solo records).

So let's stay hypothetical.

Let's assume you're a bright 18-year-old with some appreciation of rock's historical context. You've read about how it provided backdrop and motivation for the volatility of the '60s, for instance. Perhaps you know a thing or two about the Beatles, Hendrix, Woodstock.

Good for you. You're no idle "American Idol" viewer.

How, then, might you react to "Living With War" or the new Pearl Jam album? With measured thought, open disdain or (my guess) shoulder-shrugging indifference?

Would you even bother to hear either one, what with a new Red Hot Chili Peppers double-album tempting your iPod and She Wants Revenge shoved in your ears hourly?

OK, Pearl Jam would probably break through to you. As with Tool's subversive sides, its music can still stake a place in the complacent KROQ mentality, where songs don't have to signify meaning so much as satisfy a cool factor. But I wonder how many young people who dig "World Wide Suicide" understand it, share its hope to "find another way."

Then I wonder how many saw the recent Rolling Stone — which mistakenly boasts that PJ's latest is its best in a decade — and did more than laugh at the portrait of Bush in a dunce cap, next to this: "The Worst President in History?"

Would they even read such a piece, ponder its contention while looking up words like "abjure" and "despot"? Or would they just skip straight to the hype about how Pearl Jam rocks hard once again?

About that: People, they never stopped. "Pearl Jam" is indeed mighty, a rebirth in terms of song concision and democratic band vision. But it also could be seen as an extension of the equally strong, thematically similar "Riot Act," which also slipped in seditious bits amid impassioned soul-searching from Eddie Vedder.

"I have faced it/A life wasted/I'm never going back again." So sings a 41-year-old who has imparted such wisdom for most of a decade now. My question: Will anyone take his Socratic spin to heart? Is the crowd that could do with an ideological jostling — young people, by and large — apt to embrace any part of that self-analytical philosophy?

Look at how many others have tried recently — System of a Down and Bright Eyes come to mind first. All have failed to spark much more than sales and controversy.

Here's a recent Neil Young quote, about what partly led him to make the explicitly outraged "Living With War": "I was waiting for someone to come along, some young singer ... to write these songs and stand up. I waited a long time. Then I decided that maybe the generation that has to do this is still the '60s generation."

And so the Canadian citizen who has long lived in Northern California wrote songs like "Let's Impeach the President" (bolstered by contradictory sound bites) and "Lookin' for a Leader" (maybe a woman, he suggests, maybe a black man like Illinois Sen. Barack Obama). And he wrote heart-wrenching songs about soldiers' families facing the war, then finished off this burst of anger (recorded in two weeks) with a moving rendition of "America the Beautiful."

Never mind C&N prattling on about getting back to the garden; Young wonders what spiritual pit we'll be in "After the Garden" is gone entirely. (He does so, by the way, by packing up the thread of more somber "Prairie Wind" pieces, like "When God Made Me," then adding a 100-voice choir and lots of Crazy Horse fuzz. As a rock disc, it's among his best since "Freedom.")

Now Young is preparing to hurl such mind bombs at well-off boomers willing to pay triple-digits to see Y once more on stage with C, S & N. Methinks they're expecting "Deja Vu" and "Teach Your Children" — and they'll probably get 'em, too. But what will they make of the new stuff?

One thing I've learned, repeatedly lately, is that boomers are very likely to rail against rock stars speaking out when they came only for nostalgia. Tolerance for provocation has reached an all-time low, especially from music figures.

Why, I don't know. But then I also don't know why folks on either side of the political divide have such difficulty listening to each other anymore.

I applaud the work of Young and Pearl Jam because I find myself roused by both the music and the message. But my cynical side wonders: Who but their legions of fans cares?

And what are they doing about it anyway? How many protest anthems does it take — and there are more on the way from Dixie Chicks and Paul Simon — before the point sinks in and a shake-up takes root?

Are anti-war types so disgusted by the political process that they, too, are immune to rock's power of persuasion?

Where's a new Dylan when he's needed most?

"I like Beethoven, especially the poems." - Ringo Starr

Wolfmother

3/10

Wolfmother
Interscope Records

Wolfmother has been making a racket lately; both literally and figuratively. The '70s influenced, heavy-rock band from Australia has garnered quite a bit of buzz in anticipation for their self-titled debut album. However, like so many heavily hyped next-big-things, Wolfmother delivers exactly what is expected of them and not much else.

The most notable aspects of Wolfmother's sound are exactly how they are described; Black Sabbath influenced to a T, and heavy as all hell. With big fuzzed-out riffs and a singer that is constantly doing his best Ozzy impression, Wolfmother knows exactly what made stoner-rock a viable genre but pretty much refuse to bring anything of their own to the table. And for those that just can't get enough of straight-ahead genre music, "Wolfmother" has enough solid tracks to make for some happy customers, but as far as making something new and interesting, there isn't too much to see.

From the get go, the opening track, "Dimension," is pretty much what one would expect having seen any literature about Wolfmother. These guys want to rock and they know how to. It is certainly to their credit that they are able to write the types of songs that feel like classics as soon as they come on but, then again, they also often feel recycled. The second track, the unfortunately-titled "White Unicorn," throws in a brief, spaced-out interlude that only proves that Wolfmother has a few prog-rock records in their collection as well.

Songs like "Where Eagles Have Been" and "Colossal" cement Wolfmother's place as purveyors of some heavy stomp-rock but, again, they fail to sound like anything special or new. "Joker and the Thief" opens with a tripped-out riff and a big drum part that feels cliché almost the moment it starts and "Tales" serves as the requisite ballad of the album. When the band tries to stretch its wings, they falter. The garage-rock exercise "Apple Tree" only makes the band seem more irrelevant; one generic, mindless punk influenced song amidst a sea of generic, mindless psych-metal tracks; of course it isn't long before the track slows down and sounds just like every other song on the album. "Love Train" opens with Congo percussion, but the bluesy riff that jumps on top of it, not to mention the vacant verse vocals, just reek of a Led Zeppelin steal.

It's really no surprise that Wolfmother has garnered a lot of hype; they know exactly what they want to do and they do it with efficiency and a generous dose of ability. But, most importantly, they are safe, predictable rock. A listener doesn't need to engage the music or pay attention; in fact, the music seems as if it was written to be played in the background of a drunken, fish-bowled party scene in a soon-to-be-made college movie. For people that feel the desire to stock up on some well-done, new songs that are made purposefully derivative of legends like Sabbath and Zepplin they should be more then satisfied with "Wolfmother," for anyone that is looking for a new band that is actually, ahem, new, look elsewhere.

Jesu

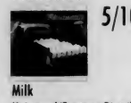
Silver
Hydrahead Records

Following up last year's self-titled release, their first full-length, neo-shoegazers Jesu have released the "Silver" EP, containing four new songs. The band's self-titled 2005 release made a big splash amongst a certain cult following; fans of pos-rock and space-rock bands like Failure and Mogwai found a lot to like on that record and there is plenty to enjoy on "Silver," despite it's short length. Frontman Justin Broadrick, who has also fronted a diverse list of acts including Napalm Death, Godflesh and Techno Animal, weaves in and out of floating soundscapes and dark, heavy guitar work. What Jesu presents is not entirely unique — Broadrick seems to wear his influences proudly on his sleeve — but it is certainly enjoyable. Broadrick offers interesting takes on the influence of other artists and there isn't a dull moment on the entire EP.



"Silver" starts off incredibly strong with the title track, which recalls the gloomiest moments of The Cure combined with crushing waves of post-rock guitar. Broadrick really shines when he allows his pensive vocals to simply float along with song, creating a real atmosphere that engulfs the entire song. The second track, "Stars," falters a little, while the huge sound, still present, is integrated with a more distinct post-hardcore and emo influence. Jesu still stays safely tucked away in a world away from MTV punk, however; they proudly show the influence of '90s heroes like Quicksand and Jawbreaker. And while those bands have led to many great second-generation post-punkers, it is evident that Jesu is more at home amongst the gloomy atmospheric crowd.

The third track, "Wolves," is the longest song on the EP, clocking in at about eight minutes. The final track, "Dead Eyes," is propelled by a throbbing bass riff, while various loops come in and out of the picture; soon an angelic keyboard line comes in that seems to lift the track up into the air. With "Stars" as the only possible exception, the tracks on "Silver" all follow down the same path, touching upon the sort of heavy doom-rock that has become more popular in indie-circles in recent years thanks to bands like Sunn O))) and Boris. However, Jesu differs greatly from those bands. Despite the long song lengths — every song on this EP is over 6 minutes, which is short compared to lengths on previous releases — they are decidedly more accessible. While the band has some moments that fit right in with drone-rock, the songs on "Silver" are lighter than a lot of the bands that they have drawn comparisons too. Their use of electronics often colors in the darker aspects of their music, namely the monstrous guitar and bass work that lumbers across the songs, and Broadrick's floating vocals certainly help to make the music more appealing to people that aren't quite ready to enter the dark corners of doom-rock.

Jesu can feel trapped at times; while each track on "Silver" is good in its own right there is also something distinctly lacking that makes the band's forbearers, and a handful of their contemporaries, so much more exciting. While Jesu seems willing to experiment and attempt interesting things with their music, and "Silver" does have some particularly revelatory and fascinating moments, Jesu still has a ways to go to live up to their full potential.

Milk
Universal/Fontana Distribution

There are times when everyone needs to sit back and listen to straight-ahead hard rock. Preferably hard rock played by a guitarist, bassist and drummer — do you really need anything else? Planeside seem to be keenly aware of this fact, and have been playing heavier hard rock for a years now — since about 2000, to be exact. Before that, bassist Ken Hirasaki and Craig Sala were in Joni's Butterfly, who at one point had amassed enough attention to go on tour with John Entwistle of The Who fame.

Their style has been compared to the Foo Fighters — lead singer Dave Harris' striking vocal similarity to the Foo's Dave Grohl probably doesn't help distance them from this — and there are some hints of other great hard rock bands thrown in there for good measure.

On their newest album, Planeside seem to have mastered the art of the rock song, drawing a lot from their influences. The tracks are all heavy, ranging from softer Foo Fighters to the intensity of Fu Manchu. That isn't really a lot of difference, though, and a lot of the songs start to sound the same, especially as you get farther into the album. Even "Two Messages," which starts out sounding like a softer, acoustic ballad, brings in the electric guitars and speeds things up after about 30 seconds of that nonsense.

The band members' musicianship is in top form the whole time, though Harris's guitar work shows solid rhythm and some complex leads — although there aren't really any solos — Hirasaki's bass is quick and pounding and Sala doesn't miss a beat on the drums. They stay tight with each other, and the result is a thoroughly enjoyable album.

Planeside has, all things considered, put out a solid album in "Milk." They often rely too much on their influences, especially the Foo Fighters, and a lot of their songs sound pretty similar to one another, but if you feel the need to rock out, or just need some heavier background music, "Milk" might be a good place to look, just don't expect it to change your life.

FROM THE STUDENT GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION

The Student Government Association (SGA) will be holding a special student referendum on May 18th and May 19th (10am-2pm & 5pm-8pm) on student representation in senate. The referendum will ask for support in increasing the representation of students from 250 students per senator to 500 students per senator, in order to increase competitiveness and efficiency in the Undergraduate Senate.

UM takes on UConn

Minutemen this season.

On April 26, against Boston College, Stone brought Eilenberg into the game to relieve starter Ryan Walczak. The rookie hurler then went 7 2/3 innings, allowing seven runs on seven hits. The game remained close until the Eagles were able to win it in the bottom of the 12th on Pete Frates' walk-off home run.

More so than anything, Eilenberg gained experience of what it is like pitching in a close, hotly contested game. Stone says that's just what his squad of young hurlers needs.

"We just need to get some consistent pitching from our young guys," he said of the five freshman arms he has on his pitching staff. "They've gotten a lot of experience and we're just hoping that we get some quality innings and execute pitches."

Today's game will renew the border rivalry that exists between UConn and UMass in just about every sport. The last time the two teams met on the baseball diamond the Huskies came out on top with a 7-1 victory.

Although the final score was lopsided, the actual game was anything but. The Huskies held a slim 3-1 lead entering the eighth inning where they broke it open. In the inning, UConn's Eric Turgeron's two-out triple cleared the bases and put the Minutemen away.

"It is a total team effort," Dietz said. "You see the strength of the team when you see how we did across the board … [it] shows you the strength of the program."

The most surprising outcome for Dietz and UMass Saturday – and all season – was the second novice-eight group that won in a time of 7:55.853.

"They've never seen a boat before and have been dedicated all year," Dietz said of the members in the second novice-eight boat.

The second novice-eight crew that won by almost eight seconds was comprised of freshman Benna Cheung, and rowers Ashley Mahoney, Emily Reynolds, Emma Linhorn, Linn Kelly, Mariah McCormick, Elizabeth Short, Andrea Morand and Sarah Potts.

The remainder of UMass' teams fared well also. The first novice-eight crew placed fourth, varsity-four finished third and the lightweight-eight team crossed the line in sixth place.

The Minutewomen will most likely be on the outside looking in again at the NCAA Championships May 26-28. UMass hasn't sent a varsity-eight crew to the tournament since 1998, where the team earned a silver medal for the second year in a row.

The Maroon and White will send its varsity-eight, second varsity-eight, novice-eight and lightweight-four crew teams to the Dad Vail Regatta May 12-13.

"We competed against the best in the country and we're coming up just a little bit short," Dietz said. "I think we're happy with what our kids have done."

Dietz and the coaching staff are "pleased overall" with the 2006 campaign.

"I think it was a very successful season," Dietz said. "It's up there with one of our best performances. We beat everybody that's out there in our reach."

share of the regular season crown.

Charlotte also earned the No. 1 seed over UMass due to a tie-breaker that involved the fourth and final team in the tournament, St. Bonaventure. Charlotte swept the Bonnies this season, while the Minutewomen split their doubleheader.

This means that No. 1 Charlotte will face No. 4 St. Bonaventure Thursday at noon to begin postseason play. No. 2 UMass faces No. 3 Fordham in a rematch of last year's championship game following Game 1.

The winners and losers of those games will square off on Friday in a double-elimination format. The championship game will be held on Saturday at noon.

UMass will be looking for its 18th A-10 championship in the last 21 years, while the rest of the group will be fighting for their first A-10 title. Fordham came close last year after winning the regular season title, but lost to UMass in the championship game.

St. Bonaventure will be making just its second appearance in the playoff tournament, after going 1-2 in the post-season last year. Charlotte is in its inaugural season as a member of the A-10. The 49ers finished in last place as a member of Conference USA last season.

No limit to Veney's potential

throwing events as well. He said that Veney also shows a lot of promise in the discus and hammer throw events.

"She could probably end up having the school records in all three events," Otrando says.

Currently her best throws in the discus and hammer throws are 144 feet, 10 inches and 138 feet, 4 inches, respectively.

It's clear that Otrando is confident in Veney's talent, as is the rest of the UMass coaching staff which includes head coach Julie LaFreniere and Otrando's wife, jumping coach Antoinette Otrando.

Antoinette was the one who first discovered the impressive Pittsburgh-native as a high school throwing star. What impressed the UMass coaching staff even further were the credentials that Veney had been racking up at Baldwin High School.

Veney was an enormously successful shot put and discus thrower. Her personal best throws of 43 feet, 5.75 inches in the shot put and 159 feet, eight inches in the discus are both school records. In fact, her mark in the discus is almost two feet further than Atlantic 10 Championship record of 157 feet, 5.75 inches set by Michelle Fournier of Rhode Island in 1999.

Veney was an honor roll student all four years and became the Pennsylvania High School Discus Champion as a senior. The potential was obviously there, but it was vitally important that Veney choose a college that would maximize that potential.

Veney decided that UMass would be that college. The deciding selling point: Coach O.

"I think [Otrando] is the best coach I've ever seen. He helps a lot with everything," Veney says. "He helps me stay positive. That's one of the major things I'm working on. The [coaches at other universities] just didn't seem like they cared. But Coach O would always call me after all my high school meets. He'd remember how I far I threw; I couldn't even do that.

"He would just talk to me whenever I would do bad. He'd keep me positive. He outlined what [would] happen if I ever [came] here and he's been true to his word ever since. I couldn't ask for a better coach."

Staying positive is not a hard thing to do when she considers all that she has accomplished. But Veney and her coaches expect even more success.

"I don't feel [my current best throw] is anywhere near my potential of where I can throw this year," Veney says. "I've thrown 46-feet in the shot [during practice], 46-plus, and I want to throw that [in a meet] before I leave my freshman year. I have so many goals and I just don't feel like I've been hitting it.

"Everything that has come up, like breaking the record, making it to ECACs – that's just the icing on the cake. We'll see. I have a lot more potential and I know that with working with Coach O it can come out."

Sometimes people may hear about the great things that UMass athletes do and forget that they are also students, but they are. And Veney had to leap from high school to college just like every other freshman.

"The first semester was rough. It was kind of like 'You have classes, but you don't have to go,'" Veney joked. "It was very different. It was a different atmosphere with everything. But, this semester I definitely found out how to do everything. I've been studying and learning how to study better. So, this semester is definitely a lot better than the first semester."

Veney is officially an undeclared student but has expressed an interest in geology.

Her adjustment to college life comes as no surprise to her coach, however.

"She's young and she's a freshman so she's come along way as far as maturing," Otrando says. "She's been good as far as that goes."

Perhaps it's this maturity that has made her so popular with her upperclassmen teammates, with whose help she has done, and will continue to do, so well.

"She's real popular with teammates," Otrando says. "She's one of the leaders of the team as a freshman. With what she does performance-wise – she places in two, three events every meet; she's a school record holder, so she's earned that respect."

This youngster's zeal and desire to keep breaking school records is perhaps as evident as anything could possibly be. When asked what she thought her next four years have in store for her, she replied, "I want it all."

The lost art of pitching inside

By Gordon Wittenmyer
Knight Ridder

With one out and two men on base a few nights ago in Houston, the worst hitter in the National League stepped to the plate against the best lefthander in the NL.

Seconds later, the first pitch from the Astros' Andy Pettitte's hit St. Louis Cardinals catcher Yadier Molina on the arm, actually, it hit the piece of body armor he had strapped to the arm, and the bases were loaded.

Broadcaster Joe Morgan, a Hall of Fame second baseman, reacted with outrage.

"That's one of the reasons pitchers don't pitch inside anymore," he ranted. "Not because they're afraid to hit them. They're afraid to put them on base. So they pitch them away, and that plays right into the hitter's hands."

As if on cue, the next batter drove a 1-2 pitch into left field for a two-run double.

Morgan's outrage isn't new. And it's not unique to him.

The mastery of pitching inside, effectively and consistently, has been a dying art in big-league baseball for years.

Bigger, stronger hitters strap on armor, crowd the plate, dive into pitches and get indignant if a pitch gets close enough to make them think about doing anything else. Shrinking ballparks, growing earned run averages, and a fear of deep counts and walks have provided decreasing incentive for pitchers to risk mistakes inside.

The result is fewer pitchers than ever commanding enough of the inside part of the plate to make a hitter do anything but settle in and order room service.

Minnesota Twins TV analyst Bert Blyleven, among the best at pitching inside aggressively during a 23-year playing career that might one day lead to the Hall of Fame, has pounded that point repeatedly during recent broadcasts while watching the Twins's once-proud pitching staff get drilled into submission by leaning, diving, comfortable hitters.

Even after a week of improvement, which included veteran Brad Radke turning around a horrendous first month with more aggressive inside pitching against Kansas City on Wednesday, the starting rotation's ERA ranks last in the majors.

"I'm not just talking about one time," Blyleven said of the bust-hitters-inside mantra he has directed at Twins pitchers. "I'm talking about following it up. It might be the third time you have to go back in there. That sends a message to everybody else on the bench.

Blyleven learned that style of pitching from one of the greatest intimidators in history, Hall of Fame Dodger Don Drysdale, through watching Drysdale as a kid in Southern California and then talking to him as a young pitcher in the early 1970s after Drysdale became a broadcaster.

"The one thing I learned from him is that when you're going in there for a purpose and you've made your purpose, go back in there again. Double it up," he said. "Then you've got the hitter maybe thinking. That's exactly where you want him. You want that little bit of doubt.

"The fear factor has to come into play."

Blyleven and other veteran pitching greats make it clear they aren't talking about head hunting.

"It's not about trying to hit anybody. It's just establishing the inner half of the plate," he said. "That's the art of it. That's the art of pitching."

So what happened to all the artists?

Sal "The Barber" Maglie, the famed intimidator who got his nickname for the close shaves he delivered in the 1940s and '50s, never came close to leading the league in hit batsmen but put as many batters in the dirt as any pitcher of his day, or since.

"When I'm pitching, I figure that the plate is mine," he once said, "and I don't like anybody getting too close to it. I gotta throw at 'em. Hell, it's my bread and butter."

Critics of today's more timid, finesse pitching styles often blame the caviar-and-fine wine generation of salaries and players for ignoring the bread and butter.

But the real reasons for this evolution in pitching are more complex.

It all seems to start with the simplest reason: "Because it's harder. It's harder to pitch inside and probably always was," said Paul Splittorff, the former Kansas City pitcher who had 20- and 19-win seasons in the 1970s. "You have better command away, and you don't get hurt as much away as you do inside with a mistake."

Changes in the game since the late 1960s have shifted the advantage to the hitters and made working the outside corners an increasingly pronounced reality. Those factors include lowering the mound in 1969, increased weight training and supplements (legal and otherwise) and a dramatic increase in hitters' ballparks over the past 15 years.

One of the resulting ironies is that as pitchers have become less willing and able to pitch effectively inside, it has become even more important that they do it.

"It's a way to stay alive, a way to survive as a pitcher," said Twins broadcaster Jack Morris, one of the majors' most fearsome competitors during his 18-year pitching career. "If you didn't do it, you either had phenomenal control, or you didn't last."

And phenomenal control alone doesn't get you far in today's slugger-friendly environment – where hitters got an assist starting in 2000 when Major League Baseball mandated warnings and automatic ejections for throwing at hitters.

Morgan's outrage pales compared to Morris' when he watches the way pitchers and hitters interact today.

"When they take swings like they're taking today on pitcher's counts, you've got to say, 'Do I get any respect out here?'" Morris said. "It's part of the game."

Pitching inside, that is. Brushing hitters off the plate.

It has to be part of the game, he said, maybe now more than ever.

"When I first came up," said Splittorff, who debuted in 1970, "most hitters were looking to pull the ball. Now most of your good hitters are good out over the plate to away, and they're going away with more authority than they did, so that has made it tougher.

"So now it's more imperative to pitch effectively inside, and not only to pitch inside off the plate, but to be able to get guys out inside, because they're more vulnerable inside now."

That's because they're leaning, even diving, because they're more comfortable.

"Back then you don't dive," Morris said of his era. "You dive, you're going to get hit. You just do it once, you're going to get hit."

In the decades before Morris pitched, the code was more intense. Hall of Famer Rod Carew said Bob Gibson recently declared the most intimidating pitcher of all-time by a cable TV show – knocked him down in a spring training game for taking too much time to fix the dirt in the batter's box.

Former Twins great Tony Oliva, the only player in major league history to win batting titles in his first two seasons, was so successful so early in his career that veteran pitchers knocked him down four or five times a week, he said, to try to intimidate him.

"I spent one season more on the ground than standing up," Oliva said.

MLB warning system or not, that kind of competitive fire rarely shows up on a big-league diamond these days.

"Today's game is a gentlemen's game," Blyleven said.

Selection show causes anxiety

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

While the majority of the student body piled into the Mullins Center on Sunday night for one last night of Spring Weekend of partying, the 39 members of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team jammed into coach Greg Cannella's office to watch the NCAA Tournament Selection Show.

Rather than listening to Dashboard Confessional and The Roots like their classmates, the players waited impatiently for ESPNEWS to get through the day's NBA playoff highlights and announce the tournament bracket.

There were a few tense moments, as the Minutemen (10-4) had to sit and watch other schools receive at-large bids before finally hearing their name called to take on No. 6 seed Cornell (11-2) Saturday at 1 p.m. in Ithaca, N.Y., but for the most part Cannella was confident that the Minutemen would qualify for their fourth postseason in five years.

"I knew we were in, but I didn't know who we were going to play," Cannella said. "I wasn't nervous; [the players] were pretty nervous. I didn't think there was any way [the committee] could keep us out, especially when you see Harvard up on the board."

Seeing 6-6 Harvard qualify to take on Syracuse in the first segment of the selection show may have put Cannella at ease – the Minutemen beat the Crimson 12-7 on March 11 – but it made some of the players more nervous, as they were forced to sit through a commercial break wondering if Harvard had taken their spot in the tournament.

"I was a little nervous, but we're in," senior captain Sean Morris said. "I kind of figured we were going to play 'Cuse. When they came up and it wasn't us [against them], I got nervous."

Adding to the Minutemen's anxiety was the selection committee's history of snubbing UMass.

"I didn't trust the selection committee because of the way things have played out in the past," senior captain Jack Reid said. "When you don't see your name for a while of course you get more anxious that, for whatever reason, you might not make it."

When UMass was finally announced the players' reaction was equal parts excitement and relief.

"I'm just happy to have that over with," Reid said. "It was a little more anticipation than I wanted to deal with watching that show, but seeing the name called on TV puts the heart at ease."

For Reid, having to sweat out the selection show was symbolic of how the year has gone for the Minutemen, especially the last few weeks, which have been very up-and-down.

Since April 22, UMass has alternated wins and losses, beginning the stretch with an 8-6 loss at Georgetown, following that with an amazing last-minute 7-6 comeback win over Fairfield, and then losing 12-7 at Syracuse before Saturday's 10-5 win over Rutgers in the regular season finale.

"The mix of emotions over the last couple of weeks in general has been an enormous roller-coaster," Cannella said. "We've had some downs after losses to Georgetown and 'Cuse and some high moments after beating Fairfield and the win this weekend. It seems indicative of this season to keep going on this rollercoaster."

Now that the Minutemen are in the postseason, they are confident that they can make a run deep into the tournament.

"I believe it's anybody's year this year, so I'm just happy to be in the tournament," senior captain Jake Deane said. "As they say, the playoffs are a whole new season so it's anybody's game."

"I think this is a Final Four-caliber team and I've had faith in that all season," Reid said.

Senior Jamie Yaman and the Minutemen learned their postseason fate on Sunday night. UMass will play at Cornell Saturday at 1 p.m.

Record-breaking year for freshman Veney

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

Baseball legend Babe Ruth revolutionized the home run and broke his own single-season record four different times (in 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1927). Then, about 60 years later, some hockey player from Brantford, Ontario named Wayne Gretzky stunned the ice world by breaking the assists record five times between 1980-86.

Breaking a record is monumental enough. Never mind re-breaking it and re-breaking it and re-breaking it and...well, you get the idea.

These men transcended their sports and did the impossible.

However, these were professional athletes. And not to say that they were expected to do so much, but they were grown adults who were paid to dedicate every fiber of energy to their respective sports.

Well, whether you know about it or not, something quite similar is happening with an amateur athlete right here in the Pioneer Valley. This amateur athlete is UMass thrower Jordan Veney. But she is no ordinary collegiate athlete, she is a freshman.

Since she began her college athletic career at the beginning of the indoor track and field season, Veney has exploded onto the scene.

At her first college meet, the Northeastern Invitational, she threw the shot a distance of 32 feet, 2 inches to finish 23rd out of 45 throwers – a fine performance for a first meet.

A few weeks later on Jan. 20, however, she really started turning heads.

At the Rhode Island Invitational, Veney posted a throw of 42 feet, eight inches – the second-longest throw in school history.

This performance marked the beginning of a string of seemingly-nonstop progress.

The very next week at the Reebok Boston Indoor Games hosted by Northeastern University, Veney shot herself to the top the UMass record books. She made a throw of 43 feet, 3.75 inches to surpass the record held by UMass alum Carole LaPlante since 1999 by 3.25 inches.

Since that time she has broken her own record four different times, most recently at the Brown Invitational when she recorded a toss of 44 feet, 10.25 inches.

Her unheralded success does not surprise her throwing coach, Bob Otrando, however. "Coach O," as he is known to the athletes, expected to see a lot from the star that he recruited so vigorously and plans to see her accomplishments grow immensely.

"The 44-10 isn't really a surprise to me," Otrando says. "I think she can go, and knows that she can go, 47 feet-plus. So, that's where her potential is and if she gets to that this year, then next year we're going to look at going 48 to 50 feet.

"I recruited her because I thought she'd be a 50-plus foot shot-putter so I'm not going to stand around and get excited about 43-, 44-foot throws where I know down the road she has the athletic ability, and if she focuses and keeps progressing, we're looking at throwing in the 50-[foot range]."

But, make no mistake about it. Veney is much more than a one-skill athlete and Otrando sees just as much potential in her other

Minutemen face rival

After two quiet games against St. Bonaventure, the Massachusetts baseball team's bats came alive in the third game of the series to defeat the Bonnies, 9-6, and avoid the sweep on Sunday.

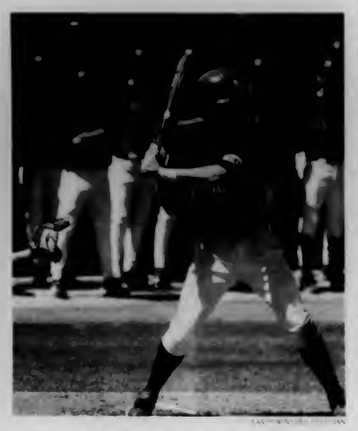
The run total of nine matches the team's offensive output of its previous three games combined. The win for the Minutemen (11-25, 9-12 Atlantic 10) can be attributed to a five-run sixth inning where they took the lead and never looked back. The victory over the Bonnies (22-17, 14-6 A10) also halted a four-game losing streak for the Minutemen.

Today UMass will be taking on Big East opponent Connecticut (28-15-1, 13-5-1 Big East) at Earl Lorden Field. The first pitch is scheduled for 3 p.m. The Huskies defeated the Minutemen in their last matchup in Storrs, Conn. on April 11.

St. Bonaventure jumped out on top early on Sunday with a pair of runs in the first inning off of UMass starter Rory McDonald. A bases-loaded sacrifice fly and an RBI single put the Minutemen in the early hole.

The Bonnies struck again in the fifth inning, putting another two-spot on the board to put UMass deeper in the hole. This time the scoring was done on a one-out double by Matt Mardeusz.

The next inning and a half was all UMass as they posted a combined seven runs in the bottom of the fifth and sixth innings to tie the score and eventually take the lead.



"We just got some clutch hits and made things happen on offense," UMass coach Mike Stone said of his team's offensive outburst.

UMass' five sixth-inning runs came courtesy of three hits and an error that led to all of the runs being unearned.

"We played good defensively and got some relief pitching and that was the key," Stone said. "They put up some zeros on the St. Bonaventure side and it made the difference for us."

Those zeros were posted by Bryan Adamski who pitched four innings in relief. The senior came on in the fifth inning and didn't surrender a SBU run until the top of the eighth.

Once again, today the Minutemen will be sending a first-time starter to the mound. This time it will be freshman Mitchell Eilenberg taking the hill to face UConn. Although the rookie has never started a game, he does have plenty experience for the Sophomore Ryan Franczek and UMass will face UConn today at home at 3 p.m. The Huskies won 7-1 in a matchup earlier this season.

Senior Day caps regular season

The Massachusetts softball team (34-14, 17-3 Atlantic 10) capped off their regular season Sunday with a win over perennial rival UConn (19-29). The Minutewomen won 11-3 in five innings to earn a share of the Atlantic 10 regular season title.

UMass tied Charlotte (42-11, 17-3 A-10) for first in the conference, but a tie-breaker awarded the No. 1 seed in the A-10 Tournament to Charlotte, making UMass the second seed. The Minutewomen will square off against last year's regular season champ, No. 3 Fordham (35-21, 13-5 A-10) on Thursday, to kick-off their postseason.

Sunday was also Senior Day for the Minutewomen, and the day began with honoring the four seniors on the UMass squad. The victory over the Huskies marked the final home game for pitcher Jenna Busa, catcher KJ Kelley, second baseman Kristi Stefanoni and outfielder Lesley Ferrara, who will be graduating this spring.

Busa started in the circle for the Minutewomen and had a strong first inning. She struck out the side, but also gave up a solo home run to UConn's Allie Gendron, giving the Huskies the early 1-0 lead.

UMass came right back in the bottom of the first, however, scoring two runs and taking the lead for good. Amanda Morin and Candice Molinari reached base to start off the inning, and after Whitney Mollica moved them into scoring position with a bunt, KJ Kelley hit a sacrifice fly that brought in Morin from third. One batter later, Amanda Acampora hit a double into left field to score Molinari.

The Maroon and White ended up scoring at least two runs in every inning. In the second, Molinari drove in the two runs with a double to the left field wall that brought Stefanoni and Morin home.

Lauren Proctor kept it going in the third. With runners on the corners and two outs, Stefanoni's steal attempt was successful, and the throw sailed into center field. Proctor easily scored on the play, and Stefanoni advanced to third. She scored on the next at bat, when Morin singled into center field to make the score 6-1 after three innings.

In the top of the fourth, Busa, who had a relatively smooth first three innings, ran into trouble. She gave up three straight singles to load the bases without recording an out. After notching her fifth strikeout of the game for the first out, Busa was hit for a fourth single in the inning, cutting the UMass lead to four. She walked the next batter on four pitches to bring in a third UConn run, making the game 6-3.

Freshman Brandice Balschmiter entered the game for Busa to close out the inning. She got out of the inning on the next at-bat, drawing a double-play ball. Balschmiter fielder a soft grounder herself and threw to Kelley at the plate for the first out. Kelley then fired to Morin at first to get the final out of the inning and complete the 1-2-3 double play.

UMass got the runs back and then some in the bottom of the fourth. Ferrara started the scoring with a two-run double into right-center field that brought Acampora and Proctor around to the plate. Ferrara then scored on the second error of the game for the Huskies.

The score was 9-3 in the fifth, and the Minutewomen needed two more runs to end the game early by mercy rule. They got the runs they needed, but from an unexpected source. After loading the bases with a pair of walks and a single, Busa came to the plate for a rare at-bat. With no outs, Busa reached base on the third UConn error, and Molinari and Mollica scored to end the game 11-3.

Despite the Senior Day festivities, the Minutewomen had their eyes on another game as well. Charlotte was hosting Saint Joseph's (13-38-1, 4-14 A-10) in a doubleheader with major playoff implications. A sweep by the 49ers would create a tie between UMass and Charlotte for the top spot in the conference, but a loss in either game by the 49ers would clinch the title for the Minutewomen.

Charlotte won the first game easily, 4-1, but had a tougher battle on their hands the second time around. The 49ers fell behind 4-3 to the Hawks in the fifth inning, but scored two more in the bottom of the frame to take the lead. They held on for the win and a

The Massachusetts women's crew team ended its season Saturday with its fifth consecutive Eastern College Athletic Conference Metro League Cup.

The Minutewomen won three out of the six events at Lake Quinsigamond in Worcester. They earned 70 points en route to capturing the trophy. Buffalo was second with 58 points, followed by Rhode Island (53), Boston College (52) and Colgate (49). There were 13 schools in all that competed for the Cup.

"It was a big weekend for us – we had a lot of big wins," said UMass coach Jim Dietz, who was unable to make the trip due to illness.

The Maroon and White won the varsity-eight, second varsity-eight and the second novice-eight races.

The first varsity-eight boat for UMass was comprised of sophomore coxswain Dana Pulda, and rowers Ellen Maskrey, Gabrielle Papineau, Stephanie Hopf, Sarah Marsan, Hannah Brewster, Amanda Mawn, Katie Berger and Catherine Ganeys.

"They were favored going," Dietz said of the first varsity-eight squad that won the Grand Final in 7:07.055. "I think everybody realized they're a very good crew. I think they met every body's expectations, mine and their own."

The team beat the second-place team from URI by over three seconds. Before the Minutewomen won the Grand Final, they won their heat to advance with one of their best times of the season – around 6:39.

UMass' second varsity-eight boat won by more than five seconds with a time of 7:13.248.

Rowing to the victory for UMass was senior coxswain Natalie Salerno, and rowers Faith Miller, Farrell Klein,

UMass professor to serve as chair of FDIC

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Staff

Last week President George W. Bush nominated a University of Massachusetts professor to serve as chair of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. (FDIC). Sheila C. Bair has been at the University since 2003 and is currently the Dean's professor of financial regulator policy at the Isenberg School of Management.

Bair previously served as an assistant secretary of the treasury for financial institutions from 2001-2002. Since obtaining her law degree from the University of Kansas, she has garnered over two decades of policy experience in Washington D.C., serving as staff council to Sen. Robert Dole and as acting chair of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission in 1994. Bair has also had ample experience in private enterprise as Senior Vice President for Government Relations for the New York Stock Exchange.

Her teaching work includes both graduate and undergraduate instruction on topics ranging from insurance markets to corporate risk management. Last fall, she taught a graduate level course on public policy with Thomas O'Brien, dean of the Isenberg School of Management.

"The students liked the course; she has a great background with deep knowledge," said O'Brien.

He added that by sharing her story and experience with the students, she helped to engage them in the material and show what a broad path might be available to them.

Bair was unable to offer comment because of Senate protocols for nominees. However, her colleagues are very excited about the nomination, and about what it means for both professor Bair and the University.

"It's a great tribute to her reputation; usually in Washington once you're out, you're out. [Washington] hated to see her go," said O'Brien.

"It reflects very well on us; part of what you want in a business school is to raise your profile outside of the local area," said Professor Nelson Lacey, chair of the Department of Finance and Operations Management.

O'Brien said that Bair would be on a leave of absence for her five-year term as head of the FDIC, and that hopefully she would return to the University with new and valuable experiences to share with the students. However, her loss leaves a gap in the department.

"I don't think a replacement for her is easily found," said Lacey.

According to Lacey, Bair was a great fit for the department because her experience and fields of expertise, especially in the regulation of financial institutions and insurance, were lacking in the rest of the department.

The FDIC creates a low-premium insurance policy for up to $100,000 on individual accounts for member banks. It was started in 1933 as a response to the panics that had characterized the start of the Great Depression. Bair currently serves on policy boards for the FDIC's Advisory Committee on Banking Policy. As chair of the FDIC, she would be responsible for helping to guide the FDIC through a number of important upcoming decisions which, according to the Wall Street Journal, include approving deposit insurance for Wal-Mart, allowing commercial firms to provide more banking services and resolving the relationship between banks and "payday lenders."

Plagiarism runs rampant on Internet

By Karen Aman
Daily Titan (Cal State-Fullerton)

FULLERTON, Calif. — For California State University-Fullerton students, most things available online – like music – are free for the taking. Some may not believe that cheating is stealing, but others argue that committing plagiarism is no different.

According to Plagiarism.com, plagiarism has never been easier. The Internet enables a plagiarizer to find sources in seconds and quickly compose a term paper or other copy.

The meaning of plagiarism is clear to CSUF biochemistry major, Phung Le, 19.

"Plagiarism is when you take another person's work and call it your own," Le said. "I would rather take an F than cheat. You cheat in high school, you cheat in college, you cheat in life," she said.

Students who cheat are lazy, said English-history major Margaret Butterfield.

"It's so much easier for students to cheat now having the Internet," she said.

According to a 1991 Rutgers University study, 66 percent of 16,000 students from 31 U.S. campuses cheated at least once. Twelve percent of students cheated regularly. The average is seven out of 10 students cheat, one of which cheats all the time.

Matt Tucker, 21, a biochemistry major, said he cheated once in high school, but he would not cheat now.

"You don't really learn, and the stuff I'm studying now, I really need to know," he said.

Officials at the University of California-Berkeley reported that cheating on campus increased an estimated 744 percent between 1993 and 1997.

Levels of cheating and plagiarism remain high, said Don McCabe, founder of the Center for Academic Integrity.

The center is affiliated with the Kenan Institute for Ethics at Duke University in Durham, N.C., and "provides a forum to identify, affirm, and promote the values of academic integrity among students, faculty, teachers and administrators."

The Center for Academic Integrity completed a survey in 2002 that measured academic integrity. The survey polled almost 50,000 undergraduates from more than 60 campuses. The center found the results alarming.

On most campuses, 70 percent of students admitted to cheating. Almost 25 percent of students admitted to serious cheating, and 50 percent admitted to cheating one or more times on written assignments.

Most students think that copying a sentence or two is not a problem, according to the survey. Students admitting to such behavior reached 10 percent in 1999, and 40 percent admitted to the offense in the surveys.

Cheating is not a very serious crime, 77 percent of students said.

The penalty for plagiarism depends on the intent of a student and the extent of the plagiarism, CSUF English Professor Debi Lyn Esquivel said. Some students simply incorrectly cite sources, she said.

About half of all high school students admitted to some level of Internet plagiarism, and 36 percent of undergraduates have admitted to plagiarizing written material.

Esquivel has failed one student for plagiarizing.

"A student was sorority sisters with a student who had taken my class a previous semester. The student turned in the same paper her sister did a couple semesters back," Esquivel said.

She failed the student because the action was so blatantly dishonest, she said.

Honor codes help combat the problem of plagiarism.

Serious test cheating on campuses with honor codes is typically one-third to one-half lower than the level on campuses that do not have honor codes, according to the report.

Professors have one weapon against plagiarism, the same one that students use to give them the advantage on papers: The Internet. Many professors can turn to Turnitin.com.

Turnitin.com was born of iParadigms, a Northern California company that researchers at UC-Berkeley started in 1996 to track copying of research papers by their undergraduates. According to iParadigms, the goals of Turnitin.com are to stop Internet plagiarism and to advance novel tools in education.

Turnitin.com reports the percentage of plagiarized information in a document. If an essay comes back 5 percent to 12 percent plagiarized, Esquivel said, she usually assumes the student got the citing rules wrong.

If a paper comes back 80 to 100 percent plagiarized, Esquivel assumes the person intended to cheat. The most plagiarized paper she has gotten from a student was in her English 301 class, she said.

Turnitin.com has since expanded and offers a range of other programs, including a series of tools to aid teachers in grading and evaluating assignments and to help students review and respond to their classmates' work online.

O'Toole to resign as Boston's top cop

By Mark Pratt
Associated Press

BOSTON — Kathleen O'Toole, the first female police commissioner in Boston's history, plans to resign amid reports she is the top candidate to become chief inspector of Ireland's national police force, a source familiar with O'Toole's decision said Tuesday.

The resignation was expected to be announced at a City Hall news conference late Tuesday.

The source, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity, would give no details of O'Toole's resignation.

O'Toole's decision comes after just over two years with Boston's top job, and in the midst of a surge in violence that's seen seven people murdered in seven days. O'Toole, 52, was the only candidate for the new position of chief inspector of the Garda Siochana, Ireland's 12,000-strong police force.

O'Toole, who took charge of the Boston force in February 2004, has already confirmed she has been telephoned by Irish government officials canvassing her interest in the position.

Two Irish government officials told the AP that O'Toole was the Justice Department's confirmed and only candidate for the post, and her nomination will be presented formally to Prime Minister Bertie Ahern at the Cabinet meeting next week, probably Tuesday. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because the full Cabinet must approve offering the job to O'Toole before it is announced publicly.

O'Toole came to Irish attention when she served as a commissioner on an international panel that authored a mammoth reform program for the predominantly Protestant police force in Northern Ireland, a critical plank of the 1998 peace accord for the British territory.

She also has personal and family interests in Ireland. Her daughter Meghan is currently studying at the National University of Ireland in Galway.

Experts: U.S. hasty in brushoff of Iran

By Ali Akbar Dareini
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran – Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's abrupt dismissal of a letter from Iran's president might only strengthen hardline attitudes and mistrust of America, some Iranians warned Tuesday. As President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad began a high-profile visit to a key Muslim country, Indonesia, a former top Iranian official said Rice's response will give new justification to those who oppose ties with the United States.

Iran's former ambassador to France, Sadeq Kharrazi, said the letter — the first from an Iranian head of state to an American president in 27 years — "could have been a turning point in relations." But he said Rice squandered the opportunity with what he called a "hasty reaction."

"This gives a pretext to those in Iran who oppose re-establishment of ties with America," he said.

Ahmadinejad's 18-page letter to President Bush touched only indirectly on the hottest dispute between the two countries — Iran's nuclear program. Instead, it focuses on a long list of grievances against the United States and seeks to build on a shared faith in God to resolve them.

Rice told The Associated Press the letter "isn't addressing the issues that we're dealing with in a concrete way."

Iranian political analyst Saeed Leilaz said Rice's quick brushoff would fuel anti-American feelings in Iran.

"It could have been the beginning of a new process," he said. Rice's response "strengthens the suspicion (inside Iran) that the U.S. is thinking of a military option only and not a political solution" to the standoff over Iran's nuclear program, he said.

As he boarded a plane for Indonesia on Tuesday, Ahmadinejad said his letter contained "the demands of Iranian people and our nation."

"I discussed our views, beliefs and positions regarding international issues as well as some ways out of problems humanity is suffering from," he told the official Islamic Republic News Agency. "We will wait for reaction ... and then we'll make decisions."

In Indonesia — the world's most populous Muslim nation, which has friendly ties with the United States and European countries — Ahmadinejad was due to discuss the nuclear issue with the country's president, then attend a summit of developing nations.

"We want Iran to be more transparent in its program," Indonesian Foreign Minister Hassan Wirajuda told reporters Tuesday.

The United States accuses Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, a charge Tehran denies, saying it aims only to generate energy.

Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi said the letter was not intended to address the nuclear issue. "We have sufficient logic and legal reasoning (to defend our program)," Asefi was quoted by the radio as saying.

"Our aim was to express our opinions about global problems and the way out of these problems," he said.

Reaction to the letter was mixed in Iran and across the Mideast.

Iranian newspapers described the message as "an initiative in global diplomacy" and "dialogue under the shadow of war."

But conservative lawmaker Hashmatollah Falahatpisheh lambasted Ahmadinejad for failing to consult parliament before sending the letter to the country. Iran considers its greatest enemy.

"This message is the outcome of a series of taboo-breaking behaviors in Iran's foreign policy. ... That the parliament is not aware of (the contents of the) letter is questionable," Falahatpisheh told an open session of the parliament broadcast live on state-run radio Tuesday.

Among Gulf nations, the letter fueled suspicions toward Iran.

The Saudi-owned daily Asharq Al-Awsat called the letter proof that "Iran is not enriching uranium for peaceful purposes as it says, and is striving for leadership and control of the region."

Such Iranian leadership would mean the Israeli-Palestinian peace process "would be stalled, the Iraqi dream (of democracy) would be thwarted and we would witness a new wave of armament," wrote Tariq Alhomayed, the paper's editor-in-chief.

The Kuwaiti newspaper Arab Times ran an editorial in which editor-in-chief Ahmed Al-Jarallah accused Ahmadinejad of acting "as if he owns the region."

Some of Iran's Arab neighbors have expressed fears over Iran's nuclear program — particularly over pollution in case of an accident — as well as over the standoff with the West, fearing possible Iranian retaliation against American military bases in Kuwait, Qatar and Bahrain should the United States launch a pre-emptive strike.

But an editorial in Lebanon's The Daily Star newspaper called the letter "a cause for hope that a peaceful solution" to the nuclear standoff and called on Washington to initiate direct talks with Tehran.

Anti-war coalition to debate Iraqi conflict

The Anti-War Coalition at the University of Massachusetts is sponsoring a formal student debate this Thursday on the current conflict in Iraq.

The discussion will allow equal time for both sides — for students who are for and against the war — to express their opinions, organizers say.

The debate will be civilized and without many interruptions or people speaking over each other, says organizer Ethan Burke.

"Regardless of where one stands on the issue of the Iraq War, we hope all can agree that dialogue and discussion is beneficial to a democratic society," said Burke, a member of the UMass Anti-War Coalition, who will be speaking at the event.

Speaking in defense of the war in Iraq will be UMass students Hirak Shah and Joe Kelley, and expressing views against the war are Anti-War Coalition members Burke and Justin Jackson.

Dan O'Brien, the News Editor of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, will be moderating the event.

The discussion will take place this Thursday, May 11 at 7 p.m. in room 101 of the UMass Campus Center. All students and community members are encouraged to attend.

Merrimack man arrested on drug possession

9:21 p.m.

Matthew Dillon Graessle, 18, of 4 Hoxie Lane in Sandwich, was arrested on charges of possession of a Class D drug with intent to distribute and being a minor in possession of alcohol. Representing party calling from Patterson dorm detected a strong odor of marijuana coming from a room. Officers responded and also detected the odor. The door was opened by the arrested party, Graessle. He was found to be the sole resident of the room, which is a single, but five other people were inside his room. Marijuana was in plain view, as well as beer. Other paraphernalia and equipment consistent with distribution of marijuana were present as well. All of the aforementioned items were confiscated, including the beer. Graessle was placed under arrest and transported to the University of Massachusetts Police Department station.

12:51 a.m.

Frank Chi, 19, of 7 Farmhill Road in Wrentham, was arrested for disorderly conduct. Police received a report of a suspicious person in Washington tower, in which the representing party asked for assistance in escorting the person out. The person was identified as Chi and was found to be a former resident of the building who had been previously trespassed. When police arrived, Chi was found highly intoxicated and kneeling on the floor in front of the elevator. Officers attempted to get him up, but he flopped around on the floor. When officers attempted to escort him out of the building, he began to scream and attempted to shove officers out of the way. He was subsequently placed under arrest.

8:28 p.m.

Sameer Gandhi, 19, of 87 Middlesex Road in Merrimack, N.H., was arrested on charges of being a minor in possession of alcohol, possession of a Class D drug, possession of a Class C drug with intent to distribute and possession of a Class B drug. An officer observed a person attempting to put beer cans into a back pack. He appeared not to be 21 years of age, and a license check confirmed that he was not of age. While removing cans from the backpack, police found another bag inside that had two small bags that appeared to contain mushrooms. Officers found mushrooms, marijuana and two yellowish pills identified as oxycodone-acetaminophen. The above items, along with a large amount of money, were seized and taken into custody. A search on rxlist.com found that oxycodone-acetaminophen is found in Percocet.

Monday May8

8:15 p.m.

Max E. Goldin, 18, of 35 Amis Street in Sharon, was arrested for disturbing the peace. Reporting party called about a male that had knocked on her door and asked questions about the make and model of her laptop, and insisted on entering the room. The male was never let in, and the reporting party slammed her door shut. He refused to leave the area, and remained outside and continued to walk back and forth outside of the room before knocking on her door again, which scared her. Goldin is a UMass student, and was not issued a trespass because of his student status.

Body of missing girl found in Crantson

CRANSTON, R.I.—The body of a missing 8-year-old Woonsocket girl was found in a wooded area in Cranston early Monday, and police charged the 20-year-old boyfriend of her baby sitter with her killing.

Joshua Davis of Woonsocket was ordered held without bail at his arraignment Monday afternoon in Providence District Court on one count of murder in the slaying of Savannah Smith.

David Smith, Savannah's father, said Davis was a neighbor of the family. He said he saw Davis driving away with his daughter Sunday after she asked him if she could go to the store with Davis, and he said no.

"She's waving. She's in the front seat all happy," David Smith said. "I said no. I told it right to him, 'No.'"

He said his daughter often talked to Davis, and would not have been afraid to go with him because she spoke to him every day.

"He was a nice guy, played along with the kids just like most neighbors would," Smith said.

Prosecutor J. Patrick Youngs said Davis took her from Woonsocket to Cranston, then killed her.

Savannah's body was found at about 3:30 a.m. Monday in the woods, near an industrial area in Cranston, said Michael Healey, a spokesman for state Attorney General Patrick Lynch.

Savannah's mother, Lisa Smith, said her daughter was a vibrant, happy child who loved to laugh.

Over a dozen people arrested for fight at Curry Hicks Cage

BY BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A series of disorderly conduct arrests were made following a hip-hop dance titled "Funkathon" at the Curry Hicks Cage last Saturday night.

Numerous police officers were at the event and outside of the building. A number of fights outside the venue required the attention of all officers present at the scene. 11 people were arrested on charges of disorderly conduct at this time.

The parties arrested for disorderly conduct are as follows: Luis A. Garcia-Lopez, 19, of 2055 Creston Avenue in Bronx, N.Y.; Dean Jason Perkins, 20, of 112 Wintergreen Ave in New Haven, Conn.; Adrian Wyse, 20, of 1314 Albemarle Road in Brooklyn, N.Y.; Steven Fabius, 22, of 85 Custer Street in Stamford, Conn.; Urmin Arias, 21, of 137 East Street 620 in Bronx, N.Y.; Keyshawn Narcisse, 21, of 53 Grosvenor Street in Springfield; Charles F. Gregg, 26, of 2026 7th Avenue 4C in New York, N.Y.; Richmond Pittman, 24, of 110 Rosewood Street in Mattapan; Christopher Larose, 21, of 79 Bowden Street in Hamden, Conn.; Joseph Mombeleur, 20, of 23 Daily Road in Brockton; and Andi Kita, 18, of 15 Pemberton Street in Worcester.

Oluwagbena Osinubi, 22, of 37 Hutchings Street Apt. 1 in Boston, was also arrested at this time for possession of a Class D drug; an amount of marijuana and a pipe were found on him upon being patted down at the entrance to the Cage.

Soon after the arrests, a fight broke out in the parking lot outside of John Adams tower, where a party used a flashlight to crack the back of a person's skull. It is reported that the victim was struck at least twice by the flashlight. University of Massachusetts Police Deputy Chief Pat Archbald said that roughly eight separate units arrived at the scene for an estimate of 12 to 15 officers on the scene.

Archbald reported that there were four cars full of non-student visitors present in the lot, and that one party engaged in a verbal altercation with another party when things escalated.

Archbald also reported a bit of a language barrier with the visitors, as they appeared to be of Albanian descent and only one "spoke fluent English." They were reportedly not at the "Funkathon" dance, but here for a party and were dropping someone off in Southwest. All of the visitors of Albanian descent were said to be from the Worcester area.

Demian Vennell, 36, of 31 Greenwich Road in Amherst, was identified as the assailant, and was arrested on two counts of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (flashlight). He was the only person at the scene arrested at the time.

It is not known if any of the fights were gang-related.

Kerry 'troubled' by nomination of Gen. Hayden to head CIA

BY KATHARINE WEBSTER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NASHUA, N.H.—Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic nominee for president in 2004 and a possible contender in 2008, told a firefighters' union Monday that he had "serious reservations" about the nomination of Air Force Gen. Michael Hayden to head the CIA.

"I'm very troubled by the nomination because he is one of the main supporters representing Donald Rumsfeld who helped to put in place the programs of spying on Americans and has been one of the biggest defenders of it," Kerry said.

Sen. Joseph Biden, a Democrat from Delaware and another presidential hopeful, also addressed the union, saying that Hayden's appointment could lead to more resignations in the CIA. Hayden, a Rumsfeld ally, "is just a means in which we'll lose the rest of the institutional memory of the CIA," he said.

President Bush nominated Hayden as CIA director Monday, after former director Porter Goss resigned under pressure Friday. Hayden, former head of the National Security Agency, ran a controversial domestic surveillance program initiated after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

A number of congressmen and senators have said the program violated the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act because intelligence officials failed to get permission for monitoring domestic phone calls from a secret intelligence court.

"We passed the law that gave them all the ability to protect America, which I obviously want to do, but to protect America and also protect the constitution," Kerry told reporters after a formal speech to the Professional Fire Fighters of New Hampshire.

"We gave them a court that they could go to on the shortest notice necessary. If they need to fix (the law), we'll help them fix it, but we want to do it in a way that honors America's respect for our constitution," he said.

Biden said the administration's priorities are wrong; a higher value is placed on tax cuts for the rich than homeland security, he said. Then, along came Katrina, "and it blew away the illusion that we were prepared, that we had kept any of our promises," he said.

One by one, colleges with swim tests throw in the towel

BY JUSTIN POPE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

(AP)—On a recent Friday morning, a line of bathing-suit clad students stood beside a campus swimming pool, waiting to jump in. They had come to persuade the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill they were worthy of a college degree — which they were not, in UNC's eyes, until they could swim 50 yards and tread water for five minutes.

For many, it was an annoying inconvenience, for others a moment of pride in conquering their fear of water. But the scene also was a small slice of collegiate history. This was the last swim test day at one of the last remaining colleges to require it. Following a wide-ranging curriculum review, this year's seniors are the last at UNC who must pass the test to graduate.

The change is a sad one for Meg Pomerantz, who lobbied unsuccessfully to keep the requirement and who teaches swim classes for students who need them to pass the test. "In my 16 years here, I've never had a student take the course and say anything other than, 'I'm really glad I learned how to do this,'" she said.

A half-century ago, passing a swim test was a common requirement on college campuses. In an era before health clubs, yoga and aerobics, swimming was both a popular exercise option and a skill colleges believed men and women should master — both for their own safety and for social reasons.

But swimming has lost its prominent place in campus physical education as the finishing school element has faded and other fitness options have multiplied.

At UNC, Pomerantz says the faculty "looked at all the different things they wanted students to achieve — diversity, experiential education, being able to apply what you learn." Focusing on the single skill of swimming just didn't fit, though Pomerantz contends it's still worthwhile.

As recently as a 1977 survey, 42 percent of institutions had some sort of swimming requirement, according to Larry Hensley, a University of Northern Iowa professor who has studied the history of physical education. But by 1982 that figure had plummeted to 8 percent. Subsequent surveys no longer bothered to ask about swimming requirements.

In 2003, Ferrum College in Virginia dropped its swim test. Colgate threw in the towel last year. The holdouts now include Notre Dame, MIT, Cornell, Columbia, Hamilton, Dartmouth, Swarthmore, and Washington & Lee, plus the service academies.

The requirement is fertile ground for campus legends, some true, most not. Before Notre Dame began admitting women in the early 1970s, students did indeed take the test in the buff. But there's apparently no solid evidence behind any of the oddly similar stories that circulate on many campuses about how the test started: A wealthy donor whose son drowns gives money for the pool on the condition that the college require a swim test.

In fact, many swimming requirements date to the early 20th century, when there was a national effort to improve water safety, or more specifically to World War I and World War II, when college campuses became military training grounds and the country underwent bouts of anxiety over its physical fitness.

Most tests today aren't particularly demanding — usually a couple of laps and treading water for five to 15 minutes.

But at the Naval Academy, the standard is 1,000 meters in 40 minutes, among other tasks. And perhaps the mother of all swim tests — "Survival Gate Four" — can be found at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. Weighed down by heavy equipment, cadets must perform several tasks in a pool amid simulated battlefield chaos. Artificial fog, rain and deafening noise are pumped in, the darkness is punctuated only by strobed lightning, and the water is churned by artificial wavemakers.

"Falling into 84-degree water — Club Med we call it — is a lot different than falling into the Hudson River on a winter day," says John McVan, who oversees West Point's aquatics program. "We're not only teaching people how to swim, we're teaching them how to swim in conditions that might not be nice."

But McVan takes great pride that, even though 5 percent of cadets arrive unable to swim, virtually all pass Survival Gate Four within a year.

Other schools also say students have every opportunity to learn. Cornell's director of physical education, Al Gantert, says it's virtually impossible to fail to graduate because of the swim test. Up to 450 students each year take beginning swimming. Technically, if they attend and make an effort for two semesters, that's good enough.

"If we cannot teach a student to swim in two semesters, that's our fault, not their's," Gantert said.

Fewer and fewer schools, however, think requiring a test is worthwhile.

There are administrative hassles finding instructors and accommodating students with chlorine allergies or religious objections to being seen in bathing suits. But mostly, it's just a headache getting hundreds of college students to show up for any one event at an appointed time and place.

At Colgate, biology professor Ken Belanger, who was chair of the committee on athletics, said students were called back from senior week travels to take the test; others took it so late senior year they didn't make it into the graduation program. Occasionally, they didn't graduate at all.

"I think the fact that there were students who were not graduating because of this requirement led people to question its validity," he said.

Still, traditionalists at Colgate and elsewhere have opposed the changes.

Pomerantz notes that North Carolina has a lot of water, and a student at another college there drowned recently. Students should have choices, but "you don't really have a choice if you fall into a lake." Furthermore, students who learn to swim will likely teach their children, making them safer, too.

"As we teach them, we break a multigenerational cycle," Gantert said.

The requirement also boosts confidence. When a Cornell faculty committee evaluated the test in 1998, Gantert recounted seeing students in one class following a struggling classmate along the pool, urging him on until he finished. He told the faculty: "Where else at Cornell University when somebody passes a test is the whole class cheering?" The faculty kept the test.

One of the seniors in line at UNC for the last test was Peter Clayton, who can do the laps but failed repeated attempts to tread water for five minutes ("I sink like a rock," he said). He came up just short again, leaving him scrambling for yet another crack at passing the requirement.

Officials granted him one — and Clayton finally passed. He floated on his back and distracted himself by thinking of all the work he needed to finish. Before he knew it, the five minutes were up.

"I was overjoyed," he said.

Still, Clayton maintains the test shouldn't be a graduation requirement. A CPR or first aid requirement would be more likely to save a life, he said. In the middle of the ocean, how much good would a back float do?

"I highly doubt 'Jaws' would wait five minutes before gobbling me up."

Police say teen shooter had been arrested for carjacking

BY MATTHEW BARAKAT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHANTILLY, Va.—A heavily armed teenager who killed a detective and wounded two officers in a shootout outside a suburban Washington police station had recently been arrested on carjacking charges, officials said Tuesday.

Michael W. Kennedy, 18, was crouched down between two vehicles in the station parking lot when he opened fire on the unsuspecting officer Monday afternoon, officials said.

An officer sitting in his cruiser was critically wounded in the attack, and Detective Vicky Armel, who had just walked out of the station, was shot and killed.

"This was an unprovoked attack, an ambush," Fairfax County Police Chief David Rohrer said Tuesday.

In all, the young shooter fired off at least 70 rounds before he was killed, Maj. Bob Callahan said. He said the teen had been armed with a high-powered hunting rifle, five pistols and an AK-47-style assault weapon.

Kennedy, of Centreville, had attempted another carjacking that day and was driving another stolen vehicle just before the attack, officials said. Armel had been headed out from the Sully District Police Station to assist the investigation when she was killed.

Four weeks earlier, Kennedy had been arrested by Fairfax police on a warrant connected to a carjacking in nearby Montgomery County, Md.

According to police reports, a 33-year-old man had been forced from his vehicle by a suspect who claimed to have a gun. Kennedy reportedly turned himself in to Fairfax police at one of their district stations and was held on a fugitive warrant charge. He was released after posting a $33,000 bond, court records showed.

Mary Ann Jennings, a Fairfax County police spokeswoman, said that on Monday there was another attempted carjacking and a van was stolen shortly before the officers were attacked. The stolen van was recovered in the police station parking lot.

She said police didn't know "exactly who he (Kennedy) was targeting except to say he was targeting police officers."

"All information points to the act of a lone, troubled individual — not a conspiracy, not the act of terrorism," said Fairfax County Board of Supervisors Chairman Gerald Connolly. "It would appear that the gunman specifically targeted our police."

Armel, 40, was a nine-year veteran of the Fairfax County Police Department. Her husband is also a detective in the department, and she had two elementary school-aged children.

"On the day she died, she was doing her job right to the last moment. It's the kind of person she was," said Fairfax County Commonwealth's Attorney Robert Horan, Jr.

A childhood friend of Kennedy, Ryan Owen, said Tuesday he couldn't believe Kennedy was responsible for the shootings.

He described him as having a "punk-gothic kind of thing going" in terms of his dress but said he had an eclectic group of friends.

Police taped off the home where Kennedy lived with his parents as they searched for evidence Monday night.

The wounded 53-year-old officer remained in critical condition Tuesday after undergoing surgery overnight, officials. The other injured officer, a 28-year-old man, suffered minor injuries.

The shooting touched off hours of gridlock and confusion in the area as roads were blocked and nearby buildings, including a high school, were locked down as police sought other possible suspects before determining there was only one gunman.

Police block the road to a police station in Chantilly, Va., after a gunman opened fire at the police station in Chantilly, Monday, May 8, 2006, wounding three officers.

Live life with a mission

Zach Oelschlegel

I've often wondered why people die young. It's tragic, really. I think we all cringe when we see the late night news and hear about a 19-year-old killed by a drunk driver. Or we see family members slowly waste away, cancer consuming all that they have left. It's sad to see someone in constant pain from a debilitating disease like multiple sclerosis, or muscular dystrophy, or someone with chronic back pain, whether they're a child or baby boomer or someone else.

The simple fact is that our bodies break down, perhaps too easily. Any guy in your engineering class will explain the embarrassment the human vertebrae are to structure, doctors will tell you about the purposelessness of the appendix, or how, other than deciding to explode unannounced and dentists will pull their wisdom teeth only good for crisscrossing and messing up the other 28.

A growing term for this phenomenon of inefficient and somewhat weird organs and structures contained in our bodies is Incompetent Design, a counter to the Intelligent Design debate you see school districts and senators shit-quibbling about. Intelligent Design makes the case that empirical scientific evidence, all across nature, would best be explained by design.

Incompetent Design looks at nature, more specifically the human body, and makes the case that so-called designer must have been a moron, an amateur, considering how the human body breaks down with relative ease.

Our frailty is a reminder of death. When you think about it, understanding this frailty is one of the most important realizations we can have in this life.

Too often, the realization comes much later than it should, typically when it's too late. In order to understand we are going to die, oftentimes we must watch ourselves or someone else face death. Yet, if we never confront our mortality, all we end up doing is leading passive lives. We become bored, stale creatures, full of potential but never seizing it. Even worse, amidst all the frailty we see in the world today, we still fail to live up to others' expectations (and our own) for what we grasp in life.

Pink Floyd masterfully describes this state of mind in the song "Time," as Roger Waters writes, "Ticking away the moments that make up a dull day. You fritter and waste the hours in an off hand way. Kicking around on a piece of ground in your home town. Waiting for someone or something to show you the way."

I'm writing this now because I am convinced the realization of frailty should awaken us to live differently . . . Forrest Gump pondered whether this life was a matter of destiny or simply mankind floating around as if on a breeze. I think it's a lot more complicated than that.

One of the troubles is how it takes a huge shove for us to go and do something with our lives. We continue to live without any sense of purpose — no mission to our lives — and become content doing so. We do this because we forget how little time we truly have.

Waters goes on to write, "And then one day you find ten years have got behind you. No one told you when to run. You missed the starting gun."

I am graduating in a matter of weeks. I've written for this paper since my sophomore year, with over 30 columns under my belt, and there is huge purpose to why I chose this column to be my last. I'm writing this now because I am convinced the realization of frailty should awaken us to live differently. Forrest Gump pondered whether this life was a matter of destiny or simply mankind floating around as if on a breeze. I think it's a lot more complicated than that.

A friend who went to church with me growing up, Jake Berkowitz, recently died from brain cancer. He was only 22. He captured every aspect of the phrase "only the good die young." Some people would look at his death and wonder why something so terrible would happen to such a wonderful man. They would struggle searching for the purpose.

I see Jake's death as utterly meaningful. Sometimes all it takes is a broken bone or bad back to remember how close we really are to leaving this life. Sadly, more often it takes the death of someone else to fully conceive the concept. Jake didn't die in vain, but he gave us a grim reminder of how short this life is. Jake's death gave me, and countless others, that swift kick in the ass to get up and move: to live with a mission.

This isn't a call to "eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we die." I don't think we were born to live a short 75 years, whereupon we return to our rightful place among the soil of the earth, but rather our lives are woven into a much larger story beyond our comprehension. I believe we were designed to live, not merely exist, with a reason. I believe this designer we had did not want us to be idle creatures, but something much more, humans that would live knowing there was so much to do and so little time to do it. Our own frailty is really one of the best friends we have. What will it take for you to realize it?

Not everyone wants the American way

World Perspectives
Asif Khan

I am sitting in my apartment in Buenos Aires looking out at a lot of buildings and a clear blue sky. We are having an Indian summer here right before winter (that is a few weeks). One of the things I am looking forward to going back to the northern hemisphere is another summer and no cold weather for another couple of months.

I have come to the end of my stay here in South America and simultaneously the end of my undergrad career, and what five years they have been. I would have extended it if I could have, but my parents would not appreciate or permit that anymore.

I came to study in the United States in 2001, and one week after I started college, the Sept. 11 attacks happened and the political and social climate in the United States and in the world changed drastically. Being Muslim and having grown up in a Muslim country, and being one of few in my dorm building, I was called on to explain a number of things about Islam, as well as Middle Eastern culture and politics. I myself learnt a lot looking at that area of the world from an outside point of view and through the eyes of others.

Subsequently, Afghanistan was attacked and the much-loathed Taliban government was toppled, which was ironic because it was created and aided a great deal by the United States during the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s. Less than a year later, with no Bin Laden in sight and growing public resentment in the United States, the case for an attack on Iraq was made, and even after intense outcry and demonstrations in the United States, as well as the rest of the world, that country was attacked and thousands died.

Afghanistan was attacked and the much loathed Taliban government was toppled, which was ironic because it was created and aided a great deal by the United States during the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s.

To this day, an average of 20 to 30 people a day are killed in Iraq — a country that had no connection to the Sept. 11 attacks or Al-Qaida but now is a breeding ground for extremists and recruiting for Al-Qaida.

Muslims started to see a pattern when Iran came under the spotlight as being the next country that needs to have a government change and is a "rogue state." The case is being furthered by the current administration, and the world is waiting to see what will happen.

I read an article today that explored if a U.S. attack on Iran would be in self-defense, and thus, legal. How is that even plausible to argue? If that is self-defense, then wouldn't an Iranian attack on the United States be justified as well?

The facts lean more towards the justification of such an attack if one looks at recent history. The United States supported a brutal, unpopular monarchy in Iran for more than two decades after helping depose the democratically elected government of Mossadegh in 1953 after he nationalized his country's oil reserves. The Islamic Revolution took place in 1979 with the support of students, religious clergy and socialists, and a new government took control of the country. The United States broke off all diplomatic contact with the new Republic and vice versa.

The hostage crisis followed suit, and then mostly successful attempts were made by various U.S. administrations to alienate Iran from the world economy. Later, coups were planned, similar to those directed towards Castro's Cuba with the help of exiles. All these measures aggravated the Republic even further and relations severed.

Today, Iran has a large, growing population and economy with high energy needs, and thus, seeks to produce nuclear energy, which it says is for peaceful purposes only. For a while, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) was in and out of the country and did not find anything illegal taking place.

However, now relations between the IAEA and Iran are not too good. The matter is still a world matter; there are organizations like the IAEA and the United Nations in place to deal with such issues. The United States still considers itself the world's bodyguard, but that is not justified in the least. We can look at Korea, Vietnam, Afghanistan and now Iraq and realize how badly things went there when the United States started its policing and government changes.

Iran already has a democracy in place, and yes, it is different from the American democratic process, but that does not mean that it is not there. Not everyone will follow the United States blindly anymore, and the current administration needs to realize that. The United States might be the world's most powerful country, but it is steadily losing all its allies. I have lived in the Middle East, Latin America and Europe in the past few years and U.S. support in all those regions is at an all-time low. An attack on Iran will diminish all of it and open yet another, bigger Pandora's Box for subsequent administrations, which they will not be able to control, just like the current one cannot in Iraq.

Combined we are powerful

Adam DeSimone

America's reliance on foreign oil is crippling our nation. While we sit idly and treat our dependence as an academic discussion, we are becoming ever more vulnerable to overseas demands. Such weaknesses are so readily apparent that discussion is no longer limited to think tanks in Washington, and is instead apparent on the cringing face of every American who pays close to $3 per gallon for gas.

Our angst is well-founded, but unguided. As people are gouged, the question "Why isn't the government doing something to fix this?" arises. However, the seemingly obvious and necessary ponderance "What can I do to help?" is generally ignored. Thus, even in his home state of Massachusetts, JFK's adage, "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country," has been forgotten. America's oil crisis has reached such an alarming level that I believe it is the civic duty of every American to demand that our government abandon its academic rhetoric, and instead, begin working — through real reform — to enact change.

Accordingly, we need to investigate possible solutions to our dependence so that every person can fulfill their obligation to reduce our oil reliance. If we are to kick our petroleum addiction, then we must all first acknowledge the essential fact that every person's actions can make a real, measurable difference. Sadly, the importance of the individual's actions has largely vanished from our culture. We feel lost among the millions and use this feeling to justify inaction and apathy. We see the government as an impenetrably-shielded bureaucracy that is immune to our demands, so we cower in its face.

Fortunately, the truth behind these perceptions is that they are entirely false. The powers-that-be are in every way vulnerable to citizen participation. However, since our government is an institution that is only as dynamic as necessity demands, it rarely acts proactively. As a result, the government reacts to citizens' demands only when the people mobilize and exact that reaction. Accordingly, if we expect to solve this problem, a massive societal attitude change must occur. We must adopt a "we are all in this together" policy. With this mindset, we are all more likely to fulfill our potential, act as a cohesive unit and ultimately end our oil addiction.

This being said, many of you are probably wondering what you can do, realistically speaking, to help. Since many of us do not have the fiscal ability to buy solar panels, purchase hybrid cars or renovate our houses to make them more efficient, we must look for other options.

Fortunately, we all possess another tool that wields a significant — yet largely underrated — power. This raw strength is in our voices, our letters, our phone calls, our e-mails and our actions. For example, every one of us has the ability to write a letter to our elected state representatives and demand action. These mailings would not have to be dramatic soliloquies or well-crafted essays; rather, they could be short and to the point.

For example, you could write, "Sen. Kennedy, if you continue to negate efforts to construct 130 windmills in Nantucket Sound, it will be unlikely that you will receive my vote in your upcoming re-election campaign," or, "Gov. Romney, if you do not endorse, support and fund projects that would make Massachusetts less reliant on foreign oil, it will be unlikely that I will endorse Kerry Healey, or any other Republican as your successor, for governor." Other viable ideas could include demands for greater tax breaks for those utilizing and advancing other renewable energies, such as ethanol and bio-diesels.

Altogether, writing a letter like this would take 15 minutes and cost 39 cents. Every letter received would focus attention on the issue and force politicians to devote their time to our concerns. Accordingly, the more letters that are received, the more effective they will be. Individually, these letters could be dismissed, but imagine for a moment: If 10 percent of University of Massachusetts students wrote letters to both Gov. Romney and Sen. Kennedy, over 2,200 letters would flood their respective mailboxes. Suddenly, our individual letters would be tough to ignore.

Altogether, writing a letter like this would take 15 minutes and cost 39 cents. If 10 percent of University of Massachusetts students wrote letters to both Gov. Romney and Sen. Kennedy, over 2,200 letters would flood their respective mailboxes.

If we do not collectively voice our concerns, nothing will be accomplished. The federal government cannot — and will not — provide the leadership necessary to wean Americans from our oil addiction. This much is clear — especially since our government is preoccupied with other daunting tasks, including the war in Iraq, the reconstruction of New Orleans and immigration reform.

Also, since many politicians' re-election campaigns are funded by oil companies they are happy to ignore the problem for as long as possible. As a result, we must rely on our own activism to compel the government — at all levels — to act.

Unlike the Iraq, New Orleans and immigration concerns, ending our oil addiction does not involve navigating moral stalemates or mending broken dreams. Instead, America's addiction to oil is an eminently solvable problem, but to solve it we must demand change. We must act sooner rather than later. We must fulfill our potential. We are all in this together, and it's time for us to act like it.

'Welcome to the jungle'

Michael Toomey

Unbeknownst to the well-read erudite, the politically conscious population, the most apt literary tableau of Americanized living was penned by a neurotic, obsessive artist. Not Howard Zinn, not Thoreau and especially not Bob Dylan.

Reaching the world by 1987, this work was quickly discovered by millions upon millions as the gospel truth to a wicked world. Painting the chaotic free-for-all, the overriding desires, our main walkway doubling as the brink of sudden death and our insatiable appetite for destruction with colors of angst, sexuality and desperation topped off with a laissez faire idiographic view, this work is a masterpiece in its realism.

Still, almost 20 years after its unveiling, we bow down to our deities of lust, the pursuit of happiness and avaricious consumerism, helpless but to watch as it brings us to our knees. Unfortunately, this piece is timelessly applicable; bringing to light the animalism of the civilized death match we call Western society, its kill or be killed dictum echoing with the delay effect of a Gibson.

The air raid screech signals the worst is already here, culminating in a feral vociferation, "You're in the jungle baby, you're gonna die," ascending chord progression and the line that pervades this tale of the American nightmare, "Welcome to the Jungle."

If it's somehow slipped under your attention, our lives are crazy. As our best suited tool to confront existential issues with, zoology is likely to succeed philosophy. That's the point to which we've unavailed. From MTV down on the floor of the Supreme Court, as Americans, as people of the land of the free and wanton, we see our willingness to lie, cheat and grind our way to a better position in the race to an ever-retreating finish line.

The unnerving competition of the rat race results in the digressions of muggings, corporate embezzlements, charitable extortion, excoriating gossip, sexual objectifications, even something as effortful as genocide. We inflate our libs through smiling teeth, shake hands with the right, a knife cradled behind the backs in our left.

There's a sublime nastiness consistent throughout the minutia to the epically grand, to purists dressed in white, subsisting on Wonder bread and whole milk. This menace is at once nauseating and pleasantly affirming. The latter aspect, the hateful component of a dichotomous attitude, is at face value a little hazy at best. How in the world can people raised to the dull virtues of Disney, the insipid postgame blather of a resourceless man who can throw a ball and "the West is the best" find anything of value in its eternal adversary of contemptuous conniving?

Well, simply because it's these opposites that define each other, but in putting the frailty of the typical human mind into play, it's usually found timidly seeking refuge by joining a side. While some, like "a rolling stone," will resignedly toil in the futility of the good fight, others miserably revel in drugs, promiscuity and selfishness, both utterly confused, downright bamboozled that the perspective they've taken to heart doesn't seem to reveal much of the whole. Being a saint or sinner is as futile an endeavor as predicting when people will finally realize the Beatles stink.

But the infinite applicability of America's desirous vacuum makes living in wealth living in the same desolate setting with nicer furnishings and a shiny ride.

It's not that easy, nor is it that simple. Perfect unity, sharing and caring, flowers in bloom, everyone feeling great, everyone in love, everyone bored to tears. "You may say I'm a dreamer, but I'm not the only one," let's kill ourselves with an overdose of fun?

Do you think that our celebrities are happy? Millions in the bank, royal treatment, frenzied adoration and Friday nights spent with Jack Daniels and Ms. Cocaine. Money and luxury serve that invaluable reminder that in the pot of gold lies the rainbow, making us fanciful of a paradise just over that next tax bracket, all the while resentful and embittered about our unextravagant, bummer of a lot.

But the infinite applicability of America's desirous vacuum makes living in wealth living in the same desolate setting with nicer furnishings and a shiny ride. All the money in the world and your life still drags. Maybe you can find God or help others find God, so that everyone can enjoy the same emptiness you're praying to fill.

Perhaps the real deal is in fighting for the rights of the oppressed, not realizing that they're struggling because you won't give up the amenities that come from resting our feet on the efforts of their toiling. Equal rights, equal wages, equal treatment; yet you probably feel that with your degree and all, the guy mopping up under the urinals shouldn't be making as much as money as you. You don't want to do it, but you value a clean men's room enough to spend a pittance on someone less qualified to do it, so you might say we're born equal, but it certainly doesn't stay that way, nor do you really want it to.

Axl Rose got this, and he probably still gets it. Holding a mirror up to this mess, revealing its sheer inanity, he also makes known that while vile and relentless, the whole sordid charade can be a blast. It's unabashed, it's raw and it's almost banal.

"If you got the money honey, we got your disease." It's the truth, but money can be symbolic of activism, egoism, assimilation or any other corrupter of the people; anything that feeds the fire. Celebrate the burn, because it's par for the course, and you can start again after it's all been razed, nature abhors a vacuum after all.

Axl himself growls the conditional for fun, showing he's not immune, he's up for a good time, but he's just as ready for a bad one. So, there's some irony to this all: "You can have anything you want, but you better not take it from me." The fallibility is just perfect.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

WHAT IS THE DEAL?

On March 8, we delivered to your office [Chancellor Lombardi] a petition signed by more than 700 students, faculty and staff, and endorsed by the Graduate Employee Organization, calling for an end to the University of Massachusetts' complicity with the crimes of the United States. A short time ago, a letter from you, dated April 5, 2006, was delivered to a member of our Coalition. While your letter makes no acknowledgment of these petitions, we can only assume you had intended to respond to all signatories, including those community members who visited your office on March 8, and who tried, in vain, to schedule a meeting with you.

Two general themes emerge from your letter. One is an attempt to silence our voices on this campus by directing us away from your office and to the Board of Trustees in Boston. Through your secretary, you have communicated your view that your letter is "the bottom line," and thus, have again refused to meet with representatives from our organization — a registered student group, not "a group described as" the Antiwar Coalition, as you mistakenly wrote.

Your letter also expends considerable effort attempting to explain and justify the policies questioned in our petition. You cannot have it both ways, and we have decided to continue this conversation in the form of an open letter. Let us now respond to your April 5 letter.

As to our first demand, namely that you "prohibit all and any forms of military recruitment on University property," you state that the University "will continue to support the various ROTC programs on campus." In fact, we do not ask for the elimination of either the Army or Air Force ROTC programs on campus."

This aside, you then wrote that the University should honor the "opportunity for individual students to choose to participate or not in various programs available on this campus." Nowhere in our letter did we suggest that students' opportunities should be limited. Certainly students who wish to enlist in the armed forces should be allowed to do so.

However, the University allows personnel from the branches of the Department of Defense, which is a discriminatory employer, to solicit enlistment on this campus. As you know, UMass has an anti-discrimination policy, the relevant sections of which read:

"The University of Massachusetts Amherst prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, creed, sex, age, marital status, national origin, mental or physical disability, veteran status, or sexual orientation, in any aspect of the access to, admission, or treatment of students in its programs and activities, or in employment and application for employment."

The military's hiring practices are clearly in conflict with this policy. Certainly the University would never allow a private employer onto this campus that explicitly refused to consider applications from or to hire, GLBT, female, African-American, Native American, Asian or Latino students.

More importantly, military recruiters are currently enlisting students to serve in a war that violates international law, specifically Article 2 of the United Nations charter. In addition, the civilian leadership of the Department of Defense has been implicated in the use of torture and detention without trial, policies which violate the U.S. Constitution, Article VI of which declares all treaties to be "the supreme law of the land."

Lastly, it is well known that recruiters prey on the most economically disadvantaged members in the community. Due to vanishing grants and scholarships, state budget cuts for public higher education and higher tuition and fees each year, students are lured by military recruiters through half-truths (and the occasional outright lie) to believe that they can fund their college educations by joining the military.

As has been pointed out by a number of national newspapers, recruiters do not give students a comprehensive picture of the reality of war, nor do they accurately represent the opportunities for "job-training," or the financial aid that you claim to want to protect.

Our second demand is that the University not permit any member of the UMass Police Department to work directly for the FBI, and that the University "respect the necessity for the separation of higher education from federal law enforcement and Homeland Security agencies."

Your response ignores the well-documented institutional relationship between the FBI and the UMPD. Since 2002, the UMPD has been paying one of its detectives to work up to full-time for the FBI office in Springfield. This detective is not required to report to you or the Chief of Police about his activities.

We believe this institutional relationship with the FBI not only forces taxpayers and students who pay the University to directly support the FBI and its policies, but it creates a campus environment hostile to the free and open expression of ideas. Nowhere in our letter do we ask that the FBI not be allowed on campus should a federal crime actually occur.

You dismiss our final demand, that the University ban all research grant funds from the Department of Defense and its branches, by stating that the University will continue to support faculty, staff and students who have "benefited from their participation in research activities sponsored by the Department of Defense and its agencies." Obviously, "benefits" and legality have no relevance to one another. UMass grants legitimacy to aggressive war, torture, rendition, detention without trial, secret prisons and illegal wiretapping.

Lastly, you imply that "university policy" is created by the Board of Trustees, and that further communications should be directed toward Boston. We view this as an abdication of your duty as chancellor, as you enjoy not only considerable authority on the Board of Trustees, but also here on the Amherst campus. Lest you forget, your job is not only to administer this campus, but also to heed the wishes of students, faculty and staff.

Indeed, according to the Office of the Provost's "Faculty Guide," "the Chancellor speaks for the campus to such audiences as trustees, state and federal legislators, alumni, state and local public officials, business and community leaders" (Chapter 1). A public University, such as ours, should be not a faceless bureaucracy or a campus of anonymous "consumers." Rather, our vision is of a democratic institution where students, faculty and staff play the decisive role in determining policy.

LOOKING DOWN ON SOME FRAT ROW MEMBERS

I participated in the Take Back the Night March and Rally. For those of you who have never taken part in such an event, I urge you to participate next year. Take Back the Night is about speaking out against sexual violence against women. It is a powerful and moving experience, and the committee who organized this year's event deserves much kudos. I also want to thank all the women and men who took part in the march.

However, what I found appalling was the behavior of some men who are part of Fraternity Row. I am not trying to call out all fraternities and all men, just the few guys who seem to think it is an act of courage to shout at women from moving cars or darkened windows, or throw a water balloon from the second floor of a house on the other side of the road.

I guess I have a different perspective; I see these as acts of cowardice and ignorance. Where is the courage of expressing yourself anonymously rather than having the guts to look another person in the eye and engage with them in an honest conversation?

What are you really saying with your actions, you are in favor of sexual violence against women? I pity you. I hope some day those cowards will understand what it means to have courage, and to be man, not a scared, immature boy.

I want to highlight that this was a small minority of men who engaged in these spineless acts. The problem is that these behaviors happened in Fraternity Row and thus the behavior of a few dullards paints the rest of the men in the fraternity system with their brush. So the stereotypes about fraternity brothers are allowed to continue on unchallenged.

Or are they? Perhaps the majority of men in the Greek system would care to speak out. Perhaps the majority of the men in the Greek system would like to make a strong and continued statement to the men who seem to think it is OK to support violence against our sisters, friends, daughters and mothers.

Perhaps the majority of the men in the Greek system would like to make a commitment to ongoing efforts over the next year, or longer, to find ways to counter the cowardly minority and show us the true mettle of fraternity men. What do you say, guys?

AM I REALLY THE MINORITY?

In reading the Collegian Editorial page over the last few weeks, I've come across several people that are fully in support of illegal immigrants assimilating into this country. I myself am not of this short-sighted crowd. Holding people back and depriving them of a better life is never a good thing on the surface, but when you go a little deeper it's a different story.

As a society, do we allow people to steal cars, and then allow them to legally sell them and make a profit? No, that's illegal, and it's similar to the problem we face. These illegals are crossing the border to get work and nine out of 10 times they send most of the money back to their families in Mexico.

In this process, Mexico's economy benefits greatly and our own suffers. When working for construction or produce outfits, they are not required to pay taxes, and there have been many reports of illegals receiving free health care. It's no wonder our health care system is suffering, and will continue, if nothing is done.

Another point that has yet to be raised is homeland security. Our president repeatedly says that it's better that we fight the terrorists in Iraq or overseas rather than on our own soil. Well, if you have little to no border control, who's to say that hundreds of terrorists haven't already crossed the Mexican border with suitcase nukes and are strategically placing themselves throughout our country, just waiting for some encoded message from Al-Qaida?

The media has made so much of the recent protests and demonstrations, but they say nothing of this larger and more pressing issue. I saw a great e-mail on the Lou Dobbs Show that said something to the effect of, we could always just sell off the job (building a wall) to China. They have some experience in the matter.

RESPECT PARENTAL CONCERN

I would like to remark on Chris Eckel's article entitled "Teach our kids thoroughly," which appeared in Monday's issue. There will always be debates on the material that is taught in schools — the presentation of gay marriage is just as debatable as sex education and the teaching of creationism in the schools. Because these issues have a moral connotation, parents who have strong stands tend to have a more personal interest in their child's exposure to these topics, and even when and how they are brought to their child's attention.

I believe we should respect this parental concern. Would you tell a 6-year-old all about sex simply because it exists and goes on in the world and that child should be aware of it as early as possible? Why not expose these young kids to articles about atrocities committed by both sides of a war, and let them draw their own conclusions?

It seems to me that certain material is saved for a later age. I understand that even "The Passion" was in debate regarding the age of viewers, but in answer to Mr. Eckel's argument, doesn't this portray a religious viewpoint, and shouldn't everyone see the movie so they are exposed to the diversity in this world?

My point is that there is a system to realizing certain issues, especially those with a moral connotation, and I believe the parents have the right to speak up about them.

Mr. Eckel said, "I don't see any teachers showing up at parents' workplaces and telling them how to do their jobs." I don't think this is a valid comparison. Parents have a personal interest in rearing their children, and I think a lack of interest in what their child is learning is a poor show of the parental care a child needs.

A total disinterest in the schooling of their child would be a sad display of parental ignorance. Granted, this particular couple could have been less dramatic about it, but I believe they had the right to protest their son's exposure to this issue at such an early age. I'm not saying the child should never be informed, but I believe this controversy can't just be brushed aside because of its strong moral connotation.

IT'S NOT THEIR FAULT

Please do not criminalize the Constitution of the United States. Our gay-born children have a right to the equal rights of the Constitution. Oppose the federal marriage amendment.

The Constitution of the United States must not be amended to allow discrimination of our gay-born children. To do this is to criminalize the most beautiful document that our founder fathers created. "Freedom and equality for all citizens of the United States."

We do not know why our children are gay. Whether it is genetic, hormonal or if something occurs during the critical time of fetal development, we do not know. What we mothers can tell you with absolute certainty is that it is born.

Homosexuals, like all human beings, need companionship. They have the right to marry and live a happy life of equality, respect and love as any other citizen.

We parents and relatives of our gay children have sat in silence with our hearts bleeding as we see our children being harassed, persecuted, killed, injured and discriminated against because they had the misfortune of being born sexually different.

We have seen the agony our children have gone through since they were in elementary school, when their different mannerisms became obvious to their classmates and adults. They became victims of harassment as a result. We have witnessed the agony of our gay children wanting to be sexually normal and have seen their pain when they face reality in adolescent years. Some committing suicide, others faking being straight to avoid harassment and discrimination, trying to change into a being that belongs only in their physical bodies but not in their inner self, suffering silently at their futile attempts.

It is with great sadness that we see some people using the name of God to promote bigotry, hate and discrimination toward our gay children. Millions of children were born are being born and will be born sexually different. It can happen in any family and we do not have a choice.

If God did not want the existence of homosexuality, he would not have created it. The fact is it is in every sector of society, in all professions and trades. Even in the animal kingdom.

Andy Garcia falls flat in directoral debut

BY EUGENE MCCRANN
WASHINGTON SQUARE NEWS (NYU)

NEW YORK — Most would be hard-pressed to make great claims for the acting of Andy Garcia. A mechanical operator with trademark facial features — squinty eyes and expressionless bone structure — Garcia's internal rage has made him number one both as a low-tolerance mob boss ("Ocean's Eleven," "The Godfather Part III") and as a straight-edge police officer ("Desperate Measures," "Black Rain"). As with his ineffectual, emotionless performance in his directorial debut "The Lost City," the actor's inability to register sincerity has become a consistent defect equally noticeable in his direction.

That isn't to say Garcia is exercising modesty. Much of this could be a promotional montage for Cuban tourism, with its intermittent concentration on the mambo, the family and cha cha. That's another way of saying it's consistently loud — the inverse of "The Godfather Part II" if Coppola had been a democratic patriot of Cuba. It has all of the sleek, splashy pomp of a big-studio epic, but since it was shot under budget with an independent studio, it somehow falls into that dreadful category that appeals to art house ignorance.

Garcia plays Fico, a wealthy cabaret owner and the elder brother in a prominent Cuban family. The film's official synopsis describes Havana as the "Paris of the Caribbean," but something unsettling awaits. With such a contrived title as "The Lost City," one can't help but think about Havana as the "Lost Horizon," and its unambiguously depicted eventual doom comes as no surprise. If this is realistically Shangri-La, then why is Garcia running his club like Michael Corleone on low blood sugar?

Fico's intellectual father has spawned sons who refuse to let Cuba lie in the hands of dictator Fulgencio Batista. One son, Luis (Nestor Carbonell), starts a renegade militia to assassinate Batista. The youngest brother, Ricardo (Enrique Murciano), flees to the jungle to join sides with Che Guevara (Sú Garcia) and Fidel Castro (Gonzalo Menendez), both played with comic insidiousness. Garcia joins neither, thanks to prophetic skills allowing him to realize neither is the solution. While his family jeopardizes his safety, he is able to walk a fine line because of his high social standing. Consequently, he must flee to New York and leave his beloved Cuba behind, with his family deceased and resources tapped.

For those who had to sit through the manipulative "Hotel Rwanda," a sigh of relief is in store. Nothing much changes in "Cabaret Cuba." Spread over too much time with little structure to hold together the massive amounts of material, the dance sequences are cut short, the shots are confusingly edited and little to nothing is substantial to the advancement of the story. The film is shot in English, but for some inexplicable reason, certain words are repeated in Spanish, only to remind us that the native language is being disregarded. Garcia doesn't know what he is doing, and for some God-forsaken reason, he believes the film warrants a 143-minute running time. The road trip of "Che" was already covered in 128 minutes in "The Motorcycle Diaries." Gandhi's contribution to revolution was covered in 188 minutes. Hell, even the founding of the United States got only 20 more measly minutes in "The Patriot."

Maybe Garcia should have cut out subplots involving high-profile actors who contribute nothing — Bill Murray, as an American gag writer, is fine but unnecessary. Dustin Hoffman's brief appearance as mob boss Meyer Lansky diminishes credibility that the film is already lacking (Garcia must have called in a lot of favors).

Garcia doesn't resolve his film in Cuba, letting his character find solace in America as he watches Castro run his country for a longer time than he can possibly foresee. A certain amount of pity resides in me just because Garcia pushed this project forward. He longed to make an important film for Cuba, but only certain sections of Miami will really appreciate it. With all of his verbose segments on democracy, justice and family, his documentation of '50s Cuba is only surface deep. Frankly, he doesn't have the talent or the budget to do it justice. Within this film, there are a decent 20 minutes but nothing worth the unceasing pride of the Cuban Garcia.

Chili Peppers still red hot and smokin'

BY MATT SAMMIS
[illegible]

[illegible] MD. The [illegible] Chili Peppers [illegible] on [illegible] rock bands, the [illegible] band made "Stadium Arcadium" a [illegible] album that represents [illegible] evolved music. It's [illegible] a polished, [illegible] more important [illegible] to the status of rock [illegible] record and party. The majority [illegible] hard-rocking and funky [illegible] some parts even fit [illegible] kind of. Course there are [illegible] of good old rock 'n roll [illegible] screaming guitar solos, beatin' [illegible] vocals, heavy bass lines [illegible] bell.

[illegible] that will undoubtedly [illegible] the seasoned fans is [illegible] Peppers' funk is back in a [illegible] big bass and guitar on "Charlie" takes the sound back to the days of "Mother's Milk." The funk climaxes on "Hump De Bump" with a thumping bass line behind lead singer Anthony Kiedis's rhythmic raps.

Flea's bass really brings out the Chili Peppers' groove. On "Tell Me Baby," he slaps a bass line, complemented by a simple guitar part that follows Kiedis's vocals. Flea plays a heavy line on "21st Century" that gives the disco-sounding verses a hard and funky feel. He steers the music in "Storm in a Teacup." In the verses, guitarist John Frusciante plays an eccentric take on Flea's bass line while Kiedis's voice follows the same melody while singing the chorus.

The Chili Peppers told Rolling Stone that this album is the best thing they've ever done, and it shows. Kiedis's vocals are the strongest they've ever been. In the evolution of the Chili Peppers' music, Kiedis has gone from a rapping front man to a vocally diverse singer. The melancholy title track has the music take a step back to allow Kiedis to sing his most impressive and melodic song to date.

The crazy, rhyme-spitting Kiedis is still there, though. In the chorus of "So Much I," he starts with spoken lyrics that gradually become singing. "Hard to Concentrate" uses a similar pattern with a melody coupled with expressive spoken lyrics.

Equally strong singing comes from Frusciante, whose backup vocals really haven't been used to their full potential until "Stadium Arcadium." He sings on almost every song, adding a completely new layer to the music. He'll take the high octave, harmonize with Kiedis, and even dare to take the lead sometimes. It's like he's feeding directly off of Kiedis's energy.

Frusciante's guitar playing also peaks on this album. Songs like "Hump De Bump" and "Especially in Michigan" show he can do so much with so little. A few simple notes can be the perfect riff over Flea's powerful bass and behind Kiedis' vocals. The mellow, jazzy sounds of "Hey" bring a guitar solo that sounds Santana-esque, but still sounds quintessentially like Frusciante.

"Stadium Arcadium's" 28 songs go into every musical style the band has ever taken on. The raw hard rock is there, the funk is there, the mellow, melodic songs are there, the acoustic songs are there and of course, these styles are often fused together.

It's been four years since the Chili Peppers released their last studio album, "By the Way." But they are back with a bang, and anyone who can appreciate a band with intense energy, diverse music and a constantly evolving sound will agree that "Stadium Arcadium" was worth the wait.

The Red Hot Chili Pepper's newest album, "Stadium Arcadium," is filled with poetic lyrics and funky, hard-rocking, experimental music

Junger's Strangler

BY LISA ARTHUR
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

You can understand why Sebastian Junger felt compelled to deliver a book on the well-trod topic of the Boston Strangler. Albert DeSalvo, who confessed to being the murderer, inserted himself into the master narrative of the Junger family in 1962, when Sebastian was a year old. His parents had hired DeSalvo and two other men to build an art studio at their home in sleepy Belmont, Mass. In a photograph, Sebastian sits on his mother's lap; DeSalvo and another worker stand behind her. In the center is DeSalvo's oddly oversized right hand, pressed against his torso.

That hand and the murderous acts linked to it have had a grip on Junger's imagination for decades. The result is an attempt by the author of "The Perfect Storm" to weave the confluence of his family's brush with evil, the stranglings, the Kennedy assassination, the Jim Crow South and the murder of neighbor Bessie Goldberg and the conviction of a black man named Roy Smith into The Perfect Tale of Crime and Injustice.

Junger, a masterful storyteller, delivers a somewhat compelling true-crime account but falls flat on his grander ambitions. The premise is promising. Junger sets out to investigate whether a jury wrongly convicted Smith in 1963 for Goldberg's murder. Police first believed Goldberg was a victim of the Boston Strangler, the crime scene bore his stamp. Smith, a day worker with a lengthy criminal record sent by an agency to clean the Goldberg house, became the prime suspect and was eventually convicted of the murder.

Junger grew up hearing this version: DeSalvo killed Goldberg, and racism led to the wrong man being convicted. The drama was heightened for Junger because the family lore includes a chilling incident. One day while they were alone at the house, DeSalvo tried to lure Junger's mother, Ellen, into the basement. "He had this intense look in his eyes, a strange kind of burning in his eyes, as if he was almost trying to hypnotize me," Ellen recalls.

She didn't go. Years later, after DeSalvo confessed that he was the Strangler, Junger and his family concluded Ellen's refusal saved her life.

But that conclusion is supposition, and that's the problem with "A Death in Belmont": It raises lots of questions but doesn't answer any. The book reads like a suspense novel but ends without a resolution or dramatic payoff. Junger can't prove Smith didn't kill Goldberg. He doesn't even take an educated stand on Smith's guilt.

And then there is the problem of DeSalvo. He confessed to being the Strangler while in prison on rape charges. Then he sought book deals. He was never tried as the Strangler, and there are vigorous doubts about his confession. If DeSalvo wasn't the Strangler, Junger has no story.

Goldberg's daughter, Leah, has attacked Junger for questioning Smith's guilt. Junger has said he stands by his work. But there is no DNA to test, and Smith and DeSalvo are dead.

"But maybe the truth isn't even the most interesting thing about some stories. ... Maybe the most interesting thing about some stories is all the things that could be true," Junger writes. "And maybe it's in the pursuit of those things that you understand the world in its deepest, most profound sense."

Maybe he's right. But Junger doesn't deliver anything profound, and the reader is left feeling empty.

Preservation Hall back in business

BY WALTER TUNIS
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

It was a happy day during a sad time.

As a battered New Orleans put on its bravest face for the opening of the annual Jazz and Heritage Festival, a modest but profound music haven came alive again.

Preservation Hall was back in business.

It was an occasion, to be sure, with U2 guitarist The Edge jamming with the club's internationally acclaimed jazz band on an impromptu version of "Vertigo." But for Ben Jaffe, son of the owners who started Preservation Hall in 1961 and current director and overseer of the Preservation Hall Jazz Band, the day of rejoicing was hardly at hand.

"The moment was bittersweet in many ways," he said by phone last week from New Orleans. "Music returned to a very important place. But it's also sad.

"I mean, it was good last weekend. It will be good next weekend. But how will it be in three months? We don't know. The reopening doesn't mean that everything is OK."

The festival did its part to provide a break from the city's recovery from Hurricane Katrina. It also served as a well-publicized reminder of New Orleans' musical heritage. But the struggles of Preservation Hall and its band are reminders of Katrina's toll.

"Five members of the Preservation Hall Jazz Band lost their homes, their cars and their instruments," Jaffe said. "They're now living outside of New Orleans for the first time in their lives."

Until last summer, Jaffe's role in spreading the musical joy and faith of New Orleans was promoting Preservation Hall. In his youth, he listened to scores of jazz greats who mixed Dixieland, swing and an exuberant performance sound at the club. He joined the Preservation band as a bassist in 1993. By 2004, Jaffe had begun a record label to distribute the ensemble's albums.

With an estimated 70 percent of the city's musicians without homes, jobs and/or instruments after Katrina, he and wife Sarah began the New Orleans Musicians Hurricane Relief Fund. It has raised and distributed more than $500,000.

After Katrina, "We evacuated to Lafayette. That's where I started getting phone calls from musicians who didn't have any access to money. Their ATM cards didn't work. The banks shut down. After that, we didn't wait for musicians to contact us. We went out and found them."

While Preservation Hall itself sustained minimal damage from Katrina, the displacement of thousands of musicians, not to mention the audiences they played to, made it impossible for the venue to remain open, at least initially.

"You can't just measure the damage in physical terms," Jaffe said. "We're rebuilding a business in a completely different economy than what existed eight months ago."

Jaffe said the national and international audiences the Preservation Hall Jazz Band plays to can't fully appreciate what has become of the band's hometown.

"This afternoon, I took our band manager on a tour of the Lower Ninth Ward. Mind you, the Ninth Ward looks completely different than it did six months ago. Six months ago it looked like Hiroshima. But there are still houses on top of houses on top of cars and uprooted construction everywhere.

"Now, this is a guy who knows this neighborhood well. He's lived here for 10 years. And he couldn't comprehend what he saw. So how can someone who has never even seen New Orleans before comprehend it? It just can't be done."

Overseeing Preservation Hall's reopening and the Relief Fund leaves little time for Jaffe to make music. So while he still plays at the club and arranges tunes for the band, Jaffe recently retired from touring.

"I'm doing a better service to the New Orleans music community, to Preservation Hall, to myself, to my marriage and to the people who have been touched by New Orleans music by remaining here in the city," Jaffe said.

He cautions that the still dire situation in New Orleans doesn't mean hope for renewal is fleeting. Music, as always, heals. And as long as Preservation Hall's doors stay open, another avenue for that healing will continue.

"One of the amazing things about our city has been its ability to celebrate in the face of adversity," Jaffe said. "That's why we play jazz at funerals in New Orleans. It's our way of celebrating a person's memory and life.

"That's what we're doing now. And that's what the Preservation Hall Jazz Band is continuing to do all over the world."

Ben Jaffe, seen above, owner of the Preservation Hall in New Orleans, was able to witness the spread of music at the annual Jazz and Heritage Festival.

The annual Spring Concert was held last Sunday night at the Mullins Center. Featured performers included The Roots and Dashboard Confessional; Above, Chris Carrabba from Dashboard Confessional quietly picks his guitar.

Possible French version of iTunes

BY LAURENCE FROST
AP BUSINESS WRITER

PARIS (AP) — Apple Computer Inc. could negotiate new deals with record labels and artists to sidestep French government plans to open the copy-protection technology of its iTunes music service to rivals, under a draft Senate amendment to be voted on this week.

The amendment, proposed by the Senate Cultural Affairs Committee, softens the terms of a government-backed copyright bill Apple criticized as "state-sponsored piracy" after its first reading in March by lawmakers in France's lower house.

Apple's market-leading iPod, which accounts for about 70 percent of U.S. media player sales, is currently designed to play music only from iTunes, which is also incompatible with rival players.

The bill adopted by the National Assembly included proposals that would force Apple, Sony Corp. and others to share their copy-protection technologies, so that competitors could offer music players and online stores that are compatible with theirs. The measures were demanded by consumer groups and backed by the government.

But the Senate committee's changes could allow Apple to maintain the exclusive link between iTunes and the iPod, lawyers and officials told The Associated Press.

Under the key amendment, compatibility disputes would be taken to a new regulatory authority that would have the power to order exclusive file formats be shared — but only if the obstacles they pose are "additional to, or independent of, those explicitly decided by the copyright holders."

In other words, Apple and Sony could continue to refuse to share their FairPlay and ATRAC3 file formats, provided they obtain the authorization of artists and other copyright holders whose music they sell online, said Valérie Aumage, an online copyright specialist with Paris law firm Dubarry Le Douarin Veil.

"As long as Apple can show that the restrictions conform to the wishes of copyright holders, there would be no case to answer," she said.

While Aumage believes that this is the amendment's most likely consequence, she also stressed that the "highly ambiguous" draft text is open to other interpretations.

If the Senate committee proposal became law, record labels could be asked by Apple to gather the necessary authorizations for music they wanted to offer through iTunes in France.

"If it's the difference between that and not doing business in France, it's probably worth the paperwork," said analyst Roger Kay of Endpoint Technologies Associates, a U.S.-based consulting firm.

The recording industry is seeking more compatibility between formats and hardware as it struggles to claw back some control of online music sales and pricing, but it has so far failed to break away from the iTunes single-pricing model in negotiations with Apple.

Culture Minister Renaud Donnedieu de Vabres has said he is determined to ensure that music downloads are compatible with all music players, to stimulate competition and consumer choice. His spokesman was unavailable for comment Tuesday.

But a government official, who asked not to be named because the Senate vote was still pending, said the minister wants the amendment "clarified" to close the loophole.

"The government's position is to favor interoperability, come what may," the official said. "That is not going to depend on deals with iTunes."

The draft amendment follows intensive lobbying by the California-based computer company, which sent representatives including iTunes designer Bud Tribble to Paris last month for a series of meetings with senior lawmakers.

The Brussels-based Business Software Alliance, which campaigns on behalf of major software and hardware makers including Apple, Microsoft Corp. and Hewlett Packard Co., has also warned that the draft legislation would harm the fight against piracy and undermine new technologies like high-definition DVDs.

Apple did not respond to repeated requests for comment. Its March statement predicted that if the National Assembly's bill became law, "legal music sales will plummet just when legitimate alternatives to piracy are winning over customers."

The Senate is expected to complete its reading of the copyright bill in coming days, after which the legislation passes to a joint committee of Senators and lower-house deputies, charged with hammering out a compromise text.

Gore heats up in documentary

BY MATT ZABOSKI
CHICAGO MAROON (U. CHICAGO)

CHICAGO — Al Gore is a Diet Coke drinker. He was also running late, and as I waited in his suite at the Four Seasons to interview him last Thursday morning, his assistant had thoughtfully provided him with a bottle of Diet Coke and a glass of ice. But by the time he arrived — just 15 minutes after the start time, mind you — the ice had mostly melted, so she dumped out the contents of the glass and replaced them with fresh ice.

Ahh, the privileges of power.

Incredibly, that's where Gore's amenities began and ended. I found Gore to be very open and friendly, despite media representations of him to the contrary. (I'll save you my theory on "Republican character assassination" as a friend of mine informed me how ridiculous it sounds. I still think there's something to it, however.)

What I thought was going to be a massive press conference consisted of me and only one other person (a student journalist from Columbia College). In the lobby prior to the interview, we brainstormed about what our "perfect question" would be, assuming that this would be the only one we would get to ask. Good thing I looked over my notes while I was on the El.

Gore was in town to promote his upcoming documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," based on his lecture about personal and political responsibility in the face of global warming. The film is never less than fully engaging. Much of that is due to Gore's surprising charisma. It also helps that director Davis Guggenheim opts to include personal anecdotes from Gore's life. Gore considered the interviews about his past "very difficult," but conceded that they helped to make a better film. When he delivers a lecture in person, he could "drop over dead" at any moment, the personal connection already exists. But "people connect to people," not to political talking points in a film, so it was critical that "An Inconvenient Truth" contain a narrative thread.

With that in mind, I asked Gore if he ever feels like he's going through the motions as he delivers his lecture to yet another huge crowd. "That's a good question," he said thoughtfully, before explaining that each repetition is slightly different. He'll switch around the order of the slides, or include a new fact from a site like RealClimate.org (which, coincidentally, is "on [his] home page"). Of course, commitment to the cause keeps him focused. "I've been trying to spread this message for the past 30 years. I say, said emphatically, and a bit me-ssg that's longer than most of my [illegible] have been alive. Some may [illegible] question the validity of global [illegible] in the face of [illegible] but Gore's dedication to the [illegible] unassailable.

To my delight, Gore came across as extremely well-read, and not just as a frequent visitor to blogs about the environment. (I'ver the dutiful University of Chicago student, I mentioned that our own Raymond J. Pierrehumbert is a frequent contributor to RealClimate.org, to which Gore replied, "Tell your professor that he's doing a good job.") Neil Postman's "Amusing Ourselves to Death: Public Discourse in the Age of Show Business" is a favorite of Gore's, and I knew from the question-and-answer session after the previous night's screening at AMC River East 21 that he is well-versed in the works of Mark Twain and Upton Sinclair. But nothing could have prepared me for the cerebral turn our conversation was about to take.

The conversation veered in a radically different direction when my fellow journalist asked Gore about the state of democracy. In a world where a second-term president coins such malapropisms as "macular" Gore's articulate nature is welcome (though I should note here that Gore rarely mentions the current [illegible] as him about [illegible] Like [illegible] Gore [illegible]

Fortunately, [illegible] get a hankering for more Gore, there are several ways to satisfy our craving. "An Inconvenient Truth" opens in theaters on June 2, and the day before, Gore's new network, Current TV, debuts on Comcast's channel 107. Current's slogan is "the TV network created by the people who watch it" — apparently for the aspiring Thomas Paines out there (including a few at the U of C).

I've interviewed heroes of mine before, like sex columnist Dan Savage, and I must say that Gore was one of my warmest subjects. Occasionally, I couldn't believe what was coming out of his mouth. The television rant, quoting Melissa Etheridge during the question-and-answer session, comparing his interviews in the film to a particularly painful bout in therapy. But in the end, his sincerity seemed revolutionary — thrilling, somehow. It was the perfect corrective to "An Inconvenient Truth," which, after all, Gore considers "the ultimate action movie." He just might be right.

Pair of rookies rock on for Minutewomen back off the plate,' or 'Keep your hands inside the ball.' If she sees something before I go up to bat, she will always try to help me. She's a really good leader."

"[We] try to have fun and stay relaxed," Mollica said. "We try to keep a mindset to stay relaxed and get it done, pretty much anything you can, [all] out, to get it done."

Mollica has certainly gotten it done this season, as she has already set her place in the UMass record books. In just her first season, Mollica has set the UMass single-season records for RBIs with 58 and home runs by a freshman with 10. Her 58 RBIs also set an Atlantic 10 record. She earned a league-high seven A-10 Rookie of the Week honors during the regular season, as well as a pair of Player of the Week awards.

Balschmiter has put together a groundbreaking season of her own. She won eight different A-10 Pitcher of the Week awards, as well as two Rookie of the Week honors. Balschmiter led the conference with a record of 25-7 and an earned run average of 0.67.

Both players credit their parents for motivating them to such success. While Mollica is from Windham, N.H., and Balschmiter hails from Newark, N.Y., they faced a similar situation, where the parents of each player proved to be their biggest fan and supporter.

"My mom has always been there for me and sacrificed a lot," Balschmiter said.

Throughout high school, her mother had to drive her 2 1/2 hours to get to practice with her summer league team four times a week. In order to find the level of competition Balschmiter was looking for, she and her mother had to travel a long distance from their home.

"We would get up at six o'clock in the morning and drive two-and-a-half hours for practice," she said. "We wouldn't get back until 11 o'clock at night, and [my mother] did it, no questions asked."

Mollica's father was just as influential in giving her an opportunity to play.

"My dad was always the one that has been there pitching to me after high school practice," Mollica said. "My dad would come and pitch to me so I could get extra hitting practice."

Another family member who has certainly played a role in Mollica's athletic career is her grandfather. She is the granddaughter of Don Zimmer, former Major League Baseball player and manager and current Tampa Bay Devil Rays senior baseball advisor.

Mollica said her grandfather has always had an active role in her athletics, but has given way to the UMass coaches, including coach Elaine Sortino, since Mollica has reached the collegiate level.

"When I'm down there [in Tampa], he sees me play, but he really doesn't say anything to me anymore because he knows I'm with such unbelievable coaches," Mollica said. "He knows [my coaches] know exactly what they're talking about, so he doesn't want to step on anyone's toes, but he always wants to see me throw or see me hit."

It was her grandfather who helped bring Mollica to UMass. One of Zimmer's connections with his former team, the Boston Red Sox, helped bring Mollica's talents to the attention of Sortino.

"Dick Bresciani, who works with the Red Sox [as Vice President of publications and archives] and knows my grandfather, called [Sortino] and said, 'You should really take a look at this kid from New Hampshire,'" Mollica said.

She also said that Sortino never saw her play a live game before recruiting her.

"Bresciani called [Sortino], and I sent a video out to her, and she just strictly saw me on my video," Mollica said.

Clearly, Mollica's grandfather knew she would be a great fit athletically for the Minutewomen, but he is also impressed with her knowledge of the game.

"I'll get out there and show him, and he can't believe some of the things I'll say to him," she said. "He says, 'Wow, I should bring that back to Tampa Bay.' He'll just joke around like that."

The girls' impact on the team, however, is no joke. Sortino has shown confidence in both players by keeping them in the starting lineup throughout the season.

"[Mollica] comes up with runners on base, and she gives you a quality at bat," Sortino said. "Even when she doesn't necessarily come up with the [best] result, I think she's a tough out." Sortino had similar things to say about Mollica's teammate, Balschmiter.

"I think [Balschmiter] is about to crack into something pretty good for her," Sortino said. "She's been challenging herself in workouts and has been trying to do a little bit more. She's going to be able to mix things up a bit and not come at you with one or two pitches. I think I see her getting better."

Mollica and Balschmiter have shown a level of confidence themselves, both academically and athletically. As freshmen, both players have already chosen a major and begun working in their respective departments.

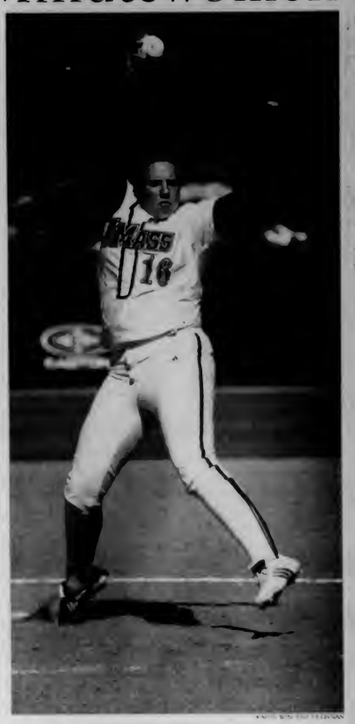
Balschmiter is working on oil painting as an art major, something she has always wanted to do.

"I took every art class I could in high school," Balschmiter said. "It was just a way for me to express myself. I'm not very good with numbers or science, so this is something I excel in."

When asked what she thought she would like to do after college, Balschmiter said, "I think I'm thinking about teaching, but I'm only a freshman and I'm not sure what I want to do with [an art degree] right now."

Mollica is a sport management major and actually left practice a half-hour early to turn in a paper for one of her sport management classes, showing just how hard balancing sports and classes can be.

"I really want to be a Division I college coach," Mollica said. "I'll probably have to start out as an assistant, but I want to be a college coach, or if not, maybe an athletic director."



On the field, they are just as driven, and have set high goals for themselves. With such great success as freshmen, it is hard not to think about the future, when their class is the senior class on the team.

"I was talking to Whitney about this the other day," Balschmiter said. "I was looking at our freshmen and thinking, 'Wow, we're going to have an awesome senior class. We can go anywhere we want to with this.'"

Mollica has also set the bar high for herself, as a senior but also as a freshman this season.

"In four years, I hope that I am in the College World Series. I hope I'm in the College World Series this year, for crying out loud," Mollica said. "As a senior, I hope that we keep having successful seasons. Keep winning, keep getting our name on the board and keep getting national recognition. We need to be up there. I want to be up there with the best."

With the Atlantic 10 tournament coming up this weekend, these two young stars will get their first chance to compete with the best. If the Minutewomen can repeat as A-10 champions, Mollica and Balschmiter will get their first shot in the NCAA tournament to try to make it to the College World Series, and make their high hopes a reality.

Freshman Brandice Balschmiter cruised to a 25-7 record in the regular season as the UMass staff ace. She has a 0.67 ERA, 246 strikeouts and 10 shutouts.

for looking into a deal for Bush, but many could have blamed them for drafting his Southern California teammate, Matt Leinart. Hollywood doesn't have a team yet, so the metropolitan area would have been the absolute worst home for the star-stricken quarterback. D'Brickashaw Ferguson may seem like a safe pick, but he's also a smart pick.

Miss No. 2

Donte Whitner? Now, the Ohio State safety may turn into a good player for Buffalo. But in the eighth slot? The Bills could have traded down at least to No. 14 with the Eagles (who got Brodrick Bunkley there anyway) and still tabbed Whitner (see Miss No. 3).

Hit No. 3

Leinart was not right for this area; he's perfect for Arizona. The Cardinals have sold out their new stadium with the additions of Edgerrin James and Leinart, who will be groomed by Kurt Warner. And Warner, an all-time Mr. Nice Guy, promises to help Leinart more than he did Eli Manning, because he's more familiar with the Cardinals' offense than he was with the Giants' in 2004.

Miss No. 3

Buffalo again. Instead of getting extra picks while dropping down for Whitner, the Bills gave up a No. 3 to move into the bottom of the first round to take defensive tackle John McCargo, a questionable run-stopper. The draft is for getting the most out of it that you can — and the Bills definitely didn't.

Looking ahead ...

Teams will go through the same grueling period of scouting, checking, double-checking, testing and rating college prospects again next year. And which players most likely will be the hits of 2007?

A year ago, Leinart was the heavy favorite to become the first player selected in 2006. This year that honor belongs to Notre Dame quarterback Brady Quinn, who will have two years of virtual pro training under Charlie Weis by the time he turns pro.

But as we learned this year, nothing is a lock.

In fact, a running back named Bush could be the first player picked in 2007. No, not Reggie but Michael, the very versatile and talented player from Louisville, who at 6-foot-2, 250 pounds, is a lot bigger than Reggie.

Yet if Oklahoma's Adrian Peterson stays healthy and comes out after his junior year, Bush may not even be the first running back selected. A big season by California junior Marshawn Lynch could thrust him to the top of the running back charts.

Underclassmen could rule the wide receiver position, with three potential superstars entering their junior seasons: USC's Dwayne Jarrett, Ohio State's Ted Ginn and Georgia Tech's Calvin Johnson, who could be the best of the group. Greg Olsen may become the latest in a string of top tight ends from Miami if he decides to forego his senior year.

Eilenberg not helped by defense

another pitch, Eilenberg threw a slider low and away, causing the batter to weakly wave his bat at the ball.

A visit from his first baseman early in the game helped settle down the young pitcher.

"Bryan Adamski has come over in the past couple of outings, and he settles me down and tells me what I need to hear," Eilenberg said.

With fatigue setting in during the sixth inning, the wheels started coming off for Eilenberg. An error by shortstop Lou Proietti with two down in the inning opened the door for four unearned runs to cross the plate and chase the starter from the game.

The final line doesn't tell the story of the effort given by the freshman. Eilenberg's stats for the game were 5 2/3 innings pitched, five strikeouts, and six runs allowed, only two of which were earned.

"I just found a groove and had everybody supporting me," he said.

Eilenberg's pitching style is defined more by finesse than power. He is listed as 6 feet, 185 pounds, which is a stretch, and you'd be hard pressed to find where power would come from.

Instead, he keeps batters guessing with a combination of a slider, changeup and his fastball. The slider has far been his best pitch this season, and he throws it early and often in counts.

"I don't throw hard so I like to mix it up," Eilenberg said. "I like to throw a lot of sliders on the first pitch to get a lot of people out in front of me."

Stone also explained that the hurler has the most success when he keeps the ball low in the strike zone. He also went on to say that Eilenberg should gain more speed on his pitches as he develops physically.

"When he gets on top and throws his fastball downhill down in the strike zone, he's effective," Stone said. "We'd like to have him develop some more, he's a young kid."

UMass freshman Jim Macdonald went 1-for-3 at the plate yesterday while batting in the DH spot. He is now hitting .236 in the 2006 season.

Bakanowski, Budd, Derosa and Veney lead Minutewomen

adding that Budd had to perform on Sunday, when the cold, damp climate did not offer the same comfort that Saturday's warm temperature did.

In addition, sophomore Christina DeRosa did well as she completed one of the most grueling and challenging multi-event weekends. She ran both the 5,000- and 10,000-meter races.

On Saturday, she took second in the 10,000-meters with a time of 37:24.87, the fastest in UMass history. On Sunday, she ran the 5,000-meters in 17:38.02, which was good enough to earn her eighth place.

She also claimed Atlantic 10 Second-Team All-Conference honors with her second-place finish in the 10,000-meters.

Though freshman Jordan Veney faulted out of the discus competition, she still put up solid performances in the shot put and hammer throw.

The five-time recordbreaker placed third in the shot put and fifth in the hammer with tosses of 42 feet, 8 1/4 inches and 148 feet, 4 inches, respectively.

As for Veney's disappointing performance in the discus, however, her coach is not worried.

"I think she tried too hard," LaFreniere said. "I think she was more relaxed in the hammer because nothing was expected of her."

LaFreniere also mentioned her team's heptathletes, senior Ashley Creel and freshman Liz Biehl.

Creel placed third with a total of 3,707 points and Biehl finished eighth with 3,044.

Creel also took eighth place in the high jump event with a height of 5 feet, 3 inches.

Parcells may be on last leg in Dallas

By Mac Engel
Knight Ridder

IRVING, Texas — Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones likes to say winning three Super Bowls in four years bought him a little benefit of the doubt. If that's the case, the Benefit of the Doubt bottle has gone empty on his head coach.

In three full seasons under Bill Parcells, the Cowboys are just a few field goals better than average. No Super Bowls. No playoff wins. No division titles. One winning season.

(Chan Gailey was fired for a lot less.)

It caused even Parcells to put on his 20/20 hindsight glasses and admit, "This was probably the toughest job I've ever had," he said. "Not because of the cooperation or the effort or the wherewithal.

"It's just where it was, and then where it went, and then we had to take a step back to get some things squared away."

With some of the "things" ostensibly squared away, the expectation for the Cowboys and Parcells appears to have reached a "c'mon-already" level, with the honeymoon period clearly over. But whereas the name Bill Parcells once satisfied the masses, restlessness has set in both within the Cowboys and their fans.

"I'm real uncomfortable, not uncomfortable with Bill," Jones said. "I'm just uncomfortable right now. I want to make something."

Jones is the fidgety and restless type by nature. It wouldn't matter if Parcells was his coach or Dave Campo or Vince Lombardi. Jones would likely have an uncomfortable feeling.

"But when you are in my shoes, I always feel like our fans are restless," Jones said.

Few doubt that under Parcells, the Cowboys have had more productive drafts and their defense has been upgraded significantly. But a few more daunting facts remain. Parcells is 10 years removed from his last Super Bowl appearance and 16 from his last Super Bowl win. And in a results-oriented business such as the NFL, the Cowboys' results under Parcells have been maddeningly mediocre.

It happens to the best of coaches. Broncos coach Mike Shanahan is 1-4 in the playoffs since winning the Super Bowl in 1997 and 1998. Mike Holmgren needed seven seasons in Seattle before he reached the Super Bowl. Colts coach Tony Dungy has yet to reach one.

Jones admitted that Parcells feels the restlessness, too, to return to the level that made him a coaching icon, or at least close to it.

"Yes. Yes. Yes," Jones said. "I know that he's very disappointed. He wanted [and] thought we had a better chance to have a better year last year. ... There is a resolve. You don't have to worry about him. What you see is what you get with him."

Although Parcells signed a two-year extension in January, history says this will be his last season with the Cowboys. He left the Patriots after four seasons and the Jets after three. He said he is committed to the contract and that he likes it here, but then he leaves himself the out that, at his age, he just might not have the energy to return. That's why fans can expect, come December, there will be questions whether the 2006 season will be his last.

"It's going to happen to you," Parcells said. "You're not going to have the energy to do what you're supposed to do, and that's when you're going to hang it up. When that day comes, I'm hanging it."

Kings fire Adelman

By Greg Beacham
Associated Press

SACRAMENTO — Rick Adelman was fired as coach of the Sacramento Kings, an NBA official said Tuesday.

The official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the move had not yet been announced, said Adelman will not receive a contract extension after leading the Kings to eight consecutive playoff appearances. Sacramento was eliminated from the playoffs on Friday by the San Antonio Spurs.

The Kings called a news conference for Tuesday, but wouldn't divulge the reason.

Adelman coached this season as a lame duck, but still got the Kings into the playoffs at 44-38 with a tremendous late-season surge after the arrival of Ron Artest. His departure, probably caused by years of minor friction between the coach and the club owners, ends the most successful tenure of any coach in the franchise's 21 seasons in Sacramento.

Adelman is 752-481 in 16 seasons as an NBA coach, the last eight in Sacramento, where he won 395 games.

Adelman's streak of five consecutive 50-win seasons ended this year when the Kings got off to a terrible start. But Adelman might have done the most impressive coaching of his Sacramento tenure this season, molding a cohesive team with just two holdovers from the 2002-03 season.

The Kings transformed themselves into a defense-oriented team when Artest arrived in a late-January trade for Peja Stojakovic. Sacramento won 25 of its final 36 regular-season games and stretched the San Antonio Spurs in the first round of the postseason, eventually losing in six games.

Though Adelman had far more success than all of the coaches in Sacramento's two decades of NBA experience combined, his failure to win a championship left him less than beloved by the Maloof family, which owns the club. Joe and Gavin Maloof tentatively courted Phil Jackson last summer while Adelman still was under contract, perplexing Adelman.

He led the Kings to the playoffs in each of his seasons, starting with his surprising onea-year revitalization of a longtime loser in the strike-shortened 1999 season.

With new acquisitions Chris Webber, Vlade Divac, Jason Williams and Stojakovic, the Kings captured the NBA's attention with their high-flying, sharp-passing style. Adelman's offensive schemes were imaginative and intriguing, though the Kings were criticized for their defense.

Sacramento increased its win total in each of its first four seasons under Adelman's watch, eventually winning the club's first two Pacific Division titles while going 61-21 in 2000-01 and 59-23 in 2001-02.

The Kings reached Game 7 of the Western Conference finals in 2002 before losing to the Los Angeles Lakers and missing a chance to play for the franchise's first championship since 1951.

Adelman reached two NBA Finals during six seasons in Portland, and also spent two losing seasons coaching the Golden State Warriors.

UM freshman pair on fire

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

It's no secret that the 2006 Massachusetts softball team has built its resume on stellar pitching performances and relentless offensive attacks. The Minutewomen lead the Atlantic 10 in a number of offensive and pitching categories, including team batting average, slugging percentage, runs scored, earned run average, opponents' batting average and strikeouts.

With that type of statistical dominance, it is no wonder the Maroon and White are once again atop the A-10 standings and have strolled into the post-season. What is remarkable, however, is that this UMass squad is being led on the field by a pair of first-year athletes.

Freshmen Brandice Balschmiter and Whitney Mollica have started their collegiate careers off with a bang, and the rest of the team is benefiting from their success. Both athletes have broken records, won awards and meshed with a new team, all while trying to adjust to college life.

"At first, I never thought it was going to be like this, but when I got here, it was awesome," Mollica said of her first run through the collegiate process.

Both Mollica, the Minutewoman third baseman, and Balschmiter, the ace of the starting rotation, expressed that their freshman year has been a transition period, both on and off the field. However, they said there is not as much pressure to perform as it may seem.

"I don't think there's a lot of pressure [to do well]," Balschmiter said. "You don't get pressure from your teammates; you get pressure from yourself because you want to come in, you want to perform and you don't want to let your teammates down."

Mollica echoed her teammate's comments.

"There's not really pressure to perform; there's more of just a will to perform," Mollica said. "It's more of a mind frame, a lot of mental [pressure]."

One of the biggest reasons for the smooth transition into the college game has been the leadership of the older players, like senior pitcher Jenna Busa, who has helped to coach the younger Balschmiter.

"[Busa] is like my big sister on the team," Balschmiter said. "I can go to her with any questions I have, whether it's pitching or just how to handle classes."

She and Mollica said that the team is very close, so they can go to any one of their teammates, including each other.

"We talk to each other every night before a game," Balschmiter said of Mollica. When asked what they talk about, she said, "Just 'Yup, we've got a game tomorrow, I'm ready to kick some butt.'"

Another senior who has developed into a mentor of the younger players is catcher KJ Kelley, who is paired with Mollica as the Nos. 3 and 4 batters in the UMass lineup.

"When I'm doing batting practice, I'll ask KJ, 'What would you pitch to me if we were in a game?' and she would tell me what some of my weaknesses might be," Mollica said. "She gives me advice like that during the game, like 'I would

Freshman third baseman Whitney Mollica leads the Minutewomen with 10 home runs, 38 RBIs, four triples, 16 doubles, a .419 batting average and a .479 on-base percentage.

Errors cost UMass a tough loss to UConn yesterday

UMass junior Bryan Adanski went 0-for-3 with two strikeouts in the loss to UConn yesterday. He currently leads the Minutemen with four home runs and 25 RBIs.

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

When Connecticut catcher Steve Malinowski strolled to the plate in the top of the sixth inning yesterday at Earl Lorden Field, the Massachusetts baseball team had a tenuous hold on its comeback hopes.

UMass freshman Mitchell Eilenberg made his first start of the year and went into the sixth inning before a two-out Josh Farkes single with two outs and runners on first and second slithered by shortstop Lou Proietti, scoring UConn's fourth run to give the Huskies a 4-1 lead.

Malinowski was next and took advantage of UMass's gift, poking a soft liner over Proietti's head that scored two runs and pushed the lead to five — putting the lid on any comeback possibility — en route to a 12-1 drubbing of the Minutemen (11-26, 9-12 A-10) in the non-conference matchup.

Sophomore third baseman Ryan Franczek went 2-for-3 and scored UMass's lone run of the afternoon.

UMass returns to Lorden Field today at 3 p.m. to face Central Connecticut.

"Mitch pitched well and he should have been out of the [sixth] inning," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "It really should have been 4-1 going into the seventh."

Eilenberg went 5 2/3 innings, allowed six runs (two earned) on six hits and five strikeouts. The Huskies led 2-1 going into the sixth, and UConn scored three of its four sixth-inning runs with two outs.

Errors sunk UMass. Four of the six Huskies runs in the first six innings were unearned.

"We knew when [Eilenberg] was up there [in the sixth inning], and that was as far as he had gone all year, that was probably going to be it," Stone said.

Stone conceded that giving the other team extra outs takes its toll on pitchers.

"You have to throw more pitches and get more outs, so it always affects the pitcher," he said. "Unfortunately, it's more amplified when you've seen a lot of [errors]. It doesn't help."

The Huskies' pitchers silenced the UM bats yesterday. Starter Rich Sirois went three innings and allowed one run on four hits. The four UConn hurlers allowed just one run on six hits and kept the best Minuteman hitters off balance.

UConn's Josh MacDonald (four innings pitched, two hits, five strikeouts) began his stint in the fourth inning and retired seven straight hitters with a blazing fastball and a quick routine — the big rights, after the catcher snapped the ball back, stepped immediately back on the rubber and fired his next heater. He fanned four of the first five Minutemen he faced.

"Personally, [MacDonald] had my number," first baseman Bryan Adamski said. "I had two K's against him. It wasn't anything special — fastball over the middle, splitter. There was no acknowledgement, just stepping on the rubber and going."

"[MacDonald] just got in his rhythm," Proietti said. "He was hitting his spots and made the pitches he had to make."

"[MacDonald] was really getting after it," Stone said. "He was pouring it in there and filling it up. Macdonald is a weekday guy. We beat him last year and the year before, but we didn't do anything today."

UMass's game against Central Connecticut today is another non-conference matchup. UMass's non-conference opponents have been lethal in 2006: Boston College was a stiff test and UConn, at 13-5 in the Big East, is no slouch.

UMass is two games out of the last A-10 playoff spot with a key three-game set with Saint Joseph's on the horizon this weekend, so yesterday's test against UConn should serve as proper preparation for the Hawks.

"You have to play the best competition you can," Proietti said. "That's the only way you are going to get better. You want to play your game all of the time. You don't want to play down to the other team's level. When you play an opponent with a pretty good record, it really makes you be on top of your game."

"We just have to play well, regardless of the outcome," Adamski said. "We have to put something positive together to get into the weekend against St. Joe's. We're still on the outside looking in, but if we start winning games, take two out of three, maybe sweep, we're right back in the thick of things in the A-10."

With 11 wins in 37 games, the Minutemen are fortunate to have a chance at making the postseason. This weekend could be the final shot for UMass, but it will take stellar pitching and solid hitting to take the ideal two-of-three from the Hawks — easier said than done.

Eilenberg's first start up and down

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

It wasn't the most favorable day to make the first start of your collegiate career. The cold and rainy conditions at Earl Lorden Field didn't make for perfect baseball weather, but freshman Mitchell Eilenberg made the best of what he was given.

Add to the fact that he faced Big East power Connecticut (30-15-1, 13-5-1 Big East), and the rookie had a tough task in front of him. Despite the 12-1 beating the Huskies gave UMass, Eilenberg kept the Minutemen (11-26, 9-12 Atlantic 10) in the game over the course of his 5 1/3 innings pitched.

"He did exactly what I was hoping he would do. Unfortunately, other things prevented us from staying in the ballgame," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "I thought he pitched well. He made some good pitches, and he's got good command of his breaking ball."

The first inning saw Eilenberg surrender two runs to the Huskies, which he says was due to nerves stemming from it being his first start. He walked the first batter but then forced a fly ball to left field and a ground out. The next two batters reached on consecutive hits to score the only two earned runs Eilenberg allowed.

Beginning with strikeout to end the first, he retired 13 of the next 15 batters he faced, including six in a row between the fourth and sixth inning. Eilenberg recorded all five of his strikeouts on the afternoon during the same stretch, the last of which was the most impressive.

Eilenberg got right fielder, Josh Farkes, on three straight pitches to end the inning with a man in scoring position. With Farkes almost certainly looking for UMass freshman pitcher Mitchell Eilenberg made his first career start yesterday. He lasted 5 2/3 innings, giving up six runs overall but just two were of the earned variety.

Hoagland takes home A-10 title

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

This weekend held the beginning of the end for the Massachusetts track and field teams' seasons with the Atlantic 10 Championships taking place on Saturday and Sunday.

The meet had its share of both ups and downs as the men's team finished seventh out of 10 teams, while the Minutewomen finished eighth out of their respective 10-team field.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien said that despite having solid performances across the board, the Minutemen crowned only one Atlantic 10 Champion.

That person was jumping extraordinaire Erik Hoagland.

Hoagland, a junior, took first place in the triple jump, setting a new record in the event. His distance of 49 feet, seven inches broke the 19-year UMass record by nearly seven inches, a mark previously held by Jerde Adobe. Hoagland's performance also marked the first time any athlete has cracked the all-time top-five list since Tom Galligani achieved the school's third-best triple-jump mark in 1995.

His performance enters him into the NCAA Regional Qualifiers meet.

"He richly deserves it," O'Brien commented. "I'm very excited for him and proud of him."

Hoagland also won his team an additional two points by placing seventh out of 14 competitors in the long jump, with a leap of 22 feet, 2 1/2 inches.

O'Brien also complimented the clutch performances that sophomore Nathan Barksdale turned in over the weekend and all season long.

"Nathan is probably in a class of four or five people that we have on our team that gets hidden because they kind of sacrifice some of their personal performances [by] becoming members of relay teams," O'Brien said.

This weekend, however, his individual performances did not suffer. Barksdale ran a season-best time of 49.73 seconds in the 400-meter dash finishing in eighth place, as well as helping the 4x100-meter relay team place fifth with its season-best time of 42.58 seconds.

Other performances for the Maroon and White were turned in by junior Tyler Simpson, who finished fourth in the decathlon with 4,959 points.

Also, freshman Kevin Ianetta finished sixth in the 400-meter hurdles. Sophomore Kevin Murphy finished seventh in the 800 meters, senior Ryan Corbett placed seventh in the 3,000-meter steeplechase and freshman Steve Gerome came in eighth place in the long jump.

Good weather conditions made the first day of the A-10s run a little more smoothly than usual for the Minutewomen. A warm climate helps keep everyone's muscles from tightening up and cramping.

"I thought that [the meet] went pretty well for us," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "We had some very good performances."

Sophomore pole-vaulter Kristen Bakanowski and senior sprinter/hurdler Elisabeth Budd were both crowned Atlantic 10 Champions.

Bakanowski finished in third place in the Atlantic 10 Conference pole-vault by clearing a height of 11 feet, 5 3/4 inches. Her jump qualifies her for the regional meet. She later attempted to break the A-10 record, but knocked the bar down.

Bakanowski also ran the first leg of the 4x100-meter relay and helped the team come in eighth place in the event.

"She looked fantastic," LaFreniere said.

Budd won the 400-meter hurdles and stormed into the UMass all-time top-five list with her time of 1:02.95. She also anchored the 4x100-meter relay team along with Bakanowski.

"Elisabeth came through [with] flying colors," LaFreniere said, later

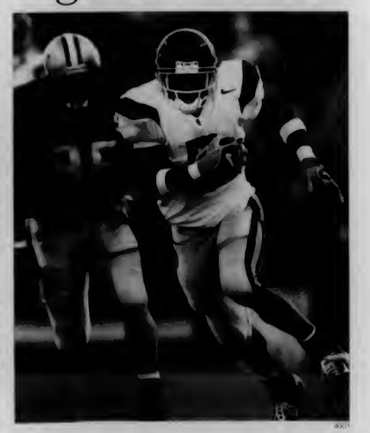
Digesting the Draft

By Vinny DiTrani
Knight Rider

We've had some time now to digest the happenings of two weekends ago, to identify the hits and misses of the 2006 NFL draft.

Miss No. 1



The Texans should not have passed on Reggie Bush. They may have acquired a premier pass rusher in Mario Williams, and pass rusher is second to quarterback as most important position in today's game. But whether it was sign-ability or the nonsense surrounding the Bush household in Los Angeles, Houston erred by not grabbing a rare player who can turn around a game with one brilliant cut.

Hit No. 1

Things couldn't have worked out better for Katrina-ravaged New Orleans than adding a marquee name to its football team. The Saints were smart enough to recognize a windfall when it fell into their laps, and did the right thing by shunning trades and holding onto the dynamic Bush.

Hit No. 2

No one could blame the Jets

The Houston Texans will surely regret passing on Reggie Bush while the New Orleans Saints were more than happy to welcome the USC stud to the team.

Sex soliciting suspect busted by UMPD

An Agawam man was arrested on the University of Massachusetts campus yesterday afternoon for soliciting sex for a fee over the Internet, according to UMass police.

Stephen G. Wortley, 27, of 243 Regency Park Drive in Agawam, was arrested at noon yesterday at an undisclosed location on campus, where he agreed to meet an undercover police officer for sex. He was arraigned in Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley later in the afternoon and received a continuation until June 20 for a pretrial hearing.

Investigation into Wortley began when police detectives noticed an Internet advertisement on craigslist.org asking for sex from a female UMass student for money.

The detective communicated with the person who posted the ad, and arranged a meeting in which sex was going to be exchanged for a fee.

The time of the rendezvous was set for yesterday at noon at a location that police refused to disclose.

An undercover operation was put in place and the suspect showed up as arranged. Wortley had engaged in conversation with the decoy and asked for her by name, after which Wortley was identified and placed under arrest, according to police.

Police say Wortley works in Simsbury, Conn. as a painter.

"This was good work by our detective bureau," Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald said. "They are consistent in their protection of UMass students."

This is the second arrest made this semester in relation to Internet sex solicitation. On Feb. 28, UMPD arrested a Chicopee man at the W.E.B. DuBois Library after an undercover UMass police officer posing as a UMass student arranged to meet him for sex, police said. The solicitation also occurred on Craigslist.org.

Drug lab discovered in UMass dormitory

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police came upon a drug lab inside a student's dormitory while executing a search warrant Tuesday night, according to Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

Torey S. Littlefield, 20, of 375 Old Post Road in Worthington, was arrested at approximately 10:22 p.m. on charges of possession and manufacturing a Class B drug, cocaine. In addition, the drugs ketamine and peyote were allegedly seized from his dorm room. Littlefield could face additional charges of possession and manufacturing Class C drugs once testing of the substances is complete, which could take several weeks.

Using information from an informant, police conducted a lengthy investigation into the reported use and manufacturing of illegal drugs in the Lewis dormitory in the Northeast Residential Area, where Littlefield has been residing while he attends classes at UMass, Archbald said.

UMPD also worked with members of the Massachusetts State Police Narcotics Unit attached to the Northwestern District Attorney's Office, as well as the Drug Enforcement Agency during its investigation.

In addition to the drugs, officers also seized various drug processing, manufacturing and refining equipment that includes funnels, beakers, strainers, heating fuel and drying equipment.

Police did not disclose the amount of each drug that was confiscated. Littlefield is not charged with being a dealer.

Peyote is a hallucinogenic drug that comes from a small, spineless cactus and has psychedelic effects. One of its principal ingredients is mescaline.

Ketamine is a synthetic drug used as an animal tranquilizer, and goes by the street name "Special K." According to a search on the official United States Drug Enforcement Administration Web site, ketamine has become popular among teens and young adults "at dance clubs and 'raves.'"

The drug comes in a clear liquid, or white or off-white powder, and high doses often produce a dissociative, "out-of-body experience" effect, sometimes called a "K Hole." It is also sometimes used as a "rape drug," according to the DEA Web site. Use of the drug can also cause delirium, amnesia, depression, and long-term memory difficulties.

Ketamine is additionally considered hazardous, as it contains explosive properties.

Littlefield defaulted his appearance at Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley this morning, but was present this afternoon. He received a continuation until June 13 for a pretrial hearing.

Archbald issued a statement yesterday afternoon regarding the arrest.

"More informants are being seen cooperating with the police department, which helps us," Archbald said. "Investigations start with help from the community.

"We are not surprised to find cocaine on campus, but it is alarming that a student has been using University property to manufacture synthetic drugs in a laboratory that he shared with other students. He is putting everyone in the building in harm's way."

This is the second drug bust involving cocaine in as many weeks at UMass. On May 3, four students were arrested in Coolidge dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area as part of a nine-month investigation into the trafficking of cocaine. The students are set to appear in court in June.

Deal to buy 'Frat Row' houses confirmed

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Speculation that the University of Massachusetts is interested in buying "Frat Row" was confirmed yesterday by two overseers of the negotiations.

Gary Shepherd of Alpha Tau Gamma (ATG), the company that owns the five properties on North Pleasant St., said yesterday that a deal between ATG and UMass has not been cemented, but is in the works.

"It's all speculative right now, but I would like to say that I'm comfortable that there will be in fact something happening," said Shepherd, who is a former president and vice president of ATG and is heading the talks with the University.

The properties are located at 375, 387, 389, 395, and 401 North Pleasant St., and are currently home for two operating fraternities, Alpha Epsilon Pi and Pi Delta Psi, and one sorority, Sigma Psi Zeta. The presidents of each of those Greek chapters say they were mailed a letter from ATG in early April, informing them that they would not be able to live in their respective houses.

Bargaining on behalf of UMass, Department of Capital Asset Management (DECAM) Deputy Commissioner Peter Norstrand agrees that a deal is in the making.

"We are in the negotiating phase right now and I wouldn't want to get into too much detail about it, but the University is obviously interested in buying that property," said Norstrand. "It's something we're working on right now, but we hope to get it done over the next couple of months."

According to the three presidents who live on the property, Ben Levine of Alpha Epsilon Pi, Long Tran of Pi Delta Psi, and Patrick Archbald said. "They are consistent in their protection of UMass students."

The Sigma Psi Zeta sorority is one of several Greek houses on N. Pleasant St. that will be purchased by UMass, according to the current owner of the homes.

Name association causes SGA drama

Tempers flared between senators in last night's Student Government Association meeting at the University of Massachusetts after the majority of students voted to table a motion that would have enforced a bylaw that already existed in their constitution.

The motion, which had been sponsored by Sen. John Williams and Sen. Charles Thebado, called for the senate to enact a bylaw that states all programs and events supported by the executive branch that are not voted on by the Senate not bear the name "Student Government Association," but instead read, "Endorsed by the SGA President."

"We're not trying to stir up any controversy," said Sen. Shawn Robinson, who also spoke in favor of the motion. "This is something that is already in our constitution, we just want to see it enforced."

Sen. Elizabeth Vargas called for the motion to be tabled and to be heard by the Administrative Affairs committee, of which she is a member.

Vargas' motion passed by a vote of 15-14 with one abstention.

Robinson was visibly upset after the vote, seen yelling at the senator who voted to abstain from voting.

"This is just an example of how bad things have gotten in the SGA," said Robinson. "Vargas sits on the committee it's been tabled to, she's said she's against the bill, now she can vote against it."

Williams explained that the bylaw exists to serve as protection for the same senators that had voted to table.

"Imagine if we had a conservative president who created a bunch of fliers in support that Pro-Wal-Mart rally a few weeks ago," said Williams. "He or she could create those fliers and put 'supported by the SGA' on every flier without bringing it to the Senate."

Despite all the drama, Speaker Sean Bliss claimed it was likely all for nothing.

"The motion is now going to be brought to the Administrative Affairs, which I'm pretty sure doesn't have enough members to make quorum," said Bliss. "If that's the case the motion will be brought back to the senate, where I expect it to be received in an entirely different tone.

"I think this whole debate was a big miscommunication," said Bliss.

Great White manager sentenced for fire

By Eric Tucker
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — A former rock-band manager whose pyrotechnics caused a nightclub fire that killed 100 people was sentenced Wednesday to four years in prison, drawing sobs and groans from some victims' relatives who hoped to see the man serve more time behind bars.

Some were so angered by the sentence given to Daniel Biechele — who could have served up to 10 years — that they stormed out of the courtroom. One man yelled, "Typical [expletive] Rhode Island!"

"What do you think of your son now?" Patricia Belanger shouted to Biechele's mother. Belanger, who lost her 30-year-old daughter, Dina Ann DeMaio, told reporters afterward: "Now it's her turn to suffer, just like we've been suffering because of her son."

Before sentencing, Biechele gazed downward and choked back tears as he apologized for the Feb. 20, 2003, blaze at The Station nightclub in West Warwick.

"I don't know that I'll ever forgive myself for what happened that night, so I can't expect anyone else to," he said, his lip quivering. "I never wanted anyone to be hurt in any way. I never imagined that anyone ever would be."

Testimony from victims' relatives Monday and Tuesday left lawyers, court officials and at one point the defendant himself in tears. Some described a grief so powerful that they could not get out of bed in the morning, and said they looked forward to nothing except being reunited with their loved ones in death.

Superior Court Judge Francis Darigan Jr. gave Biechele, 29, less than half the prison sentence he could have received under a deal he struck with prosecutors in February, when he pleaded guilty to 100 counts of involuntary manslaughter. Victims' families briefly thought Biechele was getting a 15-year sentence, but the judge suspended 11 years of that term.

Nevada students protest for world peace

By Ricky Hosken
The Sagebrush (U. Nevada-Reno)

RENO, Nev. — About 25 people walked silently along Virginia Street Sunday afternoon.

The group that organized the event wanted to promote peace and social justice around the world, but anti-war protesters also showed up to the event.

Some participants made signs to promote peace, such as Hitomi Mori, a 28-year-old international student pursuing a masters in social work. She made a sign that said "peace" in Japanese.

But others made signs such as "Drop Bush not Bombs" to protest the war in Iraq and George W. Bush's presidency.

The organizers, who are part of the university Sit for Peace club, hosted the walk along Virginia Street from Lawlor Events Center to the Manzanita Bowl. The group ended the event at the Joe Travis Student Union lawn where music was played and speakers addressed the audience.

Sit for Peace, a Graduate Student Association club, arranged the event as a project for their social work class to promote peace and solving conflicts by peaceful means. But participants arrived to protest the Iraq War, making the public think that Sit for Peace is an anti-war group.

"The general public thinks we are an anti-war group, but we're not," said Toni McCormick, who helped organize the event.

Baby's arm found in harbor

BOSTON (AP) — Workers at the Deer Island sewage treatment plant on Boston Harbor discovered a baby's arm in sewage, and authorities said Wednesday the remains could have come from 21 different communities around Boston.

Suffolk County spokesman David Procopio said the arm found Tuesday was several inches long. The arm has been taken to the medical examiner's office to determine how old the baby was and when the baby died. Results were still pending Wednesday.

Authorities originally contacted authorities in five communities north of Boston for reports of missing infants.

Tornado ravages rural Texas town

WESTMINSTER, Texas (AP) — One survivor said it was like a thunderstorm that "went crazy" as twisters ripped through rural North Texas overnight, reducing homes to concrete slabs and killing three people, including a boy cowering in the stairwell of his home.

At least 26 homes were destroyed. Ten people were hospitalized and dozens of others were treated at the scene for minor injuries.

A couple in their 80s was found dead in a destroyed mobile home in Westminster, about 45 miles northeast of Dallas, Collin County Fire Marshal Steve Deffibaugh said. A 14-year-old boy was killed in neighboring Grayson County when a chimney collapsed on the stairwell where he had taken shelter, authorities said.

"It sounded like a regular thunderstorm, then it went crazy," said Cathy Dotson, who huddled on the floor of her Westminster home with her grandchildren when the tornado hit Tuesday night. "I could actually feel my house move."

Christy Adame, who lives a half-mile from the home where the elderly couple died, took shelter in a closet with her husband and two sons.

When they emerged, she found her horse barn gone, one of her horses dead in a tree and the smell of propane so strong — and the risk of an explosion so high — that officials would not let a neighbor shoot his suffering cow, which had been impaled on a two-by-four.

"Now I know what an earthquake feels like," Adame said.

Collin County spokeswoman Leigh Hornsby said crews went door-to-door checking homes early Wednesday to make sure there were no more victims, and believe everyone was accounted for. The dead were identified as Paul Harris Newsom, 82; his wife, Mary Ellen, 80, and Colson Dwayne, 14.

Deffibaugh said the twisters took Westminster's residents "by surprise, totally unaware." The community of about 420 has no sirens, and the tornadoes hit too fast for the county's emergency telephone-notification system to respond, he said.

National Weather Service meteorologist Alan Moller said at least two tornadoes hit. "I think it was the first tornado that killed three people," he said. "Then there was a larger tornado after that that probably did extensive damage."

The damage track was estimated at a half-mile wide and 6 to 7 miles long.

Storms also raked Arkansas early Wednesday, toppling trees, damaging roofs and downing power lines. Students at a Little Rock junior high school were evacuated to a high school next door after a tree fell near fuel tanks. A FedEx truck was blown into the median of Interstate 530.

Congress passes tax cuts with debate along party lines

WASHINGTON (AP) — A bill awarding tax relief to investors and 15 million taxpayers facing the alternative minimum tax passed the House on Wednesday, giving President Bush and his GOP allies on Capitol Hill a long-sought election year victory.

The bill providing tax cuts worth $70 billion over five years passed by a 244-185 vote. The Senate was expected to clear the bill for Bush's signature Thursday.

The legislation provides a two-year extension of the reduced 15 percent tax rate for capital gains and dividends, currently set to expire at the end of 2008.

It also would extend, for this year, recent changes to the alternative minimum tax — originally aimed at making sure the wealthy pay at least some taxes — to prevent it from hitting more upper middle-income families.

The debate divided starkly along partisan lines, with Republicans crediting the tax cuts, first enacted in 2003, with a surging economy, millions of new jobs and booming tax revenues. Democrats countered that the deficit-financed tax cuts are tilted in favor of wealthy investors and that the economic benefits are not as great as advertised.

"Our pro-growth policies have helped the economy create more than 5.2 million jobs since August of 2003," Bush said in a statement. "By extending key capital gains and dividends tax relief, the House has taken an important step to continue to help hardworking Americans and to keep our economy strong and growing."

"Our tax relief sparked this economic growth," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. "And by extending key provisions of that tax relief, today's legislation adds just another spark to the already booming economy."

Critics, including most Democrats, attacked the tax rate reductions on dividends and capital gains as being skewed in favor of the rich. They noted that it was the second half of a GOP budget package that began with $30 billion in benefit cuts over five years, many of which came from programs for the poor such as Medicaid.

Democrats also cited a joint study by the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution that shows taxpayers with incomes greater than $1 million per year winning tax cuts of $42,000 under the bill while families with incomes of $50,000 a year would average a $46 tax cut.

"The Republican Party ... is sending all the millionaires on an all-expenses-paid vacation — for $41,000 a year," said Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash. "The rest of America is being forced to choose between filling the gas tank or stocking the refrigerator."

Hikers' bizarre ordeal credited with survival

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Two lost hikers who survived three nights in rugged terrain were rescued after they scavenged supplies from the campsite of another hiker who vanished last year and is presumed dead.

The pair found a backpack containing clothing and matches in the deserted campsite of John Donovan, almost a year to the day after he disappeared in the San Jacinto Mountains.

Donovan's abandoned gear "gave us the means to get out," hiker Gina Allen said Wednesday in a telephone interview.

Allen, 24, and Brandon Day, 28, of Dallas, were in Southern California for a financial convention. They got lost Saturday west of Palm Springs after wandering off a trail during what was supposed to be a day hike.

At first, they were not too worried because they could hear voices.

"I still felt we were relatively close," Day said, recalling that he thought the trail would "be around this next boulder."

Prepared only for a brief hike, they wore light jackets and tennis shoes and had no food, spare clothing or cell phones.

With night closing in, they took shelter in a small cave between boulders and spent the night sleepless, freezing and hungry.

In the morning, they struggled to follow a stream downhill through boulder-strewn terrain. That night, they were frequently awakened by their own shivering.

But they kept going, with "the mantra from night one: 'We're going to get out of here. We're not going to die. It's not our time,'" Day said.

The third day was the worst for Allen, who was getting weaker.

Iraq president urges efforts to end violence

By Tarek El-Tablawy
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — President Jalal Talabani urged Iraq's feuding factions Wednesday to unite against surging crime and terrorism, saying Iraqis feel "shock, dismay and anger" at the ongoing slaughter.

The government reported 952 people — most of them civilians — died nationwide last month in "terrorist" violence, including attacks by sectarian death squads that torture and kill their victims before dumping the mutilated bodies in the streets.

"What is asked of the political parties is that they strenuously and clearly condemn these crimes, regardless of who the perpetrators are," Talabani, a former Kurdish guerrilla commander, said in a statement. "Clerics — be they Muslim, Christians, Shiite or Sunni — from all factions should also issue edicts rejecting these acts."

Figures from the ministries of health and interior showed that during April, 686 civilians were killed in politically motivated violence, along with 190 insurgents, 54 policemen and 22 Iraqi soldiers.

Eighty-two coalition troops — including 76 Americans, three Italians, one Romanian, one Britain and one Australian — died in Iraq during the same period.

The ministries' figures for previous months were not available Wednesday night.

At least 3,550 Iraqis, including civilians, officials and security forces, have been killed in war-related violence this year, according to an Associated Press tally. That includes at least 615 in January, 741 in February, 1,038 in March and 801 in April.

U.S. officials say the relentless bloodshed adds new urgency to efforts by Iraq's religiously and ethnically based parties to complete formation of a broad-based government.

In Wednesday's violence, gunmen northeast of Baghdad stopped a bus carrying employees of a state-run electronics firm, ordered the women off and gunned down the men, company spokesman Adnan Hamad said.

The gunmen then booby-trapped the bus. When rescuers opened the door, a bomb exploded. Altogether, 11 people were killed and six wounded, Hamad said.

At least 15 other people were killed or found dead elsewhere in Iraq.

U.S. officials believe a new national unity government can — over time — restore public confidence, calm sectarian tensions, undercut the Sunni-dominated insurgency and enable American and other international troops to go home.

Tortuous negotiations have been under way for months to organize the new government, and incoming Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had said he expected to complete the final stage — the appointment of his Cabinet — this week.

Al-Maliki's spokesman, Salah Abdul-Razaq, said the Shiite leader was hopeful the task could be completed by Sunday. However, Abdul-Razaq told The Associated Press that some factions were objecting to the formula for distributing Cabinet posts, raising the possibility of further delays.

The spokesman said al-Maliki insisted that the new ministers of defense and interior "be independents and outside the factions." U.S. and British officials have insisted that the new heads of those ministries, which control the army and police, not be linked to parties that operate militias blamed for many of the sectarian killings.

But the Shiite alliance has insisted on retaining the Interior Ministry, and officials said Tuesday that the Sunnis and Kurds had accepted that demand. That would give the Shiites the right to nominate an interior minister subject to approval by other parties.

However, the Shiites said they wanted to appoint the incumbent, Bayan Jabr, who has been accused by the Sunnis of tolerating militias and death squads in the ranks of the ministry's paramilitary commandos.

On Wednesday, a key Sunni Arab leader, Adnan al-Dulaimi, warned that Jabr was unacceptable for the post and the Shiites should find another candidate.

"If Bayan retains it, the political process and the prospects for forming a national unity government will collapse," al-Dulaimi told the AP. "The [Shiite] alliance say that they want security and they are pragmatists. I don't think that they will insist on Bayan."

In an interview Wednesday with National Public Radio, Jabr said he believed the government could bring an end to the death squads "in the next few months."

Iran president: nuclear concerns 'a big lie'

JAKARTA, Indonesia (AP) — Iran's president on Wednesday dismissed Western concerns over its nuclear program as "a big lie," a day after key U.N. Security Council members agreed to present Tehran with a choice of incentives or sanctions in deciding whether to suspend uranium enrichment.

Meanwhile, in a letter to Time magazine published on its Web site, a representative of Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei offered new options for solving the impasse with the United States and its allies.

Hassan Rohani, Iran's former top nuclear negotiator, said Tehran would consider ratifying an International Atomic Energy Agency protocol that provides for intrusive and snap inspections and would also address the question of preventing a pullout from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, says of the Time magazine letter, "We've seen it ... I think there really isn't anything new in it." He said the letter does not deal at all with enrichment.

The current Iranian negotiator, Ali Larijani, said Tuesday that Tehran had no intention of withdrawing from the treaty and promised to cooperate if the U.N. atomic watchdog agency, rather than the Security Council, dealt with the issue of its nuclear program.

Iran ended all voluntary cooperation with the IAEA in February, including allowing snap inspections of its nuclear facilities.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told reporters Wednesday in Indonesia's capital that Iran will "absolutely not back out" of defending its right to pursue new technology, accusing the United States and other Western nations of monopolizing the nuclear technology market to secure profits while engaging in non-peaceful proliferation.

"They pretend that they are concerned about the nature of the nuclear program of the Islamic republic of Iran," he said after meeting with Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. "This is a big lie."

"Today the people of Iran are not just defending their own rights, but also those of other nations," he said. "They [the United States and other Western powers] want to prevent other countries from reaching the pinnacle of science and technology."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told reporters yesterday that Western concerns over Iran's nuclear program were 'a big lie.'

At a meeting Tuesday, representatives of the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France as well as Germany agreed to tell Iran the possible consequences of its refusal to halt its enrichment program and the benefits if it abandons it.

The move will delay a U.S.-backed draft U.N. resolution that could lead to sanctions and possible military action if Iran does not suspend uranium enrichment.

Fuel cutoff could cripple Palestinians

By Ali Daraghmeh
Associated Press

NABLUS, West Bank (AP) — Palestinian gas stations started shutting down and motorists lined up at pumps after an Israeli fuel company cut off deliveries Wednesday, deepening the humanitarian crisis following Hamas' rise to power.

An end to fuel supplies for the West Bank and Gaza could cripple hospitals, halt food deliveries and keep people home from work — a devastating scenario for an economy already ravaged by Israeli and international sanctions.

The Israeli company Dor Energy, the sole fuel provider to the Palestinians since interim peace agreements in the mid-1990s, cited growing debts for its decision, Palestinian officials said. Dor declined comment, but the company had threatened to cut off supplies twice before this year, only to be paid at the last minute by the Palestinians.

Asaf Sharir, a spokesman for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said Israel would "absolutely not" bail out the Palestinians. Sharir said that since the Palestinian government resells gasoline to consumers, there is no reason for it not to have money to pay its debts.

But Palestinian officials said their cash-strapped government is one of the biggest users of gasoline and unable to pay the bill.

Mujahid Salame, head of the Palestinian petrol authority, predicted fuel supplies would run out in many areas by Thursday. "If this happens, there will be a humanitarian crisis," he said.

In Gaza City, people tried to stock up at filling stations.

"I bought more than I need because I want to guarantee that I can reach work again," said Osama Shaban, 33, a construction engineer who drives 10 miles to work each day.

Station owners said they have several days of reserves, but some limited motorists' purchases to conserve supplies.

Dr. Moanya Hassanain, a top Health Ministry official in Gaza, warned that the area's hospitals, already suffering from a medicine shortage, would cease to function without fuel. Ambulances would stop running, employees would be unable to get to work, gas generators used during ongoing electric outages would be hobbled.

"It's going to be a disaster for us," he said at a Gaza City gas station where he helped fill up several ambulances.

In the West Bank, the situation was more dire. Many stations said they were out of fuel, some laying their dry hoses on the ground.

"The only thing I've been doing for the past day is telling drivers that I don't have any gas," said Wad Dabous, who works at a station in the town of Jenin. A sign said simply: "Sorry, no gas."

In Nablus, a line of taxi drivers said they stopped working because they had no fuel. One driver, Mahmoud Tourabi, said he would try to drive to a nearby Jewish settlement in hopes of filling his tank.

"They may kill me there, so I will be the martyr of the gas," he quipped.

The fuel crunch is the latest sign of trouble for the Palestinian economy, hit hard by a cutoff in Western aid. Donors halted the money flow in response to Hamas victory in legislative elections, demanding the group renounce violence and recognize Israel. The U.S. and European Union, the two biggest donors, consider Hamas a terrorist group.

Hamas has rejected the demands, despite a financial crisis that has left it unable to pay the salaries of thousands of government workers for two months.

Instead, it has raised some $70 million from Iran and Arab donors. But under U.S. pressure, banks refuse to transfer the funds, and the money remains stuck in an account in Egypt.

Compounding Hamas' woes, Israel cut off about $55 million in monthly transfers of tax it collects for the Palestinians. Israel has placed the money in escrow.

Israel dipped into this money last month to pay Palestinian bills to government-owned companies, such as the Israeli electric monopoly. The Palestinians rely on Israel for many key supplies, including fuel, electricity and water.

Last Titanic survivor dies in New England

WORCESTER — Lillian Gertrud Asplund lived a quiet life. She never married, had children or even got a driver's license. Her only known survivors are two distant cousins.

Yet condolences poured in from as far as New Zealand and Argentina. The flower room at the funeral chapel was packed, though the director had only expected one bouquet. And strangers prayed and took snapshots at her graveside as the last U.S. survivor of the Titanic sinking was laid to rest Wednesday.

Asplund died in her sleep at her Shrewsbury home Saturday at age 99.

"I've seen the movies. I've seen all the documentaries. It was a terrible accident," said Giovane Luz, 32, of Leominster, who took time off work from his job as an electrician to pay his respects and take a photo of himself next to her casket. "Only lucky persons could escape from that accident. I wish I knew her in person."

Asplund was 5 when she lost her father and three brothers after the Titanic sank in the North Atlantic after hitting an iceberg April 15, 1912.

Murder, arson suspect faces judge for charges

SPRINGFIELD — A man accused of fatally stabbing an elderly couple, then setting their apartment on fire to cover up the crime, defiantly denied the charges in court Wednesday.

Brian Cavitt, 23, of Springfield, is charged with arson and two counts of murder in the deaths of Edelmira Miranda, 67, and Milagros Rosario, 69.

Prosecutors say Cavitt killed the couple after he forced his way into their apartment at the Carpe Diem housing complex to hide out after he robbed the Big Y supermarket Friday.

"I didn't kill nobody," Cavitt blurted out as the charges against him were read during his arraignment in Springfield District Court. He pleaded not guilty and was ordered held without bail.

Relatives of the couple sobbed during Cavitt's brief court appearance. As he was led away, one person said, "I hope you die in prison."

Assistant District Attorney Richard Morse said in court that Miranda and Rosario had multiple stab wounds. Morse also said that a pair of tan shorts and jewelry found at the scene were identified as Cavitt's.

Cavitt pleaded not guilty Monday to armed robbery and other charges stemming from the supermarket holdup.

He is due back in court June 8.

Worcester man dies fighting in Iraq war

WORCESTER — A 19-year-old Worcester man was among 10 soldiers killed when their helicopter crashed during combat operations in eastern Afghanistan last week, the Army announced Wednesday.

Pfc. Brian M. Moquin Jr. died Friday in the remote mountains of Kunar Province, Afghanistan, after the CH-47 Chinook transport helicopter crashed while on a mission to find al-Quida and Taliban militants believed to be hiding in the rugged terrain near the border with Pakistan.

Army officials said the helicopter was conducting operations on a mountaintop landing zone when it fell into a ravine. All 10 soldiers aboard the helicopter were killed.

Military officials said the helicopter was not downed by hostile fire. An investigation into the cause of the crash is continuing, Julie Curren, a spokeswoman for the Army, said Wednesday.

Moquin's mother, Tracy Vaillancourt, said she was in Chicago on a business trip Sunday morning when an Army officer called her on her cell phone and told her of the death of her only child.

"He was too young," Vaillancourt told the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester. "He just wanted to do something to make everybody proud. I'm very proud of him."

Grandfather Romney celebrates

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney and his wife Ann are celebrating the birth of their ninth grandchild, a Romney spokesman said Wednesday.

Parker Mitt Romney was born Tuesday in New York City. He's the first child to the Romneys' youngest son Craig and his wife Mary. Parker weighed in at 7 1/2 pounds.

The governor and first lady planned to visit the new baby Wednesday, said Romney spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom.

The couple, who have five sons, is expected to return to Massachusetts on Thursday morning.

Filene's building preserved

BOSTON — The Boston Landmarks Commission on Tuesday voted to give protected status to a downtown block of buildings that houses Filene's department store, meaning the historic facades on two buildings must be preserved.

The petition the committee considered was filed in the 1980s, but the commission moved it up on the priority list because the new owner of the buildings, Federated Department Stores, is closing Filene's and selling the buildings.

Filene's Basement, which is owned by a separate company, will remain in the building.

Biechele sentenced after victim statements

long — four years. We've already suffered that long," said Annmarie Nowdwa, whose 25-year-old daughter, Bridget Sarrett, died in the fire.

Biechele was also sentenced to three years probation. He will be eligible for parole after serving 16 months.

DeMatis's sister, Jessica Garvey, called the sentence "infuriating" and "ridiculous."

"Four years is nothing," she said outside court.

In explaining his sentence, Dunigan told Biechele, "The greatest sentence that can be imposed upon you has been imposed upon you by yourself, that is having to live a life, an entire life, knowing that your actions were the proximate cause of the deaths of 100 people."

Biechele, the first person to be sentenced for the fire, was led out of the courtroom in handcuffs and transported to the state prison in Cranston to begin serving his sentence. The owners of the club are awaiting trial on manslaughter charges.

"I feel some compassion for Mr. Biechele, perhaps even more so for his family," Attorney General Patrick Lynch told reporters outside the courthouse. But he said he felt more for the "hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of people" who are more deeply affected by the fire.

Biechele was the tour manager for the heavy metal band Great White when he lit a pyrotechnics display that ignited highly flammable foam that lined the walls and ceiling of the nightclub. The foam was used as soundproofing and was placed there by the owners after neighbors complained about noise.

Victims included the band's guitarist Ty Longley. Many of those killed were quickly overcome by fumes emitted by the foam or became trapped in a crush at the front door.

Biechele's lawyer, Tom Briody, asked the judge to show mercy and sentence Biechele to community service.

He said Biechele was the only person to accept responsibility and is truly remorseful, having written letters of apology to the families that will be given to them later. He argued that Biechele could have never known about the hazardous conditions inside the club, which he likened to a "tinderbox."

"I ask you to consider this: Dan Biechele is the only man in this tragedy to stand up and say 'I did something wrong,'" Briody said. "He's the only man to say 'I apologize.'"

Prosecutors had asked for the maximum.

"The devastation wrought by the conduct of the defendant is unparalleled in our state's history," prosecutor Randall White said, occasionally choking up in court. "The suffering is endless, and the extent and depth of the pain is bottomless."

The fire, the fourth-deadliest nightclub blaze in U.S. history, scarred a state small enough that many of its residents seemed to know at least one person at the club that night who was injured or killed.

The owners of The Station, brothers Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, are accused of installing the flammable foam and are charged with 200 counts of involuntary manslaughter — two counts for each person killed, under separate legal theories.

Michael Derderian is scheduled to go to trial on July 31; no trial date has been set for his brother.

Teavy Moeung of the Sigma Psi Zeta sorority, the east side of North Pleasant St., known as "Frat Row," will not exist next semester. Levine, Tran, and Moeung each say the members of their chapters are currently looking for a new location to live next semester. Moeung says the letter from ATG was the only official notice she received regarding the possible deal.

"As of right now, it's very much like the school versus Frat Row," said Moeung in an interview on April 26. Moeung will be abroad in Australia next semester, but says there are about 17 Sigma Psi Zeta sisters who are currently relocating.

Michael Wiseman, the director of the Office of Fraternities and Sororities at UMass, and Joyce Hatch, the vice chancellor for Admission and Finance, both concur that there is no certainty of a done deal.

The two other pieces of property at 389 and 395 North Pleasant St. are presently not operating under Greek life and are vacant. The house on 395 North Pleasant St. was occupied by the fraternity Sigma Alpha Mu until it was handed a three-year suspension by UMass for fire, health and building violations last summer.

Negotiations between UMass and ATG have been ongoing since January of 2003 and intensified in March 2003 when ATG posted the properties on eBay.com. Since that time, however, no further movement has occurred. According to Shepherd, the process of the deal is a slow one.

"The bureaucratic process in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is a little timely, and somewhat inefficient," said Shepherd. "There is no deal that's etched yet, the deal has not been signed."

John Caruso sits outside the former Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity on April 26. The house has been vacant since it was sited for safety violations last year. More frat houses are expected to be purchased by UMass soon.

War discussion tonight at UMass

The Anti-War Coalition at the University of Massachusetts is sponsoring a formal student debate this Thursday on the current conflict in Iraq.

The discussion will allow equal time for both sides — for students who are for and against the war — to express their opinions, organizers say. The debate will be civilized and without many interruptions or people speaking over each other, says organizer Ethan Burke.

"Regardless of where one stands on the issue of the Iraq War, we hope all can agree that dialogue and discussion is beneficial to a democratic society," said Burke, a member of the UMass Anti-War Coalition who will be speaking at the event.

Speaking in defense of the war in Iraq will be UMass students Hirak Shah and Joe Kelley, and expressing views against the war are Anti-War Coalition members Burke and Justin Jackson.

Dan O'Brien, the News Editor of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, will be moderating the event.

The discussion will take place this Thursday, May 11 at 7 p.m. in room 101 of the UMass Campus Center. All students and community members are encouraged to attend.

'The Mecca of entertainment'

Adam McGillen

There is a place that many of us traveled to in our youth. It was a familiar place, one of sun and beaches, of beautiful women radiating in their bikinis and muscular men bristling in their Speedo shorts. The bar was always open; drinks always at the ready, and local residents thrived in absolute peace and serenity.

We called it paradise, and though a cloud never crossed the pristine sky, thunder shattered the still blue waters every day. Maybe this place only existed in the cathode ray tube of my television, but it reached out through the screen and touched my heart with two big thumbs up from the greatest anti-terrorism duo to ever live: Randolph J. "Hurricane" Spencer and Martin "Bru" Brubaker.

That's right. I'm talking about the Mecca of entertainment; what could be the savior of our generation: "Thunder in Paradise." "Thunder in Paradise" taught me more about life than I could ever learn in any college course, and I'm sure many of you will agree. If you haven't been blessed with a little thunder in your life, if your childhood left you an empty shell, then you need to purchase this series as soon as possible, for your own sake, please. It shouldn't be a problem: copies of the movies and the entire television series can be purchased on eBay for approximately $10 each. Your salvation is worth a mere $40, isn't it?

On the surface, the 22-episode series and its full-length feature film counterparts may seem like simple, fun family entertainment set on the beaches of a Disney resort, but in actuality, "Thunder in Paradise" delves into the meaning of life and how to make the most of your every day.

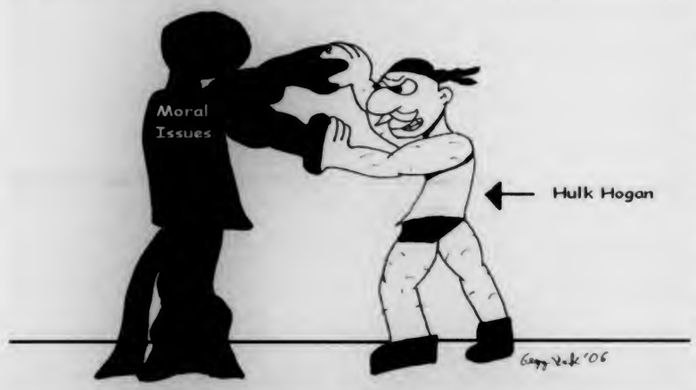
The show may revolve around a big black boat that approaches the speed of light with thunder-drive engaged, but it is so much more than just flashy special effects and incredible acting (no really, this acting is the best I've ever seen). Marlon Brando, eat your heart out — these guys are amazing.

Hulk Hogan ("Hurricane" Spencer) and Chris Lemon (Uncle Bru) showed me what true friends are. They know how to enjoy life. You can see it whenever they slap their immense fists together and give each other the thumbs up: a powerful gesture that embodies everything good and right in this world. They value family and friends, and it is their intense loyalty to each other that allows them to fight terrorism and crime so fearlessly.

"Thunder in Paradise" taught me more about life than I could ever learn in any college course, and I'm sure many of you will agree.

When they make promises, they always follow through, even if it means calling home in the middle of a firefight in the jungles of South America. That right there is something I like to call dedication: take note if you ever want to build a relationship stronger than any hatred. Even stronger than Hulk Hogan's massive arms.

True friendship is something that is rare these days. People are quick to change crowds; everything revolves around who is in what clique, who's going to dinner with who, who's getting left out. It's a terrible and depressing way to live, but we can avoid it by simply taking after "Hurricane" Spencer and good old Uncle Bru.



Just two ex-SEALs that know what's important in life: fighting all that is wrong in the world, getting it done every day, and doing it with more smiles than you'll ever find at McDonald's. If "Hurricane," Uncle Bru and their boat Thunder had been around in 1912, there never would have been an excuse to exploit a disaster and make a torturous five-hour movie.

If the show hadn't been cancelled and we still had Thunder today, this war on terrorism would have ended five minutes after it began. The economy would soar when thunder-drive was incorporated into every vehicle, and gas prices would no longer be relevant because the thunder-drive mechanism runs purely on the goodness of your heart.

Our generation faces a great deal of problems, but there is a solution for everything: what we need to do is live thunderously. Taking lessons from "Thunder in Paradise," we can all strive to be better people. Go with your gut; always do what feels right. If you can bring justice to those close to you, you will have helped to spread justice to the world.

When I say live thunderously, I mean you need to shake things up a bit. Make some noise and be heard. Stop caring that you're wearing an incredibly tight pair of shorts that don't conceal much, and simply be proud that you're doing the right thing and helping others. If we all bring a little thunder into our lives, we will turn this world into paradise faster than Uncle Bru can set sail.

What I would have done differently

Gilad Skolnick

Graduation is upon us, and in a few weeks, God willing, I will graduate from one of the best state schools in all of Massachusetts. I'll have my spiffy, odd looking square hat and a gown and I'll feel smart. I had the time of my life here, and I am deeply thankful for much that the University of Massachusetts has given me, but there are so many things I would do over again if I had a chance.

I thought in my very last article of my Collegian career of over 50 columns, I should do some charity and share my wisdom with the world. Simple things took me four years to figure out, like the fact that the best bathrooms on campus are on the 19th floor of the W.E.B. Du Bois library, and that each hour of class costs you somewhere between $25 to $35 (something to think about next time you skip class).

I recently visited the UMass Hadley farm and saw people shearing alpacas as part of a class open to non-majors as well. If I could do it all over again, I would have taken Alpaca Shearing, but that's not all I would do differently.

If I could do it all over again, I would have taken Alpaca Shearing, but that's not all I would do differently.

In four years, I managed to acquire a double degree and three different majors, study abroad for a year, take classes in all of the five colleges and hold positions on an RSO. I have watched UMCTV 19 at least once, attended a few Student Government Association meetings and ruled the High Potter Baker House with an iron fist as the vice president for two years (and served as interim president for a Thursday evening when the president had to go to the hospital). I even survived my first two years here without a cell phone.

I would have sent at least one telegram before Western Union quietly discontinued the service this past Jan. 27 just so I could say I sent one.

I would have bought fewer books, getting books from the reserves in the library saves you a ton of money and makes you more efficient at work. There are no distractions, and you tend to take fewer breaks because you know that you potentially only have two consecutive hours with the book.

I would have visited the swans more often if I knew they would be taken from us, and I picked all my classes from ratermyprofessor.com; a good professor matters a lot more than a good subject matter.

I would have joined the debate team, debating is the essence of life. Winning a debate is getting others to think your way, and after all, is that not what life is about? Plus, it has such a swell name "UMass-Debate."

I would join the UMass fencing team. Fencing is a beautiful tradition, the knights did it, and it is the essence of many great movies. From the Musketeers, Zorro and even Batman and James Bond in their newest movies, all great men (and women) can fence. I would also like to.

I would have taken horseback riding before this year so that I could do some more rad things with my horse by now, and other such classes (I'm getting credit for taking yoga at Hampshire right now).

I would have persistently gone to the ballroom dance team so that I could dance well and impress the ladies. I wouldn't have spent so much time getting three majors or two degrees or getting such good marks. I would have done at least a few more internships, because experience in the workforce is what really matters. It's taken me until now to realize that one good internship is so much more valuable than two additional good majors.

I would have taught more people about irony, sarcasm and laughter, and that not everything should be taken literally and right away to heart. As the writers Höfner & Schachtner wrote, "It is important to educate ourselves in humor because it does not tolerate anger, hopelessness, and helplessness."

I would have gone to more parties, tried more substances, experienced more experiences, changed more ways. I would have gone on more wild adventures. I was too idealistic; I wanted to change how people thought. Now I feel that I should learn from them rather than change them.

I would not have waited until senior year to visit Northampton, as I was subconsciously long bitter about its claim to fame. Calvin Coolidge started his political career there as a mayor, and I detest him for his signing of the Immigration Act of 1924 while president.

I would have started the nine-month process to become Canadian nine months ago — I just found out that I am one-fourth Canadian. No longer will I stand in the company of Canadian jokes, which are offensive to my people, and I have a new found respect for singer Avril Lavigne and astronaut Bjarni Tryggvason. Perhaps I am inadvertently upset with so many people in this school because of my more Canadian style of doing things.

I have loved my experience at UMass Amherst, this utopia, this bubble in a sea of chaos. We have a unique opportunity here, cherish and enjoy every moment. UMass has so many activities, so many opportunities and so many options. We have hundreds of RSOs, with dozens actually holding events regularly, and constant events happening everywhere. Go explore. I've enjoyed almost every minute of my time here, other than finals and midterm weeks. I hope you all do too. Thank you UMass and its people, farewell and goodbye.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

POSTERS WITH THE WRONG MESSAGE

I am writing not in response to something I saw written in the newspaper, but rather to something I saw posted in the Campus Center. I was walking to the Student Union, as I do every day, and I was glancing at the layers of fliers, advertisements and general informational papers hanging from the bulletin board, when three fliers jumped out at me.

Each one had a negative statement about Israel, such as "Which is the only country in the Middle East that legalizes torture? Israel" and "Which country was founded on the ethnic cleansing of 750,000 indigenous people? Israel."

Obviously these are meant as a spoof on the positive posters about Israel seen around campus, like "Which is the only country in the Middle East that has rights for LGBT community? Israel" and "In which country will you find freedom of religion? Israel."

Where I stand on the Israel issue is not important. What bothers me is the blatant negativity of these fliers. I assume that these are meant to support the Palestinian people — why not write something positive about them? The pro-Israel posters are just that — they are positive towards someone, not negative towards their opponents.

Why can't the authors and posters of these fliers show the same respect towards Israel that the other fliers show towards the Palestinians? So, to the hate-filled members of this campus, I say one thing: try and argue your point with positive points about the group you support, rather than negative points about the group you hate.

RECRUIT OR NO LOOT

The recent letter, "What's the deal," comes from a vocal contingent of our campus that fails to recognize the practical realities of what they are asking for. Of most concern are the second and third demands that ask the University of Massachusetts to deny access to military recruiters and give up research funding originating in the Department of Defense.

Speaking for the silent contingent of faculty, staff and students that derive support from federal research funds, I would like to help educate the writers as to what they are actually asking for.

First, under the 1996 Solomon Amendment passed by the U.S. Congress, its subsequent revisions and the recent, unanimous ruling by the United States Supreme Court in Rumsfeld vs. Fair, the third demand is already covered by the second.

The Solomon Amendment requires that campuses that deny access to military recruiters give up federal funding from the Department of Education, the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Homeland Security, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of Transportation, and the Department Of Labor, as well as the Department of Defense.

At stake here is a significant portion of the 112 million in research dollars that UMass Amherst received in 2005, part of which comes from agencies covered by the Solomon Amendment. Personally, this involves more than $1 million of my own research funding. While it may be easy for some faculty members to give up such funding, it would devastate my research program, as well as the many graduate students that I support.

Second, to give you some insight, the funds that I receive are used to develop communications infrastructures for challenged environments, including, disasters, underwater environmental monitoring and tracking endangered species, such as the Wood turtle in Western Massachusetts.

Further, parts of these funds are being used to develop a free wireless system in the town of Amherst. This is not unusual, as DoD funding created the Internet as well as many of the technologies found in your mobile phone.

Third, while the coalition has received support from the Graduate Employee Organization, this support was gained over the objections of many students from the sciences. As graduate research assistants from the sciences tend not to be the most politically vocal members of graduate student unions, their opinions tend to be overshadowed by the more active members of the organization.

As GEO continues to fight for benefit and pay increases for its members, it should keep in mind that their support for this effort does a great disservice to its own membership. As ominous as it sounds, these demands place the mission of our research university at risk. For their polite rebuke of these demands, I applaud the University administration and Chancellor Lombardi.

Voices of Montbleau Band shine

Vocalist and guitarist Ryan Montbleau jams with viola player Laurence Scudder on Friday night.

The Ryan Montbleau Band ended the show in front of a lively crowd with a cover of The Talking Heads song, "This Must Be The Place."

By Morgan-ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

On May 5, the Ryan Montbleau Band graced the tiny stage of Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall with a balanced performance that glowed with charisma and soul. The intimate venue was scattered with dancing fans and filled with an upbeat energy that was so enjoyable, fans didn't want the night to end at 1 a.m. Luckily for me, it didn't. The five down-to-earth artists gave their post-packing-up time for an interview.

The Iron Horse was home to a Ryan Montbleau Band performance last fall, but since that time they have played at numerous venues due to a busy tour schedule. They have also released their self-supported album "One Fine Color," which came out in February.

"Looking back on the fall, I feel like we have gotten better since then. Things have gotten tighter," said front man Ryan Montbleau.

The band's bassist (and UMass alum) Matt Giannaros says the Iron Horse is a great venue.

"When I was in school I spent a lot of time going to shows at the Iron Horse ... so when we played here it was kind of like a dream fulfilled," said Giannaros.

For a band that plays a variety of venues, ranging from festivals to clubs and seated shows, the Ryan Montbleau Band prefers the intimacy that comes along with a seated show — what they termed a "listening room."

Many of their shows since their album's release party have been big "blow-out" shows with a large, unseated audience. The guys said that an enjoyable aspect of the Iron Horse is that people can dance, or sit down and relax with a drink if they want.

Even though the band plays many shows in the Boston area and New England, they make it their business to venture beyond the New England hills, where their fan base is not nearly as strong.

"The Midwest is tough," said Montbleau, "We sleep on a lot of floors. It's the old-fashioned way."

The old fashioned way indeed — the group travels with two vans that are stuffed with their merchandise, and often drive overnight to their next gig's destination. But for a band with a mission, very few speed bumps can get in their way.

"We're built around the live show. We have tons of gigs playing around the Northeast — we're hungry for it," said Montbleau.

Although "One Fine Color" was self-supported, the album has continued to gain recognition and boost their following. No doubt this can be attributed to the lyrical originality and inventive instrumentals of the album.

The guys agreed that in most situations, a band needs a producer, but since each musician had their part down well and had worked on them for a year, there was no hesitation about doing the album on the road.

Down that road, there is a second album is in sight. The band doesn't find that a label is necessary for their next one, but they are open to the idea.

Drummer James Cohen feels that at eventually some sort of support from a label would help the financial aspects of touring, but that it's also important to keep their own identity.

"We're looking to be involved in a label on our own terms," said Cohen. The band agreed that it's got to be the "right" label — one that suits their ideals. Since their live shows offer a plethora of songs that aren't featured on "One Fine Color," their next album would debut many of their live songs — funk tunes that aren't even close to those on their first record. The band said they look forward to representing this different kind of music on their next album.

"I'm just excited to do new music," said Giannaros. "I can't wait to be able to present new music to people, and see the reactions to that."

But regardless, the Ryan Montbleau band still lights up each venue when they play songs from "One Fine Color." At Friday's shows, the audience — with ankle skirts twirling and hyped-up sweaty dudes — enjoyed "Inspired By No One." The song is one of their more popularized tracks. The band, in particular, felt a strong connection with the song on Friday.

"Tonight I got a great feeling from 'Inspired By No One,'" said Giannaros. "But at any point of different gigs, any one of the songs we play can mean a lot to us. It depends on our state of mind, and how we are feeling that night."

Montbleau, who writes all the lyrics for the band, said the song was based loosely on a girl he deemed "wonderful," and is described as giving him a special premonition. Her inspiration served its purpose, and helped to create the tune. But soon after a break-up email from Montbleau's aloof sweetheart, the song also got its title: "Inspired by No One."

For most up-and-coming bands, getting through the early days can be tough. Even though this jazzy grassroots band does not have a label, they do have something (forgive the cliché), their instruments and a dream. But add some serious talent and dedication to boot, that dream is on its way to becoming a very distinct reality.

Where pro musicians turn when their instruments are damaged

By John von Rhein
Chicago Tribune

Every classical musician who plays a stringed instrument at one time or another has awakened from much the same nightmare.

They open their violin or cello case to take out their precious instrument, only to find it smashed to bits. Or they imagine themselves getting out of bed in the middle of the night and stepping on their expensive Stradivarius, with a sickening crunch.

These bad dreams find their counterpart in the less catastrophic, but worrisome, accidents that befall stringed instruments in real life.

Violin strings break all the time in the heat of performance, and soloists usually are able to have them replaced in short order — usually by helpful orchestral colleagues — while they sail through the rest of the concerto on a fiddle lent by the concertmaster.

But what does a soloist do when his or her precious Strad or Guarnerius sustains a more serious injury far from home?

The American violinist Joshua Bell knows how it feels to be mired in such a predicament.

Two weeks ago, during his performance of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, he managed to displace the bridge on his 1713 Stradivarius, a golden-toned, multimillion-dollar violin that once belonged to the great Polish virtuoso Bronislaw Huberman.

Most audience members thought Bell had suffered nothing more serious than a broken string, but he knew better. Dashing into the wings, he decided his best recourse was to push the loose bridge back into place. He was a brave man to do so, because adjusting the wedge-shaped piece of wood that connects the strings to the instrument is best left to an experienced technician.

Bell returned to the stage, put his bow to the strings, gritted his teeth and hoped something not horrible would come out of his fiddle. He needn't have worried. He made it through the rest of the concerto flawlessly and drew a thunderous standing ovation for his, um, pluck.

Proper bridge placement is crucial for any stringed instrument. Bell explained in a phone conversation the morning after the incident.

"Very little millimeter affects the feel, response and sound of the instrument," he said. "In very little time, I shoved the bridge back; it's very painful to do that on an instrument quickly like that. I didn't know if the violin would even make a sound."

Although his tone did not seem to have been impaired following his self-rescue, Bell felt his instrument wasn't responding quite right.

So the morning after the incident, he took his Strad to Chicago's Bein and Fushi, one of the largest violin dealers and repair shops in the world, where a technician readjusted the bridge. Still not satisfied with his sound after two more performances of the Tchaikovsky, Bell returned his prized fiddle to John Becker, Bein and Fushi's chief repair technician, who made further adjustments.

Bell (who did not answer several follow-up phone calls) left the shop "a happy man," according to Bein and Fushi partner Geoffrey Fushi.

Laymen have trouble understanding why string players treat any damage to their violins or cellos as a traumatic, life-or-death injury. Indeed, instrument repair itself remains largely a mysterious art, practiced by reclusive craftsmen in the back rooms of quaint shops far from the glare of the concert stage.

For string players, their instruments are their lives as well as their livelihood — an extension of their musical identities to be coddled like a new addition to the household. Take away their ability to produce beautiful sounds on those instruments and you destroy their sense of self.

You would be hyper-protective, too, if you toted around a centuries-old, Italian-made stringed instrument that would fetch anywhere from $2 million to $5 million in today's inflated market.

Because accidents happen, shops specializing in the repair of stringed instruments exist in every major city and many smaller towns as well. If a solo violinist suffers, say, a loose tailpiece on his fiddle during a concert in Des Moines, he might limp through the program and later have the tailpiece repaired by a local technician.

String-playing superstars such as Pinchas Zukerman and Yo-Yo Ma take their bruised instruments to such respected, established craftsmen as Becker in Chicago and Rene Morel in New York. They think nothing of hopping on the next plane to do so when emergency repairs are required.

The actual work of these instrument artisans ranges from routine maintenance such as installing a new fingerboard or replacing a soundpost, to the more delicate art of restoring vintage violins, violas, cellos and basses that may literally be falling apart with age and wear.

"I try to take care of the artists — they have a difficult enough job performing — and I try to make the instrument as comfortable and playable for them when they need it," Becker says. "I'm lucky enough to be able to work on some of the fin-

Ready or not, disaster flicks come crashing back with 'Poseidon'

By Joe Neumaier
New York Daily News

If director Wolfgang Petersen's "Poseidon," opening Friday, marks the resurfacing of the big-budget, big-cast disaster movie — a definitive, though silly, part of 1970s pop culture — does the genre have enough air to survive?

The special effects may be more polished, but "Poseidon," following films like 2004's "The Day After Tomorrow" and "Flight of the Phoenix," are descendants of such get-out-alive flicks as "Airport" (1970), "The Poseidon Adventure" (1972), "The Towering Inferno" (1974), "Earthquake" (1974), "The Swarm" (1978), "Hurricane" (1979) and "When Time Ran Out" (1980).

Taken together, that list reads like a parody of CNN's bottom-of-the-screen news ticker. Yet that odd connection to reality is a hurdle facing these new films.

"The weird thing about disaster movies is, they sort of do say something about the times in which they're made," says William C. Martell, a veteran scriptwriter and author of "Secrets of Action Screenwriting." "In the early '70s, America was in Vietnam, and Watergate was going on. So you have to think, is the culture in a similar moment now?

"In those movies of the past, a group of individuals banded together to make a better world, even though the authorities, or the vessel, let us down. They were a mirror to how people felt."

The new "Poseidon" — adapted, as the 1972 original was, from a novel by Paul Gallico — stars Josh Lucas as a professional gambler who, after the titular cruise ship goes belly up from a "rogue wave," finds himself reluctantly in charge of a group of passengers trying to climb up to the bottom of the ship to escape. Kurt Russell, Jacinda Barrett, Richard Dreyfuss and Emmy Rossum are some of the battered and bruised who follow him.

The original "Poseidon Adventure," with its Oscar-winning ballad ("The Morning After") and its colorful cast — Gene Hackman, Shelley Winters, Ernest Borgnine, Roddy McDowall — became synonymous with producer Irwin Allen, known as "The Master of Disaster." His cinematic trademark, soon imitated by others, was to take a cast of stars and hurl them into horrific situations (in addition to "Poseidon," its 1979 sequel, "Inferno," and "The Swarm," his TV credits included 1976's "Flood!" and 1977's "Fire!" As those titles show, Allen was not known for subtlety.).

But whereas Hackman's self-sacrificing minister strove to deliver survivors from death, Lucas' character is more secretive and, at times, brutal. And the characters' backgrounds are barely revealed before all hell breaks loose.

"I didn't want to do it in an old-fashioned way," says Petersen. "These people are not that clearly defined. They're a group of strangers who accidentally come together. I think, in reality, it would be like that. These are not movie heroes, they're not the usual melodramatic types.

"Today we are all shocked by actual disasters. Audiences expect a new way of showing what disaster really is."

Ron Hogan, author of "The Stewardess Is Flying the Plane! American Films of the 1970s," says that in their previous form, serious pessimism was lurking underneath those movie catastrophes.

"In the '70s, there was a sense that you couldn't rely on anything, and even nature will kill you if it gets the chance," says Hogan.

"But what shocked or excited people was different than today. Back then, there were only three TV networks and people were shocked when bodies were shown coming in from Vietnam. Now, with a half dozen channels devoted to 24-hour news, the rawness of events is very in-our-face. I don't know if it'll be cathartic to relive that in these films."

Bit Petersen — who battled the sea in his German film "Das Boot" (1981) and the blockbuster "The Perfect Storm" (2000) — thinks it's reality that will save them.

"I wanted to open the film with the gigantic wave, but then get more intimate," Petersen says. "Gradually we — and I say 'we,' because hopefully the audience has a sense that they're crawling with the cast through the ship — enter smaller spaces.

"I wanted to do it as realistically as possible, and really get under people's skins. I didn't want to 'Hollywoodize' it. We made it gritty, more lean and mean. That's the modern twist."

This Friday Warner Bros. Pictures and Virtual Studios will release the action-adventure thriller "Poseidon," a film that might be a turn-off for cruise-lovers.

Barrett accents her 'Poseidon' role

Aussie actress Jacinda Barrett dropped her accent for the role of Maggie James in the movie "Poseidon."

By Michelle Caruso
New York Daily News

While growing up in Australia, actress Jacinda Barrett had a frightening brush with death when she got caught in the pull of a powerful ocean wave and nearly drowned.

But the 33-year-old stunner didn't let her fear of big surf stop her from diving into a starring role in "Poseidon."

"Being in big waves does scare me," says Barrett, "but I'm not afraid of water in general."

Tricky thing, since, as Maggie, a brave single mom determined to get herself and her son (played by 10-year-old Jimmy Bennett) to safety in the upside-down ocean liner-turned-deathtrap, she spent a lot of time on a drenched set and in a huge tank director Wolfgang Petersen previously built for 2000's "The Perfect Storm."

Now, sipping chicken soup to nurse a sore throat, Barrett admits she — without hydrophobia, filming was difficult nonetheless.

"Being underwater for [a long] [illegible] felt panic rise up in me sometimes," she says. "You can't see. It's murky. You're totally blind under there. You have to give yourself up to the safety people and say, 'If something goes wrong, you'll pull me out, right?' It was frightening.

"At one point, I slipped and [illegible] a propeller and my leg was injured," she says, showing a mark about [illegible] long on her left calf.

As for the film's fiery explosions, Barrett, the daughter of an [illegible] fighter who's received her [illegible] says she dealt with those just [illegible] of those propane blasts went off, I could feel the heat."

The Brisbane-born former [illegible] who appeared on MTV's "The Real World: London" in 1999, [illegible] Down Under actresses Nicole Kidman, Cate Blanchett and Naomi Watts with paving the way for her and other Australian natives to get coveted film roles in the U.S.

"They're so talented. And they did a lot of the hard work, even proving we can do a good [American] accent," she says. For her part, Barrett worked with a dialect coach to master the Yank-speak she hears in "Poseidon." "I had a hard time with your r's," she says playfully.

After coming to the United States, Barrett made appearances in several TV shows and small films (including the requisite horror film, in this case "Urban Legends: Final Cut"), then got her big break in director Robert Benton's adaptation of Philip Roth's "The Human Stain." Her haunting beauty and sensual striptease in that 2003 drama landed her on Esquire magazine's "Women We Love" list.

Next, she starred as the wife of Joaquin Phoenix's hero lineman in "Ladder 49" and appeared with Renee Zellweger and Hugh Grant in "Bridget Jones: The Edge of Reason," both in 2004.

This year, she has several films in the pipeline, including the drama "The Last Kiss" (she'll play Zach Braff's fiancee) and the comedy "School for Scoundrels."

Jacinda has a kind of earthbound self-confidence a sort of sexy tomboy quality," says "Last Kiss" director Tony Goldwyn. "She has beauty and intelligence, but you get the feeling she's not afraid to roll around in the dirt."

"I don't have particular career expectations. I've just done movies with good actors and directors," Barrett says. "If I could just keep going like this, I'd be thrilled."

Especially now that she's earned her blockbuster battle scars.

Lucas finds depth in blockbuster

By Michelle Caruso
New York Daily News

In "Poseidon," Josh Lucas plays the mysterious Dylan Johns, a lone-wolf, square-jawed, tough-talking card shark who reluctantly finds himself leading a band of survivors on a climb through a capsized cruise ship.

The journey is rife with peril, from cavernous elevator shafts and fiery explosions to water-filled escape routes.

In some ways, the movie mirrors the 34-year-old actor's hard-fought path to leading-man status — and his own quest for challenging roles has inflicted a few war wounds along the way.

"There are some interesting parallels there," Lucas agrees. "My career was really uncomfortable for a time because I was not getting work that I thought would be good, or could be good."

Born in Arkansas, Lucas grew up the son of medical professionals who, as protesters against nuclear power in the 1970s, moved their four children around the South some

The new adventures of Julia Louis-Dreyfus and Kari Lizer

By Jonathan Storm
Knight Ridder Newspapers

BURBANK, Calif. — When you're a working mother, you can't always sweat the small stuff. At the end of every episode of "The New Adventures of Old Christine," a black-and-white image flies by: "Kari's Logo Here."

Producers with big egos fine-tune their vanity logos to perfection. Kari Lizer decided to stick with the temporary filler that some technician had slipped in. "Come on, let's not do this anymore," she says she told the writers laboring to help her come up with something cute. "I have to get home and make spaghetti."

Motherly duties rank just about even with employment for Lizer, creator and executive producer of "Christine," and her star, Julia Louis-Dreyfus.

They are but one area of common ground for the two seemingly different women, one famous, one virtually unknown, who have found each other deep into their careers. Lizer's first movie role, in "Smokey Bites the Dust," came in 1981. Louis-Dreyfus debuted on "Saturday Night Live" in 1982.) As a team, they seem perched on the verge of new, long-lasting success.

"The New Adventures of Old Christine" (Mondays at 9:30 p.m. EDT on CBS) is the season's top-rated new sitcom (sorry, Larl), holding a healthy portion of the audience of the hit that precedes it, "Two and a Half Men." With an average of nearly 13 million viewers, it is second only to "Men" (15.3 million) overall in the sitcom derby.

More important, though Lizer and Louis-Dreyfus are both in their mid-40s, "Old Christine" attracts younger viewers, snagging almost as many 18-to-49-year-olds, the advertisers' Holy Grail, as "The Simpsons," and more than such shows as "The Apprentice," "The Amazing Race" and "Prison Break."

"Yeah, how about that?" Louis-Dreyfus says in that distinctive low-pitched chirp that gives her diminutive person some of its comic clout.

We're sitting in Lizer's tee-room-size office in Building 136 on the vast Warner Bros. lot. Louis-Dreyfus, the big star, defers completely to Lizer, the boss, when the topic is the show. But when personal matters come up, the two interrupt or complete each other's sentences as if they're living almost the same lives.

The office is surprisingly neat. Most show-runners live in a playpen.

"We cleaned up," Lizer says.

"We hired a team," Louis-Dreyfus says. "You know, those cleaning services. It cost, like, 400 bucks, but it was worth it."

"I'm pretty neat," Lizer says. "Otherwise, I'd go crazy. My house sometimes feels like it's going to explode ... but I'm not a slob. I feel like I'm cleaning up every minute of my entire life, actually."

"Yeah, really," Louis-Dreyfus says. "That is so the truth."

The mother role is crucial to both, a big part of the reason they are doing a traditional sitcom. It also helps explain how their show's lead character, an offbeat gal constantly trying to do right by her school-age son, seems so relatable.

Lizer, in a "very civilized divorce" (like her creation, Christine), has 10-year-old twins, Annabel and Elias, and an 8-year-old son, Dayton. Louis-Dreyfus, married 19 years to former "SNL" costar Brad Hall (they met in college) is raising Henry, 13, and Charlie, 8.

Television dramas, with their punctilious set-ups, entail excruciating schedules, with workdays frequently running more than 12 hours. Sitcoms such as "My Name is Earl" or "Malcolm in the Middle," filmed with the same single-camera technique, are somewhat easier, only because each show is half as long.

But traditional sitcoms have much more of a 9-to-5 rhythm. Actors see the script and rehearse without cameras as revisions are made for four days. On the fifth day, they perform before a live audience as four cameras shoot the action simultaneously from different perspectives. With persnickety producers, however, that can get dicey. "Friends," for instance, was famous for plodding on almost to dawn as producers rewrote and re-shot scenes over and over.

You aren't going to see that on "Old Christine." They start at 5 p.m., not the standard 7 or 8. The latest they went in filming 13 episodes last fall was 9 p.m.

"We keep old-people hours," Lizer says.

"A real early-bird special," Louis-Dreyfus says.

"Our kids come to the filming more often than not," Lizer says, "unless it's inappropriate."

"And they come most of the time then, too," Louis-Dreyfus says, breaking into that strange, sucking laugh that was an Elaine trademark on "Seinfeld."

Louis-Dreyfus appears to have conquered the so-called "Seinfeld" curse, in part, perhaps, because Andy Ackerman, who directed the last five years of that show, directs "Old Christine" and is an executive producer. Until now, none of "Seinfeld's" supporting cast has had any sitcom success: "Watching Ellie," Louis-Dreyfus' first post-"Seinfeld" show, created by Hall, kicked around for a few episodes in 2002 and 2003.

Julia Louis-Dreyfus is best know for her role as Elaine in the hit comedy series "Seinfeld."

"I had no interest in working right after 'Seinfeld' ended," she says. "I had two young kids and I couldn't really even imagine going back to work."

Eventually, the bug reattached itself. "It's exciting work. It's very thrilling to make people laugh, and this is what I love to do. It's just that basic."

After "Smokey," Lizer appeared in the infamous "Private School," what she called a "teenploitation" film, starring Phoebe Cates, and a couple of other B movies. Then, she segued to TV, where she had recurring and guest roles for 10 years on shows from "Growing Pains" through "Matlock" and "Diagnosis Murder." She moved into writing in a syndicated sci-fi comedy, "Weird Science."

In 1994, she married journeyman actor Robert Romanus (Mike Damone in "Fast Times at Ridgemont High," Snake Robinson in "The Facts of Life"), who guested in one episode of the show. For the last four years, she has been a writer-producer, and occasional actor, as Will's secretary, Connie, on "Will & Grace."

Now, it's good to be the boss.

"It's the most fantastic job," Lizer says. "It can be a real grind, but I've figured out where I'm actually creating and running the show, then I also get to set the tone for how it goes. I can get all my work done, and be with my kids for dinner."

That spaghetti's waiting.

Still, "if you had to pay that much to keep a $5 million fiddle in proper playing order, viewed in perspective it's not so bad," Fushi says.

Among string players, anecdotes are rife about colleagues damaging their instruments during performance and how they coped with the results.

Some years ago, the Greek violinist Leonidas Kavakos was playing on the precious "Leopold Auer" Stradivarius on loan from the Stradivari Society (a division of Bein and Fushi) when his bow caught the edge of his violin, ripping off a sizable piece of the top plate, or belly, of the instrument.

The distressed Kavakos rushed the crippled Strad to Becker, who carefully glued the piece back, leaving the fiddle as good as new, even to a trained eye.

And Fushi tells the story of the late Isaac Stern once lending his young protege, the Israeli violinist Shlomo Mintz, a $125,000 violin bow made in perspective it's not so bad," by the famed French bowmaker Charles Peccat.

During performance, the bow snapped in Mintz's grip. He phoned Fushi in a panic.

"Geoffrey, what can I do?" Shlomo asked the violin dealer. Fushi told him his technician could repair it so no one would even notice the repair, but that he would have to tell Stern what had happened.

"Shlomo was so frightened," Fushi recalls. "He called me back to tell me how Isaac took the news. Do you know what he said after I told him I had broken his Peccat bow? He said, 'Don't worry, Shlomo, do you have any idea how many Peccat bows I broke last year?'"

Rotten with imperfection: TV's new teen generation the nastiest yet

Shawn Pyfrom plays the role of a parent's worst nightmare on ABC's "Desperate Housewives."

By Virginia Rohan
The Record (Hackensack N.J.)

From Eddie Haskell to A.J. Soprano — my, how TV adolescents have grown in 50 years.

The term "difficult teen years" has undergone a dramatic evolution, taking on different meanings over various television eras.

In the late '50s into the '60s, about the baddest a kid got was two-faced young Haskell on "Leave It to Beaver." Unctuously polite to adults, he was sarcastic and obnoxious to the Beaver and his peers. Still, the Cleavers never really had to worry that he'd lead Wally into a life of crime.

By the '70s, bad boys were definitely mischievous. The Sweat Hogs on "Welcome Back, Kotter," for example, were underachieving, prank-playing misfits. Still, they were good kids at heart.

In the '80s, Michael J. Fox's Alex P. Keaton broke his hippie-parents' heart on "Family Ties" by being a Nixon-loving Republican. Sister Mallory could also be a bit of a handful, but her transgressions — such as that "Risky Business"-type party she and Alex threw — were nothing to blot her permanent record.

The '90s dawned with some hard-living high-schoolers on "Twin Peaks." For the most part, though, teenage rebellousness was on a par with that of surly daughter Darlene on "Roseanne" or Will Smith's fun-loving "Fresh Prince of Bel Air."

And then we come to today — and the truly bad seeds of prime time.

While most contemporary TV teens, even the rambunctious kids on "Malcolm in the Middle," are not truly terrible, two rich kids have crossed the line into full-fledged hatefulness — A.J. Soprano and Andrew Van de Kamp.

In terms of pure rottenness, no one tops the diabolical Andrew (Shawn Pyfrom) on "Desperate Housewives." Andrew has accused his mom of abusing him, so that he can emancipate himself and get at his trust fund. Andrew wants a new car, and he'll do anything to get it — even bruising his own face and saying his mother did it in a drunken rage. Doesn't the kid care at all about ruining her reputation and breaking her heart?

Are you kidding? He'd love to destroy her life.

True, Bree likes wine a little too much, and Andrew is entitled to some anger about his father's death. He blames Bree for Rex Van de Kamp's murder by Bree's psychotic friend and suitor, pharmacist George.

Clearly, perfectionista Bree did something really wrong in the rearing of her boy, who last season ran down Carlos Solis' mother. She subsequently died and Bree helped Andrew cover up the hit-and-run. To this day, Andrew has shown no remorse.

Anthony Soprano Jr. (Robert Iler) doesn't have a whole lot of depth either, but at least he's part of a larger, more compelling story line involving his parents.

A.J. has been nothing but trouble for the overly indulgent Tony and Carmela Soprano.

This kid vandalized his high school's swimming pool and is so dumb he once got half his face glued to a hotel-room carpet. This season, among other things, A.J. defied his mother and gave an interview to a TV reporter while his father was fighting for life in the hospital. He laughed when his bright, ambitious sister, Meadow, described the heart-rending plight of an immigrant family she'd worked with at a legal clinic.

A.J. has no ambition, no responsibility, no respect for his parents or the expensive things they've given them. He has flunked out of community college, has no apparent interest in re-enrolling, takes drugs, goes clubbing by night and sleeps the day away, and takes no pride in his work at Blockbuster. Then, he defied his father and tried to retaliate against demented Uncle Junior. But he failed at this as well, dropping the knife before he could get near the man who shot his father. Were it not for Tony's connections, A.J. would have been prosecuted for that bungled murder attempt.

Clearly, Tony and Carmela are going to have to fight hard to keep him out of the mob — and prison. Maybe they should have gone through with that plan to send him to military school.

A.J. does at least manage to somehow elicit sympathy for the two people who are most to blame for his sorry state — his parents. And their reaction to how A.J. has turned out has been intriguing to watch this season.

Carmela is starting to realize she can no longer believe her pretense that she insulated her kids from what their dad does for a living.

When will Tony face the fact that he, the big-shot mobster with the "semester and a half of college," is his son's role model? Will he ever see that the old parental edict "Do as I say, not as I do" never works?

Goodbye to four network series that mattered, are legacies to follow?

By Ed Bark
The Dallas Morning News

The show must go on. Most shows also must go off.

Four long-distance runners will be saying goodnight this week.

NBC's "The West Wing" and "Will & Grace" have won multiple Emmy Awards during their trailblazing tours.

Fox's "Malcolm In the Middle" and "That '70s Show" at least deserve honorable mentions in TV's long history of family comedies.

Two other veterans, ABC's "Alias" and The WB's "Charmed," officially are ending their respective five- and eight-season runs next week. Both are second-tier series compared to the NBC Fox quartet.

"Alias" never found much of an audience despite a wealth of magazine covers and high-profile star Jennifer Garner's marriage to Ben Affleck. She still might have a gainful feature film career, but not if he's her co-star.

"Charmed" is best known for firing original cast member Shannen Doherty. Join the crowd.

Here's a closer look at the four departing series that really counted for something:

"THE WEST WING"

Duration — seven seasons (154 episodes)

Launched — Sept. 22, 1999

Leaving — Sunday at 8 p.m. (NBC) with the very first episode setting the stage at 7 p.m.

Legacy — No political series has been more honored or more successful. They said it couldn't be done, but "West Wing" dared to debate issues of import outside the realm of TV drama's three ambulance-chasing food groups — cops, docs and lawyers. The administration of President Jed Bartlet (Martin Sheen) fought crime by passing a bill and saved lives by passing another bill. Affairs of the heart also drove some of the action, with Deputy Chief of Staff Josh Lyman (Bradley Whitfield) generating the most activity on that front.

"West Wing," which won four Emmys as best drama series, aspired to rise above the petty politics and rampant divisiveness in real-life Washington. President Bartlet clearly took a left-of-center approach to most domestic issues. Still, his administration invariably held the door open to principled compromise. He seemed to be the kind of president that America deserves.

How it ends — Democratic Houston congressman Matt Santos (Jimmy Smits) will be sworn in as president after narrowly besting former Republican senator Arnold Vinick (Alan Alda) of California. The president-elect still greatly respects his opponent. So much so that he's offered him the position of secretary of State, which Vinick seems poised to accept.

"MALCOLM IN THE MIDDLE"

Duration — seven seasons (151 episodes)

Launched — Jan. 9, 2000

Leaving — Sunday at 8:30 p.m. (Fox)

Legacy — The tractious, obnoxious Wilkersons served as Fox's cartoonish, live-action equivalent of "The Simpsons." They were dicey from the very first drop, with mom Lois (Jane Kaczmarek) answering the door topless in the first episode and also sharing harebrained husband Hal's (Bryan Cranston) copious back hair in a then notorious kitchen table scene.

Diminutive Malcolm (Frankie Muniz), otherwise a mental giant, kept conspiring against and with his three toxic brothers. Ouch, Lois then had another son in the show's 2002-03 season. Chris Leachman made recurring appearances as toxic Grandma Ida.

How it ends — Harvard-bound Malcolm graduates from high school as valedictorian, leaving his family with an unaccustomed gooey feel after they first get gunk all over them. Lois already has it all figured out. Malcolm will become the next president of the United States, but only after working his way through college with a series of menial jobs. She dearly wants a president who will "give a crap" about poverty-scraping working stiffs, which the Wilkersons certainly are.

"THAT '70S SHOW"

Duration — eight seasons (200 episodes)

Launched — Aug. 23, 1998

Leaving — Thursday at 8 p.m. (Fox) with back-to-back episodes.

Legacy — Taking its cue from ABC's 1950s-set "Happy Days," "That '70s Show" moved forward two decades while remaining in Wisconsin. Times otherwise changed dramatically. Eric Foreman (Topher Grace) and pals hung out in his parents' marijuana-hazed basement instead of the malt shop that served as a home away from home for Richie, Fonzie, Potsie and Ralph Malph.

Cantankerous Red Foreman (Kurtwood Smith) and his giggly wife, Kitty (Debra Jo Rupp), tried to ground the show with a semblance of parental authority. Their son had a sharp eye for irony and girlfriend Donna Pinciotti (Laura Prepon). But his three male friends basically were pot-smoking updates of "The Three Stooges." Michael Kelso, played by Ashton Kutcher, somehow managed to walk upright while flexing the IQ of a cheese wedge.

How it ends — The 1980s dawn at a New Year's Eve celebration hosted by Red and Kitty. TV critics have been implored not to reveal that (blank) makes a curtain call. It's OK, however, to note that Kutcher returns for a last go-around as Kelso. He reliably explores new vistas in stupidity.

"WILL & GRACE"

Duration — eight seasons (193 episodes)

Launched — Sept. 21, 1998

Leaving — Thursday at 9 p.m. (NBC) with a one-hour episode following 8 p.m.'s "Will & Grace Say Goodnight Gracie."

Legacy — Premiering in the fall after "Ellen" left ABC, "W&G" gained instant acceptance as the first broadcast TV sitcom with two featured gay characters. It won a mainstream People's Choice award as prime time's favorite new comedy series, an honor that easily eluded "Ellen" during its bumpy run.

"W&G" also led all half-hour series in Emmy nominations in 2002 and 2003 after winning the best comedy award in 2000. All four of its principal cast members have won acting Emmys.

Eric McCormack stars as Will Truman, a relatively straitlaced gay man compared to flamboyant Jack McFarland (Sean Hayes). Debra Messing plays Will's best friend, Grace Adler, who decided to room with him after dumping her husband-to-be at the altar in the series' first episode.

Karen Walker (Megan Mullally) is an over-the-top foil for Jack, whose sexual appetites are broadcast on an almost weekly basis. Will had to wait a few seasons to have anything other than a platonic relationship. The show has drawn criticism for moving too slowly on that front, but NBC executives have said it wouldn't have been prudent to do otherwise.

Big-name guest stars have included Cher, Elton John, Matt Damon, Glenn Close, Katie Couric and Ellen DeGeneres, whose show laid the groundwork for "W&G's" almost seamless acceptance.

How it ends — Harry Connick, Jr. and Kevin Bacon guest on a one-hour finale that promises to answer all pending questions about Grace's baby and with whom she'll raise it.

Blockbuster gives Lucas depth

two dozen times before Josh was 13, when the family settled in Washington State. After he moved to Los Angeles in the early '90s, Lucas struggled to get by on commercials and TV show guest spots.

"I remember at one point, my mother said, 'Why don't you quit?'" Lucas recalls. "Because I was literally in tears about having lost yet another movie role ... it was such a battle at that point. I was so angry. ... But even if I was completely unsuccessful [in film] for 20 years, acting would still be an obsession."

Dissatisfied with the jobs he was landing, Lucas left Hollywood in 1994, coming East to dive into stage work. It was, he says, the decision that turned the tide. Getting fed up with small roles "made me move to New York and get my a kicked in theater," Lucas says with a grin.

In 1998, a successful run in Terrence McNally's controversial but short-lived Off-Broadway play "Corpus Christi" (about a gay Christ figure and his apostles; Lucas played a Judas-like character) got him good notices and would set the stage for a film career. He landed movie roles — small ones, but diverse, and in quality projects: He was Laura Linney's deadbeat ex in "You Can Count on Me," a stockbroker in "American Psycho" and Russell Crowe's math scholar pal in the Oscar-winning "A Beautiful Mind."

Then, in 2002, his turn as Reese Witherspoon's estranged redneck husband in the smash "Sweet Home Alabama" brought him to the surface.

It was a star-making turn, tough but charming, in a frothy romantic comedy — something the thoughtful, brooding Lucas wasn't expecting. Since then, he has made it no secret he prefers roles that make him stretch; after all, those blond good looks are just one aspect to him.

"I didn't want [success] to be handed to me," Lucas says. "I wanted to be able to play opposite actors like Sean Penn and Russell Crowe. If you're Andre Agassi, you want to play Pete Sampras, you know? I wanted to be able to hit the ball back as hard as I could."

And while it helps to have blockbusters on his resume (his were 2003's "Hulk" and last year's "Stealth"), the real Lucas is evident in small films like "Undertow" and "Around the Bend," both released in 2004.

But a combination shot came with this past January's "Glory Road," in which Lucas starred as Texas Western college basketball coach Don Haskins, who took an all-black team to the NCAA championship in 1966.

"I knew nothing about basketball, so that role became an extraordinary quest," Lucas says. "One time, [Miami Heat coach] Pat Riley, who knew Haskins well, told me: 'You don't know the sport, but [in this role] you've got to convince not only an audience but also me and the players.'"

Lucas brought his A-game, and the movie was a hit.

While "Glory Road" taught him a game, "Poseidon" taught him pain. During the arduous shoot for director Wolfgang Petersen, Lucas tore the muscles in his right thumb, requiring two surgeries, and his right eye was split open when co-star Kurt Russell accidentally clocked him with a flashlight during an underwater sequence.

He ticks off his injuries with laid-back cool, but even though he says it was all "part of doing a disaster film," Lucas was well aware that a film like this could be dangerous. But characteristically, it only fired him up more.

"I got caught on a wire underwater. The safety people and camera people couldn't see me, and there was like two inches of breathing room. I got trapped and disoriented, I was starting to lose my breath, there was nowhere to go ... when I got out of the water, I screamed at Wolfgang, 'We can only do one take, that's all you can have, one take.' And Wolfgang said, 'Yes, I understand ... So, we'll do it again?' "And I said, 'OK — let's go.'" by preparing for this game just like we've prepared for the other games," he said. "It's a big thing for us, and it's important that we keep doing that. You don't want to lose sight of what has gotten you here. You don't want to try to change things now just because you're in the playoffs."

The reason that Morris and Reid are able to approach the tournament without changing their mindset is that they've been there before. Both were key players on last year's quarterfinal team and got a taste of the tournament in their freshman season.

"I think [experience is] very valuable at this time of year," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "It's probably more valuable to get some of the younger guys to relax and to play their game."

A major positive for the Minutemen is that they don't play many inexperienced players. Only two players in the starting lineup, freshman goalie Doc Schneider and freshman attacker Jim Connolly, will be playing in their first tournament game.

While Schneider has played like a veteran this year, finishing the regular season with the nation's sixth-best save percentage and 16th-best goals against average, he doesn't deny that there will be some pregame nerves on Saturday.

"To be honest, you get butterflies before every game," Schneider said. "You just have to play every game like it's the same. You have to really focus and do what you have to do."

Having so many experienced teammates to turn to for advice has made things much easier on Schneider.

"The upperclassmen do a good job keeping you calm," he said. "It makes it so much easier, especially being my first time in the tournament. These guys have been there and they're experienced, so they try to pass that experience down to you. It helps out a lot."

Freshman goalie Doc Schneider will be making his postseason debut in the Minutemen's first-round matchup with Cornell on Saturday.

Senior defender Jack Reid believes that the Minutemen have the potential to reach the Final Four this year.

Reid is one of the most intense players on the team, but he knows that it's important to lighten the mood at times.

"I like to try to keep things light and keep guys laughing, so if I can do anything funny to keep people loose, I'll do it," he said. "I don't want people to get too intense or uptight. I just want people to go out, play lacrosse, play hard and just play our game."

Playing their game is something that Minutemen got back to in the regular season finale last Saturday. The Maroon and White came out and completely dominated Rutgers en route to a decisive 10-5 win.

One of the best developments in that game for UMass was seeing its attack rediscover some of its scoring flare. The Minutemen had struggled to put goals on the board in the three previous games (20 total) but Morris believes that the strong offensive showing is a good sign as the team embarks on its tournament run.

"It refreshed our guys a little bit; we were in a little slump," he said."I think [our confidence is] definitely on the up. I think we proved last weekend that we can play. We just dominated and I think that should carry over."

Scouting matchup with Big Red

doing, they do it, and then maybe five minutes later, they're doing something else. They keep you guessing, and they make you read the defense as you play which is really tough for guys."

But the Cornell defense starts back between the pipes with goaltender Matt McMonagle, a junior who is second in the nation with 5.39 goals allowed per game and third in the land with a .644 save percentage.

Being left-handed, he provides a different look for shooters, and he has great hands. He also adds another dimension as an athletic player who can step out of the cage to play defense and has no problem taking off out of his net to clear the ball.

"They have a good goalie," said UMass attackman Sean Morris, the team leader in goals, assists and points. "Their goalie is excellent. He just makes great saves. We have to get to him early and often."

"He is maybe a little like the Syracuse goalie [Jay Pfeiffer], who we saw last year," UMass senior attackman Clay Stabert said. "He is pretty unique, and he is really good between the pipes. He is probably one of the better goalies we're going to see this year."

Coming out of the Ivy League, Cornell is naturally adept at playing a disciplined style of defense and one that doesn't always gamble to force a turnover. Rather, the Big Red will let their opponents make a mistake to get the ball back.

"They are very well coached," Cannella said. "It's a group that prides itself on hard work, and you can see that when they play. They play with a lot of passion.

"These guys are tenacious. They can press out on you. They can face up. They're really positional, and they're not going to make mistakes. That is why they are successful."

While the Cornell defensive unit will be out to confuse the UMass offensive group, the Maroon and White won't be looking to out-trick its counterparts. Morris and company will try to make quick reads to players cutting to the cage or just keep moving the ball around the box until something else opens up.

"It's really not as much about confusing them as it is just playing our game and executing what we do," Stabert said. "If we can do that, we think we might be able to get some good scoring chances. We really don't change our offense around too much from week to week depending on the defense we play."

When Cornell has the ball:

Typically, UMass senior defenseman Jack Reid can be counted on to shut down one opposing attacker while the rest of the unit focuses more on working together as a team to shut their opponents' offense down.

That won't — and really can't be — the case on Saturday, as the Cornell attack is so diverse and dynamic.

David Mitchell (40-9—49) is second in the nation in goals per game and eighth in points per game while Eric Pittard (16-24—40) and Derek Haswell (24-15—39) have served as great assist men who have proven to have the ability to find the back of the net.

Midfielder Joe Boulukos (23-13—36) can bury a shot from the top of the box, and Max Seibald (17-12—29) rounds out the Big Red's top five scoring threats for the fifth-best scoring offense in America this year, a team that put home 11.62 goals per game.

"It's got to be an even [defensive] effort," Reid said. "Shutting one guy down isn't going to do it against Cornell this weekend. It's going to have to be the entire group. Everyone is going to have to play well and play together.

"They're just great lacrosse players. They're great at burying their shots, and they're great on offense. They have a lot of guys who can do it so that creates problems. A lot of teams have one or two guys we need to key on, and that helps to limit offensive matchups. But Cornell is good all over the place so that will make it a real challenge because everyone is going to have to play great defense."

Cornell's offense features a lot of off-ball movement, which is set up through a variety of cuts and picks, meaning the Minutemen will need to be extra sharp with their defensive communication, which could be helped out greatly with the return of a downed defender.

Cannella is optimistic at the possibility of getting David Von Voigt back into the long-stick rotation for this weekend's game after the first-year starter has missed the last three contests with a calf injury. Dan Whipple served as a strong replacement against Rutgers on Saturday, and Brian Danvers and Diogo Godoi have come along well filling in also.

"He is doing well," Cannella said of Von Voigt. "He looked pretty good in practice the other day, and he is getting better everyday. Hopefully, he can play."

The X-factors:

Cornell has proven it can win games by scoring just four goals, but has won nine of its 11 contests this year by topping the 10-goal plateau, so two always important aspects of Saturday's game will be magnified in the battle for ball control.

Jake Deane's presence on face-offs marks the first key element. He has won face-offs at a .614 clip, good for sixth-best in the country this season, while none of his three potential Cornell counterparts is even ranked in the top-20.

Tommy Schmicker (.426), Boulukos (.478) and Seibald (.405) have taken the most draws, respectively.

"It's going to be a difficult one, like always," Deane said. "They have three guys who face off, and two of them [Boulukos and Seibald] are their best players. They're very good athletes. It's going to be a battle out there. The two guys who face off can go down the field and score right off the face-off. It's going to be a good battle."

"I know face-offs are going to be huge," Reid said. "We're going to need as many possessions as we can get. We've got to keep the ball on our guys' offensive sticks as much as possible. If we can do that, we can control possession time and the flow of the game. It will help keep goals off the board and help take the pressure off the defense. Jake's day is going to be huge at the X, and the wing play is going to have to be great."

Also, UMass will have to consistently be able to clear the ball. The Minutemen were successful on 88.2 percent of their clears last year, but they only cleared 12-of-18 chances in the NCAA Quarterfinal loss to John Hopkins, which kept their offense out of rhythm throughout much of the afternoon.

The Maroon and White have successfully cleared the ball 84 percent of the time this year.

"We're going to have to clear the ball close to 100 percent," Reid said. "We can't afford to boot any clears and give them second-chance opportunities. It's going to have to be a solid game through and through."

Senior attacker Clay Stabert is one of six seniors making their third tourney appearance. Stabert was fourth on the team this season with 14 goals.

shortstop. Stone found a place for Adam in the field, and the coach got a bonus deal out of the initial package: hitting.

Adam began the year batting six-through-nine in the lineup, but it quickly became a no-brainer to move him up. He jumped to second, then to third in the order, making him — as his teammates joke — one of the shortest No. 3 hitters in Division I baseball.

"People make jokes about it," Adam says. "Even my friends from home. Everybody's like, 'He must be the smallest kid in the country batting third.' There are little jokes here and there."

"Adam is solid as a rock," Fred says. "And I had the feeling he was going to be short. But you know what? He can play with anybody, including his older brothers."

Adam is about nine inches closer to the earth than UMass' No. 4 hitter, Bryan Adamski, who stands at 6-foot-4. Fred got a chuckle out of seeing them back-to-back in the order.

"It's kind of funny, isn't it?" Fred says. "It's hysterical watching those two. Nowadays, baseball players come in all shapes and sizes. It doesn't matter anymore."

Not many underclassmen could handle being tossed into the No. 3 spot so abruptly. Things are different for the No. 3 and No. 4 hitters: fewer fastballs, more off-speed stuff, nothing over the heart of the plate. But Stone had a read on Adam, and knew that he had the right mentality for the job.

"He's a mature hitter," Stone says. "He sees the ball well, he stays back and he's a confident enough kid in his own ability to be able to bat in the No. 3 spot, no matter how old he is. And that's why he is there.

"We had to put somebody there who was tough enough and had an efficient swing, a balanced swing, somebody who stays back on the ball."

"[Stone] said that I was a mature hitter and that I could do it," Adam says. "I don't doubt myself at all. I knew I could do it because I've basically hit third my whole life. It's just a little different here."

How so?

"Pitchers have different ways of throwing to you," he says. "You don't see first-pitch fastballs much. Usually the first pitch will be a curveball and I like to swing early in the count and it's a little difficult when you're getting a curveball instead of a fastball."

Adam has a compact swing. His stance is slightly open. His knees are bent comfortably. The bat rests lightly in his hands as he twirls it during the pitchers' windup. His step is short and purposeful, and he extends his arms through the zone with ease, finishing his swing with one arm, a la Mark McGwire.

The Cardinals star didn't have a lot of movement in his swing either — no rapid, jerky movements to throw off his timing or cloud his vision. The difference? Adam doesn't strike out. He has only 10 strikeouts on the season in 155 at-bats. Of the players who take the field every day, that total is by far the lowest.

Family Ties

The Tempesta's are bound together by seams.

Fred Tempesta — father of Bryon, Nick and Adam — grew up in Brockton and rooted for Sox legends Yastremski and Conigliaro. It was a unique time in Boston baseball history. The Impossible Dream season of 1968 had reinvigorated Red Sox fans, rescuing them from the mediocrity of the 1950s and early 60s teams. Fred was a junior in high school in 1968 and grew up in with a generation of ebullient Red Sox lovers.

Bryon was born in 1977 — a year before Bucky Dent tore Boston's heart out with one swing. Nick came along two years later. Fred made sure that both of them were playing ball.

"When [Bryon and Nick] were little kids we'd play ball," Fred says. "We had them out front hitting the ball. And they could hit the ball when they were two or three years old. You should have seen them. It was an amazing thing. The neighborhood kids were much older and these kids could hang right with them."

Bryon and Nick are baseball guys. Bryon pitched for a private high school and is now an assistant coach for the Curry College baseball team. Nick started for the Brockton High School Nine as a freshman. (He was the only one to do so in the school's history until Adam came along.)

Nick played shortstop on Brockton's first state championship baseball team in his senior year. After high school he suited up for Eastern Connecticut College (his team won the Division III World Series in his first year) and went on to play four years as a professional in the minor league system.

That was Adam's family — born-and-bred baseball lifers. He was influenced heavily by his older brothers, who kept track of Adam throughout his little league days (Bryon was in college then) and helped him with his game as much as they could.

"I saw what my brothers did and I wanted to do that," Adam says. "I was a bat boy for the Brockton High School when they won the state championship on Nick's team. I was a bat boy when Nick went to college. I just saw everything that they did and I wanted to do it."

"My senior year in high school, in 1997, [Adam] was the bat boy on our Massachusetts state tournament team," Nick, the middle Tempesta, recalls. "We won the title. And it's fun because I look back at the pictures and [Adam] was so small. Then I went off to college and in my freshman year we won the [Division III] World Series and he was there for that. So I thought that was pretty cool.

"I think he learned a lot from that experience," Nick continues. "He was young, but I still think he learned a lot about teamwork and what you have to do to win and work hard. We're not blessed with the biggest size in the family so we have to work a little harder."

"Adam's been playing ever since he watched his older brothers play," Fred says. "He started in little league and you could tell that he was pretty good. As he got older he started getting better and better.

"I think Adam looked up to Nick a lot. When Nick was at Eastern Connecticut, Adam was the bat boy and it kind of started from that point on. He got to know how they played and how his brothers grew up, and he got to be a real good ballplayer himself."

"We used to get him on the street and throw ground balls at him," Bryon remembers fondly. "Baseball was huge. It kept the family together. We went to the park to play all of the time."

Everyone keeps in touch. Bryon can't make it to many games because of the coaching demands, and Nick has ventured to Lorden Field a couple of times this season — both still feed their younger brother some tips.

"Nick taught me to back-leg it," Adam says. "It's a little model when you're hitting to make sure you keep your weight back. Bryon helps me out a lot actually. He'll call me and ask me how I'm doing. He'll call me and help me."

"Back-legging is just getting through the baseball," Nick says. "Before, I didn't get to see [Adam]. Now I can show him and I think it is helping. He's tearing the cover off of the ball and he's doing really well."

Stone moved Adam to No. 3 in the order after he began the year on a .313 clip. But Adam began to see first-pitch curveballs and heaters painting both corners of the plate.

Inexperience could have gotten the better of him, but he, despite some recent struggles at the plate, has handled the move to the meat of the order with relative ease.

"He's totally different from [Bryon and Nick]," Fred says. "It's the most amazing thing. Nick was hyper. Bryon was laid back and Adam has both of those characteristics. He's very calm at the plate."

Players have to be if they want to have any chance of hitting Division I pitching. Thinking is the enemy. Thinking hurts the ball club. But Stone doesn't want his players daydreaming through nine innings of baseball, either. It takes selective intensity to play baseball at the highest level, with a touch of happy-go-lucky to shake off those 0-fers.

"I've been struggling lately," Adam concedes. "I try to play defense when I'm not hitting and it just works out that way. When I go up there I'm trying not to think. I think that's been my problem lately. I'm just thinking a little bit too much. When I get up there I say to myself, 'See the ball. Hit the ball.' That's all I'm thinking. Sometimes it works, sometimes it doesn't."

Not too high. Not too low. Now that's a baseball player.

UM takes care of Central Connecticut

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

They say the best thing to do when you get knocked down is to get right back up again. That's exactly what the Massachusetts baseball team did yesterday after the drubbing they received from Connecticut on Tuesday.

Against the Constitution State's other state school, Central Connecticut (27-15, 12-6 NEC), the Minutemen (12-26, 9-12 Atlantic 10) had it all working as they dropped the Blue Devils, 11-1, at Earl Lorden Field.

What looked at first to be a pitcher's duel turned into a blowout, as UMass posted a combined eight runs in the seventh and eight innings. The Minutemen did get a little help from CCSU: a balk, a wild pitch, and an error paved the way for the big innings.

This weekend, UMass welcomes A-10 rival Saint Joseph's to Amherst for a three-game set. Friday's contest is scheduled for 3 p.m. while Saturday and Sunday's games will begin at noon.

Entering the game, Tom Cote had seen his fair share of struggles this season on the mound for the Minutemen. The freshman hadn't recorded a win in four previous starts, and had a bloated 9.59 ERA. He'd also given up 27 earned runs in his 25 1/3 innings pitched.

"He's a freshman and it takes a while for them to adapt to the level of play and what is required for freshman pitchers to be successful," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

Yesterday was a completely different story for the young hurler. Cote turned in a solid seven-inning performance for the Maroon and White. Against the Blue Devils he showed spot-on command (just three walks) and all four hits he surrendered went for singles.

Cote labored early on, throwing a lot of pitches through the first four innings. Four times during that span the count ran to three balls. Twice Cote walked the batter and once gave up a single to Jay Schillaci in the second.

"He gets freed up," Stone said of Cote when in the later innings. "He sometimes puts too much [emphasis] on throwing pitches. He forces them opposed to staying fluid."

The only run for the Blue Devils crossed the plate in the second inning on a single up the middle by John Romano. Cote quickly put the designated hitter in a 0-and-2 count but couldn't get the third strike. Romano laced the ball in the hole between first and second and plated Schillaci.

On the flip side, Bryan Garrity did for the Minutemen at the plate what Cote did on the mound. Nearly half of UMass' runs (five) were driven in by the big catcher. He chipped in with an RBI groundout in the fourth, a single to score a run in the seventh and cleared the bases when they were loaded in the eighth.

Although he went hitless in his first three plate appearances, Garrity knew his hits would come.

"My first at-bat I hit the ball hard but didn't have anything to show for it but I was pretty confident after that," the catcher said. "I knew I was 0-for-2 but I was feeling good about myself because the team was starting to hit. My last at-bat I finally got a pitch I could drive; it makes a huge difference when the guys in front of you get on."

Garrity commented on how his recent poor performances at the plate forced him to put in extra time during practice.

"It was a good day for me because I've been struggling as of late," he said. "I'm seeing the ball a little better and working a little harder in BP on staying back and keeping my weight back. Today I kind of used my hands more and got better results."

To figure out which side of a 10-run defeat is more enjoyable, a quick look at Stone's demeanor yesterday would tell the whole story. The coach seemed much more satisfied to be on the top rather than the bottom.

"It was more fun today obviously," he said with a smile. "We hit, we got great pitching and Tom Cote got his first win. We executed on offense."

Stone also said a challenge, which he and the coaching staff posed to the team after the Huskies blew them out, may have added some motivation.

"We felt that we needed to play harder throughout the entire ballgame," he said. "Today is one example, but can we do it consistently is the question mark."

Clemens ponders a return

brass is ready to do everything they can to put Clemens back in a Red Sox uniform. Their "big push" for the Rocket began with a personal visit to Houston, followed by sending him a video of Red Sox fans pleading for Roger to come back home. Clemens repaid them by making a visit to the Red Sox clubhouse on opening day to say hello to the players, coaches and management.

You sure as hell would not see Clemens having a joyous conversation with Dan Duquette if he were still around. And that is why this is so special. Not only are the Red Sox showing interest in Clemens, but Clemens is showing interest right back.

And why wouldn't he?

The scene on Yawkey Way is much different from the last time he left. There is new ownership, new management and a fan-base that would give its right arm to see No. 21 take the hill at the Fens. Those are just a few reasons why it makes perfect sense for a Rocket return to Beantown.

Clemens is tied with Cy Young for franchise wins (192), and one more victory in a Sox uniform would make him arguably the greatest pitcher in Red Sox history. Did I mention that Al Nipper, the Red Sox pitching coach, is one of Roger's best friends?

While the potential storyline of Roger Clemens finishing his career with the Red Sox and riding out of Fenway on his White Horse may seem too good to be true, talks between the two sides have gone extremely well.

"The Red Sox management and players have done everything right," Hendricks said. "Our meetings have been outstanding. It is gratifying to me to see the outpouring of affection towards Roger from the Red Sox fans and management. At the very least, Roger should be back where he belongs in Red Sox fore. Roger was very happy when he played for the Red Sox, and loved the fans' passion. Roger's history with the Red Sox is the primary reason they are one of the four teams he would consider."

While winning is an important factor in Clemens' decision, he also pays full attention to what his family has to say. But for Red Sox Nation, that may not be a bad thing.

"Koby being with the Astros is a long term factor in Roger's relationship with the Astros," Hendricks said. "It will have nothing to do with the decision he makes this year. The reason is that Koby is in [Single]-A ball and is one year removed from high school. They will not play in the big leagues together this year. Also, Koby has a dislocated finger right now, but that should be healed in the next few weeks."

"Roger listens carefully to his family," Hendricks said. "He also listens to my brother, Alan, and me. He then makes his own decision. [Clemens' wife] Debbie has very fond memories of Boston."

As of right now, he's just watching. But Red Sox management, players and fans are hoping that, come June 15, the Rocket will be launching his farewell tour right where he belongs: at Fenway Park.

-Danny Picard is a Collegian Columnist

Clemens is just one win away from passing Cy Young for all-time wins in a Red Sox uniform. The history of the Sox is a big lure for Clemens.

Minutewomen go for 18th A-10 title

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team (34-14, 17-3 Atlantic 10) will look to continue its dominance of the A-10 this weekend at the A-10 Tournament in Philadelphia. The Minutewomen will be playing for their 18th Atlantic 10 championship in the last 21 years starting today at 2 p.m. when they take on Fordham.

UMass capped off its season Sunday with a Senior Day matchup against rival UConn. The game had the largest attendance of the season, and the crowd was treated to an 11-3 victory.

With 17 conference wins, the Maroon and White won a share of the A-10 regular season title. Charlotte tied UMass atop the A-10 standings, and grabbed the top seed in the tournament by way of a tiebreaker. The 49ers swept fourth-seeded St. Bonaventure this season, while the Minutewomen split their series with the Bonnies.

The first round matchups will be No. 1 Charlotte against No. 4 St. Bonaventure at noon, followed by No. 2 UMass taking on No. 3 Fordham. The winners of the two games will play Game 3 on Friday, followed by the Day 1 losers, who will play the first elimination game of the double-elimination tournament.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino feels confident about her team's chances in this year's post-season.

"I like being seeded No. 2," Sortino said. "I think being a young team, it's better for them to come out swinging and trying to go after [the top seed] as opposed to trying to keep people from it. I think for the kind of team we are in terms of our leadership and the veterans that we have versus the newcomers that have, it puts us in a better position."

The Minutewomen are an astounding 59-14 all-time in the A-10 tournament, so playing in big games is something Sortino and the veterans on the team are well equipped to handle. The other three teams in the tournament have just four appearances in the A-10 post-season among them, so big-game experience will certainly be a factor for the Maroon and White.

"I think that's where our leadership is going to come in," Sortino said. "Knowing how to handle a championship and knowing what to focus on versus what doesn't really help you at all is very important, and our kids know that."

Every player — except the freshmen — has playoff experience with the Minutewomen, who have won two of the last three A-10 tournament titles. The simple fact of having been there before is something Sortino puts a premium on, because getting caught up in the hype and grandeur of the championship stage can be the downfall of a team.

"I think you have to know how to manage a championship," Sortino said. "It's real easy to get caught up in things that don't matter or could end up being a real nemesis to you."

One of the biggest questions coming into the postseason was the pitching situation for UMass. Freshman Brandice Balschmiter has been the team's ace all season, while senior Jenna Busa, last year's A-10 Tournament Most Valuable Player, has struggled with her consistency.

At times Busa has showed flashes of the brilliance she displayed last season (seven strikeouts, no earned runs against Saint Joseph's), but has also struggled to make it out of the third inning in other games (five hits, two earned runs, two walks against St. Bonaventure).

However, Busa has the big game experience. She pitched every game of the Minutewomen's run to the conference championship last season, giving up just one earned run in three postseason games.

Nonetheless, Sortino is going with the player who is hot right now, and that is Balschmiter.

"The thing I'm seeing in Brandice right now is that she always said she loved the big game in the beginning of the season, but she didn't know what she was doing," Sortino said. "Now I see a different pitcher."

Balschmiter has certainly been in some big games recently. Friday's second game against the Bonnies saw a struggling Busa make an early exit in the second inning. Balschmiter entered the game with the bases loaded and no outs and the score already 3-0. Although two more unearned runs were scored, the young ace got out of the inning without being charged a run.

She then repeated her performance Sunday against UConn. In the fourth inning Busa found herself in another bases-loaded jam, this time with one out, but with the go-ahead run at bat for the Huskies. Sortino once again made the switch, and Balschmiter pulled through again, drawing the double-play ball from the very next batter to get out of the inning without another run scoring.

"I saw her grow up in the last seven days," Sortino said. "Yesterday in practice she had a different attitude. She's going for it."

Sortino had a number of questions about the newest member of her pitching staff, and Balschmiter has answered them all.

"I think she's figured out how to pitch," Sortino said. "I think she gets it; she's a pitcher out there now. She's not just a freshman who can throw hard, with the ball in her hands."

If Balschmiter can lead her team through the first two rounds, the Minutewomen will battle for the A-10 crown Saturday at noon.

After the tournament is over, the team will head back to Amherst to watch the NCAA Tournament selection show, airing on ESPN/ESPN Sunday a 3 p.m. The Minutewomen will be waiting for the announcement of where they will be seeded in the tournament and who they will play, if they are able to earn a spot in the tourney.

James is overexposed as playoffs drag on

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Somebody in the NBA front office apparently forgot the playoffs are best-of-seven games.

How else to explain the rush to shoehorn all those LeBron James commercials into nearly every available slot Tuesday night in Game 2 of the Cleveland-Detroit matchup, to turn every game into a LeBron-a-thon — whether the star of the show is ready or not.

Talk about the burdens of being the chosen one: There were two spots each produced by the league and Nike promoting King James, and for most of the night, much of the mythmaking was totally out of whack with the action sandwiched in between.

The first effort by the NBA was loosely centered on the theme, "To earn the right to keep on playing," and it totaled up how many pick-and-roll plays, free throws, comebacks and 30-point games James compiled just to earn the dubious privilege of watching his Cavaliers get cut up into a million pieces by the Pistons.

Even more unfortunate, in terms of timing, was Nike's "We are all witnesses" spot. That one ran right after a desperation timeout called by Cleveland coach Mike Brown in hopes of halting a 19-3 Detroit run early in the second quarter. By the end of it, James and the Cavaliers already trailed by 18 points. By then, any witness with any sympathy for James' plight was looking for a protection program to join.

Pistons coach Flip Saunders has updated a page from Detroit's playbook of 15 years or so ago, adapting the notorious "Jordan Rules" and applying them to James. Every time the phenom picks a route to the basket, two or three defenders converge on the intersection like cop cars working a roadblock. The tactic is designed to force James to give up the ball immediately, or absorb a pounding, the cumulative effect of which is supposed to convince him to give it up earlier and earlier.

It worked to near-perfection at the outset. James made two of his first three shots. Then, as the scheme preyed on his impatience, he made only one of the next seven. None of the other Cavaliers were able to pick up the slack and by halftime, Detroit was well on its way to a repeat of the blowout in Game 1.

Of course, everybody makes a run in the NBA and this was no exception. The Cavs held a players-only meeting at halftime, the Pistons eventually got bored and "a little lax" after dominating for three quarters — as Detroit's Chauncey Billups acknowledged afterward — and James took over.

In quick succession, he set up teammate Larry Hughes and, finding less congestion on those routes to the basket, cobbled together seven points of his own to close the gap to 92-87 with 1:13 left. That caught the Pistons' attention. Back in lockdown mode on the defensive end, they turned to Richard Hamilton for a quick three-point play, then traded free throws the rest of the way and won 97-91, a result that wasn't as close as it looked.

What the game did look like, and not coincidentally, was one of those Bulls-Pistons encounters from the late 1980s and early 1990s, when Michael Jordan and Chicago had to go through Detroit to advance through the Eastern Conference hall of the championship bracket and kept running into dead ends.

Back then, Jordan was in much the same situation James is now. His best was good enough to drag an average team through the regular season and into the playoffs. But dethroning a savvy, talented Pistons team demands an almost-superhuman effort night after night, which too often turns his teammates into, well, witnesses.

"Four other guys standing around waiting for something to happen," Jordan conceded just before the Bulls finally broke through. "Isn't going to do anybody any good."

James and Kobe Bryant came into the league more polished than Jordan, they progressed faster along the individual learning curve, and both cashed in on those skills at an earlier age. But the last lesson, the one about making sure everyone around them is better, is the hardest to learn.

Bryant was forced to do so when he had Shaquille O'Neal in Los Angeles. But as the Lakers recent fall from grace against Phoenix demonstrated — after taking a 3-1 lead in the series — it hasn't stuck. It's hard to strike a balance between co-opting teammates and cooperating with them when you're always the best option; and even harder when, as is the case with both Bryant and James on so many nights, you're just about the only option.

TOURNEY TIME

Road to Final Four starts on Saturday

BY DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Coming into this season, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team had made the NCAA Quarterfinals in two of the previous three years. So when it came time for the Minutemen to set goals for the 2006 campaign, they were aiming higher than just making it back to the tournament.

"The goal wasn't to make the tournament for us this year," senior captain Jack Reid said. "The goal was to make the Final Four, and that is still our goal. I think this group is definitely capable of getting there. We've got to play our best lacrosse and just hope things fall the right way for us."

The first roadblock in the Minutemen's path to the Final Four is Cornell. UMass (10-4) will travel to Ithaca, N.Y. to take on the sixth-seeded Big Red (11-2) on Saturday at 1 p.m. in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

Reid may have his sights set high for the coming weeks, but he certainly won't be looking past the Big Red, who won the Ivy League title and finished the season ranked No. 3 in the country.

"You don't want to start thinking about what you could do next weekend or further down the road," Reid said. "You've got to keep your head on this game and this Saturday. Every game coming up is the biggest game on our schedule, and we've said it all year. Cornell is this weekend so they're obviously the biggest game on our schedule, regardless of whether it's the NCAA Tournament or not."

One of the keys to the postseason is staying composed and not getting caught up in the tournament hype. It's something that the Minutemen are aware of, but don't expect to be a problem.

"In years past, guys were like, 'Wow, I really have to play good; it's on TV, it's the tournament,'" senior captain Sean Morris said. "I don't think like that and I hope my teammates can pick that up from me. It's just another game. We have to play our game and make plays. If we do that, we'll be fine."

Since UMass approaches every game the same way during the season, Reid doesn't think there will be any change in the team's preparation this week.

"I think it helps people to keep their focus

Senior attacker Sean Morris will lead the Minutemen into Ithaca, N.Y. to take on Cornell on Saturday at 1 p.m. in the first round of the NCAA Tournament. A win would earn UMass its third berth in the NCAA Quarterfinals in the last four years.

Scouting Cornell

BY JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Naturally, the first thing the No. 10 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (10-4) has to worry about when facing Cornell (11-2) in the first round of the NCAA Tournament on Saturday will be the tenacity of the Big Red's defensive prowess.

But, with the exception of Virginia, since Cornell may be the most complete team in the nation this year, the Minutemen can ill afford to key on just one area in their attempt to move past the first round. Even further, they can't even key on just one microcosm of one area because the Big Red are so deep across the board.

Cornell, the No. 3 team in the country right now, fell victim to the biggest slap in the face handed down by the NCAA Tournament selection goons on Sunday night, as it drew a six-seed as well as the toughest unseeded opening weekend opponent in the tourney.

Maybe it's unnecessary to say Cornell will be out to prove the committee wrong by validating its 11-2 regular season record. Likewise, the Minutemen will be looking to avenge their similar fate from last year's seeding process while the seniors take one final run at becoming the first UMass group to reach the Final Four.

But last year was last year, and Saturday is Saturday. So here is a breakdown of the 1 p.m. matchup that will take place in Ithaca, N.Y.

WHEN UMASS HAS THE BALL:

The Minutemen will need to stay aware of Cornell's ever-changing defensive schematics. The Big Red will throw one look at their opposition, and by the time UMass figures out what is going on, Cornell could be ready to change it up again.

"They change their schemes around constantly throughout the game," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "I think they try to stay a step ahead of their opponents. We try to figure out what they're

Is the Rocket returning?

He's just watching for now.

At least that is what Roger Clemens' agent, Randy Hendricks, implied in an e-mail on Tuesday night. Much has been said about the future of the seven-time Cy Young Award winner, but for the time being, the Rocket is still undecided.

Clemens is currently juggling the options of retirement, re-signing with the Houston Astros or testing the free-agent market. Clemens has set a mid-June deadline to let everyone know what he will be doing in 2006.

"It is 50/50 in terms of his returning this year or retiring," Randy Hendricks said on Tuesday via e-mail. "He will make his decision on or before June 15. Right now, he is testing himself by accelerating his workout program. He has been working out and throwing all along. He will have a better idea of what he thinks he can or should do by the end of May."

It is hard to believe that Clemens would opt to hang up his cleats, especially after what happened in the World Baseball Classic. One would have to be on their way to the loony bin to think that a competitor like the Rocket would walk away from baseball and end his career with a loss to Mexico.

Clemens allowed his only two runs of the tournament in the 2-1 loss, as he watched his offense struggle mightily in the final game of the second round.

Speaking of struggling offenses, Clemens had a 1.87 ERA last season with the Astros, but finished the season with a mediocre 13-8 record. Those down in Houston are hoping that Clemens isn't looking to join a club with a powerhouse offense. Mainly because the three other teams that have shown interest in signing the Rocket are just that.

Never the less, Hendricks believes that all four teams have an equal opportunity of obtaining Clemens. And while he won't be going to the highest bidder, it should also be noted that he is not going to play for free.

"The Astros dealt themselves into the hunt with the Red Sox, Yankees and Rangers by making a good offer on May 1," Hendricks said. "But since Roger has said he won't play in May, nothing has really changed. I always expected the Astros to make a good offer in May. None is a clear front runner and none has been ruled out."

"There will not be a bidding war, contrary to media speculation," Hendricks said. "Once Roger decides, it will go like this. If he decides to retire, I will let everyone know; if he selects a particular team, I believe I will reach an agreement with that team within 24 hours. While I have said he will not play for a discount, I have never said it will be a bidding war."

So now what?

May 1 (the first day that Houston was eligible to resign Clemens) has come and gone. No bidding wars and no hometown discounts. It would only seem logical that Clemens isn't retiring. In fact, he's just waiting to see how the standings play out. The guy is 43 years old, and he can still dominate. He's just looking for a winner.

Roger, there's a call for you on line one.

It's Theo Epstein.

Most fans, at first, were too stubborn to believe that Clemens would even consider finishing his career in Boston. But as of late, the WWE-like, dream scenario of the Rocket wearing No. 21 and upending the Evil Empire at Fenway Park seems ever so realistic.

It is no secret that the Red Sox

Houston Astros ace Roger Clemens is in negotiations with the Boston Red Sox about his possible return to Fenway this season.

Bound by baseball: Tempesta in long line of baseball lifers

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Here's a hypothetical: if you had a random encounter with Adam Tempesta on the street, would you think he was a No. 3 hitter on a Division I baseball team?

"Probably not," says UMass coach Mike Stone.

Adam is 5-foot-7 and hitting third for the Minutemen. He is batting .327 (second on the team), has 67 total bases (first on the team) and has whiffed only 10 times in 155 at-bats. And he's just a freshman.

The Brockton native made the switch to second base this year after playing shortstop since little league. He talked with his high school coach about moving to second base because of (of course) his size.

"Usually the shortstops are the bigger guys," Adam says, wearing a frown after an 0-for-3 performance against Siena. "I have no problem with [moving to second.] Since my freshman year in high school I've played shortstop and second base. There are still things to learn but as long as I'm playing that's fine with me."

The middle infield is the middle infield, right?

You can't tell that he's inexperienced. Just watch him play the position. He is agile, has a cannon for an arm and attacks the baseball.

Against Connecticut on Tuesday, a Huskies hitter chopped a ground ball up the middle. It was hit straight down and took a big hop over the pitcher's head. Adam moved to his right, near the second base bag, and tried to trap the ball before it caught him with an in-between hop.

He scurried in and caught the ball off of a quick bounce. His momentum carried him forward and he used his body as a backboard to make sure that the ball didn't scoot into the outfield.

The ball popped into his glove and he fell forward, but scrambled to his feet and threw the runner out. It was a play that infielders dread: a bounding ball with a lot spin that tends not to agree with leather. But Adam smothered it and threw out the UConn runner with time to spare.

So is there anything that he's had trouble with?

"I was just getting used to playing shortstop for three years," Adam says. "There are a lot of different things about second base, like turning double plays. You turn double plays differently and you react to the ball differently."

According to junior shortstop Lou Proietti, Adam's closest associate in the field, the rook is doing just fine.

"I think he's doing an incredible job this year," Proietti says. "He's not playing like a freshman, but like an upperclassman with several years of experience. The best part is he just keeps getting better and better with each game.

"I feel very comfortable playing with him out there. It's like we've been playing together for a couple of years now. We've got a great line of communication on the field."

Adam's father, Fred, watched his son from the little league fields to Division I baseball, and the proud dad knows that his son is something special in the field.

"It was unbelievable the plays he could make at shortstop," Fred says. "He's handled the switch pretty well. If you ever watch him try to turn a double play, he's really great. He has a shortstop's arm, so that really helps."

Adam's versatility surely made things easier for Stone, who had him and Proietti overbooked at Freshman second baseman and Brockton native Adam Tempesta has been a potent offensive weapon for the Minutemen this season.

Ventilation for Herter progressing

The initial phases of the $4 million Herter Hall ventilation project began last month. Next week work crews will excavate a hole in front of the elevator lobby in order to gain access to the basement to remove old ventilation equipment and install new components to better meet demands.

The project entails the replacement of the windows of the third through seventh floors with operable units and upgrading much of the mechanical ventilation system. The work will be carried out by Chandler Architectural Products and Handford General Contractors.

"In many ways this project is a result of the complaints and agitation about environmental quality," said Burt Ewart, project manager. An August 2004 publication by the University Staff Association listed complaints about excessive noise, mold and mildew in Herter and other buildings.

Herter was built in the 1960s as what Ewart called an 'icon of modernism' that relied primarily upon mechanical systems to regulate environmental quality in the building. The project was given additional impetus as the price of energy has risen and the mechanical systems wore down. The project will also address a number of mistakes that were made during the initial construction of the building including classroom vents that were piped incorrectly.

During the summer months the project will attempt to leave professors in place while they replace the windows but Ewart warns that the mechanical ventilation system will be offline from June 1 through mid-to-late August. During a meeting on Wednesday, Ewart urged people who would be out of their offices during the first two weeks in June to get in contact with him so they could move the project along more quickly.

The Herter Hall ventilation project is scheduled to be complete by the start of the Fall semester.

Romney takes action against gay commission

BY STEVE LEBLANC
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON – Gov. Mitt Romney briefly moved to abolish the Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth on Thursday but quickly reversed himself, the chairwoman of the commission said.

A spokesman for the governor denied that Romney issued an executive order abolishing the commission but acknowledged that the governor considered taking that action after a press release with the governor's official seal was issued touting an upcoming gay pride rally.

The apparent reversal came in a flurry of telephone calls Thursday afternoon.

Commission chairwoman Kathleen Henry said she received a call shortly before 3 p.m. from Romney chief of staff Beth Myers saying that Romney "had issued an executive order revoking the commission."

That sparked an uproar from lawmakers and supporters of the commission, which prompted a second call from Myers just after 5 p.m., Henry said. Myers told her that Romney had decided against abolishing the commission, but would instead call for it to refocus its efforts on helping gay and lesbian youth, Henry said.

"I am so thrilled at the response from people on the hill and from the community at large," Henry said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. "It has just been extraordinary."

The governor's spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom said Romney, who is weighing a campaign for the Republican nomination for president in 2008, never

Kennedy urges students to consolidate loans

July 1st increase largest in 40-year history of student loans

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts Senator Edward M. Kennedy urged college students nationwide to consolidate their student loans before interest rates jump almost 2 percentage points on July 1, yesterday.

This increase will be one of the largest single-year increases in the 40-year history of the federal student loan programs. Because changes in law that will limit loan consolidation options for student borrowers will also become effective on July 1, Senator Kennedy urges students to consolidate to take advantage of current laws and interest rates.

"As the costs of college continue to skyrocket, more and more students are graduating deep in debt," said Kennedy. "I urge students to lock in today's lower rates by consolidating their student loans before July 1st."

According to a "College Board" report on trends in student aid in 2005, over nine million people are borrowing Stafford loans, and 73 percent of graduates from private 4-year colleges and 62 percent of graduates from public 4-year colleges have student loan debt.

Loan consolidation enables students to pay off their current loans, which may have different and variable rates, with the proceeds of a single, new loan at a fixed interest rate instead of multiple payments. Consolidated loans also allow students to lock in today's lower interest rates for the duration of the loan.

"I opposed the changes Congress made in the law in February to restrict the consolidation options that borrowers now have. I'm working in Congress to reverse these changes before they take effect on July 1st, and to provide additional options to reduce the cost of student loans," said Kennedy. "Congress must do more to reduce interest rates and expand benefits for students and families in order to make college more affordable for all Americans."

According to the Congressional Budget Office, federal student loan interest rates are projected to rise this July and remain at that level each July in the near future. According to the Congressional Research Service, the fixed interest rate benefit today saves over $2,100 for typical, new student borrowers over the life of their college loans.

The loan consolidation option was enacted by Congress in 1986 for students who leave college with multiple student loans. The consolidated loan benefit enables them to pay off their current loans, which may have different and variable rates, with the proceeds of a single, new loan at a fixed interest rate.

Under a consolidated loan, instead of making multiple payments, a borrower makes only one payment a month. The consolidated loan also locks in today's lower interest rate for the life of the loan. The combination of these two advantages makes it easier for students to keep loan payments on track and avoid costly delinquency or default charges.

Current law doesn't allow borrowers to "reconsolidate" a consolidated student loan, but Kennedy believes it should.

"Borrowers who consolidated their loans at higher interest rates in the past deserve to be able to refinance their loans again when interest rates go down, just as homeowners take advantage of lower rates by refinancing their mortgages," said Kennedy.

Kennedy is also working to reduce interest rates for all student loan borrowers.

"Lenders are making record profits under the government's college loan program, and restricting student loan benefits is an unfair way to reduce the federal budget deficit," said Kennedy.

A report released early last month by the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) from the University of Massachusetts addressed the issue of increasing student debt. The report, entitled, "Paying Back, Not Giving Back," addressed the issue of recent graduates incurring what they called "unmanageable debt," saying that "loan payments would have a measurable and burdensome impact on their lives and would likely hinder their ability to pay for basic necessities."

According to the report, "recent graduates with very low salaries – about half of the median individual income in the U.S. – cannot manageably repay their student loan debt while meeting other needs."

The study found that in 2004, two-thirds of all four-year college graduates left school with student debt, compared with less than one-third in 1993.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy urged college students nationwide to consolidate their student loans before interest rates jump almost 2 percentage points on July 1, 2006.

UMass professor's documentary premieres

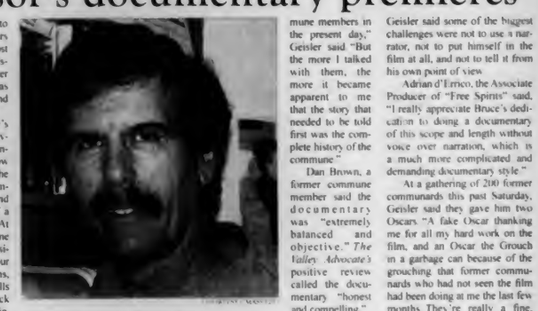
"Free Spirits," a feature length documentary, about the twenty year history of a renowned Western Massachusetts commune, premiered this past Saturday and Sunday at the Academy of Music in Northampton, Massachusetts.



The documentary, written and directed by UMass Professor Bruce Geisler, set house records for a documentary, selling out three of four shows, and drawing between 30 and 150 ex-communards for each showing. On Saturday afternoon, the audience gave the film a standing ovation. Geisler said the positive response has been overwhelming and way better than he had hoped for.

The commune, known as The Brotherhood of the Spirit (renamed Renaissance Community in 1974), was founded on principles of spirituality by the flamboyant Michael Metallica Rapunzel.

"Michael was described to me as 'one part rock'n'roll; outlaw biker, and one part spiritual master," Geisler said. "And when I first met him in 1970, he certainly lived up to that. In his early years he was one of the most energetic and charismatic people I've ever encountered. That was before the drugs and alcohol."

The commune's history is eventful, having survived government attempts to throw them off their land; the fire-bombing of communal buildings, and the brutal murder of a commune member. At its peak, the commune had 350 full time residents, real estate in four Massachusetts towns, its own airplane, Rolls Royce, national rock band, recording studio, theater, film, and video facilities.

Geisler started the film in 1991, and finished it a few months ago. He edited it for five years and the first cut was three hours long. Now, it's an hour and forty-two minutes. The documentary was inspired by the three years Geisler spent in and around the commune during the early 1970's. "'Free Spirits' began with a grant I received in 1991 to start a film that I then called 'Children of Aquarius 20 Years Later,' which was going to take a look at former commune members in the present day," Geisler said. "But the more I talked with them, the more it became apparent to me that the story that needed to be told first was the complete history of the commune."

UMass Professor Bruce Geisler.

Dan Brown, a former commune member said the documentary was "extremely balanced and objective." The Valley Advocate's positive review called the documentary "honest and compelling."

"There were many times that I wanted to quit," Geisler said, "and felt desperate and discouraged. What kept me going was that friends and family members had money invested in the production. And blind faith that it would all come out alright."

Geisler said some of the biggest challenges were not to use a narrator, not to put himself in the film at all, and not to tell it from his own point of view.

Adrian d'Errico, the Associate Producer of "Free Spirits" said, "I really appreciate Bruce's dedication to doing a documentary of this scope and length without voice over narration, which is a much more complicated and demanding documentary style."

At a gathering of 200 former communards this past Saturday, Geisler said they gave him two Oscars. "A fake Oscar thanking me for all my hard work on the film, and an Oscar the Grouch in a garbage can because of the grouching that former communards who had not seen the film had been doing at me the last few months. They're really a fine, fine bunch."

Because of the success of the film, the Academy of Music is showing the film again starting this Friday through next Thursday. Evening screenings will be at 6:30 P.M. with two showings on Sunday and Geisler is looking to get national distribution for the film.

Senate slates vote on $70 billion tax cut bill

BY ANDREW TAYLOR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—President Bush and his GOP allies on Capitol Hill anticipated a long-sought election year victory Thursday as senators debated a bill awarding tax relief to investors and 15 million taxpayers with above-average incomes.

The Senate was expected to pass the bill providing tax cuts worth $70 billion over five years Thursday afternoon by a mostly party-line vote, and Bush was eager to sign it. The measure passed the House Wednesday, 244-185.

The legislation provides a two-year extension of the reduced 15 percent tax rate for capital gains and dividends, currently set to expire at the end of 2008.

It also would extend, for this year, recent changes to the alternative minimum tax — originally aimed at making sure the wealthy pay at least some taxes — to prevent it from hitting more upper middle-income families.

The Senate debate opened along partisan lines, with Republicans crediting the tax cuts, first enacted in 2003, with a surging economy, millions of new jobs and booming tax revenues. Democrats countered that the tax cuts are tilted in favor of wealthy investors, that the economic benefits are not as great as advertised and that they make the budget deficit worse.

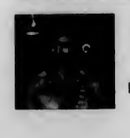
Top Finance Committee Democrat Max Baucus of Montana said is was wrongheaded to pass capital gains and dividend tax cuts — "a provision that doesn't take effect until 2009 for the most wealthy" — while letting languish tax breaks on college tuition and state and local sales taxes, as well as a research and development tax credit for businesses, all of which expired in December.

Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, countered that those widely backed tax cuts would advance soon as part of a follow-up tax bill. Republicans said all Americans share in the economic benefits of the cuts and that the wealthy carry the bulk of the overall tax burden.

"Today, out of 100 Americans, the wealthiest three are now paying the same amount — about half of the total taxes — as the other 97," said Jim DeMint, R-S.C. "This tax and economic growth package is not for the rich. It's for the people who need jobs in this country."

Critics, including most Democrats, attacked the tax rate reductions on dividends and capital gains as being skewed in favor of the rich.

A joint study by the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution shows taxpayers with incomes greater than $1 million per year winning tax cuts of $42,000 under the bill, while families with incomes of $50,000 a year would average a $46 tax cut.



"Sometimes you get handed an issue that is so crystal clear that you want to make sure everybody knows about it," said Charles Schumer of New York, head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "This bill shows the true colors of the Republican Party, far more interested in helping the very wealthy — God bless them — than hardworking Americans."

Senate vote counters prepared for a predictably partisan vote. But on the Republican side, a senior administration official said Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and George Voinovich of Ohio appeared likely to defect and vote against the bill. Democrat Ben Nelson of Nebraska announced he would vote for the bill and Bill Nelson, D-Fla., is likely to support it as well, a spokesman said.

In the House, just 15 Democrats joined all but two Republicans in voting for the bill. Passage of the bill is the first step of a two-track strategy for advancing the GOP's election-year tax cut agenda.

Bush refuses to confirm NSA data collection

By Laurie Kellman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—President Bush did not confirm or deny a newspaper report Thursday that the National Security Agency was collecting records of tens of millions of ordinary Americans' phone calls.

"Our intelligence activities strictly target al-Qaida and their known affiliates," Bush said. "We're not mining or trolling through the personal lives of millions of innocent Americans." USA Today, based on anonymous sources it said had direct knowledge of the arrangement, reported that AT&T Corp., Verizon Communications Inc., and BellSouth Corp. began turning over records of Americans' phone calls to the NSA shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Bush said any domestic intelligence-gathering measures he's approved are "lawful," and he says "appropriate" members of Congress have been briefed.

The disclosure could complicate Bush's bid to win confirmation of former NSA director Gen. Michael Hayden as CIA director.

Congressional Republicans and Democrats demanded answers from the Bush administration Thursday about a government spy agency secretly collecting records of ordinary Americans' phone calls to build a database of every call made within the country.

The top-ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee said he was shocked by the revelation about the NSA.

"It is our government; it's not one party's government. It's America's government. Those entrusted with great power have a duty to answer to Americans what they are doing," Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont.

The Republican chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, and voting record) of Pennsylvania, said he would call the phone companies to appear before the panel in pursuit of what had transpired.

"We're really flying blind on the subject and that's not a good way to approach the Fourth Amendment and the constitutional issues involving privacy," Specter said of domestic surveillance in general.

The companies said Thursday that they are protecting customers' privacy but have an obligation to assist law enforcement and government agencies in ensuring the nation's security. "We prize the trust our customers place in us. If and when AT&T is asked to help, we do so strictly within the law and under the most stringent conditions," the company said in a statement, echoed by the others.

Bush said that U.S. intelligence targets terrorists and that the government does not listen to domestic telephone calls without court approval and that Congress has been briefed on intelligence programs. He vowed to do everything in his power to fight terror and "we will do so within the laws of our country."

On Capitol Hill, several lawmakers expressed incredulity about the program, with some Republicans questioning the rationale and legal underpinning and several Democrats railing about the lack of congressional oversight.

"I don't know enough about the details except that I am willing to find out because I'm not sure why it would be necessary to keep and have that kind of information," said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record), R-S.C., told Fox News Channel: "The idea of collecting millions or thousands of phone numbers, how does that fit into following the enemy?"

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., said bringing the telephone companies before the Judiciary Committee is an important step.

"We need more. We need to take this seriously, more seriously than some other matters that might come before the committee because our privacy as American citizens is at stake," Durbin said.

Sen. Jeff Sessions (news, bio, voting record), R-Ala., argued that the program "is not a warrant less wiretapping of the American people. I don't think this action is nearly as troublesome as being made out here, because they are not tapping our phones."

The program does not involve listening to or taping the calls. Instead it documents who talks to whom in personal and business calls, whether local or long distance, by tracking which numbers are called, the newspaper said.

The NSA and the Office of National Intelligence Director did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

NSA spokesman Don Weber said in an e-mailed statement that given the nature of the agency's work, it would be "irresponsible to comment on actual or alleged operations issues." He added, "the NSA takes its legal responsibilities seriously and operates within the law."

NSA is the same spy agency that conducts the controversial domestic eavesdropping program that had been acknowledged earlier by Bush. The president said last year that he authorized the NSA to listen, without warrants, to international phone calls involving Americans suspected of terrorist links.

The report came as Hayden — Bush's choice to take over leadership of the CIA — had been scheduled to visit lawmakers on Capitol Hill Thursday. However, the meetings with Republican Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska were postponed at the request of the White House, said congressional aides in the two Senate offices.

The White House offered no reason for the postponement to the lawmakers. Other meetings with lawmakers were still planned.

Hayden already faced criticism because of the NSA's secret domestic eavesdropping program. As head of the NSA from March 1999 to April 2005, Hayden also would have overseen the call-tracking program.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., who has spoken favorably of the nomination, said the latest revelation "is also going to present a growing impediment to the confirmation of Gen. Hayden."

The NSA wants the database of domestic call records to look for any patterns that might suggest terrorist activity, USA Today said.

Don Weber, a senior spokesman for the NSA, told the paper that the agency operates within the law, but would not comment further on its operations.

One big telecommunications company, Qwest, has refused to turn over records to the program, the newspaper said, because of privacy and legal concerns.

President Bush speaks from the Diplomatic Reception Room yesterday, about a newspaper report that the National Security Agency was collecting records of tens of millions of ordinary Americans' phone calls.

Journalists murders highlights media risks

By Tarek El-Tablawy
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq—At least four Iraqi journalists and employees of media organizations have been killed this month — underscoring the risks in a nation where Saddam Hussein's press restrictions have been replaced by extremist violence.

"Under Saddam, we didn't have freedom. There were arrests, disappearances, torture, but people also understood their limits," said Ismail Zayer, editor-in-chief of the independent al-Sabah al-Jadid newspaper.

"Now, you have freedom, but there is no guarantee that you won't get killed for what you say or write."

The international media group, Reporters Without Borders, says at least 93 journalists and media workers have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003 and 42 kidnapped.

Another group, the Committee to Protect Journalists, puts the figure at about 70 because it doesn't count news assistants and non-reporting employees as journalists. Of those, nearly three-quarters were Iraqis, the New York-based group said.

"No profession, no individual, is immune from violent death in Iraq. This is simply how things are now," Zayer said. "But targeting journalists escalates this another step because we are the ones who are supposed to tell the truth. When you fear for your life, the story doesn't always get told."

Some Iraqi journalists adopt pseudonyms when reporting. Others, when covering a story in a region dominated by a different sect — whether Sunni or Shiite — sometimes say they work for an organization residents will find acceptable.

Ahmed al-Banaa, who uses a pseudonym, said such measures are often necessary given the killings of Iraqi reporters.

He cited the slaying of Atwar Bahjat, a veiled Sunni Arab correspondent for the Arab satellite channel Al-Arabiya, who was snatched from a crowd along with her cameraman and technician on Feb. 22 while reporting on the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, about 60 miles north of Baghdad. Their bodies were found the next day.

"We all remember Atwar and her fate is never far from anyone's mind when we're out reporting," said al-Banaa, who asked that his employer not be identified for security reasons.

The recent deaths of several colleagues have rekindled fears.

On Thursday, authorities said they found the body of Saud Muzahim al-Hadithi, a reporter with the pro-Sunni Arab satellite channel al-Baghdadiya. It was dumped in Dora, a Baghdad neighborhood where corpses routinely surface. Iraq's Sunni Arab minority says the killings are the work of Shiite death squads linked to the Interior Ministry.

Now infamous teen author remembered as gifted student

By Bonnie Pfister
Associated Press

HACKENSACK, N.J.—Well before she became famous as the Harvard student caught lifting material from other authors, Kaavya Viswanathan was the kind of person others noticed.

Because she was so smart.

The Harvard University sophomore with the six-figure book deal honed her love of writing at the Bergen County Academies, a rigorous New Jersey magnet high school where even top students can be intimidated.

"She was such a good student — everyone knew of Kaavya," said Kayleigh Wettstein, 18, now a senior in the school's Science & Technology Academy.

Viswanathan became even better known in recent weeks amid a cascade of plagiarism allegations against her novel, "How Opal Mehta Got Kissed, Got Wild, and Got a Life." Publisher Little, Brown and Company last week canceled the reported $500,000-deal with the teen.

For the Indian-born Viswanathan, 19, the downfall is an abrupt reversal in a young life marked by accomplishments that still earn her admiration from former teachers at a school where only one in four applicants is admitted.

At the Bergen County Academies — where the average SAT score is 1,322, or 30 percent higher than the state average — Viswanathan attended the school's premier Academy for the Advancement of Science & Technology.

She edited the school's online magazine and earned numerous writing awards. After showing a story to a counselor at a private college-prep firm, a meeting with a publisher was arranged and the strikingly pretty young woman emerged with a two-book contract. Sporting a 4.16 grade point average and 1,560 on the SATs, the high-school valedictorian headed to Harvard, where she is completing her sophomore year.

The novel about a driven, high-achieving Indian-American teen trying to get into Harvard was published in March. Within a month, student newspaper The Harvard Crimson pointed out similarities between dozens of passages of Viswanathan's novel and two works by Megan McCafferty, "Sloppy Firsts" and "Second Helpings."

Viswanathan quickly apologized for what she said was an unconscious imitation of books she read and admired years earlier, and Little, Brown planned to revise future editions. But within days readers pointed out similarities between "Opal Mehta" and the works of several other writers, including Meg Cabot's "The Princess Diaries," prompting the publisher to cancel the contract and withdraw the book from sale.

Neither Viswanathan nor her parents returned several phone calls seeking comment. But those who knew her as a high school student say plagiarism is at odds with the girl they remember.

"I saw an extremely bright and extraordinarily gifted 16-year-old with a talent for writing," said Katherine Cohen, for two years Viswanathan's counselor at Manhattan-based Ivy Wise, where college prep sessions cost parents tens of thousands of dollars. Author of "Rock Hard Apps: How to Write the Killer College Application," it was Cohen who introduced the student to a book agent.

"I don't believe the Kaavya I know would ever wantonly or willingly copy someone else's work with the deliberate intent to deceive others," Cohen said.

Born in Madras, India, Viswanathan and her family immigrated to Scotland when she was 3. They moved to New Jersey when she was 12. Her neurosurgeon father and her obstetrician mother now live on a carefully tailored cul-de-sac of five sprawling homes in Franklin Heights, one of the wealthiest towns in New Jersey.

In an environment where resume-conscious students often schedule electives into every free period, including lunch, observers said Viswanathan did not seem overly pressured.

Kaavya Viswanathan, a sophomore at Harvard University, poses in front of her dormitory at the University in Cambridge, Mass., Monday, April 10.

Nightclub fire criminal case to press on

By Eric Tucker
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I.—Prosecutors are not finished with the criminal case stemming from the nightclub fire that killed 100 people even though a former rock band tour manager is now behind bars.

Daniel Biechele was sentenced to four years in prison Wednesday for setting off the pyrotechnics that triggered the Feb. 20, 2003, fire at The Station nightclub in West Warwick.

But charges remain against Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, the brothers who owned the club where the band Great White was performing that night. Both have pleaded not guilty to 200 counts each of involuntary manslaughter.

The Derderians are accused of operating their club negligently and installing the flammable sound-proofing foam that fed the flames.

"Biechele is done, he is a convicted felon," Attorney General Patrick Lynch told reporters outside Providence Superior Court. "Next up is Michael Derderian, and we're anxious for that trial."

Michael Derderian's trial is scheduled to begin July 31. No trial date is set for his brother.

Biechele pleaded guilty in February to 100 counts of involuntary manslaughter and could have served up to 10 years in prison.

His lawyer asked for community service instead of jail time, arguing that Biechele was the only person who has accepted responsibility for the fire. He said his client had no way of knowing that the foam on the club's walls, used to muffle sound, was highly toxic.

"I ask you to consider this: Dan Biechele is the only man in this tragedy to stand up and say, 'I did something wrong,'" defense lawyer Thomas Briody said Wednesday during the sentencing hearing. "He's the only man to say, 'I apologize.'"

Afterward, Biechele, 29, stood up and choked back tears as he expressed remorse for his role in the fire.

"I know how this tragedy has devastated me but I can only begin to understand what the people who have lost loved ones have endured," he told the court. "I don't know that I'll ever forgive myself for what happened that night, so I can't expect anyone else to.

"I never wanted anyone to be hurt in any way," he said. "I never imagined that anyone ever would be."

Biechele had routinely used pyrotechnics to entertain crowds at concerts by Great White, a California-based band that rose to popularity in the 1980s. He pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter counts that accused him of igniting the pyrotechnics without the required permit.

Biechele has said he received permission from Michael Derderian to use the explosives at The Station, but the Derderians have said he never had permission.

The three men were each indicted in December 2003 on 200 counts of involuntary manslaughter — two counts for each person killed, under separate legal theories. No one else was charged. The three men are among dozens of defendants being sued by the fire's survivors and victims' relatives.

On Thursday, victims' families briefly thought Biechele was getting a 15-year sentence, but the judge suspended 11 years of that term. He also sentenced Biechele to three years probation.

"We've already suffered almost that long — four years. We've already suffered that long," said Annmarie Swidwa, whose 25-year-old daughter, Bridget Sanetti, died in the fire.

Biechele was led from the courtroom in handcuffs to be transferred to the state prison. He will be eligible for parole after serving a year and four months, or a third of his sentence.

Daniel Biechele, former tour manager for the rock band Great White, is led from the courtroom after he was sentenced, Wednesday.

Romney fighting lesbian commission issued an executive order. He said Romney weighed shutting down the commission.

"We considered abolishing the commission, but the governor thought that was too harsh," Fehrnstrom said.

He confirmed that Myers had more than one phone conversation with Henry, but said he didn't know what was said.

"We are directing the commission not to use taxpayer money for parades and parties but instead to focus their resources on counseling and the development of strategies for the prevention of violence and suicide," Fehrnstrom said.

Henry said no tax dollars were being spent on the Saturday rally, organized in part by the commission.

Fehrnstrom said Romney's action came after a press release on the governor's office stationery went out without Romney's approval announcing the rally in celebration of "gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and queer (GLBTQ) youth and their supporters."

He said the press release was "not some thing that we would have the governor associated with."

The rally is 12th such parade sponsored in part by the commission. A call left with one of the organizers of the rally identified on the press release was not immediately returned.

The Web site for the commission could not be accessed on Thursday. Fehrnstrom said he had no information about the Web site.

Last year Romney vetoed a $100,000 funding increase for the commission. Lawmakers overturned that veto.

Sen. Jarrett Harrios, D-Cambridge, criticized Romney's actions and said he would push lawmakers to create a state commission for gay and lesbian youth out of the political reach of the governor's office.

Five plead not guilty in Big Dig case

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON—Five men who worked for the Big Dig's largest concrete supplier pleaded not guilty Thursday to fraud charges for allegedly hiding the substandard quality of concrete used in the massive highway project.

The men, all current or former employees of Aggregate Industries, appeared briefly in U.S. District Court as they were arraigned on charges of conspiracy to commit mail fraud, conspiracy to make false statement in a federal highway project, conspiracy to defraud the government and mail fraud.

The indictment charges the men with recycling concrete that was too old or already rejected by inspectors, and in some cases double-billing for the loads. At least 5,000 of the 135,000 truckloads of concrete the company was paid for did not meet specifications, the indictment alleges.

Those who pleaded not guilty were Robert Prosperi, 63, of Lynnfield, a former general manager; Marc Blais, 36, of Lynn, a dispatch manager; John Farrar, 42, of Canterbury, Conn., a dispatch manager, Gerard McNally, 53, of Rockland, a quality control manager, and Keith Thomas, 50, of Billerica, a dispatch manager.

A sixth man, Gregory Stevenson, 53, of Furlong, Pa., district operations manager, pleaded not guilty at his arraignment last week.

The men said little in court, but simply entered their pleas and asked the judge to waive a formal reading of the 135-count indictment. All of the men are free on bail.

Stevenson and Farrar are no longer with the company. Aggregate said it has suspended the other four

Congress may expand border fences

By Jacques Billeaud
Associated Press

DOUGLAS, Ariz.—Much of this dusty city along the border is separated from Mexico by a fence consisting of 12-foot vertical metal bars, spaced inches apart to prevent illegal immigrants from squeezing through.

Surveillance cameras are mounted on towers nearby, and Border Patrol agents posted hundreds of feet away in the desert scrub and flowering ocotillo watch for anyone who might try to scale, cut through, slip under or sneak around the fence.

Though these fences are criticized for shifting would-be border-crossers to more dangerous and remote spots, they do make it harder for illegal immigrants to reach urban areas where they can slip into a car and head for the nation's interior to find work.

Now, as Washington seeks to overhaul America's broken immigration policies, Congress is considering putting many more such barriers along the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border, which already has 83 miles of fences.

A bill that cleared the House in December would put fences at immigrant- and drug-smuggling corridors in all four southern border states. At an estimated cost of $2.5 billion, the fences would cover 850 miles of border — roughly one-fifth the length of the Great Wall of China — though it would not be one continuous wall.

The gaps would be policed the way many remote areas of the border are already guarded now: with motion sensors, cameras, unmanned drone aircraft and Border Patrol agents.

Among other things, House legislation calls for a mostly continuous 392-mile fence from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas. The second-largest piece would be a largely uninterrupted 305-mile segment in the Texas brush country from Laredo to Brownsville, a corridor used by cocaine smugglers.

Immigrant rights groups say fences waste taxpayer money because would-be border-crossers who are desperate to earn a better living in America will always find a way around or through barriers, as evidenced by the lower sections of the fence in Douglas, where rods have had to be welded into place to patch up breaches.

Even some proponents say erecting fences, without using other border enforcement efforts, will not stop illegal immigrants.

"All by itself, it's not a magic solution," said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which favors limiting immigration.

But the Border Patrol says fences slow down immigrants so authorities can have enough time to respond to those who try to come across. That, in turn, frees up other agents to focus on remote areas, where they already use aircraft and ground sensors.

"Fencing by itself is not effective, but not having a fence is not effective either," added Sen. Jon Kyl (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz.

Advocates for beefing up border security said a 14-mile fence near San Diego, once the country's most prolific smuggling center, shows that barriers work. The fence there is made of corrugated metal sheets previously used as landing surfaces for military aircraft. Behind it is a second fence, made of tightly woven mesh.

Within that area, the barrier is credited with dramatically reducing the flow of illegal immigrants.

Rep. Duncan Hunter (news, bio, voting record), a California Republican who is the leading voice in Congress for more fences, said the costs of building fences are much lower than the government expenses associated with illegal immigration, including huge sums spent on incarcerating immigrants convicted of crimes in the United States.

Opponents say there are some costly consequences as well. Immigrant rights advocates say fences prompt migrants to cross in remote areas where they face dangerous obstacles, such as rivers where some drown, deserts where some succumb to the heat, and mountains where some are injured or die.

A border patrol agent rides along the iron fences that separates Douglas, Ariz. and Agua Prieta, Mexico along the international border Tuesday, May 9, 2006, in Douglas, Ariz.

Don't take life for granted

Kevin Pasucci

Friday, April 28th, started like any other Friday usually does for me. I woke up at 7:30, got to work at 8:00, and then worked until noon. When I got out of work though, there was a message on my cell from my dad, telling me to call him as soon as I could. Worried, I called my father back, at which point he told me he had some upsetting news.

Sean Christopher MacMillan, one of my best friends since my childhood, had been killed the previous night in a car accident. Although from New Jersey, Sean had been going to school down in West Palm Beach in Florida, and him and four of his friends had gone to a concert that night. On the way back to their campus, the driver of the Ford Explorer lost control of the car on the highway, causing the car to roll five times. Sean and another were killed, while the other three are still recovering from the accident.

After hearing all of this, I stood in the middle of campus with tears in my eyes and nothing to say. I didn't sleep very well that night, and woke up the next morning very early. As I looked out my window, all I could think of was how my friend had awoken on Thursday morning, never thinking that it would be the last time he would ever do it. For the rest of last week, I began to look at my own life, wondering how much longer I have myself.

This past Saturday, I traveled down to New Jersey for the funeral. Since our families were closely tied, my family was there to support his. The more I talked with his parents and four older siblings, the more I started to realize what an amazing person my friend had grown into. We had spent our childhood together, but neither of us was very good about keeping in touch over the years, and my moving away from New Jersey stretched our seeing each other to only once every few years.

The last time I had seen Sean was three years ago at my graduation party and I had only heard occasional updates as to how he was doing down in Florida. Sean was always on my mind, and I had kept telling myself that I would get back in touch with him in the near future, not knowing that my time to do so was quickly running out.

During the funeral, they showed a slideshow of Sean's life to such songs as "Simple Man" by Lynyrd Skynyrd. It was quickly revealed to me that he was much more than a simple man. As pictures of my friend, surfing, skateboarding, playing guitar and hanging out with friends were shown on the screen, I was in awe of how much Sean had accomplished during his 19 years of life.

"The only thing that matters is that you learn something from the person's death." I know I have.

These weren't even all of his hobbies. He also had a deep faith in God, and a huge heart filled with compassion for those around him. My friend truly had a passion for life, and made the most of every moment he had on this earth. As I cried with his friends and family, I was comforted to know that my friend had gone out on top, happy and enjoying life.

I'm writing this article as a tribute to my friend, but also as a challenge to anyone reading this article. I was struck by something that his oldest brother said to me at the funeral.

"The only thing that matters is that you learn something from the person's death." I know I have. I've learned that no one knows how much longer they have on this earth, and that I need to live my life to the fullest, never taking it for granted. I want to live like Sean did: never wasting any time in doing everything that he wanted to do in this life.

People have varying beliefs as to what the afterlife holds for us when we die. As a Christian, I believe that I will see my friend again someday in Heaven. Whatever you believe, my hope is that you would learn something from my friend's life and death.

Our days on this earth are numbered, and it's something we often forget. If there are things in your life that you want to change, or things that you want to do, don't wait. Are you living the way you want to be remembered? I had put off simply picking up the phone and calling my friend, and now I'll never have a chance to again. If I could go back, I would in a heartbeat.

It would be easy to end this article by saying "Carpe Diem," so let me quote one of my favorite bands, Social Distortion. "Reach for the sky, 'cause tomorrow may never come." In honor of my friend, I plan to enjoy the rest of my life the way he did. Don't waste the time you have on this earth. Live life like today might be your last. I know Sean would want us to.

Try to be nicer

Rebecca Paskievich

The art of conversation has been lost due to the incessant need to be doing something else. While walking to class, everyone is busy. If you're not listening to your ipod, you're sending a text message. If you're not gabbing away on your cell phone, you're talking online with your sidekick. The days of saying hello to a passerby are sadly over, and being nice just for the heck of it is a concept long gone.

In this fast-paced world it's easy to neglect those around you. Even if unintentionally, we have the door slam on the person behind us or bump into others without an apology. A cloud of cigarette smoke suffocates us on our way to class because Smokey McGee forgets that other students are enrolled at this school. We're selfishly concerned with where we have to be and what we are doing; me, me, me is the daily mantra.

Press the open button for someone racing towards the elevator; sure, you may have to endure an awkward ride down (it usually is when it's two strangers), but he or she will appreciate the favor.

Genuine courtesy is rarely encountered, but when it does surface it really brightens your day. Last week while on a crowded airport shuttle bus going to another terminal a woman stepped onboard and a college-aged boy stood up for her to sit. As we filed out, he turned to the bus driver and said, "Thanks very much, M'am." This kindhearted attitude caught me off guard. It was refreshing to see authentic benevolence when so often individuals, especially those our age, are only concerned with themselves.

Try doing something nice just for the sake of being kind. Pay the toll for the person behind you; they'll be pumped to save the few bucks and both of you will automatically be in a better mood. Press the open button for someone racing towards the elevator; sure, you may have to endure an awkward ride down (it usually is when it's two strangers), but he or she will appreciate the favor.

Smiling doesn't cost anything, and, yet, it can be the most rewarding thing you do for yourself and others. There is intense power in a grin. You can make someone's day by simply smiling at him or her. When you're driving your car or walking in the mall put a mental image of yourself in mind. Catch yourself before you get frustrated with silly things and remember that by constantly wearing a scowl you're giving off a negative self image. Even if you're in a bad mood, faking your way into a positive mindset can get you to the real thing and influence those around you.

Manners are not overrated. Everyone loves to hear "thank you," "excuse me" and "please" every once in a while. Now that you're in college don't lose the values of your upbringing. If your parents failed to demand manners, don't think you are doomed to be rude forever. By forgetting politeness and bearing a grimace you repel others.

Even though there isn't an audience to commend your kindness, do it anyway. There's not much time left this semester, but during these last few weeks make an effort to say good morning to those you pass; it may feel weird at first, but you'll soon realize friendliness is contagious. It forces you to feel good and gives others a boost. Put down your cell phone and turn off your ipod every now and then. Practice courtesy daily, and it will soon be engrained in your personality. Most importantly, remember that "You're never fully dressed without a smile."

Just as a side note: don't forget to call your mom this weekend. Sunday is Mother's Day, and it's important to let her know you're thinking of her.

News should be fact, not opinion

Greg Collins

When Greek citizen and philosopher Socrates was brought to trial in Athens, Greece, at issue was whether he had corrupted the youth of the city through his teaching methods. In his defense, Socrates pointed out that unlike the Sophists, a group of teachers devoted to teaching the skills of persuasive rhetoric, the primary objective of his pedagogy was not to convince people that his point was right but to seek the truth through reason.

This pursuit for truth is not confined to philosophy, and can be applied to all sorts of venues that give out information to the public, such as, newspapers and television news shows. Many people have justifiably concluded that several news sources are unreliable because they slant news coverage to advance a particular political preference. In effect, they have chosen the way of the Sophists and have rejected the way of Socrates.

Recently a Business Week poll revealed that voters from both major political parties felt that The New York Times carried favorable coverage of Democratic candidate John Kerry leading up to the presidential election. Additionally, the newspaper's own ombudsman publicly expressed that he thought The Times reported on certain social issues with a Liberal perspective.

While the opinions of these people do not necessarily mean that the newspaper did not report the truth, it does give an accurate indication of how people are losing confidence in news sources because they feel newspapers fail to report news in an unbiased manner. In journalism this is called seeking the truth.

This practice is not confined to favoring only one political perspective. A documentary called "Outfoxed," in which the cable news station Fox News was depicted, Rupert Murdoch, the chairman of the company which owns the station, influenced the reporting of news events. He required certain news stories to be emphasized more than other events that did not fit the political perspective of Fox News, which is generally thought to be more Conservative than The New York Times.

What is reporting the truth and writing unbiased stories to the humanly possible extent? It is certainly not emphasizing one news event while not emphasizing or completely disregarding another event merely for ideological reasons. This is why readers should be cognizant, not only of the information they get from news sources, but also of the information that is not reported.

While the opinions of these people do not necessarily mean that the newspaper did not report the truth, it does give an accurate indication of how people are losing confidence in news sources because they feel newspapers fail to report news in an unbiased manner.

These trends are not just prevalent in news sources but in any source of information for which the reader or observer does not have the benefit of having as much information as the source. Currently, I am reading a book which discusses the motivations of residents who decide to live in gated communities, such as racism and elitism. I do not have as much information about the subject of gated communities as the author, who had done extensive research on the topic. However, a different book I had read showed that mass movements of residents to different living areas were common within many races and ethnicities. So, it would be hard to conclude that the trend to live in gated communities was due primarily to racism.

How does this example apply to the pursuit for truth in news sources? Citizens do not have as much information relating to news events as reporters or news anchors; how the public perceives current events is significantly influenced by how the media reports the news.

For instance, recently the print media has reported extensively on the immigration debate. Major newspapers have used euphemisms such as "undocumented workers" or "guest workers" to describe Mexican migrants crossing American borders, rather than the less politically correct, but more politically accurate term "illegal immigrants".

Therefore, based on the connotative inferences from the first two phrases, the public is led to believe that these Mexican immigrants are not breaking any laws, when in fact; crossing U.S. borders illegally is a criminal act.

In essence, we formulate our political opinions on current events based on the reporting of news given to us through information – feeders, like The New York Times, and it is difficult to develop rational viewpoints when the news we are given is not the truth.

Declining readership and decreasing revenues for newspapers across the country are evidence that people are pursuing other news sources, which may report the news in a fair way, or at the very least, report the news in a way counter to the methods used by major Liberal newspapers.

Very few would be so bold as to assert that newspapers have the capability of reporting news through completely objective means. At the very least, reading a variety of news sources and being exposed to different information – feeders aides in the Socratic quest for truth. Just as powerful media figureheads are capable of distorting the news, like The New York Times or Fox News editors, human beings are fully capable of the kind of truth seeking Socrates artleulated while on trial.

Reforming the debate on reform

Alex Maslow

There isn't much that's better than a good, constructive, fact-based debate. Unfortunately, they are dying out like an endangered species. Their habitats are being destroyed by the bull-dozers of personal insults and the wrecking balls of emotion. While my one-man crusade to save the forest of objectivity (just north of the river of reason) may be doomed to failure, I'll be damned if I surrender one inch of logic. So what am I talking about now? Illegal immigration.

Maybe I'm missing something. Maybe I'm naïve about the situation, but to me, the situation is far more complicated than it ought to be. Then again, this is what I've come to expect.

In typical political fashion the sides have become polarized and the grey area has become a no-man's land between the trenches of the Liberals and the Conservatives. The debate is being skewed by harsh words and personal insults. Anyone who even hints that illegal immigrants ought to be deported automatically gets labeled as a xenophobe by Liberals, while Conservatives are guilty of claiming that supporting immigrants is un-American. The funniest part? That's not even what this debate is about.

You cannot steal a candy bar from a store because it is priced too high. If you do, you will be arrested. Similarly, if you steal into this country, you should be arrested and deported.

This is not (err, should not be) a debate about immigrants. This is a debate about those immigrants who sneak past the border or violate the terms of their VISA. This is a debate about those who illegally enter the country, and the issue isn't even that they are immigrants – the issue is that they broke the law.

I liken illegal immigration to stealing. While legal immigrants buy their residency by going through the proper paperwork, illegal immigrants steal it by avoiding the paperwork. Now, while the red tape of entering this country may be a bit much, that does not justify the illegal entering into this country. You cannot steal a candy bar from a store because it is priced too high. If you do, you will be arrested. Similarly, if you steal immigration into this country, you should be arrested and deported.

Of course, at this point, deporting every illegal immigrant is not an option. It is simply a logistical impossibility. Plus, there are many illegal immigrants with much to offer this country. This country was built on immigrants, and immigrants will continue to contribute to its success.

However, we should not give out residency whole sale to them. Not only will this not solve the problem, but there are many illegal immigrants who are, in fact, dangerous criminals. Why should they get the same treatment as law abiding "illegals"? (Man, talk about an oxy-moron).

I believe there ought to be a way that illegal immigrants already in this country can legalize their residency. Specifically, I believe they must meet a certain set of criteria. Anyone who does not meet all of the criteria is to be deported immediately. Additionally, anyone who has entered the country illegally after, say, April 7th 2006 (an arbitrary date) is to be deported without question. Of course, those who are deported may still apply for legal immigration, although their illegal attempt will be on record and may work against them.

They should have a clean criminal record for the last three years that they lived in their country, and they should have a clean criminal record during their time living in America. They should prove they can productively add to American society, and could not make a living in their country of origin. They should be reasonably fluent in English (enough to hold a common conversation), or prove they were unjustly prosecuted in their country of origin, in which case they receive refugee status.

I think this is a reasonable plan with reasonable and clear expectations. It is not perfect, but no idea comes out perfectly the first time. I bet the first wheel had a corner or two, but a half-wheel is a good start to the wheel, and my idea is a good start to the reformation we need.

So join me in my no-man's land between the trenches. They say the danger with being in the middle of the road is that you get hit from both sides. I say the best part of being in the middle of the road is that you get to direct the traffic. So come on and put on those orange vests of yours. Let's direct this debate away from the speed bumps of xenophobia and the narrow ledges of un-Americanism and into the wide open road of facts and reason.

Oh, and I lied about April 7th being arbitrary. It's my birthday.

'West Wing's' term expires

By Connie Ogle
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Early on in the TV series "The West Wing," a young man watches the staff scramble around the Oval Office as the president prepares to deliver an important speech to the American people. The double jolt of snagging a White House job and this new and thrilling proximity to power has left him reeling.

"I've never felt like this before," he breathes. "It doesn't go away," replies the not-so hardened staffer next to him.

That sensation — the one that makes your heart rise and your back stiffen, causes you to stand just a bit taller and vow to do good — is an emotion "The West Wing" has inspired through most of its seven-year run. But tonight NBC will air the final episode. It's titled "Tomorrow," even though declining ratings have made sure that day never comes for the series.

President Josiah "Jed" Bartlet (Martin Sheen) will step down; President-elect Matt Santos (Jimmy Smits) will step up. And millions of dreamers will lose that one hour of the week when they can pretend that the most famous inhabitants of Washington, D.C., are intelligent, thoughtful, industrious, honest, honorable — and liberal.

"The West Wing" is labeled a drama, but cynicism would suggest it's more fantasy than reality, reflective more of what we wish we were rather than what we truly are. But that seductive message — we can and MUST strive to be better — has always been an element of what makes the show so addictive. We know a president isn't going to allow a political enemy to take his place temporarily or put a member of the opposing party on the Supreme Court. But it was always pleasant, and maybe even necessary, to believe those things could happen, at least under the entertaining auspices of this fictional administration.

"The West Wing" first aired in 1999, at a time when politics didn't play a big part on TV shows. It won nine Emmys in its first season, the most ever for a drama series. It won Best Drama Series its first four years, too. Creator Aaron Sorkin, who wrote the screenplay for the film "The American President," perfected the rapid-fire walk-and-talk style he toyed with on his short-lived "Sports Night," propelling his characters all over the White House with lively wit and noble purpose.

But despite its roots in romantic comedy tradition, the show never shied away from serious issues: abortion, religion, education, health care. Middle East relations (often with the oppressive fictional country of Qumar, which bears more than a passing resemblance to Saudi Arabia). The writers took up political — almost exclusively Democratic — positions.

The show was the first scripted TV series to indirectly address 9-11. In a matter of weeks, Sorkin wrote and shot "Isaac and Ishmael," which aired Oct. 3, 2001, in which he put the White House under lockdown because of a terrorist threat. Unlike the folks on the brawny (and considerably more brainless) "24," the characters don't fight their way out, guns blazing. They sit and discuss — sometimes emotionally, sometimes logically — the subject likely to define the rest of our lifetimes. Just like we do.

Sorkin left after season 4, taking most of the light-hearted dialogue with him. We lost Rob Lowe that year in a salary dispute, too. The good news is that his (sort-of) replacement was longtime Sorkin collaborator Joshua Malina as congressman-to-be Will Bailey. But season 5 was, to be kind, not "The West Wing" to which we were accustomed. And yet, the show bounced back in its final two years, resurrecting exciting storylines and the moving humor and introducing terrific new cast members as Santos and Republican Arnold Vinick (Jimmy nominee Alan Alda) battled it out to be Bartlet's successor.

Still, the regulars — well-defined, realistically flawed, absolutely irresistible — are what kept us interested. We rooted for Bartlet, his brains, his hopes, his leadership, his courage in fighting MS. We wished he were real but were happy we had him at all. Sorkin's original idea was to never show the president, a plan that would have consistently flummoxed the writers and prevented us from enjoying the fantasy as much as we did. (We would have also missed Sheen's unforgettable entrance in the pilot episode, as he bursts into a fractious meeting quoting the First Commandment: "I am the Lord thy God," he intones, and you immediately believe it.)

We were fascinated with the dynamics of Bartlet's decades-long friendship with chief of staff Leo McGarry (John Spencer, whose death last year added almost unbearable poignancy to the tense election episodes) We admired C.J. Cregg (the fantastic Allison Janney, in what will unfortunately probably be the role of a lifetime) for her almost seamless transition from press secretary to replacement chief of staff, and we grieved over the firing of communications director Toby Ziegler (Richard Schiff), whose banishment was a painful testament to the peril of following your heart in politics.

We laughed at the antics of deputy chief of staff Santos campaign manager Josh Lyman (Bradley Whitford) even as we marveled at his relentless dedication and groaned at his seven years — seven freaking years! — of blindness in regard to his feelings for his assistant Donna Moss (Janel Moloney, who blossomed as her role expanded from secretary to political operative). Just hand Whitford another Emmy right now, he has continued to ground the series after it split into two separate shows, one on the campaign trail, the other at the White House.

Josh's inevitable comeuppances have always been essential to the show's comedy, and Whitford has always been funny. But this year his performance has taken on new depth as Josh faced his mentor's death on the biggest day of his political career and is forced, finally, to sort out those complicated feelings that landed him in bed with the woman he loves but as too pig-headed to admit.

It's the unerring ability of its characters' to rise above challenges or personal blindness that in the end defines "The West Wing." As Bartlet, at his second inauguration, told Will Bailey "Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful and committed citizens can change the world. You know why?" "It's the only thing that ever has," replied Will. That exchange echoes the truth about everyone who had anything to do with the smart, mesmerizing, thoroughly wonderful TV world about that "glorious prison on Pennsylvania Avenue" that always felt more like a glorious escape.

O-Hill set for Bowl weekend

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Bowl weekend will continue, this weekend, rain or shine. If you went to the movie night portion of the event, last night, you may have noticed a radical departure from years past. For those not in attendance, this year's events will be hosted under tents.

Last year, rain caused the weekend to be a major disaster with the smallest attendance in years. But this year students will be ready for the rain when it comes, not only will there be tents set up, but attendees will be offered free rain ponchos.

"It rained straight through Bowl Weekend [last year], and it's going to rain straight through Bowl Weekend this year. We bought a lot of tents and ponchos...so all of Bowl Weekend (movie night, Bowl dance, Bowl day, and Fill the Hill) will be under tents, big and small," Hakim said in an interview with The Collegian.

Tents and ponchos won't be the only way to separate this year's festivities from years past. This year has a unique country theme to add into the mix.

To start tonight off right, there will be free line dancing lessons in the Bowl at 8. Following the lessons the real dance will begin. The first 500 people to attend will get a free cowboy hat. Aside from the cowboy hats, people are encouraged to find their own country themed outfit and wear it to the dance.

"For those who dress up for the dance we will be having a best dressed contest" Hakim said. It should be noted that both real and fake weapons are against school policy and will not be allowed in the Bowl. No bags are allowed in the Bowl besides purses and they will be searched.

If dancing isn't your thing, do not fret. On Saturday, the Bowl will be hosting the traditional events like a free barbeque, throwing pies into resident assistant's faces, and a "singled out" dating style game.

"Singled Out will involve two single residents, one from Grayson and one from Dickinson. Each resident will take a turn to ask a crowd of participants a question. If the participants answer the question correctly, they can continue to try to win a date. Towards the end of the game, the participants will then have to do more physical things with the crowd, getting to vote for whoever wins a date with the single participant," Matt Sherman OHAG Governor-elect said.

With posters all over campus for a week now, the event has gathered quite a positive reaction from old and young students alike.

"The first two years I was here, I liked how the same typical activities seemed to be the staple and I always liked how they got everybody interacting as well. I know that this year's [activities] will be new and innovative too," said Nathan Bedrick, a student who plans to attend this weekend's events.

Also provided on Saturday will be a small portion of country themed events like farm animals, cow milking contests, rodeo roper and a bungee bull.

To conclude the weekend, bands will be performing at the Fill the Hill concert on the hour starting at 4 o'clock with a forty-five minute set. Each band has been chosen carefully to represent the wide student body's taste in music such as techno, emo and rock.

"One band in particular is quite unique, Ben Tap Soul, their lead singer actually tap dances as he sings old Jewish songs with a rock rap twist," Sherman said.

Following the conclusion of the concert, the events of the weekend will be over and it will be back to the typical routine for Orchard Hill and the rest of the campus. Unfortunately, the typical routine includes finals and homework, but on the bright side of things, the year will be over before we all know it.

Grammy winner Soraya dies

By Elizabeth Baier
South Florida Sun-Sentinel

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. Latin Grammy winner Soraya had big plans for her musical career in June 2000. She had released her third album and was about to launch a two-year tour to promote it.

But when the Colombian-American singer found a lump in her breast, none of those plans mattered. She had a new mission — to take care of her health and help other women understand the cancer that had already taken her mother, aunt and grandmother.

Soraya Lamilla died Wednesday at a hospital in Miami, her adopted home, with several family members at her side, after giving countless other women hope for recovery, according to her publicist Rondine Alcala. She was 37.

Soraya, who went by only her first name, left her fans a message.

"My physical history may come to an end, but I am sure that the one that exists in your hearts will be present for all eternity. I'm confident that my existence will leave a footprint in your lives and benefit many women in the future."

Latin music fans and Colombians in South Florida mourned her death. They remembered a sample and introspective songwriter who never aspired to stardom but was passionate about her music and breast cancer awareness.

Enrique "Kike" Posada, publisher of Boom!, a Miami-based magazine that specializes in rock and pop, called Soraya "an artist ahead of her time."

"She made music of such a quality that is rare in Latin music," Posada said. "She dominated both languages and her lyrics showed a deep appreciation for life."

Born in New Jersey to Colombian parents, Soraya became obsessed with music when at age 5 she heard a Colombian folk song, "Pueblito Viejo," during a family gathering.

She played at coffeehouses while in college and worked as a flight attendant until she landed a deal with Polygram Latino in 1996. Her musical career had taken off.

Two songs from her first album, "En Esta Noche" ("On Nights Like This"), made it to No. 1 on Billboard magazine's Latin Pop Airplay charts. She soon won praise for her fusion of Latin genres, rock, Colombian folk music and Arabic influences and was on her way to becoming one of the most praised female voices in Latin pop and rock.

Soraya Lamilla died of breast cancer yesterday in a Miami hospital.

In 2004, after successfully undergoing chemotherapy, Soraya won a Latin Grammy for her self-titled album, in Spanish and English, which spoke of hope and recovery.

But her true calling had already become clear, she told the South Florida Sun-Sentinel three years ago.

"We really just have to start talking about it," Soraya said about breast cancer. "Ignorance is what keeps many of us in fear and in denial."

Motivated by her family history, Soraya became a spokesperson for the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation in 1999, a year before her diagnosis.

"So many women in her family had been diagnosed with the disease, she wanted to educate women about early detection," said Susan Carter, director of communication for the foundation. "She was vigilant of her own breast health and she wanted others to be so, too."

Last year, about 211,240 new cases of invasive breast cancer were diagnosed among women and 40,410 women died of breast cancer in the United States, according to the American Cancer Society.

Dr. Alejandra Perez, of the Breast Cancer Center at the Memorial Cancer Institute in Hollywood, Fla., described Soraya as a role model for many of her patients.

"Our patients loved her," said Perez. "As a Colombian and as a woman working every day to try to fight breast cancer, it's a big loss in every way."

Funeral services in Miami are pending.

'Prime' example of NY humor

By Matt Schneider
The South Dakota Mirror

MARQUETTE, Mich. — I've never been to New York, but somehow I feel at home there. After spending much of the last several years devouring Woody Allen films, growing up with "Seinfeld" and "Friends," seeing Martin Scorsese films like "After Hours," "Raging Bull," "Mean Streets," "Taxi Driver," and after God knows how many films like "Metropolitan," I've developed an unassailable mental picture that captures the elite mystique of the Big Apple.

After making a bit of a splash with his debut film, "Boiler Room," writer-director Ben Younger took five years to return. "Prime" is as inauspicious a sophomore effort as a filmmaker could deliver. Bearing more than a passing resemblance to the middle period relationship films of Allen, Younger's protagonist is strapping Bryan Greenberg as David Bloomberg, who, like Younger, is an aspiring artist taking a while to get his career off the ground. Also like Younger, David's mother, Lisa, is a therapist. As played by Meryl Streep, Lisa Metzger could have stepped right out of an "Annie Hall" flashback, though Streep and Younger allow Lisa much more humanity than Allen typically allows his parental figures.

One of Lisa's patients, Rafi Gardet, just finished a messy divorce and got in touch with her biological clock issues.

When she meets and starts dating David, the end results are telegraphed to the audience in capital letters but the romance is passionate and touching anyway. (This is no Rob Reiner film.)

Uma Thurman is one of the screen's most likeable actresses; her Rafi is insecure but mature enough to recognize the dangers of falling in love with a man on the cusp of being a full generation younger than she is.

Like a good therapy session, these three neurotic characters have time to grow as people before the credits roll. Nothing cures neuroses like family spats and a few tumbles in the hay — at least, in New York, apparently.

Slack and comfortable like a pair of worn jeans, the familiar stock characters and settings aren't fresh or invigorating. (there may even be a vaguely musty smell rising from the more predictable scenes) but taking a walk through the cinematic equivalent of Central Park (ironically, one Allen staple Younger doesn't use) with lively, witty characters still relaxes the nerves and gives one the illusion of having learned something valuable about life.

Without Streep, "Prime" would have been lost. As one of our most reliable legends, you usually get the sense that Streep invests the time and care that not every character she plays really deserves.

Lisa is a complete wreck, personally and professionally. Streep gives her the grace and the exceptional comic timing necessary to pull the majority of the film through the choppy, routine waters.

Comic performances are often the most underappreciated in cinema, and for a veteran like Streep to take a role destined for the memory of oblivion is a tribute to her dedication to her craft and also perhaps to the material she chose to work with.

Through the 'transportive' magic of movies, we've all been to New York but we keep coming back because it's one of those emerald cities of cinema that manages to give you a different experience every time yet always make you feel like you've finally come home.

DVD Features:

The lackluster commentary, deleted scenes and making-of documentary are standard promotional fare. I would have liked Younger to turn the camera on his family to deconstruct the line between fiction and fact that Allen treads so expertly. Instead, we are treated to the usual interviews in which everyone gushes over Streep and some unimpressive outtakes.

"Ask the Attorney": paying rent?

By Michele L. Leal
Senior Staff Attorney

Q. I have 2 roommates, Jason and Tim, and the three of us are all on a lease which expires at the end of May. Tim did not come back after spring break for financial reasons. He told us that he cannot afford to pay rent for April and May. Isn't he still obligated? The electric bill is in my name. Tim says he does not have to pay for electricity any more, since he is no longer living in the apartment. Is this true?

A. Tim is still obligated as a tenant on the lease and he cannot avoid his responsibility for rent and utilities by simply moving out. In many cases students share apartments to cut down on living expenses. While sharing an apartment can result in greater affordability, it sometimes can result in unintended costs. It is important for all tenants to understand the legal relationship that exists between co-tenants and what can happen if one roommate fails to pay rent or other expenses as anticipated.

When tenants sign a lease with a landlord they are usually agreeing to joint and several liability. This means that all the tenants are one unit with respect to the landlord. If there is a rent deficiency, the landlord looks to the unit as a whole for resolution, rather than to each individual for their proportionate share. If one co-tenant fails to pay his portion of the rent, as in your situation, the landlord can hold the other roommates responsible, even if they have already paid their portion. Any roommate can be held responsible for up to the entire amount of the rent, provided that the landlord cannot collect more than the entire rent amount. Additionally, if any rent is due to the landlord, all the tenants in the unit can be evicted for non-payment of rent, with a 14-day notice, even those who have paid their portion. It is important to note that leases often make all the tenants responsible for court costs and the landlord's attorney fees in the event of an eviction, meaning that co-tenants can be held liable for even more than their roommate's unpaid rent. To avoid eviction and these additional expenses, it is advisable for tenants in good standing to talk to the landlord and then agree to pay a delinquent roommates share.

If you do this, you can then seek reimbursement from Tim, who is the one who owes the money. In your situation, eviction is unlikely because the lease is almost expired. The most likely scenario is that the landlord will deduct the rent owed by Tim from your security deposit.

It might be possible to find a new tenant to take over the lease for Tim. However, most leases have clauses which prohibit assignment or subletting without the landlord's permission. This means that tenants cannot change roommates without the permission of the landlord. If permission is unreasonably withheld then the tenants cannot be legally held liable for the rent deficiency.

In the case of utility bills, the tenant who has arranged for service and receives the bills is the person who is legally responsible for payment. If roommates fail to pay their share, the person named on the bill (you in this case) is the one who can be sued by the utility company. Usually tenants have oral agreements to share utilities. In your situation, even if this is the case, it may be necessary to pay the utility company the money owed by Tim, in order to avoid a discontinuance of service, or a bad credit report.

When co-tenants in this situation pay the bills of a roommate, they can attempt to recover the money in a small claims lawsuit. However, if a roommate cannot pay the rent and bills owed, they are probably not going to readily pay a small claims judgment either.

Problems like this can sometimes be prevented. It is often helpful for co-tenants to enter into written roommate agreements at the beginning of the tenancy. Although such agreements are not binding on the landlord, they can clarify the rights and responsibilities of the tenants to each other. Such agreements should specify what each tenant is financially responsible for, including rent shares and utility costs. Agreements can also clarify arrangements for food costs (separate or joint), housecleaning and other chores, and policies with respect to noise, guests and parties. Working out potentially problematic issues at the beginning of a tenancy can help to avoid major problems and misunderstandings, which can be costly in terms of time as well as money.

Talese writes "oddest of memoirs"

By Patrick T. Reardon
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO — Gay Talese, one of the founders of the New Journalism, has published a string of best-selling books over a writing career spanning half a century. He has been the biographer of The New York Times ("The Kingdom and the Power"), chronicler of the sexual revolution ("Thy Neighbor's Wife") and interpreter of the inner life of a Mafia family decades before anyone ever heard of "The Sopranos" ("Honor Thy Father").

But he calls his new book "the most creative non-fiction I've done."

"A Writer's Life" (Knopf, $26) has the 74-year-old Talese himself as his subject. Yet, it's the oddest of memoirs.

Stingy with details of his personal experience, Talese focuses on his vocation as a reporter and on the stories he has chased that often never made it fully into print, or into print at all — stories, mainly of failure, about a Chinese woman soccer player, Lorena and John Bobbitt, Selma, Ala., a star-crossed restaurant location, among others.

Recently, he spoke with the Chicago Tribune from his home in Manhattan. Here are edited excerpts from the conversation:

Question: In "A Writer's Life," you write that, for you, producing prose is like a patient passing a kidney stone. Why is writing so painful?

Answer: It could be a sentence or a paragraph or maybe a whole chapter, but I am so dissatisfied with what I do and do and do and do again and again, and that's been true since I was a high school kid.

I've always thought that I could do a better job than I was doing. And that haunting notion of imperfection or inadequacy or the aspiration of attaining a higher level of workmanship than I did the first, second or third time has made me one of the great rewriters, if not writers, of my time.

When I got a serious job after high school and college at The New York Times, I actually thought I was one of the foot soldiers for the historians. I came out of this Catholic tradition of concern for the life hereafter, the fear of purgatory or, worse than that, Hell itself. The idea was one of never quite measuring up to the expectations of our Creator.

So I believe that what we do in the present, we have to deal with in the future. There wasn't any easy lunch. You'd just better know history is going to judge you.

Q: Do you see yourself as a historian?

A: I do think of myself as a kind of historian in that I am interested in history, and everything I have written — if you look at any piece, whether it's the famous Frank Sinatra piece, or the piece on Joe DiMaggio — all the pieces are historically centered.

I'm wondering, as I'm interviewing people, how my life was different from theirs, and how their life from mine was different, and what were their concerns when they were young, what was the influence of their environment, their home life, their religiosity, the politics of their time, their neighborhood.

My first book, called "New York — A Serendipiter's Journey," published in 1961, was an attempt to bring attention to those in the shadows of the skyscraper city, and the next book was very much the same kind of thing. It was called "The Bridge." It was about the workers who were up in the sky so far above the land level that people walking along the sides of the river could not really see very clearly those small creatures crawling along the cables, building the bridge.

I was again focusing attention on those who were too uncelebrated to be having any attention paid to them by the chroniclers of history or the chroniclers of journalism. That was my place, filling in for those who were not paying attention, in the Arthur Miller sense of Willy Loman. "Attention must be paid."

Q: What are you trying to achieve when you're writing?

A: I'm trying to achieve the state of mind that I've done the absolute best I could under the conditions, and that isn't easily realized because there is no limit to what you might do with a sentence. You read the great poets — I've never written a line of poetry — the poet might go for weeks and weeks and months writing a single line. And, then, 100 years later, you read that line, and it is historical.

I would love to be the author of a line that will be read with some appreciation long after I'm dead. That's what I think spirituality is, or religion.

Q: Your book "A Writer's Life" is a kind of anti-memoir memoir. You get to some personal stuff, but the really personal stuff that you go into is mainly about the writer's part of it.

A: What I did in "The Kingdom and the Power," I turned the reporter into a public figure. And then, in this book, some three decades and more later, I am doing something of the same thing with myself as subject. In this case, I had to be the connection. What connected these subjects was my curiosity and was my desire to write about them.

I didn't want to do a memoir. I didn't want to do a me, me, me, me, me.

Q: One thing that struck me is how angry you were that, during the civil rights movement, Selma was being demonized in such a black and white way.

A: That's right. I even write that phrase, "white devils and black angels," about this confrontation. I'm going back now as an old man, and I'm saying: You could have done more work here. It isn't black and white. Journalism isn't black and white. It shouldn't be black and white. When I was still a freshman journalist on The New York Times, I didn't see it that way because my father and my mother were foreigners, and I was (like) a foreigner.

I'm not reading the script. I'm always a little bit off-center. I want to see things from a different point of view. I'm an American voice. I'm that. And I'm also a voice who knows the echoings of foreignness.

Seventy-four year-old journalist Gay Talese uses himself as a subject for his new non-fiction piece, "A Writer's Life."

UM season on the line

ball. And when you got good pitching, you got a chance to win."

Junior right-hander Chris Lloyd will get the call to the mound tomorrow. Senior David Sullivan and junior Rory McDonald will get the starts on Sunday and Monday, respectively.

Lloyd is still looking for his first win of the season, as he picked up his fourth loss in Saturday's 10-2 loss to St. Bonaventure. He allowed four earned runs on only five hits in seven innings of work.

Sullivan, who last started a week from today, was pushed back and given an extra day's rest. He will now start a day after Lloyd, thanks to some injury problems.

"[Sullivan] has a little bit of a groin issue right now," Stone said before yesterday's practice. "And Lloyd had a real good bullpen session [on Wednesday]. He felt strong. So we'll get Sullivan in the bullpen today, and we'll get him ready for Sunday."

Regardless of who pitches, the Minutemen need to be consistent if they want to have a shot of making the postseason. And Stone has been stressing that since Day 1.

"There should be a sense of urgency all the time," Stone said. "That's something that we've emphasized and we've encouraged every day at the field. We can't wait around.

"We need to take advantage of every opportunity when we play," he continued. "We need to play our best and play hard, and some days we haven't got that. So hopefully the players understand that, yeah, we've still got a chance, and it's up to us."

With senior day also on Sunday, the Minutemen faithful will bid farewell to Derrick Durepo and Sullivan, and Stone wishes they could have had a better time spending their final days wearing the Maroon and White.

"It's unfortunate that we haven't had as much fun as we thought we would," Stone said. "I think our attitude is pretty good. They're good kids. We enjoy being around them, and it is unfortunate that we haven't had more fun.

"I think it could have been a lot of fun if we had done a few things here and there," he added. "And maybe had been 15 games better. It would have been a lot more fun this season."

Runners take last shot at the New England Championships

weekend will compete well, regardless of the weather conditions," she said. "It's just that when you have good weather at the end of your season, that's when you'll probably get your best performances. I think they deserve much better weather than what's predicted."

The girls that qualified for the New England Championships are freshman Jordan Veney, sophomores Kristen Bakanowski, Christian DeRosa and Jen Rippel, and seniors Elisabeth Budd and Ashley Creel.

Since the start of the indoor track and field season, Veney, a thrower, has become a powder keg that has exploded with success.

She will compete in the shotput, discus and hammer throw events, in which she is ranked third, fourth and 15th, respectively.

Veney owns the UMass shotput record at 44 feet, 10 1/4 inches, which she set at the Brown Invitational on April 15.

Despite her take-off foot feeling less than 100 percent, Bakanowski is expected to compete very well over the weekend.

She is ranked second in the conference – only about a quarter of an inch shy of the pole-vaulter ranked No. 1.

"The competition should be strong between [Bakanowski and the top-ranked vaulter]," LaFreniere said.

DeRosa is ranked eighth in the 5K-race heading into the weekend.

Last week was gut-check time for DeRosa, as she was entered in both the 5K and the 10K. After a challenge like that, the New England Championships should seem much less intense.

Rippel, a 400-meter runner, has just recently come back to competition since a high school knee injury sidelined her for two years.

However, LaFreniere said that Rippel has been working very hard to regain her old form. Her current best time is 60.89, but LaFreniere thinks she is very capable of breaking her sixty-second barrier.

"She's been training hard and is healthy and strong," LaFreniere said. "And she is really coming into her own."

Budd is ranked sixth in the 400-meter hurdles. Her best time of 62.95 places her behind two athletes from UMass Lowell and three from UConn.

Creel, an exercise science major, is ranked eighth in the heptathlon with 3,912 points, which she achieved at the Holy Cross Heptathlon in late April.

"There's some really strong multi-eventers. This is one of the strongest years [talent-wise]," LaFreniere said. "Regardless of the weather conditions [she] will compete very well."

Creel's goal for the meet is to gain over 4,000 points.

LaFreniere commented that she is really looking forward to see what unfolds this weekend.

"It's going to be a very competitive meet. It's the wrap-up of the season for most of the athletes. I'm hoping to see great competition in all the events that we're in," LaFreniere said. "I think we're taking the cream-of-the-crop from our team to this championship and I'm hoping next year to take a larger number."

Hoagland and Bakanowski, who also shared the most recent UMass/Dinn Bros. Co-Athlete of the Week honors, are the only Umass athletes who will continue their track seasons after this weekend. They will do so at the IC4As and ECACs, respectively.

UMass breezes by Fordham

she wasn't criticizing the umpires, but simply explaining why Balschmiter struggled early to throw strikes consistently.

"That's the umpire's strike zone and that's the one that counts," she said. "If he changes it, we've got to change with it, so that's what."

Through the first two innings, Balschmiter had given up four free passes and struggled to find the strike zone. Sortino was noticeably upset with the umpire's strike zone on both sides of the plate.

"Considering she issued that many walks that early in the game, I think [Balschmiter] did a great job, especially against a pretty good hitting team," Sortino said.

For weeks, Sortino talked about Balschmiter expanding her pitch arsenal to include more than just her blazing fastball. At least one pitch was finally unveiled on Thursday, where Balschmiter froze several batters with a two-strike change-up. It must have looked as if it were in slow-motion compared to the 70 mile-per-hour fastball that usually crosses the plate.

"We knew that to have a chance to make a run in the post-season, she needed to be able to locate her fastball, and she would have to come up with something different, like her change-up," Sortino said.

Balschmiter did not use the change-up a lot in the first round, as she strolled easily through the last three innings of the game. However, Sortino promised there would be more of Balschmiter's newest pitch to come.

"We'll probably use it more later in the tournament," she said. "But when you've got people scouting your pitching patterns, you don't want to show them your full hand of cards too early."

The next challenge for the Minutewomen will be to upstart Saint Bonaventure, which stunned No. 1 Charlotte in the first round. The fourth-seeded Bonnies enter today's matchup having won seven of their last eight. Their only loss came during a split with UMass last Friday in a 12-0 blowout.

After getting swept at Niagara on April 26, the Bonnies were embarrassed at home by Buffalo, 35-1, in the first game of a doubleheader. That loss sparked the Bonnies, who won the second game against the Bulls, and beat out Temple in the following week for the final spot in the A-10 Tournament.

"I think they're pretty hot right now," Sortino said. "I think they're on a mission. They seemed pretty hot last week when we went up there and split [the season series]."

In the second game against the Bonnies, the Minutewomen fell behind 5-0 early and never recovered.

"I'm looking forward to playing them [again]," Sortino said. "We were down 5-0 to [the Bonnies'] pitcher [Christine Keleher] before we could even blink. It was tough up there. I'm glad that we got another shot at them and I think we can beat them."

Today's schedule includes three games and two eliminations from the tournament. The winner of the first game will automatically be in the championship game. After that, two more will take place that will eliminate two of the remaining three from the tournament.

Not to mention that UMass was playing these games at the UMass Softball Complex – a place where they had not lost in 73 matchups. All paths seemed to lead to another plaque for Sortino's office, and the coast appeared clear for the Minutewomen to sail into the NCAA tournament.

And then, the walls came tumbling down.

Just one day after barely beating Fordham, 1-0, UMass was shutout by Saint Joseph's, 3-0. Hours later the Minutewomen were shocked again, this time by Temple, in a 4-3 loss. Their season was pretty much over, until they were given a surprise at-large bid into the NCAAs where they were eventually knocked out of contention by Michigan State.

This afternoon will mark a new chapter (for lack of a better word) in the A-10 UMass saga. The Minutewomen will face a Saint Bonaventure team that is looking for blood. The Bonnies came into this season's tourney as the fourth team in the standings. Yesterday afternoon, Bonaventure stunned Charlotte – the top team going into the A-10 tournament.

So in hindsight, the big, bad UMass softball powerhouse should destroy the 23-20 Bonnies today. They should pound them – and then laugh about it over lunch. They should get championship number 18 this weekend.

It was just one week ago today that the Minutewomen last faced the Bonnies – they ousted UMass, 5-3, in Game 2 of a doubleheader. They shouldn't have done that.

ters and allowed 16 hits and three runs. To say the least, the championship was more of a demonstration on how to crush opponents and turn them into dust. The demonstration of course was put on by Sortino, Busa and company.

The prior season in 2004, however, was a different story for the Minutewomen.

UMass rolled into the 2004 A-10 Tourney with a 33-13 record and had won 10 of their previous 11 contests. A 1-0 edge over Fordham in Game 1 of the championships made it a nine game winning streak for the Minutewomen.

Sam shares thoughts

Sam: Well, it's been 39 months since that commercial first aired, and I still get questions about it. That should say something. In fact, I'm confident mine is better.

BH: The hockey team came on late, stealing a few victories late in the season. BC and Vermont come to mind. Is that a sign of good things to come, in your opinion?

Sam: Absolutely. [The upsets of] BC, Vermont, and Colorado College were all great games. Jon Quick? He's the man.

BH: Any mascots you still hold a grudge with as the year concludes?

Sam: Well, there's obviously Herbie. I hope to see him at some point in a dark alley. I never wish for any college team to do badly, but with all the hype this year at Nebraska I wouldn't be upset if the Huskers didn't make a bowl game. As for that St. Joe's Hawk, I get to go to St. Joe's next year – let's see how he likes a taste of his own medicine.

BH: Are we talking another "Thriller"?

Sam: Don't push your luck.

BH: Fair enough. Any final predictions for next year?

Sam: It's going to be a great year to be a Minuteman.

heat will have a Petite Final.

The second varsity-eight, novice-eight and lightweight-four events will have a similar format, the only difference being the number of boats competing and advancing.

Senior coxswain Natalie Salerno, and rowers Faith Miller, Farrell Klein, Allison Bahn, Kate Grogan, Jaime Dicke, Kristen Boyce and Elizabeth Hayashida will join Pacheco in the second varsity-eight boat.

In the novice-eight boat for UMass, will be coxswain Jeanine LeDoux, and rowers Airlina Burrill, Haley Fitzgerald, Emerald Shirley, Anna Welch, Katarina Kirotiki, Stephanie Vasilchuk, Karen Plevock and Kendal Peirce.

The UMass's lightweight-four boat – that won the A-10s – will be comprised of coxswain Amber Monson, and rowers Anna Malinkevich, Michelle Woodford, Abby Lively (A-10 Scholar-Athlete of the Year) and Melissa Kelly.

Assistant coach Alex Binkowski said that this weekend's event is "the largest intercollegiate regatta in the world."

The Dad Vail Regatta is easily the largest collegiate regatta in the United States, with over 100 colleges and universities from the U.S. and Canada. And to have UMass win one – never mind going for three in a row after a two-year absence – is already a big accomplishment.

Playoff berth at stake

Minutemen hope to sneak in the backdoor

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts baseball team will try and carry its momentum into a three-game series against Saint Joseph's this weekend in Amherst. The Minutemen (12-26, 9-12 A-10) will open the series at noon tomorrow at Earl Lorden Field. The other two games will be played on Sunday and Monday, both set for a 12 p.m. start.

UMass is coming off of two non-conference games this past week against Connecticut and Central Connecticut. The Minutemen looked like two different teams in each game, as they lost, 12-1, to UConn on Tuesday, and defeated Central Connecticut, 11-1, on Wednesday.

With the regular season winding down, UMass coach Mike Stone is hoping that his team can continue to produce on a daily basis.

"It's a big weekend for us," Stone said. "Obviously we still have a chance. There are a lot of teams still in the mix, including ourselves. We just have to play well. We played well [on Wednesday]; it's just a matter of consistency. If we can put that together for three more games in a row, that's the key."

"We still made some mistakes," Stone said about Wednesday's win. "We still did some things that we don't want to do, that would prevent us from getting runs. But we had good pitching, and we played pretty well on defense and we hit the Senior hurler David Sullivan and the Minutemen hope to sneak into the Atlantic 10 Tournament. A three-game series with Saint Joseph's this weekend will prove crucial to their chances.

Friday is last hurrah for UMass track teams

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This weekend holds the last hurrah for almost all members of the Massachusetts track and field teams. The New England Championships are scheduled to take place in Durham, N.H. on Friday and Saturday.

The men are sending 15 athletes and the Minutewomen will send six.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien said that he is excited to see some of his big-time performers finish the season off strong.

Junior Erik Hoagland has been a dominating force in the jumping events and took home the Atlantic 10 Championship in the triple-jump last weekend.

In the outdoor season alone he has won the long-jump event five times and the triple jump twice, not including the one where he claimed the A-10 crown.

Hoagland boasts season bests of 23 feet, 8 1/4 inches and 47 feet, 10 inches in the long- and triple-jumps, respectively.

He will be competing in both jumping events, as well as the 4x100-meter relay.

Sophomore Nathan Barksdale is another Minutemen looking to make some spark this weekend.

He will be competing in the 400-meters and both relay events.

"Nathan is one of those guys who everyone takes for granted because he's very consistent," O'Brien said.

The 20-year-old Indiana native owns season-best performances of 49.73 seconds in the 400-meter dash, as well as a 58.87 in the 400-meter hurdles.

Freshman Steve Gerome is another star that O'Brien expects to contribute big.

He is scheduled to compete in both relays and the long-jump.

His best jump of the year was a mark of 21 feet, nine inches, which he achieved last weekend at the A-10 Championships.

Sophomore Kevin Murphy will run the 800-meters, in addition to the 4x100-, 4x400- and 4x800-meter relays.

O'Brien added that distance runners junior Mike Dulong, senior Ryan Corbett, sophomore Nils Fischer and freshman Jesse Regnier will all run the 5,000-meters.

"We'd like to put a real exclamation point on the end of the season," O'Brien said. "I think we've had a successful indoor and outdoor campaign."

Despite being discouraged by the forecasts that are predicting lousy weather for this weekend, UMass coach Julie LaFreniere expects all of her Minutewomen to compete well on Friday and Saturday.

"I think all of the athletes going this

Minutewomen smash Fordham in first round

Freshman Whitney Mollica (left) and junior first baseman Amanda Morin (right), who leads UM in hits with 68, have led the Minutewomen offense this season. Mollica is batting a team-leading .423 with 59 RBIs and 120 total bases. Mollica is the first player in Atlantic 10 history to win the Player of the Year Award and the Rookie of the Year Award in the same season. Freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter (center) has recorded 251 strikeouts in just 233.1 innings pitched.

Balschmiter turns in solid performance in first-round game

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On a windy day in Philadelphia, the Massachusetts softball team (35-14) took a major step in repeating as Atlantic 10 champions with a first-round win over No. 3 Fordham (35-22). Second-seeded UMass defeated the Rams 8-0 in five innings – thanks largely to its birthday girl – to advance to the winner's bracket in the second round of the double-elimination tournament.

St. Bonaventure (23-20) upset top-seeded Charlotte (42-12) with a 4-1 victory early in the day to advance to the winners' bracket. The Bonnies will now play the Minutewomen in second round. The winner of that game will automatically advance to the championship round.

It was a defensive battle early in the game until the Minutewomen began to pull ahead. Shortstop Stacy Cullington started the rally in the second inning with a solo home run off the top of the scoreboard that put the Maroon and White ahead, 1-0.

In the third, UMass kept the runs coming. Whitney Mollica, the 2006 A-10 Player of the Year and Rookie of the Year, hit her 11th home run this season, another solo shot. Before Mollica's blast, UMass coach Elaine Sortino pulled Mollica aside during her at bat to talk strategy.

"I just wanted to make sure she stayed on her legs, and backed up in the box," Sortino said. Fordham pitcher Rachael Wiggins had been pitching low in the zone to Mollica, trying to get ahead in the count.

Sortino's advice worked, as Mollica doubled the UMass lead. KJ Kelley nearly made it back-to-back homers with her own drive into the outfield, but the ball was caught in front of the wall, keeping the score at 2-0.

With a new pitcher in the game for Fordham, UMass blew the game wide open in the fourth. With two runners on, junior Amanda Morin singled up the middle, scoring Michea Holness and advancing Stefanoni.

Candice Molinari, who turned 21 yesterday, grounded to the pitcher in what should have been a routine out for the Rams. But pitcher Sara Kinney threw the ball over the head of first basemen Megan Hansen and into right field, allowing Morin to score. The right fielder then made a second errant throw – this time to the plate – and Stefanoni rounded the bases as the ball sailed to the back stop, making the score 5-0 at the end of four.

Minutewomen closed out the game with another three-run frame, scoring all three runs with two outs in the inning. Morin once again singled to center, scoring Proctor and putting runners on first and second. They advanced on a wild pitch in the next at-bat, putting two in scoring position for Molinari.

The birthday girl pulled through with a two-run double to left field that ended the game. The two runs put the Minutewomen up by eight, which allowed the mercy rule to take effect, ending the game after five.

Freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter, the A-10 Pitcher of the Year was stellar in her first postseason performance. The ace faced 22 batters, giving up just two hits while striking out five. She also walked five batters, including three in the second inning, but Sortino attributed that to the umpire's shifting strike zone, and not to potential playoff jitters for Balschmiter.

"I'm sure she was tight in her first championship, but quite frankly the umpire's strike zone was a little bit less than consistent," Sortino said. "It was kind of hard during those first two innings to figure out where we could put the ball to get ahead in the count."

Sortino was quick to point out that

A-10 titles are common for Sortino and Company

Eric Athas

In Elaine Sortino's 26 seasons as the Massachusetts softball head coach, she has racked up 17 Atlantic 10 championships. She has made the other A-10 teams tremble, shiver and tremor. The Minutewomen have made winning championships look easy, and yesterday was no different.

The Maroon and White trounced Fordham 8-0.

Winning is like clockwork for Sortino's team – score a few runs, throw a few pitches, do a little dance and go home. Heck, with the mercy rule in softball, UMass gets things done in time for lunch. This season, the Minutewomen have won contests in six innings or less 13 times.

And while statistics and history under Sortino's supremacy show that winning an A-10 championship appears easy for the veteran coach, her team certainly does not see things that way.

Of course, last season during this time it was vintage UMass. Junior Jenna Busa and the Minutewomen made the A-10 championships look like a cake walk in the Bronx. They knocked off Saint Joseph's, 10-1, in the opening contest, and then swept Fordham in a two-game series, outscoring the Rams by a margin of 15-2.

Busa threw every single pitch during that span. She faced 83 bat-

Sam the Minuteman tells all

BY BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With all the television commercials and publicity this year, 2005-06 had to be one of the most successful years for Sam the Minuteman in terms of exposure. I had a chance to sit down with Sam, speaking through an interpreter, for a few minutes at an undisclosed location to get some final words from the grinning soldier himself before he took off for the summer.

Brendan Hall (BH): What was your favorite moment of this year?

Sam the Minuteman (Sam): September 1st, 9 a.m. That's when the website for the Capital One Mascot Challenge officially went up for the first time. I was at the University of Richmond the first time I voted, when we beat up on the Spiders for a good win. I'm the only one who at the time had any concept that this would blow out of proportion to what it ended up being this year.

BH: Students, for the most part, showed you a lot of love on the website. So much love that you made it all the way to the final round, where you lost to Herbie Husker. What do you have to say of all the praise you got from the student body?

Sam: What's not to love? Totally awesome. Total gratitude. I cheer on all teams all the time, and the whole campus in general.

BH: Arguably one of your most entertaining moments of the year had to be the Michael Jackson "Thriller" dance during a timeout in the second half of the Minutemen's home finale against Xavier. Anything you've got in store for next year?

Sam: I've got a few tricks up my sleeve, but as far as another dance at half-court? Probably not. I'm going to bust out a few moves you haven't seen yet, and you're going to enjoy them. Not dropping any hints, though – you'll have to wait and see.

BH: There were so many Cinderella's in this year's NCAA basketball Tournament. With UMass out, who did you pull for?

Sam: That's easy. George Mason. He's a good pal of mine. I wasn't able to talk to him after that UConn upset, because I was at a Celtics game for Mascot Day. They were announcing the score of that game over the public address as I was coming onto the court, and as soon as the final score was official I began pumping my fist in the air. The whole place exploded.

BH: Did you and George fight any famous battles together?

Sam: Ah, that was such a long time ago, it's hard to remember. I think he came a little bit after me.

BH: One of Travis Ford's mentors, Billy Donovan, took Florida to its first national title in hoops this year. Did you send any words the way of the Gators?

Sam: I actually recently talked to Albert the Alligator and congratulated him on the title, as well as the new ESPN commercial he's featured in.

BH: Which reminds me, what would you do if Steve Irwin tried to come after you?

Sam: I've got a bit of height on him, so I would just place my hand on his head while he tried to swing his arms at me. You know, like he was a little kid or something.

BH: Better ESPN commercial – Albert and the Crocodile Hunter, or you and Andy Roddick?

Rowers take on largest Regatta

BY JOEY WHITE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After winning its fifth consecutive Eastern College Athletic Conference Metro League Cup, the Massachusetts women's crew team will make the trip to the Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia on Friday and Saturday for the first time since 2003.

The Minutewomen have not made the return trip to the Dad Vail since 2003 because of a course dispute with their first-place varsity-eight boat. The dispute cost UMass its second straight year of winning the regatta. But after two years of appeals, the medals were sent back to the Maroon and White this past winter.

With the medals back, the Minutewomen look to defend their title as they attempt a three-peat.

"I think we've got a very good chance – we're pretty fast," UMass coach Jim Dietz said of his first varsity-eight squad that was just ranked third in the final Mid-Atlantic region poll.

After last weekend's victory in Worcester, the NCAA Division I Rowing committee has the UMass crew team ranked second overall in the region, only behind Princeton, the top ranked team in the country.

Also ranked in the final Mid-Atlantic Region Poll was UMass' second varsity-eight boat in fourth and the varsity-four in fifth.

The Minutewomen will be up against familiar faces like Buffalo and Colgate, along with Atlantic 10 foes like La Salle, Fordham and Saint Joseph's. But they will also face distant unknowns like Santa Barbara and University of California-Irvine.

The varsity-eights will look different this weekend as senior captain Katie Berger is forced to sit on doctor's wishes due to her asthma. Sophomore Rachael Nealer will leave the second varsity-eight to replace Berger, while Annie Pacheco will take Nealer's spot.

After the first varsity-eight squad was upset with a fourth-place performance at the Atlantic 10 Championships, Nealer was replaced by classmate Amanda Mawn.

Mawn and Nealer will be joined by coxswain Dana Pulda, and rowers Ellen Maskrey, Gabrielle Papineau, Stephanie Hopf, Sarah Marsan, Hannah Brewster and Catherine Gariepy.

Besides the first varsity-eight, UMass will also be sending its second varsity-eight, first novice-eight and lightweight-four boats to the regatta.

There are 38 schools registered to compete in the first varsity-eight event. There will be seven heats in all Friday, three with six boats and four with five. The top two from each heat will advance to the semi-finals Saturday.

The last place boat from each heat will be eliminated from the regatta, while the remaining 17 will have a "rechapage" (French for "second chance") on Friday to make the semi-finals. The winner from the four heats will join the semi-finals.

From there, the top two from the three semi-final groups will advance to the finals, while third and fourth place boats from each semi-final

Behind the Motown

Local street performer gives back to others

BY ERIKA LOVLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's 12:55 a.m. on a Saturday night — last call in the college bars in downtown Amherst. Hundreds of inebriated students crowd the sidewalks, screaming, laughing and gobbling slices of pizza. Dressed in a faded black sweatshirt and a sparkly blue cape, Bennie Johnson, known to most of the college town as Motown Bennie, leans against a tree outside Judie's Restaurant. He fidgets, tossing his instrument — a white construction bucket — in his hands, waiting until the bars empty out and the sidewalks are filled to maximum capacity.

"I have to stay out of the bars," he said. "When I try to go in and get a drink of tequila or a margarita, 15 or 20 drinks will appear because the people all want to buy me drinks."

A well-known street musician in Amherst, Motown Bennie has been performing Motown, jazz, and classic rock songs on the town's sidewalks for over three years. Armed only with his battered bucket and a kazoo for instruments, he says he sings because it makes people smile.

The sight of Motown Bennie renders nothing but stares. The 6-foot, 190-pound musician's performance costume involves a scrap of shimmery metallic cloth tied around his shoulders into a cape. His neck is often adorned with strings of fluorescent Mardi Gras beads and a bright orange kazoo. At first glance, the graying 59-year-old could be mistaken for an escapee from a local mental institution.

However, underneath his costume, Bennie looks like any other blue-collar worker, dressed in a collared sweatshirt, Dickies and a pair of work boots.

"Motown! Motown Man! I'm in love with this chick I just met," screams a student from the stoop of a nearby bar. "Make her love me back!"

With a smile and a wink, Bennie begins beating on his battered white construction bucket, singing an old rendition of The Temptations.

> "Sugar pie, honey bunch
> You know that I love you
> I can't help myself
> I love you and nobody else..."

Instantly captivated, the sidewalk crowd throngs to form a circle around Johnson. The cheers and clapping are deafening as shouts of "go Motown Man" echo across the street. Soon, half of the street is dancing.

Despite his age, Bennie is able to stay out in all kinds of weather, often performing until 2 a.m.

Several officers from the Amherst Police Department look on from across the street, more amused than concerned.

"They let me play because I work as a type of crowd control," said Johnson. "My music makes people feel good, so they are less apt to fight and get out of control after the bars lt makes my job easier and the cops' job easier."

The first time I met Motown Bennie was four years ago, while walking in downtown Northampton. I had just finished one of many fights with my then-boyfriend, and I sullenly held his hand, trying to look anywhere but his face.

"The blonde girl is mad at her boyfriend!" sang a voice from the street corner.

I turned to gawk at the tall black man in a sparkly red cape, singing and banging on a bucket.

"He won't be with us very long!"

Like anyone who has just heard Motown Bennie for the first time, all I could do was stop and laugh.

While he is a cultural icon in the Five College Area, very few people know much about Motown Bennie other than his street performances. Like most, I also knew nothing about him, until I spent a day in the life of Motown Bennie.

Third drug bust in past 8 days at UMass

BY BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts police arrested a student on Thursday night for charges stemming from the distribution of marijuana, according to Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

Adam R. Perry, 19, of 60 Twin Spring Drive in Boylston, was placed under arrest at approximately 9:51 p.m. on charges of possession of a Class D drug (marijuana) with intent to distribute. He posted a bail of $3,000 at the police station before appearing in court on Friday.

The arrest concluded an investigation into the use and distribution of marijuana on the UMass campus that Archbald said lasted less than a month, adding that it was a "quickly developing case." Archbald also said police worked with sources that provided information necessary to develop a search warrant for Perry's arrest.

Perry was arrested in his dorm room on the ninth floor of Kennedy Hall in Southwest Residential Area. Seized from his room were two pounds of marijuana — divvied up in 10-by-10-inch Ziploc bags, four one-gallon Ziploc bags, and various other small bags — a small number of plants, a bong, an electronic scale, transaction records (handwritten in a small notebook), and approximately $3,960 in cash.

Archbald said that this case was conducted completely by UMass Police "from beginning to end," using both detectives and uniformed members of UMPD to complete the investigation and make the appropriate arrest. Five officers were present at the scene of the arrest. No canine unit was used.

Perry is a full-time student at UMass. A search of People Finder on the UMass website found that he was an undeclared major.

Two photographs of the seized items released by UMPD indicate that issues of High Times magazine were also taken.

This is the third arrest relating to drug distribution over the last eight days. On May 3, four students in the Coolidge dorm in Southwest were arrested for trafficking approximately 38.7 grams of cocaine. Last Wednesday, a student in Lewis Hall in Northeast was arrested for manufacturing cocaine, ketamine and peyote in a drug lab that he allegedly created in his dorm room. In both of those cases, Massachusetts State Police Narcotics Unit was involved.

UMass police displayed the contents of a seizure in a Kennedy dorm room on Thursday.

Debate leads to discussion of war

BY NICOLE BOONJAKUAKUL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Anti-War Coalition and the Students Against the War Organization at the University of Massachusetts held a debate Thursday evening to discuss issues on the war in Iraq. The formal discussion allowed two opposing teams to address two main questions: "Should the U.S. have invaded Iraq?" and "Should the U.S. immediately withdraw from Iraq?"

The main goal of the discussion, which was moderated by the Daily Collegian's news editor, Dan O'Brien, was to promote civility and respect when discussing the War.

Ethan Burke, a member of the Anti-War Coalition and the organizer of the debate, opened the discussion by saying, "We hope we can all agree that peaceful dialogue is beneficial to a democratic society."

Justin Jackson and Burke, the war-opposing team, started off by asking, "Should a country ever invade another country?"

"So far, America hasn't benefited from invading a less-secure country, like Iraq," said Jackson, a UMass grad student and member of the Anti-War Coalition. "The government has said we're in the war to find weapons of mass destruction and to conquer the al Qaeda, or for humanitarian reasons. Today, the new reason is to bring democracy to a less fortunate country, specifically Iraq. It's about profit and power because we use forceful, economic threats to get a country to vote for our representative."

Jackson continued his argument by explaining America's historical, imperialistic philosophy.

"This country has been the dominating expansionist, military, economic, and cultural power in history, stemming from the British Empire. And because of it, we've created a constitution that allows us to expand," he explained. "Now, the Bush Administration refuses to reveal the real reasons behind the war, and has never explained this history to the public, and instead, uses September 11th as a catalyst for war," he said.

Jackson explained that before 9/11, the U.S. government had no interest in international laws and treaties. He said, "This is not a war of necessity, but one of choice — one that is picked by the intelligence to fit the rationale pre-determined by the government."

The team ended its first rebuttal by stating that "the United Nations has to approve before a country invades another, but that has never happened with our invasion of Iraq. The invasion is illegal; we've taken something that doesn't belong to us, and now, we have to give it back. People who believe in the war believe that the U.S. should maintain the imperialis-

Officials brave elements for heating plant

BY DAN MAGAZU
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Wind and rain was not enough to stop about 75 state and local officials from attending a groundbreaking ceremony for a new $118.7 million central heating plant at the University of Massachusetts last Friday.

The plant, fueled by natural gas and oil, will significantly reduce the greenhouse gas emissions currently being released by an obsolete, coal-burning facility built in the 1940s. The project is set to be completed by March of 2008.

"This is a classic example of the kind of investments we need to make in the University of Massachusetts in Amherst," UMass President Jack M. Wilson said at the ceremony. "We are invested in the flagship campus."

The project is part of a $2.2 billion capital plan for the five UMass campuses. According to Wilson, the state is providing 22 percent of the money, with the other 78 percent coming directly from UMass funds.

State senator and UMass alum Stanley C. Rosenberg spoke of the need for the state to provide a higher percentage of the funding for the capital plan. He believes that the state should be providing closer to two-thirds of the overall funding instead of one-fifth.

"That is a collective goal I think we should all embrace," Rosenberg said. "So the next time we gather for another exciting groundbreaking here at Amherst, we will be talking about a state-funded project. Not funded on the backs of students and their families."

The new plant was designed by R.G. Vanderweil Engineers out of Boston and is being built by O & G Industries. The energy facility will take up 45,000 square feet, with a 95,000-square-foot roof that will cover the building and storage tanks. It will be adjacent to the Amherst wastewater treatment plant on the western edge of campus.

"This project is one of the many projects we're doing on campus to make sure we will be able to maintain our competitive position with our peers, building great facilities that will sustain the quality that defines this campus," UMass Chancellor John V. Lombardi said. "It will replace a truly obsolete and historic facility."

"This plant speaks for our future," UMass Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Joyce M. Hatch said. "In the short term, we need it in order to keep all the projects on the way. We would be pushing the limits with the old plant."

According to Hatch, the plant will save about 200,000 gallons of public drinking water per day by recycling and treating municipal wastewater. She also said that the switch from coal will reduce greenhouse emissions by about 75 percent.

Some of the other projects currently going on at the Amherst campus include a new $92.5 million student apartment complex and new integrated science and art buildings as well as renovation to many of the current buildings.

"The project we initiate today is but one of many exciting projects moving forward across all five of our campuses," chairman of the UMass board of trustees James J. Karam said. "The board of trustees is committed to providing facilities that mirror the quality of our students, our faculty and our administrators."

Legendary journalist from New York Times dies at 84

By Richard Pyle
Associated Press

A.M. Rosenthal was remembered on Sunday.

NEW YORK — Former New York Times editor A.M. Rosenthal was remembered Sunday as a fierce defender of human rights and passionate journalist who strove to make sure his newspaper stayed free of bias in its reporting.

"He was the greatest newspaper editor of our age," Arthur Gelb, another longtime Times editor and close friend of Rosenthal, told hundreds of mourners at Rosenthal's funeral.

"Abe often said he wanted his epitaph to read, 'He kept the paper straight.' And that you did, my dear friend."

Rosenthal died Wednesday at age 84, a month after suffering a stroke. His career at The Times spanned 56 years, rising from campus stringer to executive editor and including 13 years as a columnist after his mandatory retirement in 1986.

The hundreds who gathered at a midtown Manhattan synagogue included Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel, Mayor Michael Bloomberg, former mayors Edward Koch and Rudolph Giuliani and operatic star Beverly Sills.

Also attending were journalists Mike Wallace, Gay Talese and Carl Bernstein, one of two Washington Post reporters who broke the Watergate story in 1972 and kept the Post ahead of the Times on the story under Rosenthal's tenure.

Andrew Rosenthal, a Times reporter and one of Rosenthal's three sons, spoke for the family. The service, and private conversations, were full of personal recollections of an editor who was famous for his temper, his intellectual brilliance and his unabashed passion for reporting the news.

"Abe and I met in the city room of the Times — we and Arthur Gelb were this unbreakable trio," said Bernard Kalb, a former Times foreign correspondent. "It probably was the happiest time of our lives. As kids on the Times, so to speak, every assignment was a visa to a new world."

Some spoke of the peak moment of Rosenthal's tenure as executive editor — the Times' decision in 1971 to publish the Pentagon Papers, thousands of classified documents detailing the early years of U.S. involvement and policy decisions in Vietnam.

William Safire, a retired Times columnist, recalled that after the Nixon White House tried and failed to block their publication, Rosenthal said, "We annoy the hell out of people, and we have our faults, but there is a difference between resenting the press and trying to control it."

Safire, who had formerly worked as a Nixon speechwriter, also said that when a federal court sided with the Times on publishing the secret material, a big cheer went up in the newsroom. But Rosenthal was not without sympathy, saying to Safire, "This must be a very difficult moment for you."

While Rosenthal was better known for bluntness than subtlety, Sills recalled that after a Times reviewer wrote of her that he would have "preferred a different singer in the role," Rosenthal put a big poster of Sills on his office wall, then called the critic in to discuss an unrelated subject.

"He told me later, 'I never mentioned you or the poster,'" Sills said.

Wiesel and others noted that as a Times op-ed columnist from 1986 to 1999, Rosenthal passionately expressed his feelings about injustices and violations of human rights around the world. On a visit to the Soviet Union, he upbraided a KGB official, who told him, "Mr. Rosenthal, we are not in a court of law here."

Rosenthal, he said, replied, "Yes, you are. And free people are your judges."

Fox and Bush talk about immigration

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Mexican President Vicente Fox telephoned President Bush on Sunday to express his concern about the border between the two nations as members of Congress expressed concern that using National Guard troops to keep illegal immigrants from crossing the border would further burden an overextended military.

The criticism on the eve of Bush's planned Oval Office speech to the nation on immigration came from Democrats, but also an important Republican negotiator in the immigration debate — Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska. He said National Guard troops cannot secure the border over the long term and that he does not think it is wise even in the short term.

White House spokeswoman Marin Tamburri said Bush made clear to Fox in the morning telephone conversation that "the United States considered Mexico a friend and that what is being considered is not militarization of the border, but support of border capabilities on a temporary basis by the National Guard."

She said the two presidents discussed cooperative efforts underway along the border and that Bush reiterated to Fox "his commitment to comprehensive immigration reform." She said Fox "reached out" to Bush, but she did not know how long the call lasted or the time it occurred.

A news release from Fox's office said the Mexican president initiated the call and characterized Bush as "analyzing the administrative and logistical support of part of the National Guard, not the army, to help police on the border."

The Mexican release said that Bush and Fox agreed that a comprehensive immigration reform is needed in the United States.

"In the conversation, President Bush reiterated his conviction that the migration issue can only be resolved with an integral and comprehensive reform," said the release.

"We've got National Guard members on their second, third and fourth tours in Iraq," Hagel said. "We have stretched our military as thin as we have ever seen it in modern times. And what in the world are we talking about here, sending a National Guard that we may not have any capacity to send up to or down to protect borders? That's not their role."

The president's national security adviser said sending troops to patrol the border with Mexico is among the ideas Bush is considering on immigration.

Bush planned to say in his national address at 8 p.m. EDT Monday how the government should deal with border security and illegal immigrants already in the United States, Stephen Hadley said.

"This is not about militarizing the border," Hadley said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "The president is looking to do everything he can to secure the border. It's what the American people want."

Bush is considering the National Guard plan as he seeks support from conservatives in Congress for his immigration bill. Bush wants to allow foreigners to get temporary work permits to enter and work in the U.S., but many conservatives want a tougher approach on illegal immigrants trying to sneak into the country.

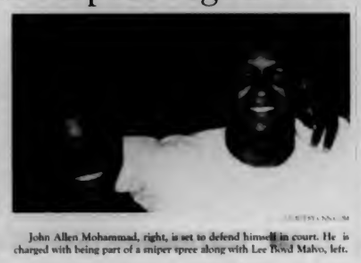
Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he supported using the National Guard on the Mexican border. He said lawmakers who doubt that the National Guard, whose members have served for years in Iraq and went to the Gulf Coast after last summer's hurricanes, could take on border patrol duty are "whining" and "moaning."



"We've got to secure our borders," Frist said on CNN's "Late Edition." "We hear it from the American people. We've got millions of people coming across that border. First and foremost, secure the border, whatever it takes. Everything else we've done has failed. We've got to face that. And so we need to bring in, I believe, the National Guard."

Hagel said the bill under debate in the Senate that he helped write would double the 12,000-strong Border Patrol force over the next five years. "That's the way to fix it, not further stretching the National Guard," he said on ABC's "This Week."

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., said there may be a need for troops to fill in while the Border Patrol is bolstered. But he did not seem confident that the National Guard could take on the extra duty.

D.C. sniper suspect begins trial

By Stephen Manning
Associated Press

John Allen Mohammad, right, is set to defend himself in court. He is charged with being part of a sniper spree along with Lee Boyd Malvo, left.

ROCKVILLE, Md. — John Allen Muhammad hid his defense strategy from his former attorneys, holding it so close that he fired them rather than reveal how he planned to prove his self-professed innocence in six Washington-area sniper killings.

Two weeks into his second trial in the October 2002 killings, the prosecution is still calling witnesses and Muhammad has yet to begin his defense. But some of his plan has trickled out through his statements in court and cross-examination of witnesses.

Muhammad, representing himself, is trying to poke holes of doubt for jurors in the established narrative that he and accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo roamed the region for three weeks, killing 10 people and wounding three.

Because no one saw him, he implies, there is no hard evidence he was the sniper.

"Does our law condemn a person first, before we have heard and known what he's been doing?" Muhammad asked during his opening statement, quoting Nicodemus from the Bible. "The word 'knowing' implies having direct knowledge of the subject at hand, direct seeing of what was going on."

Muhammad, 45, is charged with six deaths in Montgomery County. He is already on death row in Virginia for another sniper killing. This second trial, which carries a maximum penalty of life in prison, is billed as insurance in case his Virginia conviction is ever thrown out.

In Virginia, prosecutors argued that Muhammad and Malvo formed a sniper team and were thus equally culpable for the killing — even if Malvo actually fired the gun. The Virginia Supreme Court ruled 4-3 that even if Malvo pulled the trigger, Muhammad was eligible for the death penalty as an "immediate perpetrator" of the slaying.

In the Maryland courtroom over the past two weeks, Muhammad has asked many witnesses whether they saw the shooter or have "direct knowledge" about the culprit. All said no. To counter reports of he and his Chevrolet Caprice near shooting sites, he questions whether witnesses' memories were swayed by media coverage after his arrest.

He also challenges medical examiners, trying to get them to concede that a handgun, not the high-powered Bushmaster rifle police found in the Caprice, could be the weapon. And Muhammad mentions white vans, playing on authorities' initial belief that the killers were in a van or box truck.

Yet Muhammad faces some seemingly insurmountable legal challenges. Prosecutors have forensic evidence that most of the .223-caliber bullets used came from the Bushmaster. Muhammad's DNA was found on the gun. Jurors are expected to see the car, which was rigged with a hole in the trunk where a shooter could fire undetected.

"You've got a guy in possession of the weapon, which is pretty damning evidence," said Paul Ebert, Prince William County commonwealth's attorney, who prosecuted Muhammad in Virginia. "The fact nobody saw him do it, that's pretty typical of murders."

Muhammad also wants Malvo, whom he still calls his "son," to testify in his defense. But Malvo is expected to plead guilty to the same six killings and testify against him.

Judge James Ryan allowed Muhammad in March to remove his two court-appointed attorneys. According to two psychiatrist reports filed by those public defenders, Muhammad refused to share any information about his plans with them, saying they were secret. Both psychiatrists diagnosed mental illness.

He also defended himself in his first trial in Virginia. He gave an opening statement and questioned a few witnesses, but he gave the case back to his attorneys because he had a toothache. In Maryland, he has three standby attorneys who provide legal advice and sit with him at the defense table, but who are not allowed to address the court.

Muhammad wears stylish suits borrowed from one of the attorneys, totes legal texts and documents to court and listens attentively to testimony. He is polite and appears unfazed by the testimony of victims' relatives and survivors.

He pushes police officers on the stand, trying to expose discrepancies in reports they wrote that could undercut their credibility. Perhaps wisely, he hasn't questioned victims who survived sniper shootings. He objects to gory crime-scene testimony that could sway jurors.

But he also badgers some witnesses with repeated questions about police reports, statements and autopsies. His objections and motions are usually overruled.

Perhaps the biggest hurdle he faces is his notoriety — most of the jurors said during the jury selection they believed he was guilty, as do witnesses who come before him.

"He's fishing, and he doesn't have a clue," said Steven Bailey, a Prince William County police officer who testified about his brief conversation with Muhammad after the Oct. 9, 2002, killing of Dean Meyers in Manassas, Va.

Other witnesses say Muhammad confuses them. Muhammad asked Troy Mason, a police cadet who found a shell casing near the Oct. 7 shooting of a middle school student, whether he would recognize a rifle like the Bushmaster if he saw it on the ground. Mason said the question didn't make sense.

"I don't understand the shenanigans of his doing the things he is doing," Mason said after his testimony.

Heavy rains damage Bay State

By Brandie M. Jefferson
Associated Press

Brian Hosker of Lynn, who owns a building near Peabody Square, waded toward his truck Sunday. At 1 p.m., his basement had more than three feet of water in it.

BOSTON — Heavy rain forced evacuations in several communities in northeastern Massachusetts where swollen rivers spilled onto city streets, basements flooded and residents endured a dreary and soggy Mother's Day.

Gov. Mitt Romney declared a state of emergency Sunday, activating the National Guard and other state services to help local officials respond to the torrential rain that hasn't let up since Friday.

"We have, in fact, had a couple of communities that have experienced some high levels of flooding," Romney said from the bunker at the Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency in Framingham.

In downtown Peabody, about 20 miles north of Boston, cars were pulled from flooded streets and about 300 people were evacuated from a senior citizens' apartment complex. Businesses stacked sandbags at their doors, trying to prevent damage from water that at one point rose to waist-deep. Court officials planned to close Peabody District Court on Monday in an effort to keep people away from the city's square.

"I'm flooded," Peabody resident Doug Jellison told WBZ-TV. "I've got three or four feet in my backyard."

In Melrose, about 150 residents had to leave their homes after sewage lines were overwhelmed, backing up into houses, Romney said.

Officials in the fishing community of Gloucester on the North Shore also evacuated about 70 residents from Poplar Park senior home, which is downstream Babson Reservoir spillway. The structure is not in danger of collapsing, said Mayor John Bell.

The National Weather Service forecasted record flooding conditions for rivers throughout the state, including the Spicket River in Methuen, which is expected to rise 2 feet above the flood level by Tuesday afternoon. The Merrimack River was expected to crest nearly 10 feet over flood stage by Monday afternoon.

Forecasters predicted the rain to continue through Tuesday and dump at least 5 more inches across eastern Massachusetts.

"This is the tip of the iceberg," MEMA spokesman Peter Judge said. "It's going to get worse."

By Sunday morning, Boston had picked up 6.34 inches of rain in 30 hours. Farther north, Andover collected 9.8 inches over the same period, according to the National Weather Service.

Sunday's game between the Boston Red Sox and Texas Rangers was postponed by rain, the second straight washout in the series.

New Hampshire and Maine also were seeing torrential rain.

New Hampshire Gov. John Lynch declared a state of emergency and activated the National Guard.

"It's a very serious situation," Lynch said, adding that forecasters were predicting 12 to 15 inches of rain by the end of the storm in parts of southern New Hampshire. "It continues to change and the situation continues to worsen."

About 100 residents were evacuated from their homes in Wakefield, N.H., because of concerns about two dams in the area, the state Office of Emergency Management said. At least a dozen dams were being closely watched.

Kennedy's plane hit by lightning

BOSTON (AP) — A plane carrying Sen. Edward M. Kennedy from western Massachusetts to his home on the coast was struck by lightning Saturday and had to be diverted to New Haven, Conn., his spokeswoman said.

The eight-seat Cessna Citation 550 plane lost all electrical power, including communications, and the pilot had to fly the plane manually, according to spokeswoman Melissa Wagoner. No one was hurt.

The Democrat had just delivered the commencement address at the Massachusetts College of Liberal Arts in North Adams and was on his way to his Cape Cod home when the plane was struck on sand 2:45 p.m., she said.

The jet landed safely at New Haven at 4:11 p.m., said Federal Aviation Administration spokeswoman Arlene Murray. A report was filed with the agency, which will look into the incident, she said.

Kennedy planned to stay in Connecticut overnight because he was scheduled to return to western Massachusetts on Sunday to deliver a commencement address at Springfield College, Wagoner said.

—Associated Press

Officials also reported a railroad culvert and embankment washed out in Milton, N.H., with train tracks suspended in the air. And the local emergency management office in Hooksett said the town essentially was closed because so many roads were flooded.

Dozens of roadways were flooded in southernmost Maine on Sunday and shelters were set up in Kennebunk and Ogunquit.

Local men accused of killing many endangered animals

SUNDERLAND (AP) — The owner of a private trout hatchery in Sunderland and one of his employees have been charged with killing herons, osprey and at least one bald eagle that came to feed at the fish pools.

Michael Zak Jr., 58, of Sunderland, owner of the Mohawk Trout Hatchery, and Timothy Lloyd, 29, of Easthampton, were charged with violations of the Migratory Bird Treaty Act, according to federal prosecutors.

A man who answered the phone on Saturday at a listing for Zak hung up without commenting. A number for Lloyd could not be located and he could not be reached for comment.

Investigators found more than 250 great blue heron carcasses, as well as carcasses of ospreys and a bald eagle on hatchery property during a probe that began in September, said Salvatore Amato, an agent for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service in Hadley.

Forensic testing on some of the carcasses indicated the birds, including the bald eagle, had been killed by gun shots, prosecutors said.

Special agents of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service staked out the hatchery periodically and observed Zak shoot at a heron with a scoped rifle and Lloyd shoot and kill an osprey, authorities said.

Zak and Lloyd were released on personal recognizance and scheduled back in federal court in Springfield on May 30.

Kennedy, Moonves speak at college graduation ceremonies

BOSTON (AP) — How did the president of CBS react to a pitch about a reality television show in which players get voted off an island?

Leslie Moonves told the graduating class at Boston University on Sunday that it was "the stupidest idea I've ever heard in my life."

Moonves said the young CBS executive, whom he didn't name, kept coming back. Moonves eventually gave in, bringing America "Survivor," which was based on a Swedish show.

"Being open helped greatly change the fortunes of me, my company and all of television," he said of the popular show, which debuted six years ago.

At the 133rd commencement ceremony, Moonves told the soon-to-be graduates that he was successful because he was open to surprise.

"Always keep your options and your heart open," he said.

The university issued 6,134 undergraduate, graduate and professional degrees.

U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy spoke to graduates at Springfield College, despite a dangerous brush with nature Saturday when his jet was struck by lightning as it flew across Massachusetts.

Kennedy spoke about his late brother, John F. Kennedy, who addressed the Springfield College commencement 50 years ago.

"He was speaking during a time of dramatic transformation that would redefine how Americans saw each other and themselves," he said.

"The seed of the idea that technology could evolve to meet the changing needs of society was planted firmly in the 1950s, but it's in fuller bloom than ever today," Kennedy said.

Springfield College awarded 704 bachelors degrees.

KATIE AZAEVA/COLLEGIAN

"Motown" Bennie Johnson performs for a group of UMass students with his usual kazoo and construction bucket on Friday night.

KATIE AZAEVA/COLLEGIAN

Motown Bennie sits on a PVTA bus at the end of a night of sidewalk performances. He donates much of his earnings to the homeless.

number of requests for Bennie's appearance at private parties.

It's an unusually warm day in late March, but the apartment is chilly, and Bennie wears a knit hat and a faded sweatshirt as he peeks his head around the kitchen corner.

"I'm making fried chicken for you!" he exclaims. "You ain't never had southern fried chicken until you've had mine."

The three of us crowd around the tiny table on bar stools. Rose puffs silently at another cigarette, staring sleepily at the wall. I hungrily bite into a chicken leg, wiping my greasy fingers on a paper towel, sipping on a glass orange soda. Johnson watches eagerly.

"What do ya think? Good? Do you want more? Are you still hungry?"

Bennie will cook food for anyone who wants it. When he's not performing, he spends his time buying groceries, preparing meals, and delivering them to needy families nearby.

Today, Bennie has cooked enough for two additional families. He dishes the chicken out into containers and plastic bags to deliver to other friends in the complex. Johnson spends over $100 a week on food, and much of it he gives away. It's only 11 a.m. and already there are six hungry people from North Amherst who are scheduled to drop by his apartment for a hot meal.

"I can't just cook food for two people," said Bennie, looking at Rose. "I can't turn nobody away. Even if it's my last box of cereal, I can't say no. I'm always thinking about somebody else."

Although Bennie is supported almost solely by the money he earns as a musician, he won't talk directly about how much he makes. A good night might bring $125. A bad night can bring nothing more than a five-dollar bill.

Unemployed since he suffered a back injury several years ago, Johnson collects disability from the state, but refuses to go on welfare.

"I never wanted to take social security because it takes away your dignity," he said. "I totally support myself. I think I'm creative enough with that bucket to make a living with it. I ain't embarrassed if it makes people happy. My gift is making people laugh."

While Rose's Social Security checks help pay some of the bills, money is always tight for Bennie. An unused television sits in the living room, serving as a reminder of the things he can't have.

"We've had to cut down to 10 hours of regular TV a month," he said, shaking his head. "Rose sleeps a lot more now."

Bennie hasn't slept in his own bed in almost three years. After giving up his bedroom to Rose, he has permanently moved onto the main living room couch. The second couch is often taken by someone who needs a place to sleep.

There is a knock on the apartment door. Two women dressed in sweatshirts and jeans come in, and each hug Bennie. They sit on the apartment couch side by side, while Rose takes a recliner to talk to them. One of the women is crying: her son's godfather has died, and she's seeking solace. The other is hungry, and in need of a place to rest her bad foot for an hour.

Bennie says although he has little himself, he still offers what he has to others, even if it's only a place to sit down.

"I do what I do because there was a time when I had nothing," he says.

LISTEN TO THE MUSIC

Born in 1947 in New Orleans and raised in Baton Rouge, Bennie was one of five brothers and a twin to his only sister. His father worked seven days a week as a digger in the local oil fields. When the acids from the mine tanks stung his father's eyes to the point of temporary blindness, Johnson would follow his father to work and hide in the woods. Behind the boss's back, Bennie would switch places with his father and dig while his father took a much-needed rest.

"My daddy worked so hard," said Bennie, wiping the tears streaming down his cheeks. "They worked him to death. I tried to work for him, but he was always so tired."

Although the family was poor, Bennie said his mother, Josephine Cooper, taught her children to appreciate the sounds of jazz and blues. All the children learned to play the piano, drum, and guitar. The jukebox was one of the family's most prized possessions. By age 11, Bennie was an advanced washboard player and singer.

On summer nights, Cooper would load the children into the family's old Desoto and take them to Alligator Buoy — a shack of a music bar in the middle of the Louisiana swamps, where alligators sat in the parking lots, and the greatest of the great musicians played.

It was here that Johnson first saw the performances of great legends, like Ray Charles, B.B. King, and Fats Domino.

"It stayed with me," he said. "And I came to love music more than anything else."

Despite his gift for music, Bennie was unable to concentrate much in school. "I couldn't stand the racial tension," he said.

Although he was one of the school's top athletes in track and baseball, Bennie dropped out his senior year after two white boys hit him over the head for accidentally drinking out of a white-only water fountain after practice.

"I was so thirsty, I forgot to read the sign," he said.

Determined to get out of the south, Bennie took a job as a movie theater usher. The job quickly ended after his boss caught him talking to a white girl. After being jumped by the manager and a coworker, Bennie said he was dragged to the back office, where the cops were already waiting. After several shift kicks in the ribs and a crack across the face, the police left him bleeding on the theater floor.

"They beat me up, but they didn't arrest me," said Bennie. "The manager needed me to work the rest of my shift."

Bennie's second job brought him to a steak house where he worked as a cook.

"All the white employees were allowed to eat the steak, but the black ones weren't," he said. After one particularly grueling night, Bennie broke down and ate two steaks during an evening shift. In response, the manager refused to pay Bennie for a month.

"After that, I couldn't wait any longer," said Bennie. "I had to leave Louisiana."

Bennie said he waited until the restaurant closed, broke open the cash register, and emptied the $250 into his pocket. He fled that night by bus to New York.

He later met his wife of 37 years, Margarita Johnson, and raised a family in the Florence Heights apartment complex in Northampton. Bennie's three children, Petey Johnson, 32; Joseph Johnson, 28; and daughter Margarita Johnson, 30, all live locally.

FAMILY VALUES

Despite his busy schedule, Bennie says his top priority is visiting his wife, Margarita Johnson, 57, resides in the Calvin Coolidge Nursing Home & Rehabilitation Center in Northampton.

After battling multiple sclerosis for 22 years, Johnson was admitted to the nursing home three years ago when her health care became impossible to continue at home.

Bennie says he spends his visits bathing his wife and cooking for her.

"For everything I do, I make her pay me in kisses," says Johnson. "She laughs a lot, just like I do. She tells me everyone in the nursing home is jealous."

There is another knock at the apartment door, and a tall bearded man jogs in, holding his jaw. Bennie greets the man with a smile and a hug. But the tall man is not smiling back.

"Bennie, look at my tooth," he said, pointing to a large swelling on his lower jaw. A bad tooth is causing a serious infection.

"It's freaking me out. I dunno what to do."

"We got to cut this short," Johnson says to me, eyeing the infected area. "We got to get him to a dentist."

As he turns to run out the door, Bennie tucks his blue cape and white bucket under his arm. He'll play his bucket and sing on the way to the dentist, hoping to soothe his friend's nerves.

"See. There's always people who are gonna need music and a smile," he shouts back to me.

Lawrence to speak at graduation

First, applicants submitted prepared speeches; then, the authors of the best speeches were invited to read to the committee. Based on these two criteria, a winner was selected.

Lawrence said he's very honored to have been chosen to represent his graduating class. He hopes to talk about UMass in a way that everyone can relate to at least part of his speech. "I want all the graduating seniors to think, 'Oh yeah, I did that' or 'I remember that,'" he said.

However, Lawrence cautioned that "In a graduating class of this size and with so many different people, one person cannot speak for everyone."

"I am just going to try and send them off well," he said.

At UMass, Lawrence has written a weekly column for the Massachusetts Daily Collegian since the spring of 2005. He worked with the Dinsmore Research Group laboratory, under Anthony D. Dinsmore, an assistant professor of physics, on the self-assembly of micro-containers. He also works with the Alumni Fund to raise money for the University.

Lawrence spoke very highly of his times at UMass. He has not been bothered by the rising fees or the negative "Zoomass" publicity. "No one likes paying more money, but I don't want my classes getting bigger," he said.

Lawrence understands that the school and its administration are in a hard place. "The administration has our best interests in mind, the school should just be getting more funding for the state," he said.

As far as the Zoomass concerns go, Lawrence said, "I don't mind the whole Zoomass thing, as long as it's accompanied by going to classes."

He thinks that the Zoomass mentality is blown out of proportion by the public and the media. "While some people do get too crazy, the vast majority of UMass students are very responsible," he said. After all, "College is about sowing wild oats."

Lawrence has not been constrained by his physics major, and instead has been very well rounded in his studies. In the summer of 2004, Lawrence was a judicial intern in the office of Rhode Island District Judge William Clifton, where he observed the operations of district, family and superior state courts. The next summer, Lawrence traveled to Germany to the Universität Stuttgart to study 20th century architecture and German language.

He has also studied music most of his life. In 1990, Lawrence began playing classical piano, which he continued until 2002. From 1998 to 2002, he also played the trumpet. For two of those years, he played in a ska band. Currently he is the lead singer of the Tent City Band, a rock cover band.

Lawrence will be the second UMass commencement speaker from Bartlibville High School in Maplesville, R.I. in the last three years — a surprising coincidence, given the small size and out-of-state nature of the high school.

After College, Lawrence will attend New York University Law School, where he will be reunited with his twin brother who has studied at Brown University the past four years.

War debate fosters discussion

Hirak Shah, a senior finance major, spoke first in favor of the war. He refuted the opposing team by explaining the importance of Saddam Hussein's capture.

"Without question, the threat of Saddam Hussein is real," said Shah. "It was absolutely the right move — the right policy for national security, especially after 9/11 because of Saddam Hussein's ties to the al Qaeda and WMDs. He used WMDs on his own people, financing and paying suicide bombers to attack our country," he continued. "This war is not for oil, but for the safety of ourselves as well as the entire world."

Shah's teammate, Middle Eastern studies and journalism undergrad Joe Kelley, added, "The U.S. military is the only force capable of bringing stability into a country like Iraq."

Burke responded to Shah and Kelley by saying, "Did Iraq really have WMDs at the time we invaded them? The fear was there, but it's never been proven. Even President Bush has never confirmed that the Iraqis had actual ties to the al Qaeda."

Jackson then added, "I don't see how the U.S. has been a positive force in Iraq. Before we started bombing the country, Iraq had a very advanced infrastructure in the Middle East. Now, people can't get water, food, gasoline. For a country that has a considerable amount of the world's resources, how is it right for the people to only receive four hours of electricity a day?"

"Eighty-two percent of Iraq's population opposes the war invasion," stated Burke. "It's hard to argue that the war is for humanitarian reasons when one-fifth of the children are now undernourished — a level that's fallen below pre-invasion levels."

Kelley responded, "Stabilizing the country is going to be hard and will take time. We're the only ones able to restore it. Yes, it's caused a civil war in the country, but it could be worse. If the Iraqis wanted us to leave, they would've asked us already, just as they did to Osama bin Laden's family. But they haven't." He continued, "Democracy wouldn't be possible without taking away Saddam Hussein, but now, it is."

Shah also stated that the media has a role for the nation's low ratings on the war.

"The media is not covering both sides of the story. They focus on car bombings and explosions to draw in viewers," he said. "Public opinion would change if the media showed the progress we've made in Iraq. "The administration should also control what's shown in the media," he added. "Ultimately, it's not in the media's best interest to show the good side of the war because most members of the media tend to be liberals."

Burke and Jackson concluded the discussion by explaining the importance of taking action against the war.

"We see our tax dollars going abroad, but shouldn't it be spent here?" Burke said. "The best way to spread democracy is not through invasion, or restricting rights of civilian lives. The bloodshed of the soldiers and their families should be enough to take action."

When the discussion was opened to members of the audience, Nathan Murphy, a former member of the U.S. Marine Corps Reserve, said, "Although there are reasons for the invasion, is it really justified? Imagine having to take a person's life for something they personally didn't do. And when you don't kill them, you feel guilty for not doing so. Imagine seeing fellow soldiers being blown apart by Iraqi soldiers."

Another audience member addressed Burke and Jackson, asking, "Has modern warfare become obsolete?"

Jackson responded, "These are prices a population has to pay for modern warfare. We have to think about how politics and society interact with each other. There should be a better way to solve problems other than grouped violence. The U.S. has the biggest responsibility to move beyond modern warfare. With the power we have, we can make a difference."

Newbies need role models

Debbie Friedman

The other night I attended an event that, while not exactly historical, was definitely finite. Van Meter Domn in Central had its last Koffee Haus ever, a weekly event that provided music, a homey atmosphere and tasty teas to anybody who wanted to come by and chill. I'm not exactly sure how long Koffee Haus has been around, but this final event seemed to bring out people from all stratums of the community, freshmen and former residents alike. It was an incredibly positive atmosphere, and as I sat there in my $2 Koffee Haus commemorative T-shirt, watching these smiling kids dancing, it made me wonder why they should have to give this up.

As you probably all know by now, Van Meter dorm is becoming an all-freshman dorm next year, the latest victim in the scourge of Epoch. There isn't much we can do about it now, sadly. I'm sure many of you are thinking by now, "So, why should we care? Move off campus and get over it."

This may just be pointless rhapsodizing, but I feel that Epoch is truly and sincerely killing an important part of our campus. Van Meter deserves its soliloquy. This isn't just an issue of buildings in Central; this is going to affect campus life as a whole.

Nearly half of Southwest is all-freshman dorms already, and there are rumors afoot that Epoch will be gobbling down more buildings once it becomes a freshman year requirement. As dorm dwellers, many of our ways of life are going to change.

I sometimes wonder why Van Meter got selected for this program. Of all the dorms I've visited on campus, I've never seen one with so much commonality. It has a very specific and unique culture. For so many people, it's more than just a dorm; it's a home and a family. It's a community, and it's a community that's been singled out by the University as destructive.

Yet, I'm guessing when these new, fresh-faced students arrive next fall, the bar will be raised for standards of destruction. I myself lived in Butterfield, an all-freshman dorm, when I arrived at this University. I can tell you right now about the experience, based on my rather mixed feelings, that putting that many freshmen together is a terrible idea.

Perhaps Housing Services assumed that a dorm of minors would not be able to gain possession of alcohol. This assumption is ridiculous. Underage students will always be able to find a way to get alcohol, and students living in these Epoch dorms are going to lack upperclassmen as role models. Resident Life might insert some learning community assistants on each floor to help ease kids into school, but these LCAs are about as effective as a soggy Kleenex. They have lives and friends outside of the dorm and usually want to spend as little time getting to know their residents as possible. Thus we get a whole flock of inexperienced drinkers living together, with no one to guide them toward the path of not being "that guy."

Resident Life might insert some learning community assistants on each floor to help ease kids into school, but these LCAs are about as effective as a soggy Kleenex.

The upperclassmen role model is an underappreciated member of dorm society. When a freshman sees older kids going off-campus to party on the weekends, chances are they'll want to too. When it's harder to meet older people, it's harder to find a party. Living in Butterfield, venturing off campus was usually limited to the extremely rare frat party.

Now, with Frat Row allegedly being disassembled, that option's out the door for the new kids too. All-freshman dorms are an invitation for students to be drinking in their rooms, recklessly and irresponsibly. I can't imagine the property damage that will be incurred by that high concentration of newcomers in the largest dorm on campus. If you think the maintainers have it bad now, wait until they have to ford the river of vomit that will flow from the bathrooms, down the stairwell and out the door.

I'm not saying that all-freshman dorms are a totally bad idea. You make fast friendships and all that, but the sense of isolation you get from the greater University community can be downright depressing. My advice to anybody planning to live in an Epoch building is, join a club. The friends you quickly grow to love in your building can quickly turn into the drama queens that you just want to strangle.

Soon we'll all have to say goodbye to the Van Meter we know and love. Central is dethroning its final king of the hill, and it's hard to know that what was once a friendly little sub-culture will be obliterated by newbies, who will have no idea of the social world they broke apart. Though I'm not much one to talk, I inhabited Butterfield, the bastardized shell of a legend.

Next year will be different, and hardly anyone who reads this will have a reason to climb that last little hump of Clark Hill Rd. anymore, but hopefully, the memories of Van Meter will be good to you all as you wear your $2 Koffee Haus shirts. So peace everybody; see you next year on the hill, and remember that, "Nothing was sweeter than the Meter."

Playground politics

Debbie Friedman

When you were a kid, do you remember how fighting on the playground was like a competitive sport? After hours spent cooped up indoors, it was inevitable that once emptied out for recess some kind of quarrel would arise. When that confrontational time came upon you, there were several key strategies to utilize in order to defeat your opponent.

There was the trusty silent treatment that never failed to bring an enemy to the floor in agonizing mental anguish. There was also the "repeat everything the other person says" strategy, which was also quite annoying. Lastly, there were the token insults that never made any sense, but somehow still worked, such as, "I know you are, but what am I?"

Of course, if for some reason all of those strategies failed, you could break out the secret weapon of sticking out your tongue and walking away to ensure victory. Those techniques were just basic playground politics that everyone learned at a certain age.

While most people leave those politics back in elementary school, some simply can't let go. In fact, many have learned to use these juvenile tactics to their advantage with stunning precision. Prominent members of the Bush administration are key examples of this trend. The Bush team appears to be highly trained in using playground politics to keep their heads and approval ratings above water.

When faced with unscreened audiences who ask actual questions, top officials simply resort to "I know you are but what am I" type responses. For example, about a week ago at a press conference held by Donald Rumsfeld, former CIA analyst Ray McGovern stood up and asked Rumsfeld why he had said things a few years prior that demonstrated a clear connection between Al-Qaeda and Iraq when it simply wasn't true.

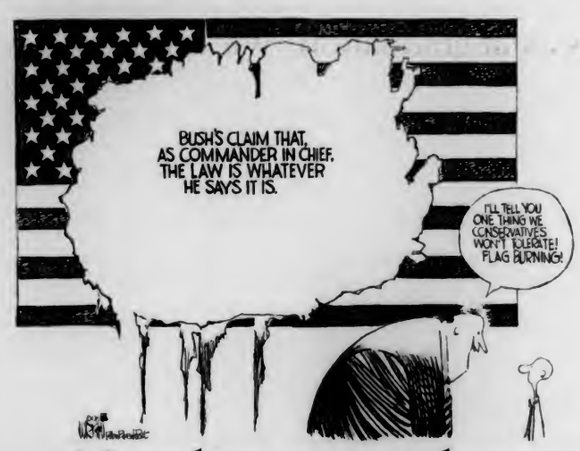
To this, Rumsfeld vehemently denied that he had ever said anything like that, despite the fact that there are video clips of him saying exactly those words. Their greatest defense to any charge is essentially "we're rubber, you're glue, whatever you say bounces off of us and sticks to you."

The sad thing is, it works. The questions thrown at them appear to literally bounce right off, sending back an absurd, shallow and blatantly false response that no one can really argue with. It's just as irritating a tactic as back in the day, except more so because these people are adults and are supposed to be of the highest moral fiber.

For the most part, they screen major audiences so that when a Bush cabinet member speaks, they are assured that everyone there is a signed and pledged Bush supporter. This means the most thorough comment made is likely to be "Mr. President, I don't have a question, I just wanted to say thank you."

The Bush administration has the silent treatment tactic down to an art as well. For the most part, they screen major audiences so that when a Bush cabinet member speaks, they are assured that everyone there is a signed and pledged Bush supporter. This means the most thorough comment made is likely to be "Mr. President, I don't have a question, I just wanted to say thank you."

It also means that all the people who do have substantial issues to talk about with the administration get left in the dust or even arrested when they try, like Cindy Sheehan. To those whom they don't have an obligation to speak to, like the American people, all they have to do is say "talk to the hand, 'cause the face ain't listening," and they can evade all responsibility.



The repetition game works like a charm for the Bush gang, too. On the playground, if you could repeat things long enough, your opponent would eventually get bored, frustrated and completely lose interest in getting what they were looking for. It works just the same in Washington. Bush and friends synchronize and repeat their inane talking points so well that the public often loses interest, or worse, starts to believe them.

Once in a blue moon you will see Bush or a cabinet member get verbally accosted to such a great degree that the three playground political strategies will fail. When this happens, they pull out the slightly altered secret weapon — the grown up tongue flick, also known as "the smirk." To me, the smirk is the worst of all. It is condescending, mocking and infuriating.

George W. has this smirk especially perfected (perhaps because he is not cunning enough to pull off the other three tactics effectively). In many press conferences or confrontations with protestors, the administration can always be saved by the smirk. This smirk is the same one childhood bullies on the playground had when they stole your lunch money or cut you in line.

The Bush team has the same bully mentality as well. They are unfazed by thoughts of punishment or potential consequences. They are ruthless, and they are largely unchallenged. However, there is one major difference between the two and that is, unfortunately for us, there is no one to put the Bush bullies in time out.

Vocalize your plan

Debra Capellari

OK, time check, 2:33 a.m. Sounds about right to me. Nope, can't sleep. Trust me, I've tried. That infomercial about rotisseries? Yep, I could quote that word for word. Not something I'm proud of, but there it is for all of you to read. Rachael Ray and I have started a relationship, something she has yet to be informed of, but I'm sure she'll hear about it eventually, when I get around to writing that postcard I've been meaning to send her about how much I love her late night reruns.

Let's get serious for a minute. For those of you who know me, please don't panic. It's only a minute, and then I promise I'll go back to my usual carefree, sarcastic, pain-in-the-ass ways. For those of you who don't know me, I don't get serious often, so when I do, it might be beneficial to pay attention. Notice I said might be — I don't make any promises.

OK, so you pick your poison. If it's South African dance, you can probably do it here. It is, after all, UMass. If it's something more mainstream like business management, that's fine too.

I'll be the first to admit it: I don't have a plan, ever. Usually, I just do the thing that seems the most appealing at the time. I figure it works and it's easy. If that makes me lazy, well, then, so be it. But here we are, all of us, trying to navigate the challenge that is going to college, and I won't lie, it's beneficial to have a plan. I promise, I'm not backing out of my plan-less ways; I'm just trying to see the situation from all angles.

Here's the thing. It's a lot harder when you don't have a plan. Here we are, floundering, grasping at straws if you will, directionless and afraid to admit it. It's perfectly acceptable to be directionless for a while, but at some point in time the plan aspect of college life should kick into your awareness, and say something like, "Hey, here I am, your plan. If you listen close enough and pay attention, I'll unfold before your eyes." Scoff all you want, plan-less readers, but this plan thing might just be legit.

So now you're thinking, "Great. I've been at this floundering directionless thing for so long, how am I supposed to figure out a plan?" First of all, try to relax yourself. I'm not asking you to map out the rest of your life. That would be nearly impossible. All you have to do is ask yourself what will make you want to be here the most. I say do what you want the most because what you want to do will keep you occupied and satisfied.

OK, so pick your poison. If it's South African dance, you can probably do it here — it is, after all, UMass. If it's something more mainstream like business management, that's fine too. If you want to graduate a semester early, buy a dog and a yellow Jeep Wrangler and drive cross country, well that's just fine too. I'll admit it. The yellow Jeep thing? That's my ultimate plan — recently discovered, I'll have you know, but a plan nonetheless.

So you've got your plan. Maybe you're worried it's a little foolish. Maybe you're worried it might not happen. Well, this is my advice to you: say exactly what you want out loud. Say it to yourself, say it to your friends, go to the top of the library and shout it out the window for all I care, but vocalize it. Once you vocalize what you really want, the fear in you begins to subside, and determination and drive take its place. What do you need to do to pass that accounting class that is so important to your major? Go out and get it done. Why not start a fund for your dreamy Wrangler with its big tires and killer sound system? Get your plan out into the universe and start making it materialize; if it's important to you, and it's what you really want, then dive right in and make it.

Still not convinced? Hey, that's fine. I'm not here to change everyone's mind, but maybe just to get you thinking about what the future could hold. As for me? Well, I'm here for now, but just you wait. I'll be sending picture postcards from the Pacific Ocean, standing in front of a yellow Jeep Wrangler with a dog at my feet.

Tainted blood rights

Adam DeSimone

At the heart of the American legal system is the United States Constitution. All laws made within its bounds must be in line with its principles. When read aloud, it sounds just shy of being poetic. It is certainly one of the most beautifully crafted and time-tested documents ever to grace human history. As such, Americans like to think of it as an ironclad, unbreakable set of principles, so fundamental to our existence that its rules can never be compromised.

This is the idealism that should guild our civilization since it gives us purpose and hope. Having appreciated the document's virtues, it is necessary to examine real world complications that jeopardize its validity and call into question our identity as Americans.

I would like to examine a current day violation of the Constitution that has been ill reported by the mainstream press. As a case study, the Food and Drug Administration's regulations on donating blood, or, more specifically, the restrictions that are imposed on gay males, serve as a surprising example of the federal government breaking its own charter and imposing a discriminatory policy on its citizens. The law that the FDA put into place states that "males who have had sexual contact with another male, even once, since 1977" are prohibited from donating.

However, before we dismiss the FDA as being homophobic and breaking the Constitution, a brief history lesson is necessary. When the restriction was put into place in 1985 there was no screening process to test if a unit of blood was contaminated with AIDS. As a result, 10,000 people contracted the virus from transfusions. With 4.5 million people requiring transfusions per year, the FDA made a decision to forbid gay males from donating, since they were considered the main at-risk demographic.

In fact, just four years earlier, AIDS had been named GRID, or Gay Related Infectious Disease, by the medical community. Only after homophiliacs began contracting the virus from transfusions was the name changed. With this new policy in effect, reports of AIDS fell by 90 percent.

However, there was no sunset provision attached to the policy. The architects of the law did not consider that blood-screening technology may eventually be developed to determine the health of the blood. Today, every unit of blood collected is tested for HIV regardless of your sexual orientation. Accordingly, with modern technology, the chances of getting the virus from a transfusion are less than one in two million. Furthermore, only three known cases of AIDS have been reported from transfusions since the late 1990s. Thus, we can see that the FDA's regulations are no longer necessary.

When we consider that a heterosexual male can have unprotected anal sex with prostitutes for years and still donate blood after one year's deferral, the double standard for gay males becomes more obvious.

Given the rules' obsolescence, we are left with an inherently discriminatory policy supported by the federal government. When we consider that a heterosexual male can have unprotected anal sex with prostitutes for years and still donate blood after one year's deferral, the double standard for gay males becomes more obvious. With this in mind, how can we seriously exclude gay men from donating under the guise of medical reasons?

Since the equal protection clause of the Constitution states, "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," we must then wonder how this policy still exists.

The answer is that the FDA managed to avoid the legal sensitivity of their actions by only referring to their laws as "guidelines." Additionally, they never specifically forbid gay males from donating. However, they do restrict "males who have had sexual contact with another male." The difference is that a man could have sex with another man once and still identify as being heterosexual. This means that the restriction is technically on the sexual act, not necessarily the person's sexuality.

With this data being considered, the American Association of Blood Banks (AABB) and the America's Blood Centers (ABC) voted to have the lifetime ban lifted, and instead have a 12-month deferral put into place for males who have had unprotected sex with another male. Thus, equal treatment would be provided for both homosexuals and heterosexuals.

However, the FDA and the American Red Cross trumped the other organizations' efforts and maintained the ban. They did this despite the AABB and ABC's request and in the face of several European countries that have lifted similar bans in their nations. Also, since only five percent of America's eligible population donates on a regular basis, and since our blood reserves are usually only two days away from being completely depleted, it is very surprising that the FDA and the Red Cross insist on excluding potential donors.

Since there is no scientific merit to maintain the current ban, the FDA is mistakenly upholding this policy. It was born to protect the nation's blood supply. With that goal accomplished, the law needs to die and show it is not an act of homophobia. Failing to do so is not only unfair to the people who can't donate — it cheapens the Constitution and the principles that we understand it to represent.

The art of health: sleeping smart

By Steve Steinberg
The Dallas Morning News

Ask Meg Daniel how tough it is to get a good night's sleep. But you'd better move pretty fast if you want to catch up with her.

Daniel, 29, is a single mother of two daughters: Jenna, 4, and Mia, 6. On Mondays, she gets up at 5:30 a.m., feeds the girls and gets them ready, drops Mia at school and Jenna at child care and heads to work at a brokerage.

The time after work is another blur: Pick up the girls, Mia's soccer practice, a drive-through dinner, Bible study at church (where child care is furnished), home. After the girls hit the hay, Daniel makes lunches and preps for the next day. If she's lucky, she'll turn in at 11 or 11:30.

The rest of the week is about as hectic. Eight hours of nightly sleep? Dream on.

But why make it harder on yourself? Even if you have a challenging schedule or obligations, you can still do a lot to get better, deeper, more consistent sleep.

How? It's all about smart choices on food, exercise and sleep preparation. Here's what our experts recommend.

YOUR SLEEP PREP

The first rule of good sleep for those with challenging hours, such as shift workers: Keep a regular bed schedule.

"You need to consider your day sleep the same way someone else considers their night sleep," said Kristyna M. Hartse, clinical director of the Baylor University Medical Center at Dallas Sleep Center.

Naps can be lifesavers, but if you overdo them, it may be tough to nod off during normal sleeping hours. And you don't want to nap for more than an hour or so at a stretch.

"The problem is, when you start getting into two- or three-hour naps, you start resetting your circadian cycle," Hartse said. (That's your body's internal clock.)

Your best bet: Start with 30-minute naps and see how those work for you.

As for shift workers, she said, they tend to be bombarded by things that night sleepers aren't: phone calls, lights, the doorbell, etc. So if you work nights, silence the phone during the day if that's practical. Keep the bedroom dark with heavy drapes or wear eyeshades.

YOUR EATING PLAN

"If you're kind of wired up and anxious and you need to get to bed and you're hungry, carbohydrates can have a relaxing effect, especially sweets," said Lona Sandon, assistant professor of clinical nutrition at the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center at Dallas.

Whoa! Put that candy bar back. If you're not sleeping well, you're already raising your chances to gain weight. By being awake longer, you have more opportunity to eat. And lack of sleep affects hormone production in ways associated with weight gain, says Sandon, who is also a spokeswoman for the American Dietetic Association.

"Have a small piece of fruit or a yogurt with some fruit," she suggests. And "it's just kind of soothing to have a warm beverage," she added. Try herbal tea, such as chamomile. Or warm milk, which has carbs, protein, calcium and tryptophan (touted for its relaxing qualities). But go easy on caffeinated drinks during waking hours, she says.

The best time to eat is about two or three hours before bedtime, she says. And it's fine to flip-flop meals: Have breakfast before bedtime and dinner when you wake up, if you like. In fact, that's smart strategy for any number of reasons.

"The meal you have before rest should be your lightest meal of the day," Sandon said.

YOUR EXERCISE PLAN

It can be a real challenge to work regular exercise into a helter-skelter schedule. But it's well worth the effort, says Carla Sottovia, assistant fitness director and senior personal trainer at the Cooper Clinic.

To maintain a complete cycle of health, people should make healthy sleeping patterns a priority.

"When you exercise, you crank up hormones that make you more alert and aroused," she said. "But at the same time, you might release some stress." Exercise also releases endorphins, the body's feel-good juice.

Don't worry about being too cranked up to sleep after a high-powered workout. "Just give yourself at least two or three hours before bedtime," Sottovia said.

"At least do the minimum — three times a week, doing some kind of cardio for at least 20 or 30 minutes. If you need to, break it up into two 15-minute sessions during the day," she said.

"Ideally, if you can have that routine throughout the week, your body will be tired enough to sleep." The more you exercise at the same time of day, the better, she said.

Is it better to do it early in your day or late? "Everybody has his or her own circadian cycle — you're a morning person," Sottovia says. "Or you're an evening person." Whatever works for you is fine.

SLEEPING AIDS

Some herbal supplements, such as valerian root, tryptophan and melatonin, are touted for beneficial effects on sleep.

"There are some published studies," said Hartse. "In some people, they may be helpful." But the sedative effects are mild, she notes.

It's also worth noting that such supplements are not regulated by the Food and Drug Administration.

Prescription sleeping medications, such as Ambien and Lunesta, are also available, but Dr. Hartse is wary of those.

"There's probably nothing wrong with using sleeping medications, but, ideally, people would be able to sleep on their own," she said. "It should be a natural function. It's like people saying, 'I'm going to take a pill to be thirsty or hungry.'"

The dangers of sun-kissed skin

By Paul Wenske
Knight Ridder Newspapers

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Amanda Chaney couldn't resist a sunny midday jog through the neighborhood with her 5-month-old daughter, Piper.

But with the sun beating down, the 32-year-old lightly tanned family physician took care to avoid overexposing herself or her baby to damaging ultraviolet rays. Sunscreen. A hall cap. And a covered stroller for Piper.

"Being a physician, I'm more aware of what the sun can do to your skin," Chaney said.

As Americans shed their winter doldrums and embrace the sun, or flock to tanning salons to get a jump on that sun-kissed look, experts are warning of a significant increase in skin cancers and potentially deadly melanomas.

The American Academy of Dermatology last month reported an epidemic-like rise in skin cancers afflicting more young people. Those warnings come on the heels of lawsuits alleging that sunscreen makers have misled consumers with exaggerated claims of skin protection. Criticism is also growing about marketing efforts aimed at persuading young people that they can get safer tans in salons.

Mayo Clinic researchers also reported last month that one in five Americans will develop skin cancer — and the risk doubles after five or more sunburns.

They also said women younger than 40 were experiencing tripling rates of basal cell cancers and quadrupling rates of squamous cell cancers, treatable diseases that historically have affected patients older than 50.

Melanoma, a potentially fatal skin cancer that can spread throughout the body, also is on the rise. Researchers saw 60,000 new melanoma cases last year — at a time when other types of cancer declined. Last year, more of the 8,000 melanoma deaths included people younger than 20.

Makers of sunscreens say their products provide adequate protection, and a national spokesman for tanning salons says the devices are safe if used in moderation.

But dermatologists and other medical experts say there still is a need for a coordinated national education campaign to address the growing problem of skin cancer, one that includes examining environmental threats that are reducing the ozone layer, which filters harmful rays.

"At this rate, it's going to get worse rather than better," said Debra Smith, who specializes in childhood cancers at the University of Kansas Medical Center. "Some people think cases are increasing because we are diagnosing it better. But it's increasing too much for it to just be better diagnosis."

Reasons for the increase in skin cancer are difficult to pinpoint, but experts say it has been building for several decades. Some point to pollutants, fossil fuels and aerosol sprays that are contributing to the erosion of the atmosphere's protective ozone layer.

Two types of ultraviolet light can cause skin cancers. Ultraviolet B rays are most associated with sunburns and the more common squamous and basal cell skin cancers. Ultraviolet A rays penetrate deeper and are associated with more serious tissue damage that can lead to melanoma, a malignancy that can spread to the lymph system.

The UVA rays "are the sneaky ones," Smith said. They penetrate skin without always showing symptoms — such as a sunburn — so you don't know they are hurting you.

That is partly the basis of class action lawsuits filed against sunscreen makers in California. The lawsuits say manufacturers lulled consumers into believing sunscreens would protect them equally from UVA and UVB rays when they did not.

Schering-Plough, maker of popular Coppertone products, disputed the allegations. In a statement, the company said that "labeling and advertising for all Schering-Plough products are developed in compliance with applicable laws and FDA regulations."

The statement also said the company is in "the forefront in introducing sunscreen products that provide broad spectrum UVA/UVB protection."

Nonetheless, Stephen P. Stone, president of the American Academy of Dermatologists, noted that "people shouldn't feel they can stay in the sun for extended periods of time just because they are wearing sunscreen."

Criticism also is mounting against tanning salons, which some view as a safer alternative to the sun. One study released last month, however, questioned salon ads placed in high school newspapers and aimed at teenage girls. The study suggested that tanning beds may be equated with the higher incidence of cancer among young people.

The study in the Archives of Dermatology notes that the government classifies ultraviolet radiation from the sun and the kind used in tanning salons as carcinogens, and that the World Health Organization recommends that people younger than 18 avoid UV tanning devices. But there are no restrictions on advertising aimed at youths.

John Overstreet, executive director of the Indoor Tanning Association, found fault with the study. He said he viewed the recent focus on skin cancer as part of a campaign "to scare us out of the sun."

Overstreet pointed to research showing that tanning salons and the sun are important sources of vitamin D, which has been found to be effective in protecting the body from certain types of cancers. And he maintained that tanning beds are no more dangerous than sunlight.

"The bottom line is that moderation is the key to all of this," Overstreet said. "In a tanning salon, you are unlikely to get burned."

Straight to the heart: aerobic advice

By Joanne Kempinger Demski
Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

If you want to be fit, three things are critical to your success: eat well, tone your muscles and do cardiovascular workouts.

"If you're missing any one of these three things, your body will not reach the full potential that it could," said fitness trainer Stephanie Granzow.

While all of these are important, cardiovascular workouts are vital because they also protect against health risks, such as heart attack, stroke, diabetes and high blood pressure, by conditioning the heart. And because you burn calories when exercising, you also can lose weight, which lowers disease risk.

But if you're like most people, getting in those cardiovascular workouts is downright difficult. Fortunately, most health facilities have many pieces of equipment to choose from.

Treadmills, elliptical trainers, step machines and stationary bikes are great, but exercisers should know how to use each correctly to avoid repetitive use injuries, said Matt Bartz, athletic director at Le Club in Milwaukee.

Even exercising correctly on aerobic conditioning machines can cause problems if you do too much, he added.

Bartz, a certified strength and conditioning specialist with the National Strength and Conditioning Association, said that companies "make machines as user-friendly as possible." But if a movement feels awkward or uncomfortable, users should seek help from staff at the gym.

He said the treadmill is "probably the most-used piece of cardiovascular equipment at any fitness center," but that it is also the piece exercisers are most apt to get injured on because it's constantly moving. He stresses that exercisers should not only know how to use treadmills correctly, they should also know how to use the safety features.

Another way to ensure safety is to use different types of machines. Using just one machine increases injury risk because the same muscle groups are used the same way each time, Bartz said.

"You may be OK for a while, but as you increase in intensity and duration, you will have a higher chance of getting hurt. Usually everyone can find at least two cardio workouts that they can do. You should try a few different motions. Cross-training is a friend, and it's a good way to keep you healthy," he said.

Bartz added that one of the best ways to use the machines, for advanced exercisers, is to try the interval training settings.

These workouts give "certain ratios of working harder, then easier. There are all sorts of intervals you can do. Interval training is a great way to safely and gradually increase your fitness level."

Granzow, who is certified by the International Sports and Science Association, said exercisers should do cardio workouts three to five times a week "for a very baseline minimum of 20 to 30 minutes."

For most people, exercising three times a week will help maintain their fitness level, but four or five workouts a week will improve it. While doing these workouts, it's important for people to monitor their heart rate and to work within a zone that is safe for their fitness level and age.

With beach season around the corner, spring is prime time for people to pump up the volume on their fitness routines.

ELLIPTICAL TRAINER

Primary muscle groups worked: quadriceps, hamstrings and glutes.

Put your foot on the lowest pedal first. Then hold on to the handrail and step onto the other pedal.

Position your body forward with the majority of your foot on the platform. Keep your feet straight; don't let them bow in or out, don't let them hang off the platforms excessively and don't press them up against the very front of the pedal, this may cause numbness in the feet. Don't let your knees bow out, they should be in a straight line with your feet.

Stand straight in a neutral spine position, keeping core muscles tight. Don't lean forward unless you're on equipment that gives you advanced options that instruct you to lean forward.

While moving, concentrate on pressing your heels down slightly on the downstroke. You can use a light grip for balance, if needed. Once you are more advanced, you can start pumping your arms.

On machines that give upper bodies a workout, use a grip with a slight bend in your elbows. Don't overextend your arms and shoulders.

Keep bouncing to a minimum. It's OK to go for speed, but don't throw your body around. Excessive bouncing often means the individual is using too little resistance.

STATIONARY BIKE

Primary muscle groups worked: quadriceps, hamstrings and glutes.

Adjust the seat so it is roughly at your hip level when standing next to it. Place one foot on the lowest pedal, then put your other foot onto the higher pedal. Do a few revolutions to make sure that when your leg extends, your knees are just slightly flexed at the bottom of the stroke.

Sit up straight, keeping a neutral spine position. Keep your back flat and core muscles tight.

It's all right to lean forward if you want to stretch your back, as long as you are able to keep your back flat and your core muscles engaged. If your back starts to round, correct your form immediately as this can cause pain or tightness in the neck area, even soreness in the lower back.

Hold on to the handlebars very gently with wrists in a neutral position — don't flex them.

TREADMILL

Primary muscle groups worked: quadriceps, hamstrings, calves and glutes.

Start with your feet on the non-moving side rails and set the controls at the lowest rate of speed and incline. Step onto the pad and start walking slowly, using a heel to toe movement. Try to keep your gait as natural as possible.

Keep a good posture by standing straight with your eyes forward, chest up, shoulders back. You should be in a neutral spine position, with your core muscles engaged.

If you're new to treadmills, lightly hold onto the side bars. Once you're comfortable with the machine, pump your arms while walking, but keep your hands relaxed. Arms should be bent at a 90-degree angle.

When you're ready to increase intensity, do it gradually.

Don't turn and talk to people while on the treadmill because you may inadvertently turn your body in that direction and fall off the machine.

Don't put your machine on a high incline then hold onto the front bar to take tension off your legs, since they're supposed to be doing the work. If you have to support yourself in this manner, you're likely going too fast.

Rock Hall of Fame hails Bob Heil's technical wizardry

By Scott Wuerz
Knight Ridder Newspapers

FAIRVIEW HEIGHTS, Ill. — The keen ear and technical know-how that put Bob Heil's name in the Rolodexes of rockers Pete Townshend, Joe Walsh and Peter Frampton have landed him in the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and Museum.

A display of mixing boards, special effects machinery and speakers made by Heil and used by the biggest rock acts of the 1970s will be put on permanent display in the Cleveland museum June 8.

"This is something I have been putting together for about a year and half," Heil said of the display. "There's a lot of history in this equipment. I told the curator from the Hall of Fame that I would clean everything up really good for him and he freaked out. He told me not to clean or fix anything."

Heil is a pioneering figure in the industry not only because he built the high-powered sound systems that made 1970s concerts the spectacle they were, according to Rock and Roll Hall of Fame Curatorial Director Howard Kramer. He also pioneered methods to make that A-bomb-loud sound well articulated, instead of just a wall of unintelligible noise.

"The concert business became what it is today because he made the experience so much better for the customers," Kramer said of Heil. "No one made the leaps in live sound that he did."

Heil can pinpoint the date he made it in rock 'n' roll. It was a fateful night in 1970 when he found himself on the opposite end of a phone line with Grateful Dead guitarist Jerry Garcia.

The psychedelic rock band arrived in St. Louis without its sound equipment and was desperately looking for something to borrow for a show at the Fox Theatre. In stepped Heil, who supplied a public address system complete with speakers, mixing board and microphones from his store, the Ye Olde Music Shoppe in Marissa, Ill.

"It was so much better than what they had, it blew them away," Heil said. "They took my stuff on tour with them when they left for their next show."

After that, luminaries of '70s rock 'n' roll sought out Heil, who eventually relocated to Fairview Heights and changed the name of his business to Heil Sound.

The Who had him build a custom quadraphonic mixing board for the band's 1974 Quadrophenia tour. The board, called MAVIS for Music and Voice Instrument System, along with a rear channel speaker from the tour, are the centerpieces of the Heil exhibit, according to Kramer.

Also included in the display are a mixing board used to produce the sound for the legendary Mississippi River Festival and a fiberglass Talk Box, serial number 1, signed by Joe Walsh and Peter Frampton.

The Talk Box, which was invented by Heil, allows a guitarist to manipulate the sound of his instrument with his mouth.

"Joe wanted it for his song 'Rocky Mountain Way,' so I built it for him," Heil said. "He made a sort of guttural sound with it. But Peter Frampton could actually talk through it."

A microphone in the display used by Who singer Roger Daltry is still wrapped in the 32-year old red gaffer's tape that Heil put on it to keep the mic from getting lost in the crowd.

"He would swing those things by the cord and the microphones would come loose and go flying," Heil said of Daltry's trademark stage move. "While everyone else was thinking 'man, that looks cool' I was thinking 'Hey, that's my microphone!'"

In case anyone questions the authenticity of the well-worn piece, Heil has hung from the microphone stand a photo taken during the tour of Daltry belting lyrics into the red-wrapped mic.

Most of the equipment that is going into the Hall of Fame was scattered around his garage in boxes, Heil said. But The Who's mixing board was sold around 1980 when he grew disenchanted with the punk-rock scene and got out of the business of engineering concert sound. A guy from Florida called him one day and offered to sell back the equipment, which was being used to prop up a broken bed frame.

While his equipment will be on display at the Hall of Fame, Heil was quick to point out that he isn't being inducted into the hall.

At this point, there is no category for sound engineers.

"But that's OK," Heil said. "That's not why I got into this. We were just having a great time. I never expected all the attention I've had."

'Idol' dismissal may be fuel for Daughtry

By Rick Porter
Zap2it.com

After hearing he was the one to go home on "American Idol" Wednesday, Chris Daughtry admitted to being "a little shocked."

Eighteen hours later, the feeling hadn't changed much for him.

"You know what? I have to say, I'm bummed," Daughtry said in an interview Thursday, a day removed from his surprise cut from the show, which is now down to its final three singers. "I'm disappointed, but I'm trying to see the bigger picture and see that there's going to be bigger opportunities."

One of those opportunities, in fact, may have already come along. Members of the band Fuel appeared on Thursday's edition of "Extra" and told correspondent Terri Seymour ("Idol" judge Simon Cowell's girlfriend) they'd love to have Daughtry as their new singer.

The 26-year-old Daughtry came to Fuel's attention after he performed the band's song "Hemorrhage" during the "Idol" semifinals in March. His performance caused sales of the single to spike.

Daughtry talked to reporters a few hours before the "Extra" item was circulated, declining to say too much about the offer. He does allow, though, that "it's one of those things where we really have to consider everything and weigh out the pros and the cons of every opportunity. And I don't know if I'm in that position right now to say 'yes or no' to anything, just with my mindset."

Daughtry, who auditioned for CBS's "Rock Star" last year but didn't make the cut, says one of his goals is to make his own way in the music business, singing his own songs. He does sound flattered by the offer from Fuel, though.

"They're really good songwriters, and that makes any band," he says of Fuel. "Great songs are what make someone successful, and they definitely have that. But part of me is debating — do I go and do my own thing and have success on my own, or do I get into someone else's success? I mean, I don't know. It's one of those things that I'm really unsure about right now."

As for what led to his elimination, Daughtry thinks it may have been his status as the favorite.

"I think people were probably comfortable in the fact that they thought I was just a shoo-in and that they didn't have to vote as hard," he said. "And I think that was the downfall, in my opinion."

When it came, Daughtry didn't hide his disappointment, making for one of the more honest reactions on "American Idol" this season.

"I was just being real. I wasn't going to pretend to be happy about it," he said. "It was definitely a gut-wrenching moment and I wasn't expecting it, not even a little bit."

Box of memories sets off fight over Beach Boy classics

By Christina Hoag
Knight Ridder Newspapers

TAMARAC, Fla. — When Roy Sciacca heard that John Lennon's handwritten lyrics to "All You Need is Love" sold for $1.2 million last summer, he figured he had a treasure trove tucked away in his vault: original sheet music for a score of legendary hits by the Beach Boys.

"I said 'I've got a lot of those,'" recalled Sciacca, a Tamarac music memorabilia maniac. "OK, it's not John Lennon. He's passed away. But still they would be worth something."

That's about all that Sciacca and the Beach Boys agree on.

The group alleges that Sciacca stole the slew of documents dating from the 1950s and early 1960s from a North Hollywood, Calif., warehouse. Sciacca says the papers were stuffed in boxes of junky memorabilia that he bought from the group's tour manager in a liquidation sale two decades ago.

Now each side is suing the other over ownership of the items, which include Brian Wilson's handwritten musical scores to classics such as "Wouldn't It Be Nice," "California Girls" and "I Get Around," old songwriting contracts signed by members of the fabled band and even '50s items signed by the Wilson brothers' father Murry.

The Beach Boys are famous for upbeat tunes like "Wouldn't It Be Nice" and "California Girls."

This week Sciacca filed a lawsuit against Brother Records, the Beach Boys' management company, in U.S. District Court in Miami, alleging that the group wrongfully interfered with his planned auction of the items last October and asking a court to declare him the legal owner.

In case anyone questions the authenticity of the well-worn piece, Heil has hung from the microphone stand a photo taken during the tour of Daltry belting lyrics into the red-wrapped mic.

Most of the equipment that is going into the Hall of Fame was scattered around his garage in boxes, Heil said. But The Who's mixing board was sold around 1980 when he grew disenchanted with the punk-rock scene and got out of the business of engineering concert sound. A guy from Florida called him one day and offered to sell back the equipment, which was being used to prop up a broken bed frame.

While his equipment will be on display at the Hall of Fame, Heil was quick to point out that he isn't being inducted into the hall.

At this point, there is no category for sound engineers.

"But that's OK," Heil said. "That's not why I got into this. We were just having a great time. I never expected all the attention I've had."

Sciacca, who owned a recording studio in Los Angeles before moving to Florida in 1995, said he was a struggling Sunset Strip singer-guitarist in the mid-80s when a liquidation sale of Beach Boys memorabilia was advertised on a flyer.

He went with the aim of possibly picking up Carl Wilson's guitar, but had no such luck. He did snag lights, road cases, tour apparel and a bunch of boxes stuffed with miscellaneous articles. The group's touring manager Elliot Lott, who was supervising the sale, charged him a nominal amount for the boxes, he said.

"I was in love with the Beach Boys," said Sciacca, now a 49-year-old movie producer. "I love Americana music, history." Sciacca owns a huge collection of Elvis Presley memorabilia, including the star's motor home, from the Jailhouse Rock movie, 16 cars, motorcycles and diamond jewelry.

Sciacca decorated his home and later his studio with various Beach Boys items and stored the rest in a vault. It wasn't until last summer that I ever entertained the notion of selling it," said Sciacca, who started a business around his Elvis collection when he moved to Florida — selling items and taking them on tour.

Sciacca contacted the Beverly auction house that had sold the Lennon lyrics. Caroline Thomas "They loved my collection. I had it packaged and boxed and ready," he said. He was getting ready to sell his love comprising some 1,000 items which could have netted several million dollars.

But when the Beach Boys' camp saw the auction advertised, they said the items were stolen. The auction was halted and the Beach Boys filed a theft complaint with the Los Angeles Police Department. The investigation was later dropped for lack of evidence, said Sciacca's lawyer Richard C. Wolfe.

In their lawsuit, the pop group says the boxes went missing from the warehouse in 1994, when they transferred an assortment of musical instruments, charts, photos, contracts and other items to another location due to problems with Gaba.

Gaba kept back 13 to 25 boxes of recordings and memorabilia and admitted that to Brother Records, the suit alleges. Gaba could not be reached for comment.

Wolfe termed that explanation ridiculous.

"How come they did nothing between '94 and 2005?" he said. "It's clear that what happened is that our client sold the stuff and is now embarrassed about selling it. Gaba has nothing to do with the memorabilia."

Yet Sciacca, Brother Records has defamed him, and now his reputation as a serious memorabilia collector and trader is at stake.

"In the collecting world, your name and word is so substantive," he said. "If I'm not viewed as honest, I don't know if I can continue collecting."

FINAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR SENIORS ABOUT THE COMMENCEMENT CEREMONY

136th Undergraduate Commencement Ceremony Sunday, May 28, 2006

Pre Commencement General Information:

There is no Commencement rehearsal.

Tickets are not required and there is no limit on the number of guests you may invite. There is no reserved seating. The stadium is uncovered. The ceremony will be held at the stadium, rain or shine. Tell your guests your entry and exit gate numbers, see "Gate Entrances by Major."

UNIVERSITY REGULATIONS STRICTLY PROHIBIT THE POSSESSION OR CONSUMPTION OF ALCOHOL AT THE STADIUM. NO GLASS OR METAL CONTAIN ERS WILL BE ALLOWED IN THE ASSEMBLY AREA OR ON THE FIELD. THIS POLICY WILL BE ENFORCED FOR BOTH GRADUATES AND GUESTS.

Photographs of graduates will be taken in the assembly area by Chappell Images. Proofs will be mailed to your permanent address. You decide to purchase or not – no obligation. Costs range from $7.00 depending on the package you choose.

The Index (the yearbook) may be ordered by calling 545-3600.

Commencement Videotapes and DVDs may be ordered by calling 545-1283. Also, there will be a booth at the stadium where videos may be ordered.

The University Club on campus will be open to the public and will serve gourmet meals from 12 noon to 4 p.m. It accepts MasterCard, Visa, Diner's Club, and Carte Blanche. To make reservations, call 545-2551 as soon as possible.

Disability Services for mobility or hearing impaired guests, please call 545-0892. For guests who are unable to walk long distances, please park in Lot 25 near the Mullins Center. Shuttle buses will provide transportation to and from the stadium. Wheel chairs are also accommodated.

Diplomas will be mailed after the grades have been received, recorded and processed by the Registrar's Office, and the diplomas have been engrossed, which is usually by August. Inquiries may be made to the Registrar's Office, 545-0555.

Commencement Morning Schedule

9:00-9:15 a.m.: Students should arrive at the assembly area, Yellow Lot #11, no later than 9:15 a.m., carrying your cap and gown.

9:15 a.m.: Professor George Parks, Director of the Minuteman Marching Band, and Commencement Marshals will help graduates line up by school/college and escort the Processional onto the field.

9:30-9:45 a.m.: Chappell Images photographs individual graduates.

10:00 a.m.: Faculty Processional begins. Faculty greet Degree Candidates at each gate.

10:05 a.m.: Processional of Degree Candidates

10:25 a.m.: Platform Party Processional.

11:45 a.m.: Recessional begins. Graduates exit through north gates #1 and #2.

12:00 noon: Chancellor's Reception for Graduates and Guests.

WHAT TO DO AND WHERE TO GO WHEN YOU GET TO THE STADIUM.

Go directly to the Graduate Assembly Area in Yellow Lot #11 north of the football stadium. Do not enter through the main gates of the stadium. Marshals will greet you and Professor George Parks will organize the Student Proces sional.

Look for the signs for your college/school. If you are unsure of the school or college of your major, see "Gate Entrances by Degree Major."

Commencement Day General Information:

ON CAMPUS CONSTRUCTION WARNING - EXPECT DELAYS

-Routes to campus/travel assistance: Please advise your guests to plan ahead to allow extra travel time to campus. Traffic is usually very heavy on major routes and in the greater Amherst area as early as 7:30 a.m., and delays are frequently encountered. (Commencements at Amherst and Mount Holyoke Colleges are the same day at 10:00 a.m.) Encourage your guests to arrive by 8:30 a.m., park in the upper campus lots, and take a shuttle bus to the stadium. Seating at the stadium is "first-come-first-served."

-Parking and shuttle services: Police officers will direct you to designated parking lots. Beginning at 8:00 a.m., free shuttle buses will circle campus every 5-10 minutes, taking you and your guests to the stadium, and returning you to the lot after the ceremony. Please make note of the lot number you park in, this will make it easier for your return shuttle trip.

-Snacks and souvenirs: Coffee, soft drinks, bottled water, donuts, bagels, and pastries are available at the re freshment stands on both sides of the stadium. Fresh-cut roses, bouquets of flowers, and balloons will be for sale inside and outside the stadium. Sweatshirts, T-shirts, baseball caps, seat cushions, diploma frames, teddy bears, banners, disposable cameras, and film are available at the tent on the east side. In addition, the University Store in the Campus Center will be open from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. with a complete supply of UMass clothing, gifts, and other merchandise.

-Food Services: Grinders, salads, wraps, fruit cups, desserts, and more are available. You may preorder Gourmet Box Lunches. To order visit www.umass.edu/dining services or call (413) 545-2472.

-Meeting arrangements: You will exit through the north gates #1 and #2. Be sure to decide ahead of time where you will meet your family after the ceremony. The Chancellor's Reception is a good place to gather and to make introductions to friends and family. Individual gathering sites will be marked for each college and school.

-Post-Commencement Reception: After the ceremony, graduates and guests are invited to the Chancellor's Reception. It will be held under the large white tent in the southeast corner of the stadium near the entry gates. Punch and cookies will be served. This is an opportunity to meet, greet, and take a family photograph with the Chancellor. Faculty are also invited to attend.

REMEMBER

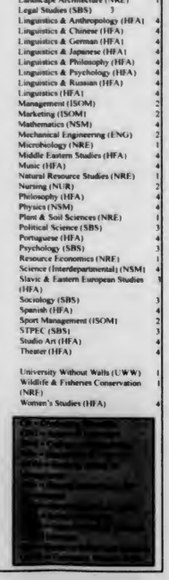
University regulations prohibit the possession or use of alcohol at the stadium.

No glass or metal containers will be allowed in the assembly area or on the field.

This policy will be enforced.

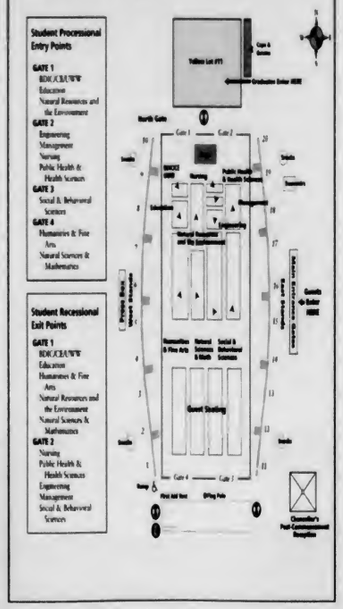
Caps and Gowns:

Caps, gowns, and tassles are available now through May 26 at the Textbook Annex. Hours of operation are 9 am - 4 pm
A student ID card is required to confirm eligibility.



With your cap and gown you will receive four (4) Commencement Announcements.
Personalized announcements may be ordered through Printing Services (151 Whitmore, 545 - 2718)

You are strongly advised to pick up your cap and gown as soon as possible.



Gate Entrances by Major

Your guests may wish to know the gate you will enter and the location in which you will sit. From the Graduate Assembly Area, you will march into the stadium through the gate indicated and sit with the school or college of your major. Double majors may sit with either major.

Minutemen top Cornell in playoff thriller that, he was still getting shots off on the cage. He is a phenomenal player, and I just did my best to stay with him."

UMass senior long-stick midfielder Jake Deane was dominant on faceoffs, winning 17-of-23 against Cornell's three-man team of Tommy Schmicker, Seibald and Boulukos. Deane also snagged 11 groundballs.

"When you look at the stats, they were all fairly even except [faceoffs]," Cannella said. "Obviously, that was a huge factor in the game with the extra possessions because we had 19 turnovers. But anytime they scored, it seemed like we got the ball back, anytime we scored, it seemed like we got the ball back, so I thought that was a huge factor in the game. I give Jake a lot of credit for that."

Morris paced the Maroon and White offense with two goals and three assists while Schneider made 10 saves between the pipes.

David Mitchell led the way for Cornell with three goals in the losing effort.

"Overall, we're obviously disappointed that our season comes to an end right now but not disappointed with the way the guys competed," Cornell coach Jeff Tambroni said.

After lightning delayed the start of the game by 20 minutes, Cornell complimented the weather with a thunderous start by jumping out to a 3-0 lead with the help of two goals from Mitchell and one from Boulukos in the team's first four possessions, causing Cannella to call a timeout.

"It was 3-0, and the crowd was getting loud so we called a timeout to take a deep breath," Cannella said. "We said, 'Let's relax and try to play our game.' We were winning faceoffs. We had some opportunities early, but the goalie made a couple good saves against us. We just needed to settle down and focus on what our game plan was."

"They got off to a quick start, and that was difficult," Schneider said. "But we have great leaders, and the coaches told me to keep my head up and have mental toughness. I just bounced back from that."

Cannella's troops responded with a three-goal burst of their own, and Pat Larmon's goal at the 8:55 mark of the second quarter evened the score.

Derek Haswell put the Big Red back on top 1:22 later after he dodged through a double-team and beat Schneider while hitting the turf. Recchione tied the game 48 seconds after that with his first goal of the afternoon, and the two teams went into the locker room knotted at 4-all.

Morris opened up the second half with three points in under 10 minutes. Working from behind the net, he came around the right side, quickly turned and dumped the ball over his shoulder to beat McMonagle with 13:41 to play in the third quarter.

After Cornell's Casey Lewis tied the contest at 5-all with 7:09 to play, Morris set up both Stabert and Jamie Yaman to give UMass a 7-5 edge, its largest lead of the day.

The tides turned once again as Cornell answered with two straight goals, and Mitchell completed his hat trick to tie the game at 7-all with 12:41 remaining in the final frame. Brian Jacovina, UMass's craftiest assist man over the last month, put the Minutemen back on top with his seventh goal of the season with 5:54 to play.

The Big Red rallied with two scores in the ensuing 30 seconds to take a 9-8 lead, its first advantage since the 7:33 mark of the second quarter.

Junior midfielder Andrew Recchione notched two goals on three shots in this weekend's defeat of the Cornell Big Red.

the nation in faceoff winning percentage and fourth in groundballs per game during the regular season. "Today we were lucky enough to get the ball."

LOOKING AHEAD

After downing Cornell, the Minutemen immediately began to look to next weekend, as they will have the chance to qualify for the first Final Four in the program's history.

Morris, who has been a part of two UMass squads that have come one win shy of a Final Four berth, feels that this year's team has what it takes to make it to Philadelphia.

"These two guys, [freshman goalie] Doc [Schneider] and Jake [are the difference]. Years past, we really haven't been dominant at the goalkeeping position and faceoffs," the senior captain said. "The four years I've been here that's definitely been a key. We played a great team today and we were able to ride those two guys' backs. I have all the confidence in the world in them."

UMass currently has the ignominious distinction of being the team to make the most NCAA Tournaments without a Final Four appearance. The Minutemen have made 12 quarterfinals in their history, including three of the last four years, but have come up short of a trip to the national semifinals each time.

The experience that the seniors have gained in making two quarterfinals in their three years is something that UMass coach Greg Cannella believes will be a positive in Saturday's matchup with Hofstra.

"I think [good leadership] has always been the key for us at UMass," he said. "We have it here with our seniors and a lot of the younger guys, too. Doc in the cage has been a super leader all year; to step up as a freshman and be the leader of our defense. I think leadership will be the key as we move on."

ODDS AND ENDS

The win at Cornell on Saturday was the first road win ever for UMass in the NCAA Tournament. The Minutemen were 0-12 entering the game. UMass is now 7-16 all-time in the tournament.

The start of the game was delayed 20 minutes due to lightning, but once the game began the weather cooperated, and the game was played under mostly sunny skies.

The quarterfinal meeting with Hofstra is a rematch of the Feb. 26 season-opener, which UMass won 11-7 in Amherst. Hofstra has not lost since, running off 17 wins in a row.

Morris was named the ECAC Offensive Player of the Week on Thursday for the second year in a row, while teammate Jack Reid was named the league's Defensive Player of the Year. Morris and Reid, who were both All-ECAC First Team selections, were the only Minutemen recognized by the league.

Minutewomen take A-10 Championship advanced to second and third, putting UMass in position to pull away.

The Minutewomen's hopes were dashed when Cullington lined into an inning-ending double play. She drove the ball down the left field line, but third baseman Twarowski caught the line drive and tagged out Molinari, who was trying to get back to third base on the catch.

UMass finally got another runner across the plate in the fourth when Lauren Proctor hit a solo home run to right center. Proctor, a left-handed batter, normally hits to the opposite field, but crushed the ball this time to right field. Even with a strong wind coming in, the ball easily sailed over the wall to put UMass ahead, 3-1.

Balschmiter settled down after a shaky first couple of innings to take control of the championship game. In the sixth, she struck out the first two batters, giving her eight in the game, her highest strikeout total of the tournament.

Early on she had trouble with her control, and looked in at the umpire a number of times, showing her displeasure with the strike zone. She was able to gain her composure, however, and kept Fordham from gaining ground on the Maroon and White.

In the bottom of the sixth, the Minutewomen added some insurance. Kelley led off with a walk, and Michea Holness entered the game to pinch-run for the catcher. Fordham pitcher Sara Kinney then fell apart, throwing three wild pitches during the next two at-bats, bringing Holness around to score without another hit or walk. The only time the ball was put in play was a pop-up bunt by Cullington, on which Holness did not advance.

UMass entered the top of the seventh with the 4-1 lead and a chance to close out the game. Just three outs away from an A-10 championship, Balschmiter made her first big mistake, leaving a pitch over the middle of the plate.

Fordham's Allison Storc drove the ball back up the middle, but Balschmiter made a great play, getting her glove down and fielding the ball cleanly to get the out at first. After a pop-out to the catcher, the next batter grounded to the shortstop, Cullington, who threw to first base for the final out and the A-10 title.

The three-run victory over the Rams was a very different game from the 8-0 mercy-rule win in the first round. UMass coach Elaine Sortino thought the biggest difference was the Rams' pitching.

"I think they gave themselves a better game on the mound [than Thursday's game]," Sortino said. "Kinney brought her best game of the entire year [on Saturday]. She did what pitchers do, keep you a little bit off stride. That was one of her better outings against us."

Balschmiter was named Most Outstanding Player of the tournament. She went 3-0 over the weekend with a 1.11 ERA and 20 strikeouts through 19 innings pitched.

"Brandice really grew over this weekend," Sortino said. "It is a really different experience the first time through [the tournament] as a pitcher, especially such a young one as a freshman. I though she handled it well."

Balschmiter saved her best for last, as her one-hitter in the championship game was by far her best. She faced 26 batters Saturday, allowing just one hit and one earned run while striking out a tournament-high 8 batters and walking two. The win pushes her career record to an astounding 28-7 as a freshman.

Her top moment of the weekend may have been the first pitch of the final game. Her fastball reached a speed of 73 mph (equal to approximately 110 mph in baseball), the highest mark she has ever reached.

This is UMass's 18th A-10 championship in the last 21 years, all under Sortino. Of all those championship teams, Sortino feels this may be one of the best.

"They're right up there with the greatest of them," she said. "They're a great group and a very balanced team. They've got dominant pitching, great hitting, good speed, and a good defense. You can't ask for more than that."

The next stop for the Minutewomen will be right here at home. UMass is hosting the Amherst Regional as part of the 64-team NCAA Tournament. The second-seeded Minutewomen will play Albany in the first round. Texas A&M, seeded No. 13 overall, will open the tournament as the top seed against Lehigh Friday at noon at the UMass Softball Complex, followed by UMass and Albany at 2:30 p.m.

Freshman attacker Jim Connolly scored one goal and gathered two ground balls against Cornell this weekend.

Anxious times at The Hangar

By Jeremy Rice

Minutes after beating Fordham on Saturday to win the Atlantic 10 Championship, the [illegible] softball team found out Sunday [illegible] Selection Show [illegible] clinched [illegible] bid to the NCAA [illegible] with their victory [illegible] and were wanted to find [illegible] it would be playing in [illegible] it would.

[illegible] players met at The [illegible] for the selection show [illegible] ESPNEWS. The entire [illegible] some members, as [illegible] local camera crews, [illegible] to cover the event.

[illegible] Coach Elaine Sortino [illegible] during [illegible] the festivities, [illegible] was part of [illegible] NCAA Selection Committee, [illegible] decides which teams get [illegible] which teams go home [illegible].

"It could be really lonely [illegible] team," Sortino [illegible] on her way to [illegible] where the selection [illegible] watch. "I wish I could [illegible] watching with the rest [illegible]."

On a day [illegible] however, Sortino [illegible] a much better mood. About [illegible] after the selection [illegible] UMass came on [illegible] along with Albany, [illegible] and No. 11 Texas A&M. [illegible] filled with screams [illegible] as the team's year-[illegible] came to fruition.

The tournament will begin [illegible] the UMass Softball Complex starting with Texas A&M and Lehigh at noon, followed by UMass and Albany at 2:30.

The cheers picked up again once everyone realized that they were playing in the Amherst Regional, meaning that UMass would be hosting their section of the first round of the tournament.

This is the ninth time UMass has hosted one of the 16 regionals, and the first time since 1999. It will also be the first time an NCAA regional will be held at the new UMass Softball Complex.

"I am totally thrilled," Sortino said after the announcement.

There was nothing but excitement after the selection, but before that the room went through ups and downs with every passing announcement. There was silence before every announcement and a rush of anxiety after Massachusetts was not on the screen.

The biggest excitement came when No. 8 Tennessee was announced as the top seed and host to the Tennessee Regional. The Volunteers crushed the Minutewomen, 20-0, in five innings at the UST-Adidas Spring Break Invitational in Tampa back in early March. Overall, the event appeared to test the nerves of new players and veterans alike.

"Every time you watch a selection show you're going to be nervous," senior captain KJ Kelley said. "You never know where you're going to be put, but it's also exciting to find out where you're going because you know you're already in."

"It was very nerve-wracking," freshman and A-10 Tournament MVP Brandice Balschmiter said. "I've never done this before so I didn't know what to expect."

"I had knots in my stomach every time [teams were announced]," freshman Whitney Mollica said.

This is the 12th consecutive trip to the NCAA tournament and the 16th overall. Last year, the Minutewomen lost to No. 4 Texas 1-0 in the first round, and then fell to Texas A&M-Corpus Christi, 6-2, ending their season.

This year may be their best chance in years to make it deep into the tournament. The last time UMass reached the College World Series was 1998, when the team was led by eventual Olympian Danielle Henderson. Many of the seniors, however, see in this year's team one of the best they've been a part of.

"This is definitely one of the more dominant teams we've had," Kelley said. "We're a more together team; we're really close. We have a pitching staff that is really tight."

All season there was talk that this is one of the most well-rounded teams UMass has had in years, with dominant pitching, great hitting, a solid defense and smart base-running.

"We've basically got it all," Kelley said. "It's really come together for us."

With the first round of games taking place on the UMass campus, preparation for the tournament changes immensely. Traveling is no longer an issue, but players will now be here all week studying for finals and writing papers.

"Normally we would travel on Tuesday or Wednesday morning, so not having to do that puts us at an advantage compared to the past few years," pitching coach Kaila Holtz said. "But now the girls have the added pressure of finals and trying to manage both, whereas if we were on the road, it would be mainly softball."

One of the biggest challenges facing the team will be helping the younger players adjust to playing on the national level, particularly Balschmiter, who started all three games in the circle for the Minutewomen in the A-10 Tournament.

"I feel like she really grew up in the Atlantic 10 Tournament," Holtz said. "She found her rhythm and was setting up hitters really well. I see her being ready for the big game this weekend. She'll be more comfortable at home where we've had large crowds before."

With no travel schedule involved, Sortino was asked what the coming week will be like as far as preparing for the tournament. She answered simply:

"Very busy."

Mother Nature just doesn't seem to agree with the Massachusetts baseball team's schedule. With six games already either postponed or cancelled due to inclement weather, rain engulfed the Northeast again this weekend, wreaking havoc on UMass's three-game set with Saint Joseph's.

Saturday's game was the only one the two teams were able to get in this weekend due to the heavy downpours. The Hawks (17-34, 9-13 Atlantic 10) took advantage of the rare weather and dealt the Minutemen (12-27, 9-13 A-10) a crushing 13-1 loss at Earl Lorden Field.

The bottom of the SJU batting order — coupled with two costly errors that led to a seven-run sixth inning — were the difference on Saturday.

The two teams will try to finish out their series today with a doubleheader beginning at 11 a.m. The weekday matinee will continue with Game 2 slated to start at 3 p.m. More rain and cold temperatures are expected in Amherst.

SJU's seven, eight and nine hitters destroyed the UMass pitching trio of Chris Lloyd, Mike Dicato and Ryan Walczak. The group combined to reach base an astounding 10 times — seven hits, two errors and a walk.

All three SJU hitters also crossed the plate twice apiece, with Chris Cashman and Mike Blabusch doing so in consecutive innings in the third and fourth. The trio proved especially dangerous in the third, when they all reached base consecutively and proceeded to score the Hawks' first three runs.

Cashman led off with a groundball single that sneaked under the glove of Lou Prisetti and was driven in by Blabusch's double to right-center. Jereme Scott then drew a walk and eventually came around on Matt Godusky's sacrifice fly.

Of the UMass pitchers they faced, the three were especially tough on the starter Lloyd. Five of their runs and four of their hits came during Lloyd's five plus innings of work.

The junior started off the game strong for the Minutemen, but soon faltered, and the Hawks made him pay. Lloyd began the game by striking out the side in the first on just 13 pitches and faced the minimum amount of hitters through two innings.

Over the next three innings he would surrender all six of the runs he allowed before bowing out to reliever Mike Dicato in the sixth after facing just one batter. The freshman didn't prove to be any more effective, but he didn't receive much help from his defense.

The sixth frame was especially tough on the Minutemen's young second baseman. Adam Tempesta committed two of his three errors in the inning, bringing his season total to 15.

UMass coach Mike Stone lifted his starter after Blabusch singled right field. The No. 9 hitter, Scott then bunted his way on, and moved Blabusch to second in the process. Tim Smith next reached on a fielder's choice that erased Blabusch at third base.

Already it looked as if it was going to be a long inning for Dicato and the Minutemen. After Smith reached, eight more Hawks reached base safely. SJU sent 11 people to the plate before Lloyd or Dicato could prevent a base runner.

Tempesta's first error came with the bases loaded and Greg Mason up at the plate. The SJU catcher hit a groundball that rolled right to where the second baseman was positioned. Tempesta wasn't able to get his glove down in time as the ball bounced off it and through his legs, scoring Godusky.

The freshman's third blunder of the game came with the very next batter. This time Cashman hit the groundball to Tempesta, except this time the ball was moving a little faster than the previous play. The result was the same however as he watched the second consecutive groundball roll through his legs and into short right field.

When it was all said and done, the Hawks scored seven runs — six of them coming in a row and two of them being unearned.

KAREN WINGERT/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Jim MacDonald went 0-for-2 with a walk and a strikeout in Saturday's matchup with Saint Joseph's.

Minutemen down Big Red

COLLEGIAN/CHARLIE MITCHELL AND BILL ARCHAMBAULT

Freshman goalie Doc Schneider (left) tallied 10 saves on 38 Cornell shots in Saturday's 10-9 win over the Big Red. He notched two saves in the first quarter, four in the second, two in the third and two in the fourth while collecting three ground balls. Schneider led the nation in saves per game with an average of 13.4 during the season. Junior midfielder Brett Garber (right) is second on the team in scoring, with 24 points on 16 goals and eight assists.

Federico and Recchione come up big in Ithaca

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

ITHACA, N.Y. — The big players came up huge, but the ending to Saturday's game was a song for the unsung heroes.

Fred Federico and Andrew Recchione added a pair of late tallies to lift the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team past sixth-seeded Cornell (11-3) by a 10-9 score in the first round of the NCAA Tournament at Schoellkopf Field in front of 5,023 fans.

The Minutemen (11-4) have advanced to their third NCAA Quarterfinal in the last four years and will take on Hofstra in the NCAA Quarterfinals at neutral Stony Brook on Saturday. The winner will be making its first-ever appearance in the Final Four.

In a game that featured six ties and three lead changes, UMass was able to put together the last two-goal run of the contest to escape with the win on Cornell's home field behind the net before finding Recchione near the top of the box on the left side. Recchione then fired a shot that beat McMonagle on the high side to give the Minutemen a 10-9 advantage with 2:34 remaining.

Trailing 9-8 with under four minutes remaining, Federico started his charge 30 yards away from the cage, dodged to the right side and put his shot past goalie Matt McMonagle to tie the score at 9-all with 3:46 to play. The sophomore midfielder knocked home the tying goal with his lone shot of the day.

"I told the guys in the locker room that it takes a lot of courage to take that shot when you're down by a goal with a couple minutes to go in the game," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Freddy is that type of kid, and I give kudos to him. He did it against a pole. He seemed very determined on the play, and it was an outstanding shot."

"The goalie was bating me to one side, and I just shot it to the other side where he left the cage wide open," Federico said. "I just treated it like it was any other play. That was how I tried to do it, and I went out there and made it happen."

On the next UMass possession, attackman Clay Stabert worked so I was calling for the ball from Max [Seibald], and I got it. Reid was able to get over on me. I drove to the middle and kind of got in trouble so I tried to roll back out. He did a good job staying on my hands. I came back, and he got a good check on me. I couldn't get much muster on my shot. I forced [the shot] in there, but it was the last play of the game so I was just trying to make something happen."

Reid did a number on his counterpart every time he was on the field, holding the Big Red's most prolific scoring midfielder to just a single goal while shadowing him at the top of the box, away from his typical location near the crease.

"[Boulukos] is just a great player, and I had my hands full all day," Reid said. "I wasn't as comfortable up there today as I was behind the cage, but I just tried to do my best to stay in his gloves to make his shot difficult to get off. Even doing

Deane quietly leads UMass past Cornell

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

ITHACA, N.Y. — Due to the fact that he spends most of his time on the field grappling for faceoffs and digging up groundballs, it's rare for Jake Deane to get much limelight. It's even more unlikely that the senior long-stick defensive midfielder for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will ever have a highlight on SportsCenter (like teammate Sean Morris did for his no-look, behind-the-back shot against Rutgers last weekend).

But whatever flair that is lacking in Deane's game is more than made up for in his unglamorous, yet undeniable, effectiveness.

And while Deane may not show up in the highlight reel, those who he plays with and against understand just how much of an impact he has on the game. Just ask Cornell coach Jeff Tambroni, who watched as Deane won 17-of-23 faceoffs and scooped up a game-high 11 groundballs in UMass's 10-9 win over the Big Red in the first round of the NCAA Tournament on Saturday.

"I think the game was won and lost in between the 30-yard lines," Tambroni said. "The groundball play was the biggest thing. Even though we didn't have a lot of success on the faceoffs, I felt like our biggest downfall was our inability to pick the ball up off the ground when it was kicked out.

"You have to give a lot of credit — probably more than anybody else on that team — to Deane, because he controlled that part of the game for UMass."

In typically modest fashion Deane termed his performance as "all right," though he did underscore the importance of controlling the possession battle.

"Possession of the ball in any sport is important because you need the ball to score," said Deane, who was sixth in

Minutewomen take A-10 title

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

It may be something UMass fans are used to hearing in mid-May, but the Massachusetts softball team are the Atlantic 10 champions. The Minutewomen (37-14) won their 18th championship Saturday after defeating Fordham, 4-1, in the championship game.

The Maroon and White defeated St. Bonaventure (23-22) to advance to the championship game, while Fordham, which lost to UMass in the opening round, won two straight games to stave off elimination and return to the championship game.

The Minutewomen play at home this Friday against Albany in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

After defeating Fordham Thursday in the opening round of the tournament, the second-seeded Minutewomen faced off against No. 4 St. Bonaventure, which stunned top-seeded Charlotte in the first round.

It was a back and forth game, as both teams notched a first-inning run. UMass jumped ahead in the second with a pair of runs to make the score 3-1. After senior Kristi Stefanoni scored on a wild pitch, catcher KJ Kelley singled to left, sending Candice Molinari home and giving the Minutewomen the two-run lead. Kelley's RBI, her 148th, tied her with Scooter Wheeler for the UMass record.

The Bonnies fought right back, tying it up in the top of the second. Lauren Krieger smacked a single up the middle to score Kristin Brunetto. Krieger scored later in the inning on a double by Caitlin Grattan, making the score 3-3 after three.

The Minutewomen scored the eventual winning run in the fourth inning, when Kelley reached on an error. Amanda Morin scored from third on the play to give UMass the 4-3 lead. The Minutewomen hung on for three more scoreless innings to earn the first spot in the championship game.

Meanwhile, St. Bonaventure fell into the losers' bracket, where it would wait for the winner of the Charlotte-Fordham game. After being stunned by the Bonnies in the first round, Charlotte fell again, this time to the Rams, 4-0, to be the first team eliminated from the postseason.

Fordham then finished off St. Bonaventure with a 3-1 victory, setting it up for a rematch with the Minutewomen. Not only did the two teams meet in the opening round of the tournament, but it is a rematch of last year's A-10 Championship game, which the Minutewomen won 7-0.

This year would not be as easy for the Maroon and White, however, as Rams pitcher Sara Kinney had one of her best games of the year.

The Rams struck first, grabbing a run in the top of the first. Fordham's Allison Twarowski doubled to right field, bringing in freshman Gina Capardi from second for the 1-0 lead.

The Minutewomen came right back, however, leading off the bottom of the first with a pair of hits. Doing what they had done all season, Morin sent the game's first pitch into centerfield, and Molinari singled to the same place to put two runners on.

Whitney Mollica then grounded out to the pitcher and got thrown out at first, but advanced the runners into scoring position. Kelley tied the score with a deep sacrifice fly that brought Morin in from third. That run marked Kelley's 149th career RBI, a UMass record.

After Cullington was hit by a pitch, Molinari took advantage of a wild pitch and gave UMass the 2-1 lead after she scored from third.

KAREN WINDORSKI/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore infielder Lauren Proctor went 2-for-3 with an RBI and a run scored in the A-10 Championship against Fordham.

In the top of the second, Balschmiter recovered from hitting the first batter with a pitch by getting the next three hitters out. She had some help from Fordham's Irish Arno, who was called out on hatter's interference. Arno attempted a bunt but failed to get out of the way of the catcher, Kelley, who tried to throw out Stephanie Mott stealing second.

Arno was called out by the umpire and Mott was sent back to first base — a big break for Balschmiter, who drew a fly out and a strikeout to escape the inning unscathed.

In the bottom of the third, the Minutewomen had a chance to pull away. After Molinari led off with a single to right field, the Nos. 3 and 4 hitters laid down a pair of bunts to get runners in scoring position.

Mollica bunted to the right side of the infield and the ball trickled between the pitcher and catcher. Molinari reached second and Mollica was safe at first, but the pitcher was charged with an error.

Kelley followed up with another bunt. This time the ball was fielded cleanly and Kelley was out at first, but the runners

UM rowers face stiff challenge

By Joey White
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's crew team was upset in the finals at the Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia Saturday by Atlantic 10 foe Saint Joseph's.

In a tight race, the varsity-eight boat finished just 1.56 seconds behind the Hawks with a time of 6:41.58.

After a two-year absence from the event, it would've been the third straight Dad Vail victory for the Minutewomen.

"I think they knew they should've won. I thought they should've won," UMass coach Jim Dietz said. "They felt they rowed a strong race."

The team was without senior captain Katie Berger, who was on doctor's leave. Sophomore Rachael Nealer was removed from the second varsity-eight team to replace Berger.

The remainder of the squad — which defeated Saint Joseph's at the Knecht Cup, the Atlantic 10 championship and the ECAC Metro Cup championship earlier in the season — was comprised of sophomore coxswain Dana Pulda and rowers Ellen Maskrey, Gabrielle Papineau, Stephanie Hopf, Sarah Marsian, Hannah Brewster, Amanda Mawn and Catherine Garriepy.

After breezing through the competition in their heat on Friday and semi-final round Saturday in clear skies, the Minutewomen were forced to wait for on-and-off thunderstorms to clear up.

The conditions delayed events so that in the late afternoon each race started five minutes apart from the other.

"We got up to the line cold," Dietz said. "St. Joe's got a jump on us [and] we got a slow start."

At the 1,000-meter marker, the Maroon and White were in fifth place, but then used the fast conditions to race through the field.

"They started to get aggressive and attacking the field," Dietz said of his team after the slow start. "This was the first race they were behind in."

With an easier semi-final round, Dietz said the Hawks were much more rested up for their final match-up on their home course.

Dietz claimed that "our competition was a little bit harder" than Saint Joseph's and so the Hawks didn't have to push as hard to make it to the final round. Both squads, though, faced the same amount of heat winners (Saint Joseph's finished second in its heat to Colgate) and repechage (French for "second chance") teams.

"I didn't consider them being a factor — we beat them every race," Dietz said of the Hawks. "They really got up for this regatta."

Dietz admits that his team didn't have the best lineups this weekend and that fatigue probably set in having raced three weekends in a row. But he did like the fact that he was able to get Nealer back in the first varsity-eight boat.

"[Pulda and Nealer] already have the knowledge of what it takes to race at that level. I think that it was a great experience to be able to get two sophomores into that final race," Dietz said.

The second varsity-eight crew finished third overall with a time of 6:50.00.

In the boat for the Minutewomen were senior coxswain Natalie Salerno and rowers Faith Miller, Farrell Klein, Allison Bahn, Kate Grogan, Jaime Dicke, Kristen Boyce and Elizabeth Hayashida. Annie Pacheco replaced Nealer.

"I think it was a fun race to be at. They enjoyed it and that's what it's all about," Dietz said.

The novice-eight finished fifth with a time of 7:15.2, while the lightweight-four squad placed fifth in the semi-finals and didn't advance.

"We don't usually do this race. It was like a reward to get in one more race and get pepped up for next year," Dietz said.

With the second-place finish of the first varsity-eight team, UMass will most likely not get into to this year's NCAA championship tournament — the teams are to be announced Tuesday.

"[We're] coming away from this weekend feeling pretty good, and of the season," Dietz said. "The 2006 season was a very good campaign."

Students present disaster research results

By Anna Dollanitis
Collegian Staff

After spending Spring Break on the Gulf Coast as part of a class, several UMass students presented a documentary last week about their experiences.

Five students in the Honors Colloquium of Geosciences 250: Natural Disasters, led by teaching assistant Jennifer Bonin, traveled to the Gulf Coast from March 17 to March 26 to survey the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

Sophomore Elaine Richardson, junior Catherine Stubbington, sophomore Jordan Stout, and freshman Jordan Veney presented their findings in a two hour documentary entitled, "The Face of Katrina."

The purpose of the trip, which was funded by Commonwealth College and the Department of Geosciences, was to research the damage caused by the disaster. Bonin, who had visited the Gulf Coast in September of 2005, said that her goal for the second trip was, "To teach [the students] natural disasters in a real classroom."

The team's itinerary included tours of Bay St. Louis, the wetlands and Bayou of southern Louisiana, and the levee system and business district of New Orleans.

"We got up early to catch all the daylight we could and took daily trips to devastated areas of the Gulf Coast," said Bonin. "We filmed, talked to people, and were toured by many experts."

Rubble and twisted trees line this street in Passagoula, Miss. Several UMass students witnessed the destruction firsthand when they traveled to New Orleans to research the impact of natural disasters.

The documentary, narrated by junior and Collegian Correspondent Georgia Kelley, was comprised of two parts: "first, the maintenance of the levees, and second, the after effects of the hurricane. It kind of gave you a behind the scenes look at what the media doesn't tell you," said Veney, the team's videographer.

"The Gulf Coast was and still is devastated by the hurricanes of 2005. Entire towns have been

Convenience stores to close for summer

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Workers from Auxiliary Services at the University of Massachusetts will be meeting with union representatives today to discuss the closings of campus convenience stores this summer.

Auxiliary Service officials recently informed employees that all four campus convenience stores

Worcester in the Northeast Residential Area, Franklin in Central, Hampden in Southwest and the Mini Store inside the Student Union building — would close at the end of the month, and that all of the workers would be out of a job until September. The convenience stores have not closed for the summer in over two decades.

"It seems really random to close after 20 years," said Tammy Damon, a single mother of two who co-manages the Worcester store.

Ashoke Ganguli, a director at Auxiliary Services says the closing of the convenience stores for the summer is purely a "business decision," adding that the University was losing about $100,000 a year to keep them open.

Not everyone, however, thinks that the convenience stores were the reason for the loss in revenue, including Virginia Koehler, the other co-manager at the Worcester store.

Koehler says the convenience stores are included in an umbrella of services funded by Auxiliary Services, and now the stores are being singled out due to mismanagement.

"It was the catering from the Campus Center that lost the most money," Koehler said, adding that new employees have been hired in other parts of Auxiliary Services, while the convenience store workers were laid off.

Ganguli says many employees in other areas of Auxiliary Services are laid off every summer due to lack of business.

"The convenience stores are there to support Dining Services and Residence Life," Ganguli said, adding that for four months out of the year, business is "dead" when students leave for school vacation.

Donna Johnson, the president of the Massachusetts Teachers Association, which is representing the employees, says Auxiliary Services is straying from its mission to provide a non-profit service

Bush seeks to deploy troops to Mexican border

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush is ordering as many as 6,000 National Guard troops into the struggle to tighten the U.S. border with Mexico, hoping to increase security there and to win conservatives' support in Congress for an election-year overhaul of the nation's tattered immigration laws.

Bush was to outline his plan in his first Oval Office address on a domestic issue. His prime-time televised speech was coming just hours after the Senate began work on legislation to strengthen border security, authorize new guest worker programs and give a chance at citizenship to most of the estimated 12 million people already living illegally in the United States.

Immigration has emerged as a major political issue. Hispanics comprise the nation's fastest-growing minority and have demonstrated in rallies attracting tens of thousands of

Experts: research before buying a new computer

By Martina Goodni
Collegian Correspondent

The four-year-old computer groans ominously as the hard drive struggles to download one more song, picture, or file. The 2000 word document flickers, threatening to disappear as one last sentence is typed. The "Blue Screen of Death" might take over at any moment; it has happened before.

Computer owners might consider investing in a new system when the old one slows down, frequently stalls or crashes even after it has been repaired. But, according to the Federal Citizen Information Center (FCIC), a citizen and consumer advocacy group, a computer purchase requires consumers to choose between many makes, models and dealers. This results in a complicated process that requires research. Furthermore, people might not know when it is actually time to make the "major purchase decision."

Before students try work through the extensive terminology and major brand names to invest in a new computer, Steven Marcil, owner of College Pro Computers in Hadley, which serves the Five College area, said that consumers have to ask themselves basic questions about their old equipment.

"Is your old computer satisfying your needs? Is it fulfilling your expectations?" he said. These expectations include such things as, word processing and multi-media capabilities, speed, power and networking capabilities. Once a consumer has determined that they really need a new computer, they have to figure out what to buy.

"The recommend is a custom-built with open architecture," said Marcil a self-described butcher, baker and bartender of computers, who urges consumers to avoid pre-built systems.

Marcil and his associates at College Pro Computers, where a customer might trip over a monitor or keyboard if they're not cautious, build what they call "extreme machines." The five-time Valley Advocate award winners design custom computers based upon information gathered during an interview with the buyer. This is a good option for students who can barely get online to shop around, or people who know little about computers.

But first, the store technicians require customers to do homework. It is necessary that they figure out how much memory they want, whether they need a DVD burner and what size of monitor they want, among other specifications.

However, custom-built computers are more expensive, but pre-built computers come with a lot of unnecessary software. This software collects information from the internet and "dirties" the computer, according to Marcil, who points out that Dells are purchased "based around a budget." He said that College Pro repairs Dells the most.

"Don't always look at the price, because (lower) price upfront will cost you more money in the future."

Eastern Massachusetts deals with severe flooding

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

HAVERHILL — Crews floated boats down flooded streets to rescue people trapped in their homes, overflowing pipes spewed sewage into streets and rivers and hundreds of people fled homes and businesses Monday as New England braced for the region's worst flooding since the 1930s.

The region's most severe flooding was in the Merrimack Valley, north of Boston on the New Hampshire border, where the Merrimack and Spicket rivers overflowed their banks and forced the evacuations of hundreds of people.

Gov. Mitt Romney said sewage was a major problem. About 35 million gallons a day was being dumped into the Merrimack River due to a burst in the pipes in Haverhill while another 115 million gallons a day were expected to spill in from a regional treatment plant in Lawrence, because power for the plant was under water.

"It's going to get worse before it gets better," Romney said, adding water in the Merrimack was the highest it has been since the 1930s and it was continuing to rise.

In Lowell, emergency crews took to flooded streets in boats and used bullhorns to urge people to leave their homes. Sections of the Rosemont section of town were under several feet of water. Forecasters said the river could exceed 60 feet by 8 p.m. Monday, putting it at more than 8 feet over flood stage.

"If everything follows predictions, we will probably exceed the 1938 hurricane event for flooding in the Merrimack Valley. That's a really big concern," said Charlie Foley, a meteorologist for the National Weather Service in Taunton.

The rains swamped much of northern New England. In New Hampshire, more than 600 roads were damaged, destroyed or under water. Gov. John Lynch said his own front yard in Hopkinton had become a pond.

In southern Maine, fast-rising floodwater forced scores of families to flee homes near the Mousam River. In York Beach, kayakers paddled down a main street, where yellow police tape blocked off the downtown and firefighters in a boat went building to building to make sure that propane tanks were shut off.

Two men canoe down Central Street in Peabody yesterday as continued rainfall led to flooding in much of New England.

And officials said the worst was yet to come.

Harder rains were predicted for late Monday, threatening to push the Merrimack, Spicket and other large rivers over their banks, swamping entire neighborhoods.

The 6 to 9 inches of rain that had fallen over the Spicket River near Methuen, along the New Hampshire border, "has prompted a life threatening rise," according to the National Weather Service, which also warned that overflow from dams along the river would contribute to the rise.

The Spicket Falls dam was stable but Mayor William Maruri said a housing complex next to the dam was being watched carefully, and the city may cut power from the power plant on site as water continues to rise. Water levels were at 11 feet — two feet above flood stage — early Monday.

In Haverhill, 100 residents of the Bethany Homes Senior Center on the banks of the Merrimack evacuated were taken by bus to a community center. A nearby subsidized housing complex that is home to many seniors also was evacuated. Owners of businesses along the river hurried to move merchandise to higher ground.

Helen Tufo, 82, played cards inside inside a community center being used as a shelter. She saw water rising over the parking lot outside her home as she left. "All of our gardens out back are ruined," she said.

Nearby, roommates Erica Digaetano, 22, and Kelly Malynn, 23, were warned by firefighters to move out of their first-floor apartment in downtown Haverhill. The basement already was full to its ceiling with water, which was rising.

Statements from victims gain role in justice system

By Justin Norick

NEW YORK — "I just have to get this right." James Gahan would say to himself. For months, he would lie awake before dawn to sit by the picture windows of his home, looking out into the darkness and thinking: "For Jimmy. I have to get this right."

He was preparing for one of the most difficult moments of his life: the moment last week when he would tell a judge what it was like to lose his only child, Jimmy, in the 2003 Rhode Island nightclub fire that killed 100 people.

Under the rules, he would have to keep his remarks under five minutes. But that was not a problem. "I knew I could only hold it together for one and a half," Gahan says.

In the past few weeks, two high-profile cases — the Moussaoui terrorism trial and the Rhode Island fire case — have spotlighted a relatively recent component of the American criminal justice system: the victim impact statement, an outgrowth of the victims' rights movement that began roughly three decades ago.

Both cases have been front-page news because of their scope and the number of deaths. But every state has some kind of provision for crime victims or their family members to have a say at sentencing.

Victims' rights advocates call it an essential step toward giving victims a role in the criminal justice system. But what does it do for the survivors? Why do people stripped of houses and businesses," said Stout, the group's interview coordinator. "To stand on a slab of cement where someone's house once stood is eerie and unsettling, to put it lightly."

Students gain perspective on trip to ravaged Gulf Coast

The group interviewed members of the Army Corps of Engineers in New Orleans, who discussed the construction plans for the new levee system. They also acknowledged that hurricane season is just around the corner, beginning on June 1.

While in New Orleans, the group witnessed a dead body being removed from the debris. "Six months down the road, still finding bodies is just disgusting," said Stout.

According to the documentary, the amount of homes destroyed in Hurricane Katrina equaled the total number of houses currently existing in all of Washington D.C.

A cab driver and New Orleans resident interviewed by the team said, "I sleep in my cab. I take $5 showers. I'm tired, but I've got to do what I have to do. People are dying everyday. Tomorrow is not promised to us."

"Everybody there made an impression on me," Veney said. "Everyone had their own stories, their own trials and tribulations. It was very interesting and heartbreaking to hear everyone's encounters with the disaster, but it really made me thankful for what I have."

After Hurricane Katrina, a toilet was all that remained on the bare foundation of this house in Pasagoula, Miss.

The team also outlined the positive aspects of the recovery effort. After months of non-existence, weekly garbage pickup has resumed, Mardi Gras celebrations took place as always, and guided tours of the destruction are beginning to bring tourism back to the devastated area.

The reactions of the team's peers were both heartfelt and inspired. Junior Katherine Egan, after watching the documentary, said, "The presentations showed me how much work there is left to do, and if there were another trip, I would indeed want to go."

The team dedicated their documentary to Leroy, a lead engineer in New Orleans. "This film was dedicated to him out of respect for who he is and what he has done for the city of New Orleans and the country as a whole," said Stout.

Veney concluded, "Every time I pass through a construction site, see a demolished building, or see damage in any area, my mind automatically thinks back to Hurricane Katrina. Before the trip, I had never had a dream of being in a hurricane or tornado, but afterwards, I have had more than I care to count."

Iran's president rejects plan to stop nuclear enrichment

By Ali Akbar Dareini
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran's president said Sunday it was pointless for Europe to devise an incentive package if it required Tehran to stop enriching uranium — effectively thwarting the latest international diplomatic effort before it even began.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad spoke on state television after returning from Indonesia, where he was warmly welcomed and won developing nations' support for the peaceful production of nuclear energy.

The hard-line leader said proposals for a political and economic package being shaped by the European Union were "invalid" if "they want to offer us things they call incentives in return for renouncing our rights."

Also Sunday, a Foreign Ministry spokesman declared "insignificant" reports that inspectors from the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency found traces of highly enriched uranium on equipment from an Iranian research center.

Refusing to budge in his relentless and strident campaign to assert Iranian regional power and leadership, Ahmadinejad said opponents of Tehran's nuclear program were "living in the era of colonialism" and did not respect Iran's national sovereignty.

Iran insists its nuclear program is designed only to build electricity-generating reactors. The United States and some allies suspect Tehran is hiding a military program to make nuclear weapons.

Ahmadinejad's remarks were clearly aimed at European Union foreign ministers meeting Monday in Brussels, Belgium, to consider sweetening a package of incentives that would entice Iran to suspend uranium enrichment — an issue that has now reached the U.N. Security Council but was put on hold to give the EU more time for diplomacy.

In August, Iran rejected an initial European initiative that included economic benefits and the transfer of some nuclear technology for a civilian program. Iran has repeatedly stalled or waffled on a November offer from the Kremlin to enrich uranium on Russian soil for use in Iranian reactors.

In January, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Iran would not give up control over a single step of the nuclear fuel cycle — from mining uranium to enriching it. Iran then announced it was resuming research-level uranium enrichment.

In February, the International Atomic Energy Agency board voted to report Iran to the Security Council, and Tehran vowed to immediately start work on full-scale uranium enrichment and curtailed the IAEA's powers in Iran — ending intrusive, surprise inspections.

At the Security Council, the United States — with limited backing from Britain and France — sought a tough resolution to declare Iran a threat to world peace and subject it to sanctions or even military action.

But Russia and China, both of whom hold vetoes in the council, opposed such dramatic measures. Given the divisions among the five permanent members of the council, which includes the U.S., Britain and France, Washington was forced to back down while the European Union took another run at a diplomatic solution.

In London, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said a U.S. attack on Iran over its nuclear program would set off an enormous military escalation in the Middle East and send oil prices soaring to $100 a barrel.

Chavez said an attack would force Iran to cut oil production. "My English friends — should park their vehicles because oil could reach $100 a barrel or more," Chavez told British lawmakers and left-leaning activists.

Saddam refuses to enter plea for charges

By Sinan Salaheddin
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — A defiant Saddam Hussein refused to enter a plea Monday, insisting he was still Iraq's president as the judge formally charged him with crimes against humanity, including murder and torture of women and children.

As stipulated by Iraqi law, the charges were announced as the defense began making its case in the nearly 7-month-old trial of the ousted Iraqi leader and members of his regime.

Chief judge Raouf Abdel-Rahman called Saddam and his seven co-defendants into the court one by one to read the charges against them in a crackdown against Shiites in the 1980s. He listed the names of 17 people who died from torture during interrogation or from harsh prison conditions.

Saddam, the first to be called, sat alone in the defendants' pen listening silently. When Abdel-Rahman asked for his plea, he stood behind the podium and traded shouts with the judge, who tried to limit him to a one-word answer.

"Your honor, you gave a long report. That report can't be summed up by saying guilty or not," Saddam said. "Your honor is now before Saddam Hussein, the president of Iraq — I am the president of Iraq by the will of the Iraqis, and I remain president of Iraq up to this moment."

"I do not recognize the collaborators that they brought to appoint a court and put forward a law with retroactive effect against the head of state," he said.

Abdel-Rahman entered a plea of not guilty for Saddam.

The atmosphere in the court was solemn, with few of the outbursts that have disrupted past sessions. Brought in after Saddam, his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim — once head of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency — frowned as he listened to the same charges. When asked his plea, he muttered, "What you say is not true."

Saddam and his co-defendants face possible execution by hanging if found guilty on the charges in the crackdown in the Shiite town of Dujail.

Security forces arrested hundreds of Dujail residents, including entire families, in the wake of a July 1982 assassination attempt against Saddam in the town. Witnesses, including women, have recounted being tortured while in prison. Farmlands were razed and 148 Shiites were sentenced to death for the shooting attack on Saddam. All 148 were killed, either dying under interrogation or executed.

AP

Saddam Hussein argues in court during his trial for crimes against humanity. Hussein has refused to enter a plea in the case.

Abdel-Rahman accused Saddam of ordering security forces to launch a "systematic, wide-scale attack" on residents of Dujail "using all weapons against them."

"As a result for your orders to use force against Dujail residents, nine people were killed in the first two days ... and 399 others were arrested," he said.

He said Saddam ordered 148 persons tried before his Revolutionary Court, then approved death sentences issued against them. Earlier in the trial, the prosecution presented the trial order and a memo approving the death sentences, both with signatures that Iraqi experts authenticated as Saddam's.

Two women and five children were among the 17 who died in prison. The judge also listed six other children who were among those executed. He did not give their ages, saying only that they were under 18.

All the defendants were charged with willful murder, imprisonment in violation of fundamental norms of international law, torture and enforced disappearance of persons under Article 12 of the 2005 criminal code of the Special Criminal Tribunal, which defines crimes against humanity.

The seven other defendants also pleaded innocent, most with curt answers of only a few words — though Abdullah Kazim al-Ruwayyid, a low-level Baath official accused of informing on some of the Dujail residents who were later killed, tried to argue against the charges.

"I have no relation to Dujail at all, not in the least," he shouted.

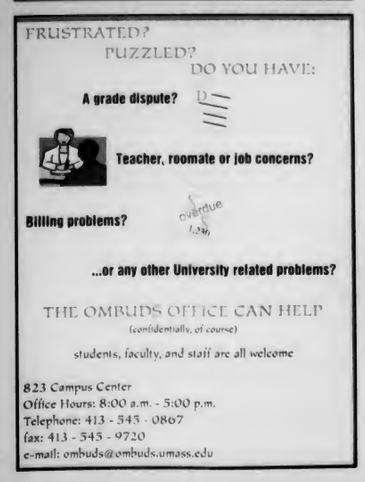
Under the Iraqi system, the court first hears plaintiffs outline their complaint against the defendants and the prosecutions' evidence against them. Then the judges make their accusations against the defendants as specific charges, and the defense presents its case.

With the reading of charges, the trial — which began Oct. 19 — entered the defense phase. The first five defense witnesses spoke from behind a curtain to protect their identities, testifying on behalf of Ali Dayih, a Baath Party official from Dujail.

The witnesses included two relatives of Dayih who said he was in Baghdad the day of the assassination attempt on Saddam and who insisted he had nothing to do with the crackdown.

Saddam and the other defendants have argued their actions in Dujail were legal since they were in response to the shooting attack on Saddam's motorcade as he drove through town.

But prosecutors argued that the crackdown went far beyond the attackers to punish the entire town. It said the 148 were sentenced to death after a swift trial in which the accused could make no defense, and that children as young as 11 were among those convicted.



Defense lawyers asked Monday that the full dossier of the Revolutionary Court trial of the 148 be brought as evidence, hoping to show the men got a fair trial. Abdel-Rahman said he would consider the request.

The trial has faced numerous delays and setbacks, with two defense lawyers killed soon after it began and repeated outbursts in court by Saddam and Ibrahim slowing the proceedings.

But U.S. officials observing the court have said they expect the trial to speed up, with up to three sessions a week. The trial will resume Tuesday.

The special tribunal is preparing to start a second trial against Saddam on genocide charges in a 1980s military campaign against the Kurds known as "Anfal" in which an estimated 100,000 people were killed.

Bush proposes tighter security against aliens people this spring.

Republican lawmakers are deeply divided on what to do about illegal immigration.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid Harry Reid urged Bush on Monday to denounce a bill approved by the Republican-controlled House that would make all illegal immigrants subject to prosecution as felons and call for construction of a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border.

The president's own call for tougher border security is part of a broader plan to overhaul a system that he has described as inhumane, with desperate foreigners risking their lives for a chance to earn U.S. wages. The issue raises emotions on all sides, with many Americans and influential conservatives in Congress angry that so many foreigners are taking jobs and draining resources across the country.

Karl Rove, Bush's top political strategist, said law enforcement agents apprehend over 4,200 illegal aliens every day.

Bush was proposing a carrot-and-stick approach. Immigrants who follow the rules could be eligible for new temporary work permits that allow them to take low-paying jobs and have an eventual chance at citizenship. Those who flout the law and try to sneak in would find a border that is more secure and harder to cross, at least in theory, with National Guard troops supporting Border Patrol agents along the 2,000-mile line with Mexico.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the effort would use only "a very small percentage of the Guard," which numbers about 400,000 members around the country and is still heavily involved in the war in Iraq. There could be up to 6,000 troops used, according to a congressional official who had briefed on the plan.

Under Bush's proposal, formed in consultation with border-state governors who command the National Guard, Border Patrol agents would maintain primary responsibility for physically guarding the border. National Guard soldiers would not perform law enforcement duties, but would help in such areas as construction, surveillance and transportation, Snow said.

The White House hopes that the tougher security will be enough to get House conservatives to support the work permits and citizenship proposals that they have been opposed to. A bill that passed the House last year ignored those ideas and instead would increase criminal penalties for illegal immigrants and construct the long fence.

However, conservative Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions of Alabama said sending the National Guard to increase border security would indicate Bush "gets it" and would be helpful in allaying concerns of members who oppose Senate legislation that focuses on guest workers and potential citizenship.

The president has got to look the American people in the eye and he's got to tell them from his heart that he actually means to have a legal immigration system, that he's prepared to ask the Congress for the resources he needs to make that happen," Sessions said.

Practical jokes account for weekend theft

Friday May 12

A 12:54 a.m. fight that broke out at the Starbucks coffee shop on 71 North Pleasant St. resulted in the arrest of Sherley Duveste, 20, of 92 Cherry St., Brockton, for disorderly conduct.

A disturbance call was placed after loud voices reportedly were heard outside of the CVS at 76 North Pleasant St. Anthony E. Gibbs, 21, of 336 Front St., Chicopee, was arrested at 1:01 a.m. and charged with disorderly conduct.

William Hoysgaard, 24, of 81 Lake St., Sherborn, was arrested at 2:21 a.m. after police made a motor vehicle stop at 1 Main St. Hoysgaard was charged with operating under the influence of alcohol, and failure to stop/yield.

Lemuel Alvarado, 22, of 211 Arnold Ave., Springfield, was pulled over during a motor vehicle stop at 3:13 a.m. at 364 North Pleasant St. Alvarado was charged with unlicensed operation of a motor vehicle.

A phone call was placed to police at 9:22 a.m. after someone reportedly saw two women playing with a downed electrical wire at 19 North Pleasant St. The caller reported that the two were then both shocked by the wire but didn't require medical assistance.

Jonathan D. Bernashe, 24, of 165 Chicopee St., Granby was arrested at 9:03 p.m. for operating under the influence of liquor. Bernashe allegedly hit the medium on South Pleasant St. by Snell St., causing the left front tire to blow out. He was then given field sobriety tests that he reportedly failed.

Loud music and voices at 50 Tracy Circle spurred a noise complaint to police at 11:50 p.m. Police reportedly were met with very little cooperation from both guests and the residents of the apartment. Matthew Coyle, 21, of 16 Paquette St. Northampton, Christopher J. Bushey, 21, of 50 Tracy Circle were arrested and charged with unlawful noise. One minor was charged with disorderly conduct.

A disturbance call was placed to police at 11:38 p.m. at 11 Amity St. James Graham, 21, of 14 Walker Road A7, North Andover, was charged with disorderly conduct and his 1996 Honda Accord was towed to Amherst Towing.

Saturday May 13

Aleksander Moisey Murshteyn, 23, of 171 Feaning St., Amherst, was pulled over by police at 2:17 a.m. at 211 Lincoln St. after driving in the wrong direction down a one-way road. Murshteyn was charged with operating under the influence of liquor and a one-way street violation after police.

A deer was found incapacitated on the side of the road near 425 South Pleasant St. at 5:17 a.m. Police moved the deer to an open field where it was humanely put down.

Two males were reportedly seen stealing a patio table and appeared to be loading a gas grill into the bed of their white Dodge pick-up truck at 5:24 a.m. at Townehouse 15. Police investigated and found that the two were attempting to play a prank on some fellow Fitchburg friends who attended UMass by taking a table and grill and placing it at their parent's house in Fitchburg. There were no arrests.

A larceny call was placed to police at 6:27 p.m. from 4C Brandywine after a propane tank and a small table were reportedly stolen from the residence. It is believed the individuals involved were involved in a scavenger hunt.

BBC apologizes for interview identity mistake

By Danica Kirka
Associated Press

LONDON — The BBC interviewed the wrong Guy.

The network has apologized to its viewers for a studio mix up that resulted in a man mistakenly appearing on live television as Guy Kewney — an expert on Internet music downloads.

In fact the man was Guy Goma, a Congolese man applying for a technology-related job with the British Broadcasting Corp. Goma followed an employee to the studio after a mistake at a reception desk, the corporation said late Monday.

The BBC said it apologized to viewers for any confusion.

The case of mistaken identity occurred on May 8 — the day Britain's High Court awarded Apple Computer a victory in a lawsuit against Apple Corps, The Beatles' commercial arm.

In a reaction piece following the verdict, the BBC News 24 consumer affairs correspondent Karen Bowerman welcomed someone she believed was computer expert Kewney.

After she introduced him, there was a moment when Goma winced. He scrunched his face in panic and tried to open his mouth as if to explain.

"Were you surprised by this verdict today?" Bowerman asked.

"I'm very surprised to see the verdict come on me because I was not expecting that," he said in a heavy French accent, blinking in the studio lights. "When I came, they told me something else."

Nonplussed, he pressed on, growing more confident in his punditry as the interview progressed. He gamely delivered his opinion on the future of music downloads and cyber cafes following the landmark verdict.

Meanwhile, the real Kewney, who was waiting to be taken to the studio, looked up on a monitor and found another man in the interviewee's chair.

Consumers consider many factors when buying a computer

Marcil said.

Many pre-built computers don't come with Microsoft Office software, which is valuable for networking and priced around $150. Marcil said that freshman can start off with a basic system, as low as $99 for a used computer at College Pro. He also suggests that graduating seniors consider purchasing a new system compatible with requirements for work.

Rachel Vincent, a senior biochemistry major at UMass, said that her mother bought a custom-built Dell desktop when she was an incoming freshman. She wants to replace her 4-year-old system with a laptop, which currently outsell desktops according to Marcil.

"I think I'm just going to get a Dell online. That's the easiest way to do it," said Vincent who says she doesn't know anything about computers except that hers has a "big virus." The 21-year-old said that her boyfriend will help her get a Dell, which allows online shoppers to customize their system.

Systems for UMass freshman don't have to be the more expensive laptops, but they need a computer that works with the University network. If their system is too old, it may not be compatible with UMass.

A publication called, "Choosing the Right Computer: A Guide for Parents of UMass Amherst Students", was compiled by former OIT technical consultant Deborah Edwards. It describes some basic system requirements for computer use on campus.

In the 71 page guide, Edwards also explains how and where to buy a computer and who should fix broken equipment. She provides sample definitions of terminology. The guide also warns that technology comes out so quickly that computers are obsolete in six months and parents need to consider this in a purchase according to the guide.

"Remember to choose your system's components with future performance in mind. The computer system you purchase today should be upgradeable, that way you'll be able to adapt when the next wave of software and peripherals appears," said Edwards. She points out that even three to four-year-old computers might not work with the software for some of the University's degree programs.

A six-year-old computer is an antique according to www.dummies.com, affiliated with the popular "For Dummies" guides. To save money on a new computer purchase, the makers of the site suggest that consumers move old hardware to a new computer, if it's not antiquated yet. Hundreds of dollars can be saved by using an old monitor. A keyboard, mouse or printer can be transferred to a new computer as well.

Even though people should try to save money on a computer purchase, the FCIC recommends that people buy as much as they can afford. The price for an entry-level system is around $1,000 and high-end systems start around $3,000 according to the FCIC.

They also recommend that consumers separate computers into two types, those intended for graphics and those made for word processing. In addition, says the FCIC, consumers need to compare laptops and desktops, both of which can be used as a primary computer. Edwards and Marcil point out that laptops, though often bought for their convenience, also have their downsides. They aren't as upgradeable as desktops and repairs are more expensive.

Once consumers have figured out what they can afford and want, they can commit to not only a system but a dealer. Reputable dealers offer better warranties and service says the FCIC. Their computers "have succeeded because of the high-quality of their machines and their service."

Also, there are two more considerations that the FCIC elaborates on: mail order purchases or local dealers. The former are less expensive and customer service takes place over the phone. Also, consumers will have to ship out the computer for dealer repairs. Locally bought computers might cost more, but the dealers often provide free demonstrations and answer questions in person. An online worksheet at the FCIC Web site, www.pueblo.gsa.gov, is available to guide people through their purchase.

Even though computers grow more and more complex, people should make an effort to keep up and understand the inner workings of the technology world. The FCIC says that consumers who don't know anything about computer language, like the difference between RAM and Mouse, need to brush up on terminology. And, Marcil points out that hardware becomes obsolete because of consumer demands. This makes computers obsolete.

"Our expectations of our computers is limited," Marcil said.

Deadly Indonesian volcano erupts

By Chris Brummitt
Associated Press

MOUNT MERAPI, Indonesia — Mount Merapi erupted violently Monday, sending searing gas clouds and burning rocks down its scorched flanks and threatening villagers who refused to leave because of ancient mystical beliefs.

The activity triggered renewed panic and fresh evacuations of some closest to the crater, but others ignored urgent warnings to leave.

The volcano in the heart of densely populated Java Island had been rumbling for weeks, spewing ash high into the air and pushing lava to the surface, where it has formed a large unstable dome.

On Saturday, authorities declared the highest danger alert, triggering mandatory evacuations for some 4,500 residents.

A sharp increase in activity Monday saw near hourly surges of clouds containing volcanic gas, rock fragments and other debris that tumbled as far as 2.5 miles down the mountain's western slopes — twice as far as a day earlier, vulcanologists said.

"I am panicking this time," said Katimi, a mother of three and one of thousands who boarded vans and trucks to seek shelter in mosques, government buildings and schools. "Merapi appears angry," she said.

Hospitals and clinics were preparing for the worst.

Merapi, the most active of 129 live volcanoes in Indonesia, sent out a deadly cloud of gas that incinerated 60 people in 1994, and about 1,300 people died in a 1930 eruption.

"We are prepared for some of the things that we may deal with, (from our experience) in the previous eruption in 1994 — treating burn injuries caused by the hot clouds, and also treating broken bones," said Ning, the head of a local medical center. Like many Indonesians, he uses one name.

The clouds of volcanic ash, gas and debris, known to experts as pyroclastic flows, are the biggest threat to residents, who are drawn to Merapi's slopes because its fertile volcanic soil makes for bumper crops.

"They are like a glowing avalanche that just incinerate everything in their path," said Lyman Jaques, from Australia's geoscience agency. "There is a real risk for people living on its flanks."

Scientists warn the unstable lava dome could collapse, sending out a deadly cloud of gas like the one in 1994.

Residents call the clouds "Wedhus Gembel," or "shaggy sheep clouds," because they resemble tightly curled balls of wool as they avalanche down the mountain at speeds of more than 60 mph.

Widi Sutikno, the official coordinating the government's emergency operation, commended those who recognized the danger and left Monday.

Militants shoot down U.S. helicopter in Iraq

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Insurgents shot down a U.S. helicopter south of Baghdad and killed two soldiers, bringing the weekend death toll of American service members to seven, the U.S. military said Monday.

The military also said American forces killed more than 40 insurgents, including a known al-Qaida operative, in five raids south of Baghdad in an area commonly known as the "Triangle of Death" because of the large number of insurgent attacks.

Insurgents also launched new attacks Monday, firing more than 30 mortar rounds at a British military camp in southern Iraq, wounding four soldiers. Elsewhere, 19 Iraqis were killed, including eight police officers in southern Basra and one in a roadside bomb attack that hit an oil tanker in Baghdad, sending a large plume of black smoke billowing over the capital.

Four of the U.S. military raids occurred on Saturday and Sunday around Latifiyah, 20 miles south of Baghdad, the U.S. command said.

American soldiers and helicopters killed 16 suspected al-Qaida insurgents, including one militant who allegedly had led an April 1 militant attack that downed an AH-64 Apache helicopter and killed the two soldiers aboard in the Youssifiyah area, about 12 miles south of Baghdad.

A new al-Qaida group had claimed responsibility for downing that Apache and posted a gruesome video on the Web showing men dragging the burning body of what appeared to be an American soldier across a field as they shouted "Allahu akbar!" or "God is great!"

During the Latifiyah raids, U.S. forces killed al-Qaida member Abu Mustafa and 15 other suspected al-Qaida associates, the U.S. command said. Abu Mustafa was wanted for "his leadership role" in the shooting down of an Apache helicopter on April 1, the U.S. command said.

The weekend raids also wounded four Iraqi civilians and two suspected militants, and detained eight suspected insurgents, the military said. The wounded included two women, one of whom was pregnant, and two children, the U.S. military said. All of them were treated or were evacuated to an American military hospital.

In a separate raid Sunday, U.S. forces and American planes and helicopters attacked an insurgent haven in Youssifiyah, killing 25 insurgents, detaining four and destroying three safe houses and a vehicle loaded with weapons and ammunition, the U.S. command said. One woman and two girls were wounded in the raid.

When U.S. helicopters, including one carrying two of the wounded, were leaving the scene, insurgents shot down a U.S. Apache and killed the two American soldiers aboard, the U.S. command said.

Other Americans killed over the weekend included two U.S. Marines who died Sunday during unspecified "enemy action" in Anbar Province, the area of western Iraq that is the heart of the Sunni-Arab led insurgency. Two U.S. Army soldiers also died Sunday in a roadside bomb attack in Baghdad, and another one died in a roadside bomb in the capital on Saturday.

The seven fatalities raised to at least 2,443 the number of U.S. military personnel who have died since the war began in 2003, according to a count by The Associated Press.

In other attacks Monday, insurgents fired more than 30 mortar rounds at a British military camp in southern Iraq, wounding four soldiers.

The mortar barrage occurred Monday at Britain's Camp Abu Naji in Amarah, 180 miles southeast of Baghdad, said British spokeswoman Capt. Kelly Goodall. One of the British soldiers received a serious leg injury, but the other wounds were minor, said Holly Wheeler, a Ministry of Defense spokeswoman in London.

The attack raised the total of British casualties in the past nine days to six soldiers killed and five wounded — all in southern Iraq, an area that has traditionally been far more peaceful that central and northern Iraq where U.S. forces are based.

On Saturday, two British soldiers were killed and one was wounded by a roadside bomb as they patrolled in their armored vehicle north of Basra city.

Convenience store customers upset by summer closings

to public employees.

"I think Auxiliary Services wants to be for profit, but that's not what the University is about," Johnson said.

Koehler says many of her regular customers, including many UMass faculty members, are upset that the stores will close. She adds that once a business drives its customers away, "it's hard to bring them back."

This month, a manager at the Franklin store received disciplinary action after the manager placed a written petition in the store for customers to sign, asking them their opinions on the store's closure. The manager received a written warning from Auxiliary Services, which confiscated the petition.

Johnson says the union is trying to appeal the written warning. She questions whether the confiscation was an unfair labor practice or a violation of the manager's First Amendment rights.

Ganguli said the manager was reprimanded because "That's not part of [the] job description to agitate customers."

Meanwhile, several employees are scrambling to find new jobs for the summer after being given 30-days notice that their employment would end.

Victim statements used in more trials

voluntarily relive the anguish of their losses, and in a public setting?

Interviews with family members show the reasons are varied. Vengeance is only one possible motivation. For some, it is a feeling of empowerment, knowing they have a say in the process. For others, the goal is facing the defendant and showing that their loved one was a human being. The very process of testifying may be therapeutic in itself. And many see it as a way to give a voice to their departed loved one.

But no one will say it gives them "closure." And that, say advocates, should be obvious.

"People are missing the point if they think anything that happens in a courtroom brings closure," says Steve Siegel, who oversees victim services at the Denver district attorney's office and worked on both the Columbine High School shooting and the Oklahoma City bombing case. "We can give support towards healing. But there's no going back to what once was."

Gahan, who says he lost in 21-year-old Jimmy a best friend as well as a son, knows how true that is.

"The word 'closure' is used far too generously," he says. "It'll never happen."

Sitting by those picture windows at his home, Gahan realized that his job at last Monday's sentencing hearing for Daniel Biechele, a former tour manager who set off the pyrotechnics that led to the fire, was to give his son a voice.

"At the end it came to me: I had to ask for some mercy for this person," says Gahan, who believes the defendant was "way down in the chain of responsibility" for the tragedy.

"That's what Jimmy would have wanted," Gahan says.

Just as Gahan wanted a voice for his son, so Dan Levy, a decade ago and across the country in Arizona, wanted a voice for his brother. Howard Levy, a father of two young children, was murdered as he waited to play basketball early one weekend morning. Then, at the hospital, as his family stood sobbing upon learning Howard was dead, an intensive care nurse admonished them: "You people really need to keep it down."

The experience thrust Levy into a new profession: victims' advocate. He is a full-time adviser to Gov. Janet Napolitano on victims' issues.

"It was an opportunity for me to talk about who my brother was," Levy says of the impact statement he gave at the killer's sentencing even though a life term had already been set. "I wanted the guy to know it wasn't just a 'victim' — it was Howard Levy."

Every state has some provision for victim impact information at sentencing, although a few limit it to a written statement. On the federal level, a 1991 Supreme Court case held that such statements do not violate a defendant's rights to a fair trial. The idea is gaining hold in Britain; a pilot project began earlier this year.

The Zacarias Moussaoui terrorism case presented a unique situation because of the sheer number of victims of the 9/11 attacks. About 45 relatives spoke for the prosecution, trying to convince the jury that Moussaoui deserved death. Only by implication, though — the rules barred them from speaking about the defendant or about the penalty.

C. Lee Hanson described talking on the phone to his son, Peter, the moment before his plane crashed into the World Trade Center, telling him, his wife and their 2-year-old daughter. He said Peter told him: "Don't worry, Dad, if it happens, it will be quick." Hanson also testified about the pain of retrieving DNA samples to identify remains: "I was picking hair out of brushes, putting toothbrushes into bags."

Another was Blake Allison, who kissed his wife, Anna, goodbye at the Boston airport, went to work and later learned her plane had crashed into the trade center. And yet Allison did not testify for the prosecution. He spoke for the defense, along with about a dozen other family members, in what lawyers call a real rarity of the justice system.

Allison says his opposition to the death penalty was only one motivation. "Also, I felt the government was prosecuting the wrong guy because they had to punish somebody," says Allison, 56, of Lyme, N.H. He also was concerned about Moussaoui's mental state.

List of Guantanamo detainees released

By Andrew Selsky
Associated Press

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — The Pentagon gave The Associated Press on Monday the first list of everyone who has been held at Guantanamo Bay, more than four years after it opened the detention center in Cuba. But none of the most notorious terrorist suspects were included, raising questions about where America's most dangerous prisoners are being held.

The handover marks the first time that everyone who has been held at Guantanamo Bay in the Bush administration's war on terror has been identified, according to Navy Lt. Cmdr. Chris Peppler. A total 201 of the names have never been disclosed by the Defense Department before.

"This list takes us one step closer to our goal of fully reporting who has been swept into U.S. military custody in Guantanamo, and how they and their cases are being handled," said David Tomlin, the AP's assistant general counsel, adding that the Pentagon did not give all the information the AP sought in a Freedom of Information Act request.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the names of all detainees held at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base were previously kept classified because of "the security operation as well as the intelligence operation that takes place down there."

In a briefing in Washington, he did not explain why the Pentagon did not contest the AP's request for the release of the names, as it did with previous Freedom of Information Act requests for prisoner information. Just last month, the Pentagon released 558 names of current and former detainees to AP.

The release will help lawyers and other advocates track who has been held at the base and find former detainees to help investigate allegations of abuse, said Priti Patel, an attorney for New York-based Human Rights First.

While the release of Guantanamo names is welcome, human rights groups also want to learn the identities of all those held in Iraq, Afghanistan and secret locations, Patel said.

"There's still much more in darkness," she said.

For example, the United States has not disclosed where it is holding Khalid Shaikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibh, who allegedly plotted the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and other captured top al-Qaida figures. The list released Monday also does not specify what has happened to former Guantanamo Bay detainees.

The fate of some is documented. All British nationals held at Guantanamo Bay, for example, were transferred back to Britain. But what has become of dozens of other detainees was not known.

Some could be free. Others could be in secret U.S. detention centers, or in torture cells of persons in other countries.

Jumana Musa, an official with Amnesty International's Washington office, said there have long been rumors that the CIA has a secret prison at Guantanamo Bay, an isolated base along the Caribbean which Cuba granted to Washington by treaty a century ago.

But Peppler, in an e-mail to the AP, emphatically ruled that out.

"Absolutely not," Peppler said. "There are no other detention facilities other than those under DoD control in Guantanamo Bay."

The AP sought the names, photos and other details of current and former Guantanamo Bay detainees through a Freedom of Information Act request on Jan. 18. After the Pentagon didn't respond, the AP filed a lawsuit in March seeking compliance.

The Pentagon later agreed to turn over much of the information. Motions are pending in court for additional information, including the height and weight of the roughly 480 detainees still at Guantanamo Bay to assist with news coverage of a hunger strike.

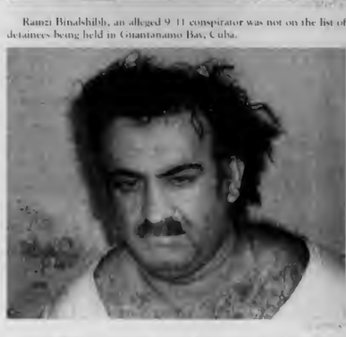
The Pentagon refused to release that information, arguing that medical records are private. The military said the hunger strike began in August and has involved a maximum of 131 detainees.

The Pentagon also argued that releasing photos of current detainees would damage U.S. intelligence gathering. Releasing pictures would make it easier for al-Qaida to retaliate against detainees suspected of cooperating with interrogators, said Paul B. Reuter, the director of the Joint Intelligence Group at Guantanamo. That would make it harder for the U.S. to collect intelligence, Reuter said in a May 10 affidavit filed in response to the AP's Freedom of Information Act suit.

"No human intelligence sources interested in cooperating with the United States officials under any hope of anonymity will be willing to do so if their photographs and names are publicly released," he said.

The U.S. military says 759 detainees have been held at Guantanamo Bay since the detention center began taking prisoners in the U.S. war on terror in January 2002. About 275 have been released or transferred.

The U.S. has filed charges against 10 detainees.



The Pentagon says another 136 detainees at Guantanamo have been approved for release or transfer, but their departure in some cases has been delayed as Washington tries to persuade their home countries to accept them and receive assurances they won't be tortured or mistreated.

In April, the Department of Defense released to the AP the names of 558 detainees after it had a Combatant Status Review Tribunal, which determines whether they are "enemy combatants" who should be held.

That list, however, did not include about 200 detainees who were released or transferred before the Combatant Status Review Tribunals began in July 2004. Those names were among those listed Monday.

Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged 9/11 conspirator was not on the list of detainees being held in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, another accused conspirator also did not appear on the detainee list, making some wonder where he was being held.

Democracy in Iraq without the U.S.

Mike Sances

Last Monday, UMass Amherst was paid a visit by probably the most courageous person I have ever met. He is an Iraqi named Samir Adil, and he is president of the Iraq Freedom Congress. Samir was speaking in the Pioneer Valley as part of a two-week tour of the East Coast, sponsored by the American Friends Service Committee.

Some background on the IFC: formed in March of 2005, the group opposes the American occupation, Islamic terrorism, and sectarianism – what Samir describes as a civil war that has been going on since the invasion began. In terms of solutions, the IFC also opposes handing Iraq over to the United Nations. Instead, they argue that "an independent, democratic, secular, non-ethnic and mass organization…founded to guarantee the right of the people of Iraq to determine freely the future political regime in Iraq" is their country's only hope for survival.

Not surprisingly, the IFC's is not the safest political outlook to have in Iraq right now. This is probably why, according to Samir, Al-Qaeda in Iraq recently released a statement condemning the IFC, which opposes the use of violence to achieve their goals, as more dangerous than the American military. It is also why Samir, who lives in Baghdad, is forced to live daily with 12 bodyguards, risking his life by traveling to the United States to speak.

Yet for all democracy rhetoric thrown around in the American media, the IFC, or even the mere idea of a group like the IFC, is not so popular in this country either, as Samir complained about in his talk. That is understandable among supporters of the American government's quest to "impose our will" (Colin Powell's phrase) on the Iraqi people, but how often do you hear the idea of a secular, democratic, mass-based political party offered as a solution by the antiwar movement? I never have, nor, I am embarrassed to say, has the idea ever occurred to me as someone opposed to the war.

The media here present an image of a society hopelessly divided into three ethnic groups, Shiite, Sunni, and Kurd, with a paralyzed political process and a government that sometimes seems like it is only the shadow cast by the death squads. In terms of leadership, the options portrayed are limited to the American generals, terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, or whoever the unelected president happens to be this week.

The Iraqis themselves are seen as victims, disempowered pawns on some global chess board of terror, and generally ignorant of democracy. On the rare occasions when they are given a voice, it is invariably one filled with mourning, fear, rage, or submission. Even the triumphant "purple finger" images from the January 2005 elections were a form of infantilization, when you think about it, since the Iraqis' decisive role in bringing them about was eclipsed by the lie that President Bush actually wanted elections to occur.

Samir managed to relate the dire human rights situation in Iraq without sounding like a victim. He described in passing the horrors that would be done to him, simply because his beard happened to be cut in a Western style, should he make the mistake of traveling to the southern parts of Iraq. But even worse is what he said they would do to him in the western provinces. First they would shave off the offending facial hair, then cut his throat, then slice open his stomach, pull out his insides and toss acid on them.

Samir sees his life as valuable only insofar as he is the voice of a popular movement. If he dies, he says, the movement dies.

He enjoys coming to the United States, he says, simply because he is able to take a walk outside without armed guards. In Iraq, however, the guards are not for his protection. Samir sees his life as valuable only insofar as he is the voice of a popular movement. If he dies, he says, the movement dies.

The message he left the audience with was one of courage, of defiance of both fear and death. Above all it was a message of hope. A friend remarked afterward how he suddenly felt stupid complaining about the difficulties he faced as an organizer at UMass. Indeed, a story like Samir's certainly makes questions like "what can we do?" sound obscene, letting alone complaints about life in general.

But what Samir's story also puts in perspective is the claim that there is no "good news" coming out of Iraq, and that the media focus too much on the negative. Unfortunately, that debate defines what is "good" or "bad" solely in terms of what is good or bad for the American government, and therefore is concerned with democracy and human rights only when they coincide with the interests of power.

It is therefore not surprising that the IFC is not well-known to the American media, despite the fact that Samir's is the most hopeful story I have heard out of Iraq since the war began. For those so thoroughly indoctrinated with the rightness of the mission to "impose our will" on Iraq, a viable nonviolent opposition to the occupation would be very grim news indeed.

How dare you ask me if I have a job!

Colin Richardson

There are many reasons to be proud of me. I am an upstanding citizen with no criminal record, I just finished my thesis, and I am graduating in four years. And yet, you have the gall to ask me if I have a job? I don't and I'm sick of you asking. You fellow graduate, you parent, you society. Stop asking me. I am unemployed and, as far as I can tell, unemployable too.

I don't see why I am so unemployable. I am a (somewhat) intelligent person who is about to receive his Bachelor of Arts degree in history from an accredited university. Over the last four years I have developed and honed my writing and analysis skills as well as learned a critical and nuanced understanding of American and European history. The problem is that I have not learned how to lie effectively (like the soon-to-be-rich graduates of the School of Management.) Is it such a problem that I resist selling-out? Is it such a societal problem that I have a conscience? Is it wrong that my soul has no price-tag?

My morals are not completely rigid though. They do not preclude eating, having medical insurance, and sleeping inside of a roofed structure. Our system makes me think that socialists really had it right – who says the Soviet Union was a failure? I bet they didn't hassle their proud college graduate comrades. They didn't have an unemployment problem.

Yet here, in the "land of the free" and the "home of the brave," I have to look down society's shotgun of shame. I am not going to walk the plank of indentured corporate servitude no matter how much the cubicle sharks below want me to. I will not be the churn in their capitalist feeding frenzy.

So what to make of my futureless life? Am I doomed to live in a cardboard box? Will I never have the pleasure of taking part in a business luncheon? Will every Friday be a casual one? Will my collection of power ties hang forever impotent? Will my only colleagues be the people in front of and behind me in the unemployment line?

Our system makes me think that socialists really had it right–who says the Soviet Union was a failure? I bet they didn't hassle their proud college graduate comrades. They didn't have an unemployment problem.

Odds are.

Yet does this amount to a problem? No, it doesn't. My lack of a Mcjob is not your McProblem so why don't you get off my McCase.

It is not a problem because nothing is wrong. I can enjoy all the pleasures that are denied to denizens of the fast-paced competitive business world. I finally have time to read, take walks in the woods, and write poetry – wouldn't Thoreau be proud? Just because those activities don't provide dental insurance shouldn't diminish their values in society's green dollar-signed eyes.

One problem is the insistence that a college graduate's worth is defined by their job and not by the content of their heart. Another problem is that college graduates are herded like cattle into a cubicle world where they are turned into automatons and the water cooler is their only diversion from the gray purgatory that they live in for 40 hours each week.

There are many consequences to my resistance to America's workaholic culture. I am constantly forced into socially awkward situations because instead of making idiotic small-talk about what accounting firm has hired me, I become indignant and "belligerent." My self-esteem is mercilessly attacked by the jackals from the media who think of unemployment as a scourge of society rather than a self-bestowed blessing. Jobs are the curse that Satan gave man, while unemployment is the gift that man gave to himself.

If society is to label us all then let us take a look at what we are. There are the employed, the unemployed and we college students who exist in a hallowed, albeit brief, state of limbo. So why should I have a job, I'm a still a college student for at least 13 more days. So how dare you ask me until then.

Scientific hypothesis about philosophy

Matt Sloan

I have always been a fan of those late night philosophical debates on the unanswerable questions of life and morality. Some of my fondest memories have been discussing intently, over an orange sunrise, the meaning of the important and intangible topics from science and society, to death and dreams, to religion and reality. In these discussions I am free to search through my own thoughts and take in the ideas and retorts of a companion who promenades down the paths I missed or forgot or never knew existed.

I would have been a philosophy major if I had not been so concerned with others' opinions of such a choice. I was fearful that majoring in philosophy would lead me only into the caverns of my own mind, transforming me into a college graduate who would be intent on living the ideal bohemian lifestyle: smiling on the street corners of big cities at the fearful, fancy-suited unenlightened population that would avoid making eye contact with my future, bearded self. A noble life, perhaps, but how could I explain it to my wife? I decided to pass on the philosophy degree and, after much soul searching, I found biology to be an adequate alternative, one I considered more socially acceptable.

As time rushes me through the gauntlet that is the path to achieving a biology degree I come across contradictions which tug at my re-consideration of the academic choice I have made. Increasingly I worry about the nobility and true motivations for my decision to pursue biology.

Philosophy is described as "the love and pursuit of wisdom by intellectual means and moral self-discipline." This may be one of the most poetic dictionary definitions I have come across. The philosophy graduate leaves with a Bachelor of Arts degree, certifying the bearer's aptitude for creativity.

Biology "is the science of life and living organisms," where science is defined as "the observation, identification, description, experimental investigation, and theoretical explanation of phenomena." This definition is cold, dry and far less poetic. Those who have majored in this subject leave with the university's stamp as Bachelor of Science, a seemingly distinguished honor.

Philosophy is an art of logic, careful consideration and argument. To prove anything in this realm, various tests of validity and soundness must be passed, with one's own opinions weighing heavily in on the conclusion. For example, to determine an argument's validity one could claim "If A, then B must follow" and go on to say "A happens," logically, B must come next. To determine the soundness of this argument the philosopher must ask if they believe with the statements set forth and why or why not. It is this step that makes philosophy an art, and an extension of the humanity.

The divide between philosophy and her daughter sciences will likely widen in the coming years as technology advances and brings with it more powerful concerns of what makes a person human.

Biology is the science of patience, determination and strategy. Philosophy is the driving force of biology, as biologists work hard to address the claims of the philosophers. Biology, however, lacks the personal review of conclusions, the integration of individual belief into one's work that lies at the heart of philosophy. If a scientist desires to perform an experiment to prove their individual belief, it would be considered "directed research" and found to be weak evidence by the scientific community. Strong evidence comes from an impartial scientist guarded from tampering with and blinded to the results of the experiment. The outcome is not at the whim of the experimenter's desires but the laws of nature.

Philosophy, then, becomes mother of the sciences. Ideas arise in philosophy and scientists work diligently to prove or disprove them by trial in the physical world. The major divide between philosophy and science is a principle known as Ockham's Razor. Ockham's Razor claims that if multiple, competing theories exist to explain a phenomenon, the simpler one is a better solution.

However, just last week my Neuroendocrinology professor told my class, "If a solution to a problem appears simple and logical, it is probably incorrect." He said this in explaining why the idea of a "brain center" is out-of-date and helped confound neuroscience research for decades because it oversimplified the way the brain functions.

The divide between philosophy and her daughter sciences will likely widen in the coming years as technology advances and brings with it more powerful concerns of what makes a person human. Some believe that the morality of scientific discovery is stretching thin. People are now deemed heretics for refuting the widely held presumptions of science. Scientific fanatics now make ridiculous claims of the life-enhancing properties of drugs and surgical procedures, ignoring the repercussions of these treatments or advocating for their use before definitive testing has been completed.

Claims to look younger, feel better, grow stronger, live longer, or build superior children all confront my understanding of what makes me human. I have weaknesses that I am working to overcome in my life in order to learn how to raise the best children I am capable of raising. This makes me human. I do not want to teach my children that it is science, not oneself, which will solve life's problems.

The truth is that sciences have risen and fallen in the past, but philosophy has never died. Eventually modern science will fail to fulfill its promises of prolonged life and happiness and the future will not be free of suffering and sadness. Then, the world may see that a new means for pursuing wisdom has not been created. No greater security in humanity will be provided. No better answer to the purpose of life will be available. So many today are devoted to and crusade for science, but, sadly, they are the apostles for this new religion, which is plagued by the same old questions.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

IMMIGRANTS ARE PEOPLE TOO

I had to respond to some serious flaws in the Ed-Op piece on Friday May 12, 2006 titled "Reforming the debate on reform." I agree with much of Mr. Maslow's points, but at the same time I believe his focus is incorrect.

Likening illegal immigration to stealing is a little off, but stealing does have a lot to do with the debate.

When American companies move into a country like Mexico and have the audacity to pay their workers far less than a living wage, that is stealing quality of life. One such company guilty of this kind of stealing is Kimberly Clark, who has laid off hundreds of workers since 2004 here in the US and moved their factories to Mexico. Why is this company in particular important? Because the sponsor of the Immigration bill that is causing all this debate around reform, (HR 4437) James Sensenbrenner, makes his living off of the assets of Kimberly Clark, a company his father started after WWII when he invented the Maxi pad.

Mr. Sensenbrenner is living the Capitalist American dream, creating jobs to help his company make more money. If the Mexicans come here for higher wages, then who will work for less wages in Mexico? That would defeat the purpose of outsourcing jobs to Mexico. This in my opinion is what the debate should be about.

I am distressed that it is ok for a Collegian columnist to lump people into a word like "illegals." Immigrants are people. People who need food and shelter just like natural born Americans. This debate is centered on the economy, but it's directly about people. Mr. Maslow said, "They (immigrants) should prove they can productively add to American society and could not make a living in their country." Any immigrant who comes to America to work, legally or illegally, has already proven productivity and need. By working a job, even with our low minimum wage, they contribute to society, and by keeping that low paying job they show just how desperately they need that paycheck.

If our minimum wage is high enough to attract people from all over the globe, we must ask why they are leaving the countries where the goods we use are produced. Are low prices worth the immigration debate? I hope the middle of the road doesn't think so.

PERVADING IGNORANCE

This is the first time I have ever truly felt the need to write to the Daily Collegian. The column "How to advertise at UMass" can be translated into the ways in which racist ideologies penetrates our discussion around diversity. Clearly all events on campus face lack of advertisement and student participation. But perpetuating this attitude of "you come to me/them and us" is no way to addresses issues pertaining to community.

People of color have always been looked upon to come up with solutions to diversity problems. This shifts the burden of fixing the effects of white supremacy onto people of color. For example, the use of the term "colored people" instead of "people of color" may seem like a small grammatical error, but has been historically used as a mechanism to dehumanize people of color. Don't get me wrong: it's not about being "politically correct"; it's about being sincere and genuine.

If you want to get to know an organization or group on campus you need to just ask. I'm white and I have been to many "cultural events" on campus this year and if I can find these events so can everyone else. The ignorance of the article disgusts and insults me, but most of all I feel embarrassement and shame for the columnist.

GRADUATE POWER

The recent letter by Assistant Professor Mark Corner contained some misleading statements about the Graduate Employee Organization's support of the UMass Anti-War Coalition's demand that UMass refuse Department of Defense funding. He writes, "… this support was gained over the objections of many students from the sciences." As a graduate student from the sciences who participated in GEO's debate on this issue, I can speak to the accuracy of Corner's assertion.

Because GEO is a democratic organization, the question of whether to support the Anti-War Coalition's demands was debated and voted on at a membership meeting, at which all GEO members are entitled to a vote.

Although Corner claims that "graduate research assistants from the sciences tend not to be the most politically vocal members of graduate student unions," GEO members who were opposed to the demands did not need to be "vocal"; they merely needed to attend a meeting and cast a vote.

At the March membership meeting, there was vigorous debate on the issue of whether UMass should accept Department of Defense funding, with graduate employees from Corner's computer science department presenting a strong case for opposing the demands. Ultimately, the demands were endorsed by a margin of six votes. Graduate employees from the sciences could be found voting to support, voting to oppose, and abstaining. My point is that if even seven members who were opposed to the demands had bothered to attend the meeting, the endorsement would have been voted down.

This is democracy in action, and I encourage my fellow graduate employees in the sciences to begin to make their voices heard in their labor union.

'Alias' and its beautiful spy end their run

By Bridget Byrne
Associated Press

BURBANK, Calif. — "Alias" is coming in from the cold.

"I think we have done these characters justice and to do any more would be pushing it," says series star Jennifer Garner, who plays double-agent Sydney Bristow, perhaps TV's most gorgeous female spy since Diana Rigg played Emma Peel on the '60s British series "The Avengers."

After five seasons, the ABC series that revitalized the espionage genre with a visually dazzling combination of glamour, angst and trickery concludes Monday, May 22, with a pair of episodes (9 p.m. EDT).

The brainchild of J. J. Abrams (who has since created ABC's hit drama "Lost" and directed "Mission: Impossible III"), "Alias" leaves behind a loyal, cult-like group of fans who understood the minutia of the double-dealing plot twists.

Yet mainstream viewers were often left scratching their heads over the spies' constantly shifting alliances between good and evil, not to mention their occasional faked deaths.

Show runner and executive producer Jeff Pinkner says it's "always been a family drama" and has "always played with the question of whether or not Sydney Bristow had a choice in what she was doing in her life ... fate versus free will."

The role made Garner an A-list star and her private life media fodder. Supermarket tabs tracked her divorce from "Felicity's" Scott Foley, her dating of "Alias" co-star Michael Vartan, her marriage last year to film star Ben Affleck and the November birth of their daughter, Violet.

Simply clad in black, action-star work clothes, the gracious, fresh-faced actress arrived promptly for lunch at the Mickey Mouse-themed Rotunda restaurant on the Walt Disney Studios lot, where the final episodes of "Alias" were in production.

Pinkner joined her and they shared feelings about the bonds that develop among cast and crew during the series run.

"This show will always be the backdrop to me growing up and I did it with these people. They've seen me struggle through stuff, figure stuff out, struggle through it again," said Garner, now 34. "They have been enormously kind to me the entire time and have done nothing but facilitate my growth, and been very patient."

That included her real-life pregnancy, which was worked into the plot, with Bristow giving birth to a daughter, Isabelle, in the April 19 episode.

Filming that sequence felt "too intimate," Garner said. "It was a horrible scene to shoot. I felt ridiculous. I kept saying to the crew, 'This wasn't what it was like. I wasn't like this. I was very calm.'"

Certainly more fun for the actress over the years were the many disguises Bristow adopted to go undercover, including "hundreds and thousands of dollars worth of wigs," Garner recalled. Her favorite was "the blonde bob," which she donned, along with blue contacts, to pose as a Nordic beauty. "It's the only time I've ever felt, 'I wish I was this person.'"

She also mastered snippets of many foreign languages, the hardest being Czechoslovak.

And Garner is proud to say she performed many of her own stunts, though she's miffed that as her fame grew so also did Disney's insistence on stunt doubles.

She said she had wanted to do a "descender" in one of the final episodes, where "you're rigged in a harness. Couldn't be safer. A hundred and fifty feet. I've done higher than that several times."

But she was told insurance wouldn't cover her. "I was crushed. I was so bummed."

So on this day, she was happy to be going back after lunch to shoot a rappelling scene, even though "it's just a wussy thing."

Pinkner co-wrote one of the final episodes, but, teasingly, would only say, "People die; people live."

However, he assures the conclusion honors Bristow's ongoing romance with CIA agent Michael Vaughn (Vartan) and her relationship with her parents, particularly her father, double agent Jack Bristow (Victor Garber).

The final episodes also pay off the mythology of the show, based on the mysterious prophecies of 15th century seer Milo Ramhaldi, and add another kink to the machinations of treacherous spymaster Arvin Sloane (Ron Rifkin).

Garner admitted to some ambivalence as production on the series drew to a close.

"I feel very much like a college senior," she said. "Kinda, 'When will this ever end?' I'm never going to get out of here!' and at the same time, 'Oh, don't let it end. Who am I without it? I don't want it to end! I love these people.'"

Jennifer Garner's last performances as Sydney Bristow will air on ABC on Monday, May 22 in the two final episodes of "Alias."

Gnarls Barkley, Raconteurs can't live up to their hype

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

I've just finished reading a thoroughly researched but badly edited and only slightly insightful biography of Elvis Costello called "Complicated Shadows," the last hundred pages of which are devoted to the mercurial artist's prolonged era of collaboration.

Costello with the Brosky Quartet, Costello with Burt Bacharach, Costello with guitarist Bill Frisell, with Swedish mezzo-soprano Anne Sofie Von Otter, with the Dirty Dozen Brass Band, the Jazz Passengers, occasionally even the Attractions — the list goes on and on. And it's still growing. His next album, "The River in Reverse" (due June 6), finds Costello mining the soulful sound of New Orleans alongside one of that city's most famous sons, Allen Toussaint.

Yet to read "Complicated Shadows" you'd think that all of Costello's collaborations were critical failures and commercial disappoints — which, on the latter front, they were. And the number of such experiments regardless of the artists involved — that have gone on to remain treasured works can be counted on two hands at most. In rock and soul, anyway, these things usually amount to curious larks or poorly conceived attempts at forming supergroups.

Which brings me to arguably the year's most hyped new albums: "St. Elsewhere," the debut from Gnarls Barkley, a pairing of DJ Danger Mouse (of "The Grey Album" notoriety) and Cee-Lo Green, formerly of the Goodie Mob, and "Broken Boy Soldiers" from the Raconteurs, a new group featuring Jack White of the White Stripes and underrated power-popper Brendan Benson trading licks and vocals, while the rhythm section from the Greenhornes, Jack Lawrence and Patrick Keeler, anchors the proceedings.

I should have known that neither album would measure up to the incessant buzz that has trumpeted their arrival, with the Raconteurs' very slight work (in stores Tuesday) a particular letdown.

It's unfair to come down too harshly on something clearly born from such a freewheeling spirit, and I'll admit that the single "Steady, As She Goes" — which steals part of its feel from Joe Jackson's "Is She Really Going Out With Him?" — is a guilty pleasure.

But there's little else about "Broken Boy Soldiers" worth recommending, and much of it is so derivative of a variety of '60s influences I'm surprised White or Benson would attach their names to it without insisting they're just joshing.

"I'm going back to school today," White sings across the title track's Cream-y gallop. "I'm done ripping myself off." And so he and his cohorts rip off everyone else. "Hands" cops from late-era Beatles, "Level" pushes Hendrixian fuzz to the fore. There are traces of Donavon-ish acoustic drone, electric-piano-tinged Band-y balladry, and lots of trippy back-masking on the final cut, "Blue Veins," which could pass for an outtake from the first Led Zeppelin album.

Granted, as with the Gnarls Barkley disc, it's easy to get caught up in the sheer sonic force of it all — set aside reservations about why such a detour is happening right now and just enjoy these rehashes for what they are. The Raconteurs don't sleepwalk through this, after all. But neither do they generate anything as stirring as a proper White Stripes or Benson album. It's just fairly disposable neo-psychedelic playfulness that doesn't deserve more than a footnote in its makers' discographies.

And yet it's being sold to the public as if it were major. Ditto "St. Elsewhere," which at least is more futuristic and daring, coming off like a schizoid Outkast concept disc about madness, murder and depression, or perhaps an extension of the post-apocalyptic work DM did on the last Gorillaz project.

After all, the duo hides behind costumes, appearing in public in photos as droogs from "A Clockwork Orange" or the geeks from "Napoleon Dynamite" or Wayne & Garth from "Wayne's World." At Coachella, of course, where those who could see the show were suitably bowled over, the expanded Gnarls Barkley ensemble emerged as characters from "The Wizard of Oz."

Like the Raconteurs, the Gnarls team has already impacted radio — on the other side of the pond, that is, where the brilliantly soulful "Crazy" rocketed to the top of the charts based almost entirely on massive downloading. It should do the same here (it already has surfaced in a number of TV spots, anyway), and were our rigidly defined airwaves open to something eclectic (a number of other songs (the title track, the Motown bounce of "Smiley Faces") would be smart follow-ups.

But much as I keep playing "St. Elsewhere" and marveling at both Danger Mouse's deliciously menacing production style and the expressiveness of that burgeoning soul giant Cee-Lo is — since leaving Goodie Mob he's issued one remarkable, envelope-pushing gem after another — I'm not nearly as taken aback by it as I imagined I might have been given its buildup. It's not nearly as rich/satisfying as, say, N.E.R.D.'s first album, of which it sounds like a fractured, gone-insane cousin.

Then again, I didn't think much of "Sidewayz" or "Brokeback Mountain" when I first saw those films, thanks to so much advance hype — and now I look upon them both with far more admiration. Maybe I'll realize how great the Gnarls disc is once I find it in my CD changer at the end of the year.

Or maybe I'll still conclude that even the most ballyhooed collaborations don't amount to much after the excitement of their initial unveiling.

Cast tells what they'd do with a 'Windfall'

By Leanne Lee
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

PASADENA, Calif. — It's something everybody has thought about. What would you do if you suddenly won the lottery? Would your life take on a whole new luster or would it coagulate in a glut of new friends and foes?

That's the subject of NBC's new summer series, "Windfall," premiering June 8. The show stars Jason Gedrick ("Boomtown"), Luke Perry ("Beverly Hills, 90210"), Lana Parrilla ("Boomtown"), Malinda Williams ("Idlewild") and Sarah Wynter ("24"), whose characters are among the chosen few who've won the right to tell their bosses to "take this job and shove it."

At a press gathering here Perry reveals that he's usually a loser, though he feels lucky in other ways. "I'm healthy, I get to do what I want to do for a living, that kind of stuff. I feel really good about that. I never win anything. I never pick the right number. I never pick the right door."

Perry knows somebody who won the lottery. "Here's the thing. You win, like, a million, a million and a half, that gets you in trouble; it doesn't get you out. And a lot of times people will win jackpots of a little bit of money, and it just kind of causes them a problem. They don't actually get that long-term 'My-life-will-benefit-and-I-can-help-people-with-it.' On this show everybody gets $20 million roughly, and that is a lot of money ... money doesn't get rid of the problems. It just gives you a whole new set of them. And it's about how you go about dealing with those problems."

Perry sees this fortuitous event as a troubling event. "People talk about, 'Oh, it's such a great thing,' but it's traumatic in a number of ways because it just completely takes your life to a different place, and everybody has to figure it out."

Creator and executive producer of the series, Laurie McCarthy, thinks the show is really about freedom. "Even though the premise is about money, it's what money really buys you. Money buys you freedom. Then what do you do? I think that's the scariest thing of all. If you could really do anything you want, what would it be? What would it be, and who would you do it with? Would it be with the person you're currently with, married to, partnered with, or would it be with someone else?"

Actress Malinda Williams says her fantasy as a lottery winner is simple. "I don't have, like, a thousand things that I would do. Just one picture comes to my head, and that's of me on a boat with my friends. And it's my boat, of course — a big one."

Perry harbors his own daydream: "I equate money to time, and if I didn't have to spend my time doing things to make money, I'd probably be doing a different set of things. I think we all have our jobs that we do and our professional endeavors that we engage in, but I also know that there's another part of me that sits at home at night and thinks about engineering and chemistry and things like that, things I don't have any education in, but I find them really interesting. I'd probably pursue things like that."

Co-star Sarah Wynter says she'd go shopping. "I'd just point. I'd take a shopping cart and go through Saks and just say, 'Charge it. Charge it.'"

Gedrick would transform his money into another TV show. "I've kind of secretly, in my own fantasy world, lobbied to my own private NBC and my own private Regency (the show's production company) that they might pull their $10-million-each resources together, give it to me, and on my hiatus we'll do the reality show, 'What I Would Do With $20 million.'"

Lana Parrilla's quest would be to travel. "I'd buy a yellow submarine and bring everyone along. There's so many things that I would do. Oh, gosh. I would probably buy an around-the-world-trip ticket and go to all the places I've always wanted to go to and bring my friends and family along."

What's important, says McCarthy, is how windfalls affect relationships. "When you have a world of choices ahead of you, is that going to affect your marriage? Is it going to affect your family? That — I think those are sort of the biggest issues."

Perry adds, "I think we all kind of know the initial 'Ooh, ah, I won the lottery! Do this, buy that, do this, do that.' And then after a while, you still got a lot of money left and the rest of your life ... Relatives are turning into lawyers, and that's the worst part of it. They go to law school on your money so they can come back and sue you later."

It's not so bad," says McCarthy. "It is an incredibly liberating thing, and it gives people all sorts of freedom. It's an all-access pass in the world that we live in."

'Da Vinci Code' arrives with deafening silence, much hype

By Terry Lawson
Detroit Free Press

Psst. Have you heard about this "Da Vinci Code"?

Usually, when a movie with so much potential is opening the next weekend, you find prominent stories in Sunday newspapers. Tom Hanks and director Ron Howard are usually happy to do a few select interviews to support their films.

Yet the only promotion being done for the film version of Dan Brown's novel, which has a powerful Catholic Church seet conspiring to keep a mind-blowing secret, is the film's trailer and TV commercials.

Everything else is bolted down tight.

This is not about keeping the secret. Even those who haven't read the novel have probably heard — via the media, which has examined the potboiler as if it were, well, the Holy Grail — the answer to the mystery it poses.

Though the Catholic Church has condemned the movie for its distortions, it has also condemned harmless heresies like Kevin Smith's "Dogma" and, weirdly, "The Last Temptation of Christ," which turned out to be a deeply spiritual movie.

And remember, until the 1960s, the Church condemned movies on a weekly basis, providing families with a list of movies it deemed as unacceptable as meat on Friday.

In most cases, the makers of religious movies that are controversial seize on publicity, hoping the controversy will translate to attention.

"The Da Vinci Code" is something different, and so the decision was made: Everybody shut up.

The strategy is apparently twofold.

Journalists tend to especially admire Hanks and Howard, because they are honest, intelligent and seemingly genuine. (The secret to acting, said George Burns, is sincerity. "If you can fake that, you've got it made.")

Because of that, the two men might be expected to accidentally say something that would fuel the controversy or that could be interpreted as a gotcha.

Second, of the 40 million people who have read "The Da Vinci Code," the great majority, according to booksellers, are older than 30. Many of them are as fascinated by the snippets of history and theological scholarship in the book as they are by its cracked conspiracy theories, which are about as credible as LBJ's involvement in JFK's murder or the Jewish banking cabal.

"The Da Vinci Code" has created a run on cracked theories and real scholarship, as any trip to a bookstore will quickly reveal.

Target moviegoers, however, are not hip to the Gnostic gospels.

Maybe they will be someday, when they start looking for the spiritual symbolism behind the X-Men. Generally, they don't go to movies about religion, which is why the "The Passion of the Christ" was a phenomenon, not a trend.

The studio releasing "The Da Vinci Code" hopes that twenty-something filmgoers have only a vague notion of what the film might be about, and that they will simply go to see Tom Hanks in a thriller.

It makes next weekend's godless box office race all the more interesting because it isn't Tom Cruise's continuing popularity that's being tested.

It's the marketing of a movie that has enormous brand name appeal, built-in demographic difficulties and — oh, did we mention — if it's true to Brown's breathless and often ridiculous novel, it dares to question the foundation of faith of millions of Christians.

Heathen Hollywood may be saying a few prayers too.

Director Ron Howard has had little to say about the upcoming "Da Vinci Code," joining in the relative silence also kept by Tom Hanks.

Bruce Springsteen

We Shall Overome
Sony

Bruce Springsteen, de facto spokesman for the human condition, has just released another LP. "We Shall Overcome," a tribute album to old-time Pete Seeger folk music, must be judged as a tribute album and nothing more. Disappointment will rush in like "Kitty" if the album is compared to all-too-well-known Bruce songs, like "Born in the USA". Bruce is going back to his folk roots, and he doesn't care what you think.

His last release, "Devils and Dust," caused some of his fans to turn the other cheek, taking offense to the politically ambitious album, but his true fans stuck by his side. Springsteen has always had a say with politics, dating back to his "Lost in the Flood" days, but never before has he been so upfront about it. His early songs were ably translated into a political meaning. "Devils and Dust" is not open for debate.

The pressure is on for Bruce. With albums like "Greetings from Asbury Park," "The Wild, Innocent, and the E Street Shuffle," and "Born to Run," Springsteen has established himself has the rock 'n' roll savior. "Devils and Dust" has challenged all that the Runaway kid is about. "We Shall Overcome," though dramatically different, won't be the savior of his musical career or the downfall of his kingdom. But one thing is for sure: it will part the sea of his fans.

"We Shall Overcome" was recorded in Springsteen's New Jersey living room. He has always been known to play with exceptional bands. For this album, Springsteen hand picked an all-star line-up of folk Dixieland musicians. The band members sound flawless on every track, truly making themselves feel at home with Bruce. They kept their feet off the coffee tables and oriental rugs, and left their whisky jugs at home. The band is a nostalgic ensemble full of fiddles, banjos, a shout chorus, an accordion and a phenomenal drummer, but not Weinberg this time.

Where are the emotional ties that Bruce has with his long-time E Street Band? They have been playing together for 30 years, and Bruce just conveniently decided to drop them for this album. Well, he has done it before with the stark and dry "Nebraska" and, oh yeah, "Devils and Dust," (to name a few) possibly his two worst albums. This album has a circle of guns pointed at it. Will the Boss escape free of wounds?

There is one stand-out track that is flawless, "Shenandoah." "Shenandoah" was redone like never before. It starts off with complete legato sounds—a beautiful bed of sustain that helps Bruce's voice float above the Valley like the rising sun. The shout chorus is a perfect compliment, crying falsettos and octave jumps that are the rays of Bruce's voice. The piano tinkers in the background, like the chirping birds. The ride cymbal pattern the drummer plays is almost the applause for a job well-done.

With songs like Irish-ballad "Mrs. McGrath," "My Oklahoma Home," "Eyes on the Prize," "Jacob's Ladder" and "Old Dan Tucker," Bruce achieves an organic sound, outside his own realm of musicianship. Bruce is pushing it this time, though. On the opening track, "Old Dan Tucker," Bruce's voice does sound different, but it's a bit strenuous and dishonest.

"Pay Me My Money Down" is a great corral song, that brings to mind cowboy boots and sheriff stars. "Pay me my money down/Pay me or got to jail!" This song gives the shout chorus its time to shine. The chorus belts out underneath Bruce, crafting an urgent mood, while Bruce screams, "Take it to B flat!" The band listens, as if they had a choice. Don't question the Boss.

The track "Erie Canal" is just awful. Bruce has never sounded so disingenuous. The horn section in the background sounds like they are crying, or rather, that they are whining. I think they are whining for the false emotion in Bruce's voice. I don't believe it. This is the only skippable track on the record.

"Oh Mary Don't You Weep" is a close second to "Shenandoah." The track begins with a dual violin melody reminiscent of a 1920's dive bar. Bruce comes in at about the 16th measure of the violin solo with the shout chorus, again doing their job best, echoing Bruce's lyrics in affirmation. During one of the musical pauses in "Oh Mary," you can hear Bruce yell out to the band, "Ok, trumpets, you go!"

The title track, "We Shall Overcome," tugs on the listener's emotions. It starts with Bruce gently finger-picking a guitar melody. The bass guitar is consistent throughout the whole tune; a thumping that sounds like marching soldiers. When he sings, his voice is held up with musical understatements, like a faint shaker and the angelic shout chorus in the background. "Here in my heart/I do believe/We shall live in peace someday." This song is the only track on the album that presents an alternate political meaning.

The closing track, "Froggie Went a Courtin'," completes the album with a boom. It starts off with a banjo solo, with a thud on every two and four of the beat. It's hard to abstain from breaking-out into a hoedown while listening to this track, or at least a bobbing of the head. The beat is contagious. The highlight of this track is Bruce. He sounds honest. You can tell the band and the Boss are having a great time, while Bruce finishes each phrase he sings with "Hmh uh!" When the song is over, it leaves you wanting more. Hopefully, Bruce will give us more, maybe an album with the E Street Band.

Overall, the album is a very solid listen, but non-true Bruce fans, be wary. This album is the real Bruce, the Bruce who wrote "Born to Run" on his acoustic guitar as a folk ballad before making it a rock 'n' roll anthem. On the other hand, real fans will eat this album up, healthily absorbing all the organic nutrients it has to offer.

The Ruse

7.5/10

Light In Motion
Self-Released

With their latest album, "Light in Motion," Los Angeles-based indie rockers the Ruse have managed to do the impossible — they sound vaguely like Coldplay without being completely boring. Instead of coming off as an imitation or even an overly derivative band, "Light in Motion" comes off as a strong and original album — well, as original as possible from an album that immediately conjures thoughts of another band, anyway.

The album's opener, "Everything Comes With a Price," hints at what is to come. There are hints of shoegazer atmospherics and feedback, but the band's pop sensibilities are evident, especially in the production. Guitarist Jim Bilus may sound like he's channeling My Bloody Valentine's Kevin Shields, but he does his best Jonny Buckland — of Coldplay, of course — later on in the same song. Singer John Dauer could be accused of being a borderline Chris Martin impersonator based on this track, but even that statement is a little misleading; his voice isn't terrible distinctive, but it's definitely his own.

From there, the album begins to draw the listener in with its thick textures and often creative melodies. Occasionally the band lets the instrumentation get a little thinner, with only Dauer's voice and Jason Young's light drumming in the mix, but for the most part there are always many layers of chiming guitar behind them. Occasionally, as on "Devil In the Girl," Bilus brings in a bit of the controlled feedback of the first song, creating, in that case, at least, a soft background for a slow, acoustic ballad. Just as often, he lets far-away-sounding, reverb-drenched melodies create poppy backgrounds for songs like "Goodbye."

There are some letdowns on the album — notably the penultimate "Don't Let It Fade Away," which sounds a bit too much like an actual Coldplay song for comfort — but they are few and far between. Overall, the Ruse has put forth a very solid effort, even taking into account the few less-than-stellar moments.

"Light in Motion" is really a very satisfying release. It never gets caught in one pop song cliché for too long, even if it does use it to begin with, and it isn't afraid to rock a little bit at times. The songs are well-written, and the musicians all have the talent to pull them off. Don't be too surprised if you hear a lot more from the Ruse.

Former poet laureate Kunitz dead at 100

By Hillel Italie
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Stanley Kunitz, a former U.S. poet laureate and Pulitzer Prize winner whose expressive verse, social commitment and generosity to young writers spanned three-quarters of a century, has died. He was 100.

He died in his sleep early Sunday at his home in Manhattan, said his publisher, W.W. Norton.

The Massachusetts native spent much of his later life on Cape Cod. Kunitz had just turned 95 when appointed poet laureate in 2000, capping a career that began 70 years earlier with the collection "Intellectual Things" and later included a Pulitzer, a National Medal of the Arts and — at age 90 — a National Book Award.

He served a single one-year term as U.S. poet laureate and was also the Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress, the precursor to poet laureate, from 1974 to 1976.

His poems included tributes to nature and wildlife, such as "The Snakes of September," the traumatic memories of "The Portrait," in which he recalled his father's suicide, and the spiritual journey of "The Long Boat," with his wish "To be rocked by the Infinite/as if it didn't matter which way was home."

His early work was more formal, more dependent on rhyme and meter, but he anticipated his own evolution with the poem "Change," with its promise of "Becoming, never being." Over time, his verse simplified, crystallized, with Kunitz once observing that he had learned to "strip the water out of my poems."

In some ways, he maintained a quiet, contemplative life, working for hours at night on an old manual typewriter, and by day nurturing his beloved garden in Provincetown, Mass. But he also helped found two writing centers and was a self-described pacifist who was a conscientious objector in World War II, opposed the Vietnam War and criticized the U.S.-led war against Iraq.

"He was very outgoing, very cheerful, very funny, very interested in you and the others in the room," said fellow poet Galway Kinnell. "You could say that most of the American poets younger than he was tended to look up to him as their guide, their leader, their surrogate father."

"Of course," Kinnell added with a laugh, "after a while, all the poets were younger poets."

Shortly before his 100th birthday, "The Wild Braid" was published, featuring poems, photographs of Kunitz in his garden and his reflections on gardening, art and the end of life. "Death is absolutely essential for the survival of life itself on the planet," he said, explaining his acceptance of mortality. "It would become full of old wrecks, dominating the population."

Kunitz spent much of his latter years in Provincetown, Mass., where he bought a home in 1962 and lived with his third wife, Elise Asher, an artist and poet who died in 2004. Her work adorns the cover of several of Kunitz's books.

Born in Worcester, Mass., in 1905, Stanley Kunitz was raised by his mother, an immigrant dressmaker from Lithuania. Kunitz's father took his own life before Kunitz was born, and his mother, as Kunitz wrote in "The Portrait," "locked his name /in her deepest cabinet/and would not let him out/though I could hear him thumping."

Kunitz was apparently destined for the literary life. He began to write poetry in grade school, and was praised for it even then.

"My teachers were always saying things," Kunitz recalled in a 2000 interview with The Associated Press. "They said, 'Stanley, you're going to be a poet.' I was told that a dozen times. And so I began to believe it."

He graduated summa cum laude from Harvard University and got his master's degree there. He expected to be invited to stay on as an assistant, until a professor told him that the white Anglo-Saxon students there would resent being taught by a Jew.

"That really almost broke my heart. And I think in the end it probably did me a great favor," Kunitz said. "Because, it prevented me from becoming a completely preoccupied scholar."

After leaving school, Kunitz worked as a newspaper reporter and editor in Worcester and continued writing verse. He was just 25 when "Intellectual Things" came out, but surviving remained a struggle. He supported himself by editing literary reference books and making unsuccessful attempts at farming.

Kunitz was a conscientious objector during World War II, but was drafted anyway. The Army didn't know what to do with him. They switched him around a few times, and he fanned at a largely black camp in North Carolina where he dug latrines most of the time and, since a lot of the men there didn't understand what the war was all about, Kunitz started a magazine he hoped would explain why.

"My feeling was I would never kill another human being," Kunitz said. "How could I fight in this war? But I realized the war had to be fought, to end the horrible possibility of the fascists taking over. It was a tremendous dilemma."

Kunitz is survived by a daughter, Gretchen Kunitz, and a stepdaughter, Babette Becker. Gretchen Kunitz told The Associated Press on Monday that a private memorial is planned for this weekend in Provincetown. Public ceremonies are expected this summer in Provincetown and New York.

'Thirds' is a 'charm'

By Connie Ogle
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Megan McCafferty is famous these days, but not for the right reasons. Recently, Harvard student Kaavya Viswanathan admitted to plagiarizing from McCafferty's first two novels in her own book about a teenage girl in New Jersey who suffers through high school, loves the wrong boy and dreams of attending an Ivy League university.

"Charmed Thirds"
By Megan McCafferty
Crown

I suppose if you're compelled to steal another writer's work, you may as well scavenge from the best, and McCafferty is one of the sharpest, funniest, most refreshingly candid writers working in the coming-of-age genre. What she should be known for is not someone else's lack of imagination but her hilarious Jessica Darling novels — "Sloppy Firsts," "Second Helpings" and now "Charmed Thirds" — which may be about a young woman's amusing and rocky journey to adulthood but are smart and accomplished enough to delight readers of any age.

In "Charmed Thirds," Jessica has left behind her hated hometown of Pinesville — sort of — for her dream destination of Columbia University, despite the fact that her parents can't or won't help her financially. Her relationship with the reformed but ever-mysterious Marcus Flutie continues despite the fact he attends Gakkai College in California, "an unaccredited Buddhist school at which it is possible to major in Chanting and Purification."

Distance from Marcus, literal and emotional, sends Jessica's moods careening from jubilant ("Reunion sex rocks") to pathetic (obsessive Google stalking). But "Charmed Thirds" isn't just about a teen romance trying to find its adult legs. McCafferty gives herself plenty of room to insightfully chart three eventful years in Jess's life, during which she works at the magazine internship from hell, makes new and dysfunctional friends to take the place of longtime BFF Hope, and is attracted to a married foreign man, a faux sensitive emo boy and, most frightening of all, a cocky young Republican.

Jessica must also cope with her changing relationships with her mother and sister and recover from the most horrific experience of her life: "There is only one thing worse than walking in on two people having sex. Walking in on two people having sex and having those people be YOUR PARENTS. Even more harrowing is walking in on your parents when they don't even have the decency to be doing it in some totally boring position but one that is way more porno than parental and on the couch in the living room instead of under the sheets, in their bed, in their room, in the dark, where sex among the dimply of butt and bald of head belongs."

The humor in "Charmed Thirds" is cheerfully blue — Jessica may be formidably intelligent, but her observations frequently concern sex. ("For the record, I don't know if size matters because Marcus is all I've had. But I can certainly say this: Size sure helps. Whoo boy, does it help.") Jessica's an original, but her problems are universal, and McCafferty is formidably adept at channeling her self-deprecating, wise-guy voice. If you don't see yourself in Jessica Darling you're not looking hard enough.

'Horrors of War' proves great cinema can come from Ohio

By Andrew Whalen
The Lantern (Ohio State U.)

COLUMBUS, Ohio — World War II sci-fi horror film "Horrors of War," shot entirely in Ohio with a cast and crew of locals, is attempting to build steam before its Japanese DVD release on July 7 with screenings scheduled across the United States during the next month.

Co-directed by Peter John Ross and John Whitney, "Horrors of War" has been screened locally at The Screens at the Continent movie theater three times. The first screening was for the cast and crew only, while the next two were public screenings, which received responses that producer, co-writer and Advanced Computing Center for the Arts and Design instructor Phillip R. Garrett described as positive.

"People were very kind to us," Garrett said. "They seemed to really get into it. They really care about the characters."

Screenings at the Continent were just the beginning of the film's steady rise in popularity. Tuesday, "Horrors of War" began a screening tour of sorts with stops in Indianapolis, Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Dayton, New York and Austin, Texas. The Dayton screening, which will be the last in Ohio, will be at the Neon theater on June 1.

Ross said Kevin Smith, director of films such as "Dogma" and "Mallrats," said on his Web site that he will be attending the screening of "Horrors of War" in Los Angeles.

"I hope he really does show up," Ross said. "His saying he'll be there is not some kind of guarantee, but I find it very promising that he said, himself, that he would like to go to the screening."

Ross said the DVD will be released in Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxemburg, Hong Kong, Malaysia, and eventually in the United States.

"As far as an actual American release, we're in negotiation right now with the distributor, and once that's finalized we imagine it will be anywhere from 90 days to, well, three to six months until the actual release in the U.S.," Garrett said.

As for special features, Garrett said numerous things are being prepared, including Web documentaries, audio commentary featuring Ross, Whitney and Garrett, a behind-the-scenes featurette, indie filmmaker tips, a deleted scene and deleted footage montage, story boards and still galleries.

Garrett said the Web documentaries are modeled after Peter Jackson's Web documentaries for "Lord of the Rings" and "King Kong." The extra documentaries that are unavailable online will be included on the DVD.

Alec Rossel, a junior in film who plays Captain Mitchell in "Horrors of War," said he could not be happier with the movie and that it was amazing how it was accomplished in Ohio.

"We broke a lot of people's mind-sets that real movies can't be made in the Midwest," Rossel said. "We proved a lot of those people wrong, because we made a real movie and it stands up. It's pretty cool."

Additional information about "Horrors of War" and its future screenings can be found horrorsofwarmovie.com.

"Horrors of War," a World War II sci-fi movie filmed in Ohio, is starting on a countrywide screening tour on June 1 to promote its Japanese DVD release.

Hoobastank singing a new tune

By Adam Z. Winer
The Diamondback (U. Maryland)

COLLEGE PARK, Md. — To quote the language of their home state of California, the members of Hoobastank are quite "stoked." Coming off the multi-platinum album "The Reason" and the Grammy-nominated song of the same title, they have every reason to be so.

"We don't have depressing lives, and I don't think that being in a rock band means you should be depressed and want to kill yourself," explained Hoobastank drummer Chris Hesse. "We don't have drug problems, we don't really fight; none of those typical rock-band problems you always hear about."

With a naturally high-flying mind-set, it's no wonder the positive lyrics of front man Douglas Robb are dominating the group's latest songs. Phrases such as "We're holding the key, to unlock our destiny," from the song "Born to Lead," are frequently featured on Hoobastank's upcoming album, "Every Man For Himself."

"If I were you, holding the world right in my hands, the first thing I'd do is thank the stars for all that I have," is heard on Hoobastank's latest single "If I Were You."

The pop-minded alternative-rock band unleashes its latest effort today in hopes of delivering its positive songs with the same success as its previous tracks. Still, the group's expectations are modest, Hesse says. After all, following up the kind of success they had in 2004 is near-impossible for many bands, and Hoobastank is aware of just how fortunate they were.

"We got lucky that we got all that attention from one song basically. We probably won't have the same success again," Hesse says.

Don't worry, rock fans, Hoobastank doesn't plan to fade out anytime soon. "If I Were You" is already one of the most requested songs on FM radio, and you can expect to hear it on rotation all summer long.

In the past, the band has been heavily criticized for not trying new things or taking risks musically.

"We're not trying to be the next thing — we're not scenesters," Hesse said. "We know we're not breaking any new ground or doing anything too original. But we like what we play, and I think fans are responding to that."

What they are playing these days is music that walks the increasingly blurry line between pop and rock, but most recently Hoobastank has focused on leaning toward pop.

"Yeah, we're definitely playing pop music, and we're OK with that," Hesse said. "We just feel like a band that has less testosterone."

To Hesse, the band's evolving sound is just a natural progression from their previous work.

"It's only subtle differences, but I feel like we were more creative this time around," Hesse said. "We came into the studio with only a vague idea of what we wanted to do, not just rigid ideas — we left things open."

Part of the reason for the musical shift may be due to the loss of aggressive-minded bassist Markku Lappalainen, who left the group last year.

"Markku was tired of touring, wanted to settle down and have kids, which he did actually, he just got married," Hesse says. "But he always wanted more progressive stuff anyway, more aggressive rock. I think he wanted a change."

Bassist Josh Moreau was signed this year to replace Lappalainen in the band, but Hoobastank was still a three-person group at press time.

Hoobastank is currently on its Every Fan for Himself tour and is scheduled to perform at the DC 101 Chili Cook-Off in Washington May 20.

Bet you can guess what Hesse thinks about that.

"Yeah, we're stoked," he says.

Dan Estrin (left) and Doug Robb (right) of the pop-rock band Hoobastank are both "stoked" about the tour their band will embark on this summer to promote their latest album, "Every Man For Himself."

Tom, dude, what's the problem-o?

Tom Cruise's latest film, "Mission: Impossible III" has done relatively poorly compared to expectations, prompting many to wonder what has hurt Cruise's star power.

By Barry Koltnow
The Orange County Register

New York is a great sports town. Chicago is a great sports town. Boston and Philadelphia are great sports towns.

But none of those cities can approach Hollywood as a great sports town.

The difference is that in Hollywood, sports has nothing to do with baseball, football or basketball.

The biggest sport in this town is picking the carcass clean.

It's not considered a major sport elsewhere, but Hollywood athletes play the game with vigor.

People in Hollywood love to pick at the carcasses left after a tough, hard-fought weekend of movie openings. They love to speculate on what went wrong, who was to blame, whose career is in trouble and, most importantly, how it affects your next project.

The sport is played each weekend, but the weekend before last was the Super Bowl of carcass-picking.

As you might have heard, Tom Cruise's movie, "Mission: Impossible III" did not do as well as some industry insiders expected.

Oh, the numbers look impressive at first glance. In its opening weekend, the action flick took in about $48 million domestically, and a more respectable $70 million outside this country.

It might seem unfair to pick at Cruise's carcass with box-office numbers that would be the envy of almost any other star. But when you're the biggest movie star in the world, and a controversial one to boot, an opportunity to pick apart a carcass is a terrible thing to waste.

The movie under-performed when compared with the opening weekends of the two previous "Mission: Impossible" films ($56.8 million and $70.8 million, respectively), but both weekends were part of a four-day Memorial Day weekend.

Of course, the third installment in the series opened on 1,000 more movie screens than the original, and 400 more screens than the second.

But veteran carcass-pickers are not really interested in comparing screens and holiday weekends vs. regular weekends. They don't even care that it's been six years since the last "Mission: Impossible," and audiences probably were no longer interested in the franchise.

This is Tom Cruise, and that makes it an entirely different game. Picking at Cruise's carcass has become more than a mere sport. It is an obsession.

So, carcass-pickers throw out the standard rules, and play by a completely different set of rules for Mr. Cruise.

Under these new rules, you don't consider the marketplace. You consider the man.

Carcass-pickers seem divided on the real cause behind the lackluster performance of the summer's first blockbuster (I don't use that term as it pertains to success, but rather to the size of the budget and the expectations).

There are some who believe that the couch-jumping incident on Oprah Winfrey's show is the underlying cause. But that theory doesn't hold water.

Industry insiders revealed weeks ago that "Mission: Impossible" was not tracking well with women. Please don't ask me to explain how studios "track" movies in advance. It's a secret process to which I am not privy, although I suspect that it's no more scientific than executives asking family members what movie they want to see.

If the movie was not tracking well with women, then couch jumping could not be the culprit. I think women liked it because macho Tom showed a soft side, which was important after dumping Nicole Kidman. If he lost anyone on the couch, it was his male audience.

So, if not the Oprah disaster, then what?

Many pickers speculate that it is his continuing identification with Scientology that has turned off movie audiences. There is some truth to this theory. People were willing to overlook his beliefs when he kept quiet about it.

And Cruise did keep mum on his private thoughts for a long time, but apparently he couldn't hold back any more. He hired his publicist Pat Kingsley, who not only guided his career but kept him on a tight leash when it came to expressing his opinions. Once free from her restraint, he wouldn't shut up.

I don't believe that it is his Scientology beliefs in general that caused the audience to turn on him. However, I do think it was a particular comment that might have done him in.

Of course, I am referring to his criticism of Brooke Shields for taking drugs to battle postpartum depression.

I think he crossed the line with that remark, and it is my opinion that women were outraged that a man weighed in on a topic that was none of his business.

How could he have thought that it was a good idea to chastise a new mother? Is there any more sympathetic symbol in our society?

Sunday was Mother's Day. Perhaps it was the perfect day for Cruise to reflect on his actions and stand silent for the past year.

Instead of jumping on Oprah's couch, maybe he should consider lying down on a psychiatrist's couch.

Franczek mans the hot corner

rest of the team is that much more excited to step up and try to drive him in.

"I feel like if we get out early everybody wants to hit and get back in the box and keep swinging," Franczek says. "I feel like if we score in the first inning then everybody is clawing at the bat to get right back up there and hit again."

Just like most ballplayers, he has a special routine he goes through each time he steps into the box. Before the first pitch of each at-bat, Franczek holds the bat with two hands out in front of him and takes a deep breath. When he steps into the batters box, he hits the same spots on the plate each time and blows a kiss to his mother. The final part is a special tribute because his mother died when he was just 11 years old.

After he had a monster game against Northeastern in the Beanpot Tournament back in April, Stone said how valuable Franczek was because he could bat just about anywhere in the UMass order – and he'd be just as effective. Getting the most out of his bat is the reason he steps to the plate before anybody else wearing a maroon uniform. The more at-bats he gets, the more chances guys like Tempesta and Adamski have to drive him in.

"He's a battler and a competitor," Stone says. "He's our best contact hitter and he's probably our best hitter. He's just a real pleasure to have on our team."

Stone is actually lucky to have Franczek in the lineup. After he had a break out senior year in high school, the Springfield Republican named him the Player of the Year in 2004. Just looking to play baseball at the collegiate level, Franczek initially meant to attend Elms College in his hometown.

Through a twist of fate, a family friend led Franczek to Amherst and Stone. According to Ryan, originally the family friend was going to attend UMass and his wife mentioned Franczek's name to Stone. The coach had heard of the kid from Chicopee and knew all about him, but he couldn't contact him because an NCAA rule prohibited it.

But Franczek took the initiative and called Stone to set up a meeting. The two kept in touch and Stone went to go see him play a few times. Finally, before it was too late, Franczek scrapped the Elms College plans and signed a letter of intent to play at UMass.

Stone couldn't be happier with his decision: "He's a real good ballplayer – not just a pretty good ballplayer – a real good ballplayer," the coach says.

In high school, Franczek was the ultimate utility player. In one game he played all nine positions on the baseball diamond. It wasn't until he got to Amherst that he settled in to the hot corner. Third base is now where he is most comfortable and enjoys playing.

"I like how hard the balls are hit to third, it's a reaction thing," Franczek says. "When you make a diving play to the left or right you get a pretty good feeling."

Franczek still has two more seasons to go, and the Minutemen have two more seasons to watch those plays and see him change the school colors one diving play at a time.

ing the bats early in the first game and just played well. We finished the game in good shape."

Wendle's first miscue of the game came with one out and the bases loaded. Andy Tuetken was at the plate for the Minutemen and the sophomore lifted a routine fly ball right at Wendle. He couldn't get a handle on the ball and it squirted out of his glove allowing a pair of freshman – Jim MacDonald and Adam Tempesta – to cross the plate.

An errant throw to home plate by Wendle on the very next play ushered in another UMass run. Rookie Joe Cotone shot a single in the vicinity of Wendle. Seeing Bryan Garrity trying to score, the right fielder fired the ball home but it sailed over the catcher's head giving the Maroon and White an early 4-0 lead.

Again Wendle misplayed a groundball in the outfield on Munsey's following single. This time the error cost the Hawks two runs, putting them in an even deeper whole.

In all the Minutemen sent 11 batters to plate in the inning. Because of Wendle's shaky defense, Tuetken and Munsey's runs were unearned.

"We're still alive and if that's the case then that's great," Stone said of his team's chase for the final playoff spot. "Two wins in the conference is real good for us."

Freshman second baseman Adam Tempesta leads the Minutemen in hitting with a .318 average for the 2006 season.

Seniors bid the Daily Collegian farewell

I wanted to cover games, write my stories from home and then e-mail them in. There was no way I was going to give up large amounts of my free time working with a bunch of people that I really had no interest in getting to know.

And that's how things went for a while. I got my feet wet with a few rowing stories that spring (I still have no idea what a coxswain is, though), and then got lucky to get assigned to cover women's soccer the following fall. Lucky in that I at least knew something about soccer as opposed to some of the other fall beats like field hockey and cross-country, and luckier still because I got to cover Jim Rudy's team.

I've covered eight coaches during my time at the Collegian, and all of them were accommodating and many are among the most successful in their profession, but none was better to work with than Rudy. With Rudy it was more like talking to a friend than doing an interview, and I never knew what pearl of wisdom would slip into a routine answer to a soccer-related question.

I wrote regularly last year, but it wasn't until this year, when I was named assistant sports editor, that I really began to get a lot out of my time at the Collegian.

This year was everything I never wanted. I was spending more time in the office than I ever imagined, between writing more frequently, working the desk two nights a week and the incomparable Score production week.

The funny thing was that I actually found the whole experience enjoyable. I made plenty of friends and got to cover basketball and lacrosse, two of the prime beats on this campus.

At some point this year, my major unofficially switched from journalism to the Collegian. Nothing against the journalism department, but I learned far more in the countless hours spent covering games and working in the basement to put out the next day's sports section than I ever did in any classroom.

Now I can't picture my college experience without my time at the Collegian. As I move on from the Collegian, I do so with mixed feelings. There were many times when I would have preferred to be doing a million other things other than putting out the section or covering some doubleheader on a beautiful spring day, but now I realize how much I'm going to miss this place.

I'm leaving behind a lot of friends, and a lot of memories, and as I prepare to leave UMass I will always be grateful for the experience I gained at the Collegian. I took off my reporting training wheels at this great paper, and now I'm ready to ride confidently into the real world.

Dan Duggan was a Collegian columnist.

in what we soon learned to be his typical wit – told us that the journalism business wasn't something any of us wanted to get into.

Like the typical college student, I completely ignored what he had to say.

I loved every bit of it, took it all in, learned as much as I could and eventually became the sports editor of The Campus Report, the MCC school paper. I tested the waters in the kiddie pool before I graduated from Middlesex and knew I had to get my fix here at UMass.

In the spring of 2004, I packed up and moved out to Amherst for my second shot at a Bachelors degree, riding high from the confidence I had from nearly doubling my GPA and completely motivated to somehow make it in sports journalism, the field I felt was the cause for my calling.

I've never learned more about anything – how to write and report, how to treat people and, most importantly, how to have fun while doing things the right way – than I have doing my five semesters at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

There isn't a single thing I could have learned in a classroom that I was taught at the Collegian. It would be like trying to read a book about how to play baseball and going out to a park after a couple years and trying to hit Jon Papelbon. Good luck even trying to make contact.

I've been lucky enough to learn from a great batch of writers who have all gone on to further their careers since their graduation. I was lucky enough to arrive at the right time and did the work I needed to do in order to move on up the food chain.

My goal from here on out is to further my career while doing my best to improve the legacy and reputation of the Collegian the same way it has helped me grow as both a person and a writer.

The goal for each sports editor is to leave the section in better shape than how it was left for them. After the work we did with The Score and the way I saw every single writer on staff develop throughout the course of the year, I know that I can say I've done my job.

After not even knowing if I'd make my way through college three years ago and without a single ounce of sports writing experience, it's safe to say that I have no idea how I really got here.

And I also know that I've got no idea where I'll be down the road.

What I do know, however, is that I'll keep putting myself in a position where I continue to succeed.

It's better to be lucky than good, but it's always good to be lucky.

Good luck to all of you.

Jeff Howe was a Collegian columnist.

Bad weather has UM slipping and sliding

Rob Greenfield

What did the Minutemen do to get this luck?

Do they not tie their shoes the right way? Did they pray to the wrong baseball god? Is it because they wear red uniforms instead of maroon ones? Or could it be the hideous music the team insists on playing during every game (that includes a nice selection of 1980s rock songs and love ballads)?

Whatever it was, days like yesterday were the result.

The Massachusetts baseball team planned on playing three-game set with Saint Joseph's. Games were originally scheduled for Friday, Saturday and Sunday. But Mother Nature had another agenda. Rain moved the games to Saturday, Sunday and Monday, but the two teams scrapped the Sunday matchup and scheduled a doubleheader for yesterday starting at 11.

The first game went fine – no sliver of blue sky appeared and fans were treated to a depressing gray overcast, but at least the game was on.

UMass senior David Sullivan had "the best outing he's had" at Earl Lorden Field, according to coach Mike Stone, who hid beneath a puffy maroon jacket zipped up to his chin.

Would Game 2 – an insignificant game for the eliminated Hawks but a crucial one for the Minutemen in the Atlantic 10 playoff hunt – hold the rain off for another two hours? Nice try.

In the top of the third inning it started pouring. It wasn't light rain either. These were droplets. The three game umpires met after the top of the third to discuss (I assume) the possibility of a cancellation. It became evident, however, that no cancellation or postponement was going to make the men in blue call the game.

So: UMass hurler Rory McDonald and the soaked infielders had to fight through low visibility, a muddy infield, slippery baseballs, tenuous grips on their bats and groundskeepers invading their turf during every break in the action.

"In the third inning, I said that it would be a miracle it we could get the game in because it was really raining hard," Stone said. "The grounds crew did a hell of a job. They came in between innings."

After three innings it was a mess. Hitters tried to get the bat handles dry by tucking the handle in the pit of their jerseys – the only dry spot on them. McDonald asked for a new baseball every couple of pitches and some of his stuff sailed high, courtesy of the wet baseballs.

Puddles formed around second base, third base and first base, right where the infielders were stationed.

"Where the defensive players stand when the ball is being pitched is where the water gathers most," groundskeeper Steve Boro said underneath a maroon and white-checkered umbrella. "They tend to be a little lower than all the other spots because of the traffic they get."

Boro stormed the field in between innings armed with Diamond Dry, a drying agent that provides more traction for the players. They scattered it all over the field, even while infielders took grounders warming up for the next frame. They dumped so much of it at one point that it looked like a windy day on the beach. Fans and players shielded their eyes from the Diamond Dry whirlwind.

Boro hauled a wheelbarrow out to second base before the top of the fourth inning. As he jogged out to scatter the magic drying dust, the groundskeeper looked like a guy holding somebody's legs in a wheelbarrow race.

But no matter how much Diamond Dry covered the darkened dirt infield, the grass was still slick, and McDonald found that out first hand when he charged off of the rubber to try and field a St. Joe's bunt in the top of the fourth.

"It was really hard to come off the mound on that one bunt," he said. "Coming back towards the ball I almost slipped in a puddle. After the fourth inning the ball was pretty slick too. I was just trying my best to throw it over."

"Today, third base was pretty bad and it was pretty slick over there," third baseman Ryan Franczek said, his jersey stained with mud from head to toe. "The first step is pretty tough to get going. The dirt gets stuck in your cleats so when you run out onto the grass you have to take short, choppy steps."

This is what the Minutemen have had to deal with for the last two months: rain delays, soaked fields, postponed games, doubleheaders and cancellations.

"When you wake up you have prepared the night before for a game the next day," Franczek said. "When you go onto the field now knowing if you are going to play or not it's kind of frustrating."

The seasoned and stoic Stone didn't think twice about it.

"This is New England," he said succinctly. "We get good days and we get bad days. Sometimes you have to play through the rain. It's New England. We deal with it."

My mistake. The rain wasn't a problem yesterday. But somebody needs to do something about that music.

Minutewomen host NCAA Regional end will be preparing their younger players for the national stage. Kelley has been to the NCAA tournament three times and knows how to keep focus during such a big game.

"You just try to tell [younger players] that it's just another game, but yet it's not another game; it's more important," Kelley said. "You just need to keep relaxed, keep breathing and keep under control."

The winner of the Amherst regional will advance to the Super Regional in a best-of-three series with the winner of the regional hosted by No. 4 Northwestern (42-12). Also in the pool with the Wildcats are Notre Dame (35-19), UC Santa Barbara (24-20) and Southern Illinois (34-11). The winner of each Super Regional advances to the College World Series, an eight-team, double-elimination tournament.

The Minutewomen have not reached the College World Series since 1998. Led by UMass great Danielle Henderson, the Minutewomen won 11 straight games en route to the College World Series, but lost their first two games in the CWS and were eliminated.

Third captain indicted

By Aaron Beard
Associated Press

DURHAM, N.C. – A Duke University lacrosse team captain became the third player indicted in the rape scandal Monday, and the first to speak out, blasting the charges against him as "fantastic lies."

"I look forward to watching them unravel in the weeks to come," said David Evans, a just-graduated 23-year-old economics major from Bethesda, Md., who was one of four team captains.

At a news conference, Evans was backed by other players and his mother, Rae Evans, a Washington lobbyist who is the chairwoman of the Ladies Professional Golf Association board of directors.

The charges followed a March 13 party at an off-campus house, where a 27-year-old black student at nearby North Carolina Central University told police she was raped and beaten by three white men after she and another woman were hired as strippers.

Evans also proclaimed the innocence of sophomores Reade Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., and Collin Finnerty, 19, of Garden City, N.Y., who were indicted last month on the same charges.

District Attorney Mike Nifong said he did not expect any more indictments in the case, saying the three players facing charges were the only ones implicated by the evidence.

Defense attorneys have insisted all the players are innocent, citing DNA tests they say found no match between any of the team's white players and the accuser.

Evans' attorney, Joseph Cheshire, said the accuser identified Evans with "90 percent certainty" during a photo lineup. Cheshire said the accuser told police she would be 100 percent sure if Evans had a mustache – something he said his client has never had.

Evans turned himself in after the news conference and was released after posting a $400,000 bond. He was scheduled to make an initial appearance Tuesday, but Cheshire said his client would probably waive it.

Evans, who lived at the house where the party was held, was indicted on charges of first-degree forcible rape, sexual offense and kidnapping. In the past, he had been cited for a noise ordinance violation and alcohol possession.

He said that he and his roommates helped police find evidence at the house, and that he gave investigators access to his e-mail and instant messenger accounts. He said that his offer to take a lie-detector test was rejected by authorities, and that he later took one on his own and passed.

"You have all been told some fantastic lies," he said at the news conference.

Evans attended the Landon School, a prep school in suburban Washington, where he also played football and hockey and led the lacrosse team to a three-year record of 56-2. He is one of five members of the Duke lacrosse team to graduate from the Landon School.

No sophomore slump

Sophomore Ryan Franczek has played a stellar third base for the Minutemen this season and is second on the team in hitting with a .317 average.

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

After the long doubleheader with Saint Joseph's, Ryan Franczek is probably the dirtiest player on the field. There isn't one spot on his maroon jersey and white pants that doesn't have a trace of brown on it. The "UMass" lettering scripted across his chest is barely legible.

The fact that he took it upon himself to change the school colors from "Maroon and White" to "Maroon, White and Brown" showcases the type of player he is. The Chicopee native is what is known in the Boston area as a "dirt dog."

Franczek is a 5-foot-11, 180-pound third baseman who is the type of player that avoids the spotlight. People talk about the versatility of first baseman/reliever Bryan Adamski and the budding star in Adam Tempesta, but Franczek has quietly avoided the so-called "sophomore slump" to have a very successful 2006 season.

With just four games left in the regular season, he's second on the team in batting average posting a .318 mark. He's also tied with Adamski for second on the team in extra base hits with 14 – eight doubles, four triples and two home runs. Add to the fact that no one on the team gets on base more than Franczek (.417 on-base percentage), and you have a pretty good lead-off hitter.

Yesterday against St. Joe's, Franczek demonstrated what a lead-off hitter is supposed to do. In yesterday's doubleheader he reached base a combined five times and scored three runs with an RBI. On two consecutive plate appearances in Game 2 Franczek was hit by a pitch. In the sixth – after being hit the second time – he took third on a perfectly executed double steal and ended up crossing the plate for the third UMass run of the inning.

Since late last season he has held down the No. 1 spot in the order. Franczek has turned out to be the perfect table setter for the Minutemen. Not only does he get on base, but he makes things happen on the basepaths. Stone says not only can he steal a base here and there but he has great base running ability in general.

"He's a good base stealer and a good base runner, not necessarily a straight out base stealer," Stone says. "I wish we had more guys like that. If you had nine guys like Ryan Franczek then you'd be in good shape."

Franczek enjoys every minute that he's up at the plate. He sees it as his personal responsibility to get the rest of the team up and running out of the gates. If he gets on base and then the

UMass takes series from Saint Joseph's

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

When a team is having a tough year, there is nothing it needs more than a confidence boost. That's just what the Massachusetts baseball team (14-27, 11-13 Atlantic 10) received yesterday with its sweep of Saint Joseph's in a doubleheader at Earl Lorden Field.

UMass dominated the Hawks (17-36, 9-15 A-10) in the first game taking it easily, 12-3, and used a late-inning surge to hold on for a 7-3 victory in Game 2.

The Minutemen take the field again today against Quinnipiac. Centerfielder Derrick Durepo and pitcher David Sullivan will be honored on Senior Day. Game time is scheduled for 3 p.m.

The nightcap proved to be a much closer contest than the first game. UMass picked up where it left off by scoring three runs out of the gate in the first inning thanks to an error by shortstop Chris Cashman.

SJU struck back later in the game, scoring one in the fourth and putting two more on the board in the fifth.

With Game 2 scheduled for just seven innings, UMass stormed back in dramatic fashion to take back the lead in the sixth inning. After Joe Cotone doubled, he advanced to third on a bunt by junior Travis Munsey. An error on the third baseman put Durepo on first. He eventually went to second when sophomore Ryan Franczek was hit by a pitch for the second consecutive time.

"We knew had to get something going and Joe [Cotone] did a great job, he's down 1-2 in the count and gets a double," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

A two-RBI double by Lou Proietti and an RBI single by Jim MacDonald capped the scoring in the game and put the Minutemen ahead for good.

Stone believed the turning point in the game was sparked when Bryan Adamski entered the game to pitch in the sixth. With starter Rory McDonald beginning to labor in the fifth, Stone called on the junior – who was given a rare day off from his usual spot at first base.

"When he pitches and we have an opportunity to win the game I think people step it up," Stone said. "I think that it was important to get Adamski in at that point. Rory was really dealing with one pitch [in the fifth inning]."

A seven-run first and a four-run fifth propelled the Minutemen to victory in Game 1. SJU's Ben Wendle would especially like to forget the bottom of the opening frame. The freshman outfielder made three errors on consecutive plays to open the door for the big UMass inning.

"It was a great day for us," Stone said. "We came out swing-

Seniors say their goodbyes to the Collegian

Dan Duggan

When it came time to decide on a college major, like most high school seniors I had no idea what I wanted to do. The only thing I knew was that I wanted to major in a field that would allow me to stay in contact with sports.

I've been involved in athletics my whole life, though when I began to realize that David Stern may never call my name on Draft Day, I knew I had to figure something out.

For some reason the journalism major kept popping into my head. I had never given writing much consideration, but the idea of covering sports for a living seemed to be an occupation that offered almost as much exposure to sports as being a professional athlete.

Writing was something that always came easy to me, going all the way back to second grade, when my daily journal entries were usually 500-word game recaps, while my classmates were writing about how they wanted a pony. So when Mrs. Hebert said I'd make a great sportswriter, somehow that comment must have stuck in the back of my mind.

When I enrolled at UMass I decided to declare a journalism major, but for the first year and a half of my college career I didn't do very much in the way of actually gaining journalism experience.

Somewhere during those first few semesters of soaking up the partying experience and knocking out gen-eds, I started reading Bill Simmons and decided that was what I wanted to do.

I had no idea where to start my journalism career, but I had heard that the Collegian would be a good place to start, so I sent in a Red Sox column – the same ones that we laugh at every time someone e-mails them to us now. Luckily for me, Andy Merritt, the then-sports editor saw something in my writing – or maybe he just needed someone to cover crew – but, whatever the reason, he invited me to come to a sports meeting.

When I wandered down to the Collegian office in the Campus Center basement two and a half years ago for that first meeting, I had no idea what I was getting myself into.

I knew that I wanted to write about sports, but I really had no idea what that meant. I quickly learned that writing for the Collegian was much more of a commitment than just sending in the occasional Red Sox column.

And while I knew I'd have to put some time into covering beats, I was careful not to get engrossed with working in the Campus Center dungeon.

"It's better to be lucky than good."

I'm not really sure which one I am, though I'd obviously prefer to be the latter.

Either way, it's also been said that you create your own luck, and I've sure worked hard enough to do just that. I've really had no other choice.

Three years ago, I was the typical college screw-up, shunned aside by the University of New Hampshire as though I were nothing more than a mere presence in a classroom with a number shining high above my head, rendering my name and personality useless.

Sound familiar, anyone?

The Dean of the Whittemore School of Business and Economics had shown no mercy, but when I think back to January of 2003, should she have?

After all, I was a product – or maybe more appropriately an error – of the system, just another kid who couldn't make the grade in his accounting class.

You know what? I'm a whole lot better off.

I'm not one to live by any credos, but when I think of the whole "everything happens for a reason" thing, it sure makes a ton of sense.

I wouldn't be where I am today without my experience at UNH. I learned a lot there that has made me the person I am today, but I'll spare the three people who are reading this of that boredom.

I was kicked out into the New England winter cold, forced to reevaluate the rest of my life and left completely clueless as to where it was about to take me.

Hello, Middlesex Community College, the school located less than a mile from my house, the one place no kid from Lowell ever wants to end up, the campus half the size of my high school – the 13 classes and 11-month hiatus from the playbook that completely changed my life.

When UNH kicked me to the curb, Middlesex was the only place that gave me a chance to prove myself when a chance was the only thing I ever wanted. For that, I am eternally grateful to the school I never wanted anything to do with. It's funny how things like that work.

I took my first whirl at a journalism class in the spring of 2003 and never looked back.

Paul Sullivan, the former Boston Herald writer, was my teacher. During the first week, he

Minutewomen host NCAA Regional at Softball Complex

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team (37-14) begins its pursuit of a College World Series title this weekend in the opening round of the NCAA Tournament. The Minutewomen will host the Amherst Regional starting Friday in a double-elimination format with Albany (36-11-1), Lehigh (41-12) and No. 13 Texas A&M (33-17).

The Minutewomen are coming off their second straight Atlantic 10 Championship after beating Fordham, 4-1, Saturday. UMass will be making its 12th consecutive appearance in the tournament and the 16th in the program's history.

Play will begin at noon Friday with Texas A&M and Lehigh, followed by UMass and Albany at 2:30 p.m. Similar to the A-10 bracket, Saturday's games will feature a winners' and losers' bracket, and two teams will be eliminated before the Regional Championship on Sunday.

The Minutewomen are just 22-32 all-time in the NCAA tournament, but are 14-12 as the home team in the tournament. UMass has hosted a regional eight times but has not played host since 1999. This will be the first regional held in Amherst since the construction of the new UMass Softball Complex.

"It's very exciting," senior KJ Kelley said. "[UMass] has hosted regional in the past, so it's nice to bring it back to Amherst to host one ourselves."

Not only are the Minutewomen hosting the opening round, but they are also the No. 2 seed in their group. Last year, UMass was the fourth seed in a field that included No. 4 Texas, Texas A&M Corpus Christi and Mississippi State.

"This is so good for the program that it's here, and we'll have fans here," freshman and A-10 Player of the Year Whitney Mollica said. "It's so much better for us because I know how excited I am, and I know how excited the team is. So we're just going to be adrenaline-pumped and ready to go."

The Minutewomen have never faced Albany or Lehigh during regular season play. However, they are 2-1 all-time against Texas A&M. They last faced the Aggies in last year's season opener at the Arizona State tournament. UMass lost in the game, 8-0.

One of the biggest challenges for the Minutewomen this week-

See SOFTBALL on page 10

Sophomore Lauren Proctor hit .396 for the regular season, good for third on the team behind Whitney Mollica and Amanda Morin.

Mixed results for UM track teams at N.E. Championship

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

For most Massachusetts track and field athletes, the New England Championships in Durham, N.H. drew the Massachusetts 2006 outdoor track and field season to a close over the weekend. The men placed 24th out of 36 teams, while the Minutewomen finished 19th out of 37.

Junior Erik Hoagland, a dominating season-long performer in the triple-jump and long-jump, was disappointed with his day, placing ninth and second in the events, respectively.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien blames the moderate performances on a heel injury that Hoagland had previously suffered.

"It's like anything in athletics, sometimes you get a small injury or some type of a minor sprain or something and it certainly affects you at the end of the season," O'Brien said. "He's the kind of athlete who, if he does less than what he anticipates as his capability, he's disappointed."

Sophomore long-distance runner Nils Fischer took second in the 5,000-meter run with a time of 14:41.99, a personal outdoor season best. He finished runner-up to Dartmouth senior Steve Mucchetti who completed the race in 14:39.28.

"Nils was in it all the way," O'Brien commented. "He has been coming [along] very well at the end of the season. He up pretty high in the Atlantic 10 [Championships] last weekend, and then followed it up with an even better performance this week."

Senior Ryan Corbett wasn't far behind Fischer. He finished in seventh place with a time of 15:03.62, also a personal outdoor season best.

Sophomore Nathan Barksdale came in 11th place in the 400-meter in 50.58 seconds and also did well in the 4x100- and 4x400-meter relays.

Freshman Kevin Ianetta finished in 13th place with a time of 55.82, another personal outdoor best.

The Minutemen sent three relay teams to compete in each of the meet's three different relay races.

The 4x100-meter team was on its way to a third-place finish until a botched hand-off sunk them all the way down to ninth – out of point-scoring range.

The 4x400-meter team, made up of Barksdale, freshmen David Lopes and Steve Gerome and junior Manny Harris-Lopes, ran a time of 3:21.80, finishing in a pleasing fifth place.

Murphy, Corbett, sophomore Ryan Durkin and junior Zac Pryzsiecki, the athletes that make up the 4x800-meter team, reached deep down and recorded a time 7:58.80, taking home a fourth-place finish.

O'Brien said that his team competed very well over the course of the season and that many of his freshmen and sophomore athletes showed a level of maturity that is "beyond their ages."

He added that a lack of depth in certain events made holding their own more and more difficult as the season went and that he expects to improve that lack of depth for next year.

Women's sophomore pole-vaulter Kristen Bakanowski was the only event-winner for the Maroon and White.

She won the event with a jump of 12 feet, tying her career-best performance – something she has done a handful of times.

Bakanowski had been battling a nagging ankle injury all season, but appeared to finally regain her old form about two weeks ago when she won her third A-10 pole-vault title.

Sophomore Christina DeRosa took sixth place in the 5,000-meter run. By running a 17:31.63, she broke her previous school record by 12.12 seconds.

Senior Ashley Creel, an exercise science major, collected a total of 2,460 points in the heptathlon to finish in fourth place.

Sophomore Jen Rippel finished 20th in the 400-meters with a time of 1:01.18.

Freshman Jordan Veney, usually a dominant force in all of the throwing events, failed to place within the top 24 in any of them.

UMass coach Julie LaFreniere was unavailable to comment on any of her athletes' performances.

The two UMass competitors who will continue to compete are Erik Hoagland and Kristen Bakanowski, who will take part in the IC4As and ECACs, respectively as well as the NCAA Qualifying Meet. Hoagland will perform in the long- and triple-jump and Bakanowski will do the pole vault.

Woman describes ordeals in egg donation process

By Tersa Chobot
Collegian Correspondent

"From day one, I felt like my head was being messed with," said Jennifer, 22, a senior in college and a communications major.

She is 5'4" and weighs 135 lbs. She has brown hair the color of a mouse, and her eyes are round and almost look like marbles coming out of her eyelids.

She considers herself an average person; she has good grades and an overall steady life. She said that the only thing she would change is that she wishes she had some extra cash to spend, instead of living from paycheck to paycheck.

This is when she decided to look into being an egg donor.

She always saw the ads in newspapers and magazines with enticing titles, such as, "Make up to $8,000."

Jennifer thought that donating her eggs would be an easy way to make fast cash. She didn't know that egg donation was going to be a gruesome, time consuming process.

At first, she responded to the advertisement, filled out a questionnaire about her mental and physical health, sent pictures of herself as a child along with current pictures to the donation agency and was told by the agency director that she would be matched with a couple and then they would give her a call. She thought that it was over, that it was a piece of cake, and couldn't wait for her paycheck. Boy, was she wrong.

Three months later, Jennifer finally got the call. She first went to meet the couple who chose her photograph and profile at the fertility clinic. The couple told her that she was just a little heavier than they would have liked, but her grades and health were very good, so they decided to go through with using her as a donor and the real process began.

She underwent intensive testing and passed all tests, but decided to quit briefly after starting to take the fertility drugs, once she realized that egg donation had more physical and emotional risks than she had first assumed.

This advertisement was used in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian to lure young women into donating their eggs: "EGG DONORS WANTED. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Must be a non-smoking female between the ages of 21 and 32."

Most agencies make egg donation seem like a rewarding experience and downplay the seriousness of the process. The truth is that egg donation is a lot more physical and emotional than the fertility clinics want to let on.

Christine Harte, egg donor coordinator for Robert Nichols Fertility Clinic in Norwood, Mass., explained that after a match was made, the donor undergoes intense testing to make sure that she is eligible. The only initial guidelines for the donor are that she must be a non-smoker between 21 and 35, and cannot be asthmatic or obese.

Harte said that these ages were chosen because 21 is considered safe for legal purposes and 35 is the cut-off age, because after 35, some women's eggs start becoming infertile.

"The first serious thing I had to do after a match was found was take a medical exam; they tested me for everything from Scabies to Syphilis," said Jennifer.

During the initial medical examination, doctors look for gene abnormalities or diseases. Harte said that this is done to every donor to protect the recipient and the child from these diseases. Even an intensive family medical history will be performed.

Also, any potential donor with any sexually transmitted diseases, including chlamydia, will be rejected.

"I've seen couples using egg donors as a way to conceive [who] even have the donor's husband or boyfriend be tested for diseases too; some people just want to be totally sure that the donor is clean of any diseases that could be transferred to them," said Harte.

UMass Dining Services tastes success

By Matt Sheehan
Collegian Correspondent

Step aside, men's lacrosse, there's another program on campus gaining national recognition this spring.

University of Massachusetts Dining Services was awarded second place by the National Association of College and University Food Services in this year's multiple concepts category. Judges focused on presentation, selection, merchandising, marketing and nutritional soundness. The contest matched up 700 schools from around the country.

"The category we competed in this year was very competitive; schools like UC-Berkeley, Harvard and Cornell all entered. It speaks highly of our program to be mentioned in the same company," said Ken Toong, director of Food Services at UMass.

The maroon and white are quickly establishing themselves as a force in collegiate dining, garnering acknowledgment for the seventh time, including a first place finish in 2005 and third in 2004.

The University has focused on healthier eating this year.

"We use trans fat-free oil and offer more fresh fruit and vegetables," said Toong.

The recent accolades will not translate to arrogance, Toong insisted.

"We will remain humble; we are not going to stop here, we'll continue to improve," he said.

Sophomore Emily Lewis praises the dining commons' dedication to variety.

"They offer a wide assortment of food and bring in places like Ben & Jerry's or Starbucks from time to time, a benefit other schools don't have," said Lewis.

"More Oreo cheesecake would be great, can't get enough of that stuff," said Lewis.

Junior Damien Yee appreciates the innovative experience offered by each dining hall on the Amherst campus.

"The sushi bar and stir-fry are something I have yet to see elsewhere," said Yee.

Toong and his staff have never been afraid to defy the conventional. College dining concepts like Steak and Lobster Night, dim sum brunch, pho noodles and sushi bar were applied here before any other campus in the United States.

The dining services' ability to cater to the appetite of the students on campus is its most appealing characteristic, according to sophomore Michael Cunningham.

"It seems like every time I or someone I know, makes a complaint, there is an improvement," said Cunningham.

UMass takes student input very seriously, according to Toong.

"We are very flexible to change, we do weekly polls and are always open to suggestion," said Toong.

Last year the student body grumbled over the seemingly premature closing times of dining halls on campus. To the delight of campus collegians, hours have been extended.

Ken Toong, director of Food Services at UMass.

The renovation of the Berkshire Dining Commons in the Southwest living area will add distinct flavor to an already well-seasoned reputation. Plans include 10 different themed eateries, with an ambiance of downtown Northampton.

"With the job being done at Berkshire, I think we will be number one in the nation next year," an enthusiastic Toong predicted.

Dining services has tasted triumph, but accomplishment will not skew perspective.

"In the end," Toong affirmed, "It's all about the food."

WTC memorial architect speaks at UMass

The World Trade Center memorial, which is expected to be completed between 2009 and 2010. The plan includes a series of buildings in the form of a torch, in honor of the Statue of Liberty, surrounded by gardens and fountains.

Architect Daniel Libeskind visited the University of Massachusetts campus last Tuesday as part of the 2006 Robert and Pamela Jacobs Distinguished Lecture in Jewish Life and Culture. Libeskind presented a slideshow of his structural designs, which can be found in numerous countries around the world, including sites in Germany, Israel, Italy and the United States.

Libeskind, widely known for creating the winning design plan for the World Trade Center memorial, discussed architecture and the influence of Jewish culture and tradition in his work, which he described as a dimension of substance "infused with depth and fire of tradition."

Libeskind said that he admires and is as much influenced by contemporary architecture as he is of older designs.

"Every building tells a story," said Libeskind.

He defined architecture as an emotional art, saying that "it is the art of mobilizing spiritual, emotional and intellectual desires."

He also described architecture not as two-dimensional, but as visceral and spatial.

"Architecture is an experience of space and infusing that space with a certain meaning," he said.

Libeskind presented a series of his museums and memorials and discussed the use of light and space in his designs. The accentuation of light in many of Libeskind's creations is demonstrated through his use of sharp and dramatic lines. He described light as an essential component of architecture. "Buildings are not only standing in the light, but are also giving light," he said. "Architecture can use a means of light and space to connect one to the world," he added.

Libeskind also presented the layout for his design for the World Trade Center memorial, which is expected to be completed between 2009 and 2010. The plan included a series of buildings in the form of a torch, in honor of the Statue of Liberty, surrounded by gardens and fountains. Libeskind designed the space with light in mind.

He hopes the memorial "gives impetus to what happens in the world today and in the future."

Laura Iheller, a sophomore interior design major, said that she was unfamiliar with Libeskind's work before attending the presentation.

"Libeskind's designs are different from anything I've seen," said Iheller.

She enjoyed his use of angles and light, which she said are just as important in architecture as the actual building materials.

Libeskind, the son of Holocaust survivors, was born in Poland in 1946 and became an American citizen in 1965. According to a press release, Libeskind studied music in Israel and New York before studying architecture. He graduated in 1970 from the Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art. He received a postgraduate degree in history and theory of architecture at the School of Comparative Studies at Essex University, England in 1972. Libeskind has taught and lectured worldwide and has received numerous awards, including the 2001 Hiroshima Art Prize – an award given to an artist whose work promotes international understanding and peace, never before given to an architect. His work has been exhibited extensively in museums and galleries and has been the subject of many publications. His memoir, "Breaking Ground," has been translated in over 90 countries.

Bears eat monkey in front of zoo visitors

A Sloth bear eats a Barbary macaque monkey at the Beekse Bergen safari park in Hilvarenbeek, south Netherlands May, 14.

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands— Bears killed and ate a monkey in a Dutch zoo in front of horrified visitors, the zoo said Monday. In the incident Sunday at the Beekse Bergen Safari Park, several Sloth bears chased the Barbary macaque into an electric fence, where it was stunned.

It recovered and fled onto a wooden structure, where one bear pursued and mauled it to death.

The park confirmed the killing in a statement, saying: "In an area where Sloth bears, great apes and Barbary macaques have coexisted peacefully for a long time, the harmony was temporarily disturbed during opening hours on Sunday."

"Of course the habitats here in the safari park are arranged in such a way that one animal almost never kills another, but they are and remain wild animals," it said.

Witness Marco Berelds posted a detailed report on the incident, including photos, on a Dutch Web site. He said one Sloth bear tried unsuccessfully to shake the monkey loose after it took refuge on the structure, built of crossing horizontal and vertical poles.

Ignoring attempts by keepers to distract it, the bear climbed onto a horizontal pole, and, standing stretched on two legs, "used its sharp canines to pull the macaque, which was shrieking and resisting, from its perch."

The bear then brought the animal to a concrete den, where three bears ate it.

The zoo said it "usually wasn't possible" for keepers to intervene when an animal killed another. The park plans now to move the Barbary macaques — which are large monkeys but often inaccurately called "Barbary Apes" — to another part of the park, it said.

Software makers crack down on net piracy

By Michael Liedtke
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO—Computer software makers launched a crackdown on illegal Internet sales of their products Tuesday by suing suspected pirates who have set up shop on the popular online auction site eBay Inc.

Usually fierce rivals Symantec Corp. and McAfee Inc. teamed up to kick off the crusade by targeting five different eBay sellers in three lawsuits filed Monday in a Los Angeles federal court.

"If online marketplaces are going to pursue the free-market ideals that they aspire to, they must make sure the products they sell are authentic," said Joe Fitzgerald, Symantec's vice president of intellectual property.

The two leading makers of anti-virus software decided to sue after uncovering evidence that the individuals named in the complaints had completed more than 15,000 sales involving pirated software between October 2005 and December 2005, said Keith Kupferschmid, an executive with the Software & Information Industry Association.

The trade group is coordinating the software industry's efforts to patrol eBay and other Internet auction sites for pirates. Kupferschmid said the group intends to buy copies of pirated software in the auctions and then sue "egregious" copyright violators without forewarning. The industry expects to file the suits on a monthly basis.

The campaign isn't currently aimed at eBay or the buyers of pirated software.

Besides software makers, the association also represents a large number of providers of electronic information, including The Associated Press.

This week's initial burst of lawsuits named Edward Cosmos of Bloomington, Calif.; Grace Chan of San Jose, Calif.; Kevin Liu of New Brunswick, N.J.; Mary Tian of New Brunswick, N.J.; and G.f. Tian of Highland Park, N.J.

Cosmos, Liu and the Tians didn't immediately respond to e-mails sent to their eBay profiles Tuesday. Chan's auction registration is no longer active, according to eBay. Efforts to locate a phone number for her were unsuccessful.

Cosmos and Chan received nothing but positive feedback from sellers, according to their eBay profiles. A few negative remarks were mixed with the mostly flattering commentary posted about Liu and the Tians on eBay's site.

The civil suits seek unspecified damages, as well as court orders to prevent future copyright and trademark infringement.

Software makers have long complained about pirates hosting their sales. The industry estimates it loses $11 billion to $12 billion a year from the distribution of pirated software.

The industry believes 90 percent of all software sold on Internet auctions violates copyrights or licensing agreements, Kupferschmid said.

San Jose, Calif.-based eBay disagreed with those estimates. "We know (piracy) is an issue, but we don't think it's a big problem," spokesman Hani Durzy said. eBay supports the software industry's efforts to penalize pirates, Durzy said.

Senators debate immigration bill

This is the border fence in the distance that separates the U.S., foreground, from Mexico near downtown Nogales, Ariz., May 15, 2006.

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The Senate rejected a call Tuesday to secure the nation's borders before tackling other immigration-related concerns such as citizenship for millions of men and women in the country illegally, a victory for President Bush and supporters of a comprehensive approach to a volatile election-year issue.

The vote was 55-40 against a proposal by Sen. Johnny Isakson, R-Ga., who said that anything less than a border security-first approach amounted to "a wink and a nod one more time to those who would come here" unlawfully.

Republican and Democratic supporters of the sweeping Senate bill said Isakson's approach would be self-defeating and derail the approach that Bush backed in Monday night's prime time speech from the Oval Office.

"We have to have a comprehensive approach if we're going to gain control of the borders," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

Eager to blunt any political fallout from opposing Isakson's proposal, the bill's sponsors countered with an alternative of their own. Backed by Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., it said immigration changes envisioned in the legislation could proceed if the president declared they were in the national security interests of the United States.

The Senate cast its first votes on the immigration bill as Bush renewed his call for Congress to act. "The objective is, on the one hand, protect our borders, and, on the other hand, never lose sight of the thing that makes America unique which is, we're a land of immigrants and that we're not going to discriminate against people," he said at a news conference with Australian Prime Minister John Howard.

Bush drew continued criticism from House Republicans for his speech, and the White House sought to emphasize the border security elements of the president's plan.

"This is going to be a tremendous enforcement support partnership," U.S. Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar told reporters at the White House, anticipating the deployment of up to 6,000 National Guard troops to states along the Mexican border.

"We can certainly do what is asked by our commander in chief," added Lt. Gen. Steven Blum, National Guard Bureau Chief.

Blum, Aguilar and others stressed that National Guard forces would function in support roles, leaving front-line law enforcement against illegal immigrants in the hands of federal Border Patrol agents.

Republicans expressed support for new attempts to secure America's porous borders, but they rebelled against another element of what Bush calls a comprehensive plan to alter immigration laws.

"Thinly veiled attempts to promote amnesty cannot be tolerated," said Rep. Tom Price, R-Ga. "While America is a nation of immigrants, we are also a nation of laws, and rewarding those who break our laws not only dishonors the hard work of those who came here legally but does nothing to fix our current situation."

Any legislation that emerges from Congress will eventually come from House-Senate negotiations. But first, the Senate had to act, and there, Bush's speech won praise from Republicans and Democrats alike lining up behind long-stalled legislation.

Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., said he and other supporters had the support needed to defeat any crippling amendments offered by critics. Bush's speech "solidified some votes," he told reporters.

"The president gets it," added Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill.

Behind the rhetorical lovefest lay political calculations — politicians of both parties stressing their election-year credentials as tough on illegal immigration in an era of terrorism.

Still, the impact on the Senate floor was to demonstrate support for legislation that combined several elements — toughening border control, creating a new guest worker program and opening the door to eventual citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country. The same bill includes provisions to toughen enforcement of laws against the hiring of illegal workers by businesses.

Pentagon to release 9/11 security video

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The Pentagon on Tuesday released the first video images of American Airlines Flight 77 crashing into the military headquarters building and killing 189 people in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The images, recorded by Pentagon security cameras outside the building, were made public in response to a December 2004 Freedom of Information Act request by Judicial Watch, a public interest group. Some still images from the video had previously been leaked and publicly circulated, but this was the first official release.

The airplane is a thin white blur on the video as it slams into the Pentagon at ground level. Almost instantly a white flash and a huge orange fireball appear on the video, followed by a tower of gray-black smoke. One of the videos shows a Pentagon police car driving in the direction of the impact point shortly after the plane hit.

Traveling at an estimated 530 mph, the hijacked plane plowed into the southwest side of the Pentagon at 9:38 a.m. EDT, shortly after two other hijacked airlines were flown into the twin towers at the World Trade Center in New York. The attacks set off fires in a portion of the Pentagon and killed 125 people inside, in addition to the 59 passengers and crew and the five men who hijacked the plane after it took off from nearby Dulles International Airport.

Debra Burlingame, whose brother Charles was the pilot of the American Airlines plane, said in a telephone interview that she realized Pentagon officials were compelled to release the videos under the Freedom of Information Act. But she said the images provide no new information about what happened that day.

Ms. Burlingame said she doubted that release of the videos would do anything to dispel the many conspiracy theories, including the claim by some that the Pentagon was hit by a missile. The Pentagon videos provide only the briefest glimpse of the plane as it hits the building; the images were recorded on cameras designed to record license plates of vehicles entering the Pentagon grounds and were too slow to capture the airplane's approach.

The Pentagon had previously refused to release the videos, saying they had been provided to the Justice Department as evidence in any criminal proceedings.

"We fought hard to obtain this video because we felt that it was very important to complete the public record with respect to the terrorist attacks of September 11," said Tom Fitton, president of Judicial Watch.

Cheryl Irwin, a Pentagon spokeswoman, said families of the victims of the Pentagon attack were not consulted before the videos were released on the Pentagon's Web site.

Driving rain eases in flooded New England

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

METHUEN—Driving rains that caused the worst flooding in New England since the 1930s finally eased up Tuesday, but washed-out roads and the danger of dam breaks prevented many people from returning to their homes.

More than a foot of rain fell across New Hampshire, Massachusetts and southern Maine between Friday and Tuesday, with up to 17 inches in some places. No deaths or serious injuries were reported.

Gov. Mitt Romney said the damage would reach tens of millions of dollars in Massachusetts alone. And more rain was forecast for the weekend.

But on Tuesday, the worst appeared to be over. In Maine, roads reopened and the threat against two dams on the Salmon Falls River eased.

In Methuen, Mass., state and federal engineers watched a granite dam in danger of collapse after it was reinforced with 5,000 sandbags.

Many property owners began cleaning up, although major rivers remained above flood stage.

Jeffrey Saba, 42, used a 20-foot canoe to inspect his swamped home in Lowell, Mass., near the swollen Merrimack River. The water flooded Saba's garage and rose past his deck, 10 feet off the ground. "I just canoed over a 6-foot fence," Saba said.

"We are up against a battle now," Saba said. "The next couple of days will be just a waiting game."

Water flooded the first floor of a nursing home in Lawrence, forcing officials to cut power to the place and evacuate 200 residents.

In Haverhill, officials worked to repair a burst sewage pipe dumping tens of millions of gallons of waste per day into the Merrimack River. State environmental officials said that the sewage posed no immediate threat to public health, and that a temporary fix should be in place by Friday.

The heavy rains triggered the worst flooding in some areas since 1936, according to the National Weather Service. And even though the month is only half over, it already ranks as the wettest May on record in Concord, N.H., and Portland, Maine.

Scattered showers were forecast through the weekend, but the rains should be much lighter, said Charlie Foley, a meteorologist for the National Weather Service in Taunton.

Entire neighborhoods in Nashua, N.H., were sandbagged as firefighters rescued about a dozen people and their pets by boat. About 40 female inmates from a halfway house in Concord, N.H., were taken to higher ground because of a leaky dam.

Maine Gov. John Baldacci joined Peggy Fennelly as she walked inside her candy store in York to find soda bottles and supplies bobbing in the dark floodwaters. Her freezer had fallen over, and boxes of candies and chocolate were soggy and ruined.

"I started crying and he hugged me," said Fennelly, 73. "He said, 'You're a strong lady and you'll make it.'"

Verizon denies receiving NSA request

By Peter Svensson
Associated Press

NEW YORK—Verizon Communications Inc. denied Tuesday that it had received a request for customer phone records from the National Security Agency, bringing into question key points of a USA Today story.

"Contrary to the media reports, Verizon was not asked by NSA to provide, nor did Verizon provide, customer phone records," the New York-based phone company said in an e-mailed statement.

The statement came a day after BellSouth Corp. also said the NSA had never requested customer call data, nor had the company provided any.

A story in USA Today last Thursday said Verizon, AT&T Inc. and BellSouth had complied with an NSA request for tens of millions of customer phone records after the 2001 terror attacks. The report sparked a national debate on federal surveillance tactics.

The newspaper story cited anonymous sources "with direct knowledge of the arrangement."

"Sources told us that BellSouth and Verizon records are included in the database," USA Today spokesman Steve Anderson said Tuesday.

"We're confident in our coverage of the phone database story," Anderson added, "but we won't summarily dismiss BellSouth's and Verizon's denials without taking a closer look."

USA Today said in a follow-up story Tuesday that BellSouth did not challenge the initial report when given details about it before publication. But BellSouth spokesman Jeff Battcher said he never agreed to the reporter's allegations when presented with them.

Verizon also said USA Today erred in not drawing a distinction between long-distance and local telephone calls.

"Phone companies do not even make records of local calls in most cases because the vast majority of customers are not billed per call for local calls," Verizon's statement said.

Three smaller phone companies, with mainly local business, contacted by The Associated Press on Tuesday also denied being approached by the NSA. Representatives at Alltel Corp., Citizens Communications Co. and CenturyTel Inc. all said they had no knowledge of NSA requests to their companies.

Verizon's statement Tuesday apparently did not apply to MCI, which Verizon acquired in January. In an earlier statement, Verizon said it is in the process of ensuring that its policies are put in place in the former MCI business.

MCI had a long-distance consumer business, but its main source of revenue was corporate clients.

An attorney for the former chief executive of Qwest Communications International Inc., another regional phone company, said Friday that the company had been approached by the government, but denied the request for phone records because it appeared to violate privacy law.

The denials by Verizon and BellSouth leave AT&T as the sole company named in the USA Today article that hasn't denied involvement. On Thursday, San Antonio-based AT&T said it had "an obligation to assist law enforcement and other government agencies responsible for protecting the public welfare," but said would only assist as allowed within the law.

AT&T spokesman Michael Coe said Tuesday the company had no further comment.

Verizon Communications said on Friday it does not and will not provide any government agency with customer records.

Guantanamo detainees: a diverse group

By Ben Fox
Associated Press

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico—He has a flowing white beard, can't hear or see very well and, according to his lawyer, uses a walker to hobble around the Guantanamo Bay detention center.

Haji Nasrat Khan is the oldest prisoner at Guantanamo Bay, according to a newly released list of all those who have been held at the isolated prison on a U.S. Navy base in southeastern Cuba, perched above the Caribbean Sea.

Khan, an Afghan who the military says is 71 but may be several years older, exemplifies the striking diversity of Guantanamo detainees past and present as identified by the list, which the Pentagon released Monday to The Associated Press in response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit.

"I met him one time and came out of there thinking, 'Why is this old man here?'" said Peter Ryan, a lawyer whose firm represents Khan and 14 other Afghans at Guantanamo.

The list provides the first full official accounting of all those who have been held by the military in Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. The document provides the names, hometowns and dates of birth of 759 current and former detainees.

They range from teenagers to an Afghan, now released, who was nearly 90 and was reportedly referred to as "al-Qaida Claus," by interrogators. Their hometowns are from all over — including the holy Muslim city of Mecca; Lyon, France; and Baton Rouge, La.

The military now holds about 480 detainees at Guantanamo following a series of releases and transfers that began in October 2002, nearly 10 months after the detention center opened.

An additional 136 detainees have been approved for transfer or release, but the timing depends on when their home countries agree to accept them and whether they can assure the United States the men will be treated humanely, said Navy Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler.

"This has proven to be a complex and time-consuming process," he said.

The Pentagon list does not say whether detainees were released or transferred. But the information is available from other sources, including news reports and a comparison of the list released Monday with a roster released last month.

Among those who had left were Yaser Hamdi, who was captured in Afghanistan in 2001 and taken to Guantanamo, where U.S. authorities discovered he was born in Louisiana and was therefore an American citizen. He was transferred to a military brig in South Carolina.

Hamdi was released to his family in Saudi Arabia in October 2004 after the Justice Department said he no longer posed a threat to the United States and no longer had any intelligence value. As a condition of his release, he gave up U.S. citizenship.

Two Afghans who were under 18 when they arrived are no longer at the detention center, while a third who was still there in the summer of 2004 would no longer be a minor. Peppler said there now is no one under 18 at the camp.

Khan's defense lawyer said he doesn't know if the elderly Afghan is among the 136 who are slated for release or transfer. He is at Guantanamo with his adult son, who was captured in a compound with some 700 weapons, including small arms and rockets, according to lawyers and military documents released to the AP.

Khan and his son told a military panel that the younger man was guarding the weapons for the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai and the father said he was arrested while complaining about his son's capture several days later.

The military said the father and son had links to the Taliban. At a military hearing, the father ridiculed the notion he could be a threat.

11 countries agree to access for documenting Nazi atrocities

By Arthur Max
Associated Press

LUXEMBOURG – Millions of Nazi files that describe in gray, bureaucratic tones the mechanics of mass murder will be thrown open to researchers following an agreement Tuesday by a panel that has kept the archive locked away since World War II.

Once ratified, the decision will give access for the first time to some 50 million files sheltered in a vast archive in the German town of Bad Arolsen, including the registration of concentration camp inmates by the numbers burned on their arms, stacks of crumpled identity booklets and meticulously kept records of executions.

"Bad Arolsen is the most complete file. On many subjects it is unique," said Luxembourg ambassador Paul Mertz, the chairman of the 11-nation International Commission that oversees the archive.

The files also will be available to Holocaust survivors and families of victims whose fate may not be clear.

"This will allow them to bring closure somehow for unanswered questions," said Paul Shapiro, a U.S. delegate affiliated with the Holocaust Museum in Washington D.C. "It's also an insurance policy against forgetting what happened to these people."

After months of negotiations, amendments to two 1955 agreements controlling the archives were initialed by delegates from the 11 countries on the commission. The amended agreements will be signed at a ceremony in Berlin before they are submitted to the individual governments for ratification, Mertz said.

It could take until the end of the year before the process is complete and outsiders will gain access to Bad Arolsen, he told The Associated Press.

As the Holocaust generation dwindled, pressure has been growing for nearly a decade to open the archive, but was thwarted by irreconcilable divisions over the conditions to ease access.

The files hold virtually everything the Nazis recorded on the camps, the prisoners held there and how they operated. Indexed and cross-referenced, they contain 17.5 million names of Jews, homosexuals, the mentally ill, "patients" subjected to cruel medical experiments, millions of people forced into slave labor, and Gypsies, who are also known as Roma.

The card indexes alone occupy three massive rooms at Bad Arolsen, a spa resort in central Germany. The documents themselves, some yellow and crumbling, fill row after row of metal filing cabinets in six buildings.

Experts say the opening could provide new insights into the mechanics of the Nazi extermination campaign and help people discover specific information on what happened to relatives.

The International Tracing Service, the arm of the International Committee of the Red Cross which is the archive's custodian, was founded after the war to trace missing persons. Later, survivors eligible for compensation applied to the archive for documentary evidence of their mistreatment.

Until now, the only way to access the information was to submit a request to the ITS, and await their response.

But the service has lagged behind the number of requests for information, which still flow in by the tens of thousands every year. It now has a backlog of more than 400,000 inquiries about those who disappeared during the Nazi regime.

The breakthrough came last month when Germany agreed to soften its privacy protection rules meant to safeguard the reputations of victims.

Under the changed language, each country will be able to receive copies of the files and will apply its own privacy rules. The countries on the International Commission are Belgium, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Israel, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Poland, Britain and the United States.

"We feel tremendous time pressure," said Shapiro. "I only wish we had reached this stage years ago."

The ITS says it has scanned 56 percent of the files since 1999, but it cannot move faster without more funding.

"We have only a restricted budget, and we get the budget only for humanitarian work," said Maria Raabe, spokeswoman of the ITS in Bad Arolsen.

Some of the information on Jewish victims in Bad Arolsen already is duplicated in the huge archives at Yad Vashem memorial in Jerusalem and the Holocaust Museum in Washington.

But Jews were only half of the 12 million people exterminated by the Nazis, and the files in Germany have far more comprehensive accounts of Nazi operations.

Last month, archivist Udo Jost showed an AP reporter an example of documents in the archive soon to be unveiled.

One concentration camp, Mauthausen, in Austria, diligently recorded the deaths of its inmates there, listing them by name, serial and prisoner number as well as the place and date of their birth.

"It also shows how they died," Jost said, showing a copy of the camp's Totenbuch, or Death Book, from 1942 and 1943. "These prisoners were killed every two minutes with a shot to the back of the head."

In a few hours, 300 were executed on April 20, 1942.

"That was Hitler's birthday," he said. "The camp commandant did it as a birthday gift for him."

U.S. has warmest April on record

WASHINGTON—Last month was the warmest April on record for the United States, offering many Americans a pleasant spring month.

For the 48 contiguous states the average temperature was 4.5 degrees Fahrenheit above normal for the month, the National Climatic Data Center reported Tuesday.

That made it the nation's warmest April since record-keeping began in 1895.

Worldwide it was also an above normal month, but not a record breaker, finishing as the seventh warmest April worldwide, according to the Data Center, a branch of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The warmth led to below normal home energy demand for the month, the agency added.

The warmth was particularly noted in Texas and Oklahoma, which had their warmest April on record.

For New Mexico, Kansas, Arkansas, Missouri and Tennessee it was the second warmest April.

None of the 48 contiguous states was cooler-than average, but it was below normal for the month in Alaska.

Drought persisted across large portions of the southern and southwestern United States, the Center said, but nationwide rainfall was near normal for the month.

And it noted there was a series of tornado outbreaks during the first half of the month affecting parts of the Midwest and central Plains as well as the Deep South.

Enron prosecutors manufactured case, say defense attorneys

By Kristen Hays
Associated Press

HOUSTON—The government bore down on Enron Corp. as it would the Mafia, intimidating top lieutenants into pointing fingers at their bosses because someone had to pay for crimes that preceded the company's stunning collapse, the lawyer for former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling said Tuesday.

"This was all manufactured after the fact," Daniel Petrocelli declared in an impassioned plea for jurors to acquit his client of all 28 fraud and conspiracy counts against him. "Because it's Enron. After all, somebody has to pay. It's Enron."

In a searing closing argument, Petrocelli sought to drive home the defense theme that neither Skilling nor Enron founder Kenneth Lay perpetuated an overarching fraud at the company because none existed.

But prosecutors, unable to dig up tangible proof, found mouthpieces in a string of ex-Enron executives "robbed of their free will," who pleaded guilty to crimes they didn't commit, Petrocelli said. He said fear of lengthy prison terms and expensive legal battles drove those witnesses to say whatever the government wanted them to in testimony against Lay and Skilling.

"That's how they take down Mob kingpins," Petrocelli said.

Lay lawyer Bruce Collins, the first of several attorneys on his legal team to address jurors, said his client has accepted "full responsibility" for Enron's failure — but Lay committed no crimes.

Collins said another judge presiding over numerous Enron-related lawsuits in another courtroom will decide whether Lay is liable for losses suffered by investors after the company sought bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

The current jury's job is to decide if he is guilty of the crimes alleged by the government.

"Today you decide if Ken Lay is locked in a cage for the rest of his life. Today you decide if Ken Lay is a criminal. Today you decide if Ken Lay committed any crimes," he said.

Tuesday's lengthy closing arguments were the last opportunities for the defendants' lawyers to address the eight-woman, four-man panel. Prosecutors who made their closing arguments on Monday get one more chance in a rebuttal argument on Wednesday. Then, jurors will begin deliberations in the case that began Jan. 30.

The trial is the premier case to emerge from the government's 4 1/2 year investigation into Enron's collapse in one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history. More than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs were lost by the time the energy trading company started bankruptcy proceedings.

The government alleges Lay and Skilling repeatedly lied to investors and employees, touting Enron's financial health when they knew accounting trickery hid failing ventures.

Speaking softly, Petrocelli started by telling jurors that he has "had Jeff's life in my hands" for two years since the ex-CEO was indicted. On Wednesday, "his fate's in your hands."

"Look into his eyes. Look into his soul. See if you see a criminal. See if you see a man with criminal intent," Petrocelli said.

Jurors listened intently, but most didn't laugh when Petrocelli made lighter comments. A female juror repeatedly looked at Skilling's three children — a daughter and two sons aged 22, 19 and 15. The daughter, seated near her mother and Skilling's first wife, Sue Lowe, at times snuffled and dabbed tears.

Petrocelli conceded on Tuesday that Skilling, during his six-month tenure as Enron CEO in 2001, made many mistakes, and said Skilling was far better at building the company in the years before that than he was at running it. But mistakes are not crimes, the lawyer said.

But Petrocelli's closing argument mostly attacked the way the government handled the Enron case. He turned a prosecutor's suggestion that the case was about "lies and choices" back onto the government itself.

Petrocelli accused federal prosecutors bent on winning convictions of criminalizing innocent comments, honest mistakes and normal business practices.

"They had their eye on the prize. The prize was Jeff Skilling and Ken Lay, and that's why we're here," Petrocelli said. "Documents don't lie. People do. So you create evidence."

Petrocelli also beseeched jurors not to broker any deals during deliberations, such as finding Skilling guilty of some counts and acquitting him of others. All other allegations of fraud, insider trading and making false statements to auditors stem from the single conspiracy count, and it's all or nothing, the attorney said.

"Do you have any hesitation at all about him? If you do, you must acquit him. Don't negotiate with his life. Not guilty, not guilty, not guilty — 28 times," Petrocelli urged.

Skilling faces 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors related to his activities from 1999 to August 2001. Lay faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy stemming mostly from the period after he resumed as CEO upon Skilling's departure.

On Thursday, Lay will be on trial again — before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, but without a jury — in a case related to his personal banking. In that case, the government contends he obtained $75 million in loans from three banks from 1999 through 2001 and reneged on agreements not to use the money to carry or buy margin stock. He is charged with one count of bank fraud and three counts of making false statements to banks in the case.

Lake plans to issue his verdict in the banking case, which is expected to last several days, after jurors in the larger conspiracy case render theirs.

Former Enron CEO Jeff Skillings (L) and attorney Daniel Petrocelli talk to reporters after the conclusion of closing arguments in the trial of Skillings and Ken Lay.

Investigators accuse professor of plagiarism in research

By Chase Squires
Associated Press

BOULDER, Colo.—An investigation of a professor who likened some of the Sept. 11 victims to a Nazi found serious cases of misconduct in his academic research, including plagiarism and fabrications, a University of Colorado spokesman said Tuesday.

One member of the five-person investigative committee recommended that ethnic studies professor Ward Churchill be fired, and four recommended he be suspended, university spokesman Barrie Hartman said.

Gov. Bill Owens said Churchill has tarnished the university's reputation and should resign.

Churchill, who has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing, said he would wait for university officials to make their next move before he makes his.

"Some of this I see as being transparently ridiculous, laughable," he said.

The professor touched off a firestorm with an essay relating the 2001 terrorist attacks to U.S. abuses abroad. The essay referred to some World Trade Center victims as "little Eichmanns," a reference to Adolf Eichmann, who carried out Adolf Hitler's plan to exterminate European Jews during World War II.

University officials had earlier determined Churchill could not be fired for his comments about the terrorist attacks, but they launched an inquiry into allegations about his research.

The committee's 125-page report said Churchill falsified, fabricated and plagiarized some of his research, did not always comply with standards for listing other authors' names and failed to follow accepted practice for reporting results.

The decision on his future at the university will be made by school officials later this year. Churchill has said if he is fired, he will sue.

Churchill's wife, Natsu Saito, who also teaches in the ethnic studies department, said Tuesday she had resigned her tenured teaching position at the school but said she and Churchill have no plans to leave Boulder.

In her resignation letter, Saito accused the university of reneging on promises to her and the department, ignoring racial harassment of the department and individuals, and treating Churchill unfairly. She said her decision to resign was not prompted by the pending report.

Egg donor feels side effects

"The psychological testing is where I couldn't take it anymore," said Jennifer.

After medical testing, the donor is sent to meet with a psychologist to be analyzed and to make sure that she doesn't suffer from depression or any other psychological problems.

"Most importantly, it is to make sure that the donor will go through with the process," said Harte.

The American Society of Reproductive Medicine suggests that donors who abuse drugs and alcohol, those who have significant stress, are in an unsteady relationship or have been sexually abused should not become egg donors.

"More donors have a psychological problem than a medical problem, and this is why only few of the donors are permitted to proceed after this testing," Harte said.

Once all of the tests are performed, and the donor is permitted to continue, the hormone treatments start.

First, the donor needs to give herself a shot twice a day with a drug called Lupron. This drug stops a woman's period, and is supposed to match up menstrual cycles with those of the woman who is receiving the eggs. Harte said that most donors will come to the fertility clinic to be given the shots because they don't feel comfortable giving them to themselves, but that doing it at home is also an option. The fertility drugs also stimulate the release of 10-20 eggs, instead of the one that is usually released during a woman's monthly period.

"I quit after two days of getting the fertility shots. They gave me the worst cramps and headaches and made me miserable. I did nothing those two days; I couldn't do school work and all I wanted to do was sleep," said Jennifer.

"I decided to quit because I couldn't afford to feel that miserable for three weeks."

The side effects of the fertility drugs are hot flashes, mood changes, vaginal dryness, headaches, sleep problems and fatigue.

"I realized that for me egg donation wasn't a good idea; what seemed appealing to me was the money, and it seemed easy enough, but I just wasn't aware of everything that it entailed," Jennifer said.

During the weeks of taking the fertility drugs, the donor is asked to refrain from having sexual intercourse, and some clinics require that you sign a contract saying that you won't. This is because the drugs make pregnancy more likely.

Also, if your partner has an STD and hasn't been screened, it could be passed along in the egg.

Harte said that most people think that egg donation can ruin your own chances of having children later on in your life, but actually that is very false.

After weeks of taking fertility drugs and continuous trips to the clinic to have ultrasounds and blood tests, the eggs are finally retrieved. It is a small surgery called transvaginal ovarian aspiration. A water-filled needle is inserted, and using suction, the eggs are taken immediately to be mixed with the sperm. The surgery lasts only 15 minutes and the donor is given a sedative. Once this is over, the donor will finally be paid, and the physical procedures are over.

Risks of this procedure include bleeding when the needle is inserted or possible damage to the donor's bladder or blood vessels.

"If the donor can handle the side effects associated with the fertility drugs, then the surgery should be easy," said Harte.

Most donors said that the surgery wasn't bad compared to the fertility drugs.

Donating eggs could really help make a couple's dreams of having a family come true. Just don't think that the process is easy and don't let the ads fool you into thinking that it's easy money. Money shouldn't be the motivation to do it. Egg donation does have emotional and physical risks that should be explored before deciding to donate.

Correction

In an article printed in the May 15 edition of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian entitled "Students hold debate on war in Iraq," students Justin Jackson and Ethan Burke, a member of the Anti-War Coalition and the organizer of the debate, were mistakenly quoted throughout the story.

Most notably, Burke's statements regarding a poll on the Iraq invasion were misquoted.

The article read, "'Eighty-two percent of Iraq's population opposes the war invasion,' stated Burke."

In reality, Burke said, "A poll done was by the British Ministry of Defense to find out what the Iraqi public opinion was; they polled them and asked them about the occupation; 82 percent strongly opposed the U.S. presence in Iraq."

The Collegian apologizes for its error.

Making coffee gets easier

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

NATICK—Soldiers thirsting for a cup of coffee on the front lines of World War II could quickly heat up the beverage inside their "steel pot" helmets that served as both head protection and a handy container for campfire cooking.

That isn't an option for modern-day soldiers, whose Kevlar-fiber helmets can defend against bullets but don't work so well for fixing food.

So researchers at the Defense Department's Combat Feeding program in Natick cooked up another way for troops to make a hot cup of joe: A thick, re-sealable polyethylene bag that can be used anywhere.

Soldiers mix instant coffee with water in the bag, then slide it into the flameless ration heater bags troops use to warm their meals. A magnesium and iron oxide pad within the flameless ration bag transfers heat to the water in the hot beverage bag. Within minutes, the coffee is steaming hot.

Soldiers slip the bag into an envelope-like cardboard carton, which can be used like a cup to drink the coffee and protect their hands from the heat.

Barbara Daley, a food technologist at the Combat Feeding program, said many soldiers on the front lines were going without coffee because there was no easy way to make it. The researchers at the program based at the U.S. Army Soldier Systems Center spent about two years developing the Hot Beverage Bag, or HBB, as it is known in military speak.

"There are coffee lovers out there and they wanted a way to make a hot cup of coffee. We found a simple, dependable, inexpensive way to do it," said Daley, who helped develop the bag.

Army Sgt. 1st Class Rick Haddad, who spent two months in Afghanistan last year, said the lightweight, easy-to-use bag was a big hit with the soldiers in his platoon, who previously often went without coffee.

"It's a morale thing," Haddad said. "Any time in a cold weather environment, if you can have something hot once a day, that definitely improves morale, especially if you are pulling guard duty for 12 hours a night with no sunlight.

Still, the instant coffee won't be mistaken for Starbucks.

The bags were first introduced to troops last year and are now being included in every meal pack, known as Meal, Ready-to-Eat, or MRE. They cost about 6 cents each to produce.

World War II veteran Tom Blakey said the hot beverage bag would have come in handy while he was serving in the 82nd Airborne Division. Although helmets were a popular way to cook coffee or meals for a group of soldiers, that could only be done when they were sure the enemy wasn't close enough to see or smell smoke from the campfire.

"You had to have the proper circumstances ... because of the fire situation and the proximity of the Germans," he said. "When we found a fire they were building, we bombed it, just like they did to us."

David Stieghan, U.S. Army Infantry Branch historian at Fort Benning, Ga., said soldiers have used a variety of military-issued utensils as well as their own ingenuity to find ways to make coffee during wartime.

In the Civil War, Union soldiers were issued unrationed and unground coffee beans, along with a one-quart tin-plated steel cup. Soldiers would roast a few coffee beans at the bottom of their cups or in a small frying pan, then use their bayonet socket to crush the beans. They would then pour water into the cup and boil it over a campfire, Stieghan said.

In recent years, front-line soldiers have used poisonous fuel tabs to heat up coffee in their canteen cups, but that system wasn't always practical. Neither the fuel tabs nor canteen cups were always readily available, and soldiers had to use matches to light the tabs, so making coffee or other hot beverages that way could be tricky.

"When it comes to coffee, soldiers have always done whatever it takes," Stieghan said. "Just for this purpose up or the feeling of having something warm in their hands."

Man says he fatally stabbed Springfield soldier in self-defense

By Adam Goldman
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD—Lawyers for a man charged with fatally stabbing a soldier training to fight in Iraq say their client acted in self-defense when he was confronted by a "raging military man" who was upset that his wife was having an affair.

Pablo Vargas, 28, of Holyoke, allegedly stabbed Iremayne King, 27, a former National Guardsman who had recently joined the Army.

"Pablo Vargas was caught, confronted and trapped," defense attorney Perman Glenn told a Springfield Superior Court jury Tuesday during opening statements in Vargas' trial. "He had nowhere to run, nowhere to hide. All he could do was fight. He was dealing with a raging military man.

"This is a self-defense case," he said.

Glenn said Vargas was sitting in his underwear and socks in the Springfield apartment that King shared with his wife when King came home on a weekend pass from Fort Drum, N.Y. in September 2004.

He said King burst into the apartment with a gun, began hitting his wife and then went after Vargas.

"Mr. Vargas had no idea what he was getting involved in," Glenn said. "He had no idea this woman had a jealous husband."

But prosecutor James Orenstein said Vargas knew King was on his way home and was waiting to kill him. He said King had two guns stored in the bedroom, but was unarmed when he burst into the apartment.

"Mr. King did not have a gun in his hand," Orenstein said.

King — an Army specialist who worked as a mechanic — was shot 11 times with an ornamental knife in the heart, lung, liver, spleen and kidney.

King and his wife ... had a daughter together and children from previous relationships ... were having marital problems and considering getting a divorce.

Glenn said King's wife ... had become involved with Vargas several months before the stabbing, while King was already training at Fort Drum for a deployment to Iraq. He said King had a history of domestic violence.

Some solid suggestions

Jon Brandt

The semester is coming to a close — as if you weren't already aware. All over campus people are getting ready for finals and the summer, and despite the recent bad weather, hopefully we will have a warm and enjoyable break from school. Since this is my last column for the year, I thought I'd give a little advice on how to have a fun time during the summer, but also how to stay safe.

After finals are over, you might find yourself having a sudden urge to run through the streets screaming with joy. This is understandable, and no one can blame you, but just make sure you look both ways and avoid doing this near Sunset Avenue, as it is likely you will be hit by a car. I would stick to the smaller roads and, if possible, the sidewalks. You never know when a crazed bicyclist will be behind you, but it's their job to avoid you.

Once you get back to your room you might be tempted to throw your possessions out of your window. If you choose to throw books and other light things out the window, make sure no one is around when you do it — the last thing you want to do is hit someone who is running around screaming with joy. Remember, do not throw your computer or printer out the window. I know it's very hard to not do it, especially if they have been giving you a hard time all semester, but this could really hurt someone, and who is going to clean up that mess? Also, if you take your computer or printer to an open field to destroy it, a la "Office Space," make sure there are no cops around. While you aren't really hurting anyone, this is still considered littering and destruction of property. Even though it's yours, you can still get in trouble, so steer clear of that hornet's nest.

Once you are back at home you'll want to hang out with friends and party. You have to remember though, you aren't at school anymore, and a lot of the crap you pulled over here will not fly at home. For instance, if you are one of the bastards that refuse to flush the toilets in the dorms, you will be sad to learn that you need to clean up after yourself at home, unless your mom wipes your ass for you already, in which case you have bigger issues. If you get drunk, don't puke all over the place and leave it for someone else to clean up. That's just not cool.

If you're going to a party, don't be "that guy" at the party that everyone hates and eventually throws out. You are representing the University of Massachusetts, and I'll be damned if my reputation is marred because you can't handle your alcohol. Everyone and their sister already knows that UMass is the ninth party school in the country. Big deal. If you are still proudly celebrating that, months after it was announced, then you are a loser.

If you're going to be heading to the beach, make sure you take the proper precautions beforehand. First, make sure you drink lots and lots of beer so that when you get to the beach you pass out. Then, your friends can take some sunscreen and write funny things all over your body that will leave imprints for weeks. And, because you're probably so white from a winter of bundling up, the contrast from the white writing and your now burning red flesh will be seen for miles. If you've just eaten a big meal, don't bother waiting a half hour before going swimming. Everyone knows that's just an old myth. The food actually makes you more buoyant, but the dessert industry doesn't want you to know this. They figure the longer you sit around after eating, the more likely you are to buy some cake or ice cream.

If you're going to be having a Fourth of July celebration at your house, don't forget the fireworks. Nothing says happy birthday, America, like an M-80 to blow up a small part of it. As always, use precaution when lighting the firecracker. If at first it doesn't ignite, get in very close to inspect. Pick it up and feel it in your hands to see if it's hot. Hold it up to your ear to listen for burning sounds. If that doesn't work, just pour a whole lot of gasoline on the grill, throw in the firecracker, and light it.

I hope these tips will help you throughout the summer. As always I assume no legal responsibility for anything that goes wrong. Let the authorities settle it for you. Have a great summer and try to stay out of trouble; either with your parents, John Q. Law, or at the beach.

Are we losing?

Katy Bruck

Last semester, I tried to make it a regular routine to log on to the New York Times Web site and read at least the first few "above the fold" stories. But this semester, probably due either to the lack of political science classes in my schedule or the gradual seeping in of college apathy, I fell out of the habit. However, with the recent high-profile immigrant protests and various other issues (was I the only one that missed the Bausch and Lomb contact lens solution recall?), I decided it might not be a bad idea to start being a little more proactive. Ironically, at about the same time, a good friend of mine decided that she'd start sending me forwarded newspaper editorials and anecdotes — most of them distinctly pro-war or anti-liberal (and there is a distinction between the two, apparently). I was reading one of these e-mails recently when I decided to make another visit to the New York Times Web page. Hence, my coming upon the Moussaoui story.

On May 4, 2006, Zacarias Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison for his involvement with the attacks on September 11th. The headline describes Moussaoui as "defiant," and I would say that's a pretty apt description. He's quoted as yelling, "America, you lost! You lost!" as he was led out of the courtroom, to be transferred to a Colorado prison to serve a life sentence.

Moussaoui described his trial as "a wasted opportunity" to understand why individuals involved in Al-Qaida do what they do. Neglecting all else said, including his allusion to America's grief as "selective" and the general closed-mindedness of our people, I found this statement to be startlingly true. I can't even count how many times I've sat around my dinner table while my liberal aunts and grandmother heatedly curse out the Bush administration for their shaky justifications and, according to my second eldest aunt (after a few glasses of wine), flat out lies, and the only thing I'd had to contribute was the fact that I simply didn't know enough about the situation to make any determinations at all, other than the obvious ones.

Yeah, undeniably, war bites the proverbial big one, and however many moral or ethical justifications are being spouted, there's almost always an economic motivation tacked on to the rhetoric. That's been true in this country since the Spanish-American War. We can thank Teddy Roosevelt for the abandonment of our former isolationist point of views, and our irreversible economic ties to the other countries on this planet. And that's certainly not a bad thing; it's part of why we've come so far, and hopefully, still have far to go as one of the planet's leading political powers. I have always held the belief that America has always strived to be the Athens of the modern world. What distresses me about this article in particular, though, is that it renews the fact, in my mind, that we are straying farther and farther from this internal ideal I established for my country back when I was first starting to learn to think for myself (something encouraged by my bleeding-heart liberal family).I find that an interesting lack of linguistic understanding on the part of many Americans today is knowing the difference between sympathy and comprehension. Moussaoui's description of his trial as a missed opportunity rang true to me because of my own lack of knowledge of the politics and culture of Middle Eastern countries. I don't think that any exceptions should be made for Moussaoui or any of his peers, and I think the outcome of his case was an extraordinary display of understanding on the part of the judge and jurors (though they came to their verdict against the expectations of even the defense attorneys), but I also think that more of an effort should be made to educate Americans about terrorism — why it happens, where it stems from and who takes part in it.

What distresses me is that we are straying farther and farther from this internal ideal I established for my country back when I was first starting to learn to think for myself.

I think something that a lot of people potentially skimmed over in the Moussaoui article is the fact that his mother plans to petition to have her son transferred to a French prison — because Moussaoui is not Iraqi or Afghan, he is a Morrocan immigrant who spent near the entirety of his life living in France. One thing I do know about Al-Qaida and Islam-based terrorism is the fact that it doesn't really have a "base" country — it spans Europe, South America and all of Africa, not just the Middle East. Its members hold citizenship in dozens of countries, speak dozens of languages; the only thing they share in common is a fanatical interpretation of the Quran (an interpretation that sits comfortably in the minority). I think that we also forget that these faceless terrorists are indeed sons and brothers of people just like us. Moussaoui himself, as his defense attorneys brought to the attention of the court, had a determinedly unstable childhood, full of hostility and complications. We forget that fanatical and suicidal tendencies are not always genetic, and they can never been entirely culturally motivated.

I certainly don't presume to put forth any suggestions as to how we should fix this widespread problem of lack of education and understanding, nor do I profess any special or advanced knowledge of the topic myself. This brings me to one last point. How many people reading this article right now can honestly say they've read even one page of the Quran? Since I can say that I haven't, and don't want to tread on the dangerous ground of making religious assertions, I'll just leave you with the words of Immortal Technique:

"…God is not a religion, but a spiritual bond

And Jesus is the most quoted prophet in the Qu'ran."

Apocalypse now

Bonnie Solomon

What would you do if the world was about to end? Would you be heroic and try to save people? Would you run for your life, hide in a shelter? With June 6, 2006 (6.6.06) coming up, these are the questions people have been asking. Some religious fanatics believe that will be the date of the end of the world. They believe this is the day of the Beast, the day the Devil will arise. The Apocalypse.

What if instead of the Devil taking over, aliens invaded? What would you do if you were in a real life "War of the Worlds"? If aliens invaded, how would we survive on campus? The library would be so obvious that they would shoot it down first. Then probably the Fine Arts Center because the FAC looks like a piano, and I don't think aliens will be too keen on pianos. Aliens would definitely destroy Hasbrouck, because it contains all the physics and engineering labs. They won't want us finding anything out about them. We could hide in the dining halls, that way we could have food and shelter. Although most of Franklin is windows, so it would not be safe there either.

What would you take with you? Would you save your laptop? Your goldfish? If aliens invaded, those would all be useless. Except maybe the beer.

This gloomy weather makes it perfect for aliens to attack. Walking with umbrellas or hoods does not give us the ability to see the sky that often, and the monstrous clouds are in the way. If they attacked, we'd never be able to see them.

In "War of the Worlds," like in most end-of-the-world-as-we-know-it movies, the protagonist has to decide what is most important to him or her. What would you take with you? Would you save your laptop? Your beer? Your goldfish? If aliens invaded, those would all be useless. Except maybe the beer. You could get drunk so you wouldn't feel the pain, or you could offer the beer to the aliens as an exchange for your life. I'm sure they'd be quite fascinated with the phenomenon of alcohol. They would probably get so inebriated that they would fail in their mission to take over Earth.

Saving ourselves if the polar ice caps melted and the next ice age began would be pretty easy. We'd all just barricade ourselves in the library. It is so big that there is definitely room for all on-campus residents. In "The Day After Tomorrow," the New York Public Library was not nearly as tall as our library. On each floor, there is a plethora of books for the students who would be camping out there. If, God forbid, we had to burn them all, then we would be able to live quite comfortably until the eye of the storm passed. Or we could all just move to Mexico, but I'm sure the Mexicans would not be too happy about that. We won't let them into our country; why would they let us into theirs?

What if the apocalypse happened by a meteor hitting the Earth like in the movie "Armageddon"? Do we have talented enough engineers and astronauts to actually get on the meteor and blow it up so it doesn't destroy Earth? Do we have the technology and skill to be able to do something so impossible? What would you do? Would you run around screaming? Sit in your room and cry? Drink a beer? (If it holds off the aliens, of course it will hold off a meteor.)

The dictionary defines "Armageddon" as "any final and decisive war or conflict, for example, a worldwide nuclear war." This option is feasible, as Iran is cooking up a horde of nuclear weapons (supposedly).

If President Bush believes that "the September 11 revolt of passengers against their hijackers on board Flight 93 had struck the first blow of 'World War III,'" (Yahoo!News), and that the "War on Terror" could be World War III, then my breakfast this morning of bagel and cream cheese was crème brulee and caviar. If this is true, then we are all doomed.

So, stockpile canned food and blankets. Store some machetes in your underwear drawer, just in case. Make sure you can always see the library, and avoid the Fine Arts Center. Always have a hefty supply of beer in your fridge, and extras in your closet. If you do all this, you'll be thankful that you read this article so you can be prepared when the day comes.

Well, it may be true that 6/6/06 is the day when the Devil will take over the world (muahaha), but it is already the next day in Australia.

Chris Eckel

So for those of you who are graduating, get ready to step into a new chapter of your lives. There are a few differences between college and the real world, most notably that in the real world, you have to be up before 11, you can't drink on a Wednesday afternoon without getting fired, and the dress code is a little more demanding than sweats and Uggs. It can be a little bit intimidating without some sort of advice from someone older and/or wiser, and I qualify on the older front. I don't pretend to know it all, or even much of anything. Most of the things I know come from ESPN, GQ, or my own experiences, none of which are on the level of Sophocles, Thomas Jefferson or Eleanor Roosevelt when it comes to intelligence, but that won't stop me from trying to help you all out with some wisdom.

For starters, I think that no matter how much we all bash the University of Massachusetts, we'll remember our time here as four-to-nine of the greatest years of our lives. I've learned that the book is almost always better than the movie.

I believe that without New England winters, we wouldn't enjoy New England summers nearly as much as we all do, so stop cursing the snow. I think that taking some time off right now to figure your life out is far better than realizing you don't like what you've done with your life several years down the road. I'm fairly positive that Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert are the best sources for news in this country. I've found that it's far better to say "please," "thank you" and "I'm sorry" too often rather than not often enough. Kudos and Clif bars might make for a great breakfast, but you shouldn't try and live off of them.

Hope is the best of things, and unlike the preseason expectations for the UMass basketball team, sometimes the things you hope for come to pass.

Hope is the best of things, and unlike the preseason expectations for the UMass basketball team, sometimes the things you hope for come to pass. I have faith in the fact that O.A.R. makes the best music in the world for kissing and cuddling, but that doesn't mean you can't practice with other bands. I think that we should all keep some sort of journal, if for no other reason than to see where we've all been.

I'm pretty sure that, in this country, money is more respected than intelligence and integrity, but that is no good reason to go chasing a big paycheck while throwing away your principles. I'd put forth that you will see people at their most honest when they're drunk, or when they have chalkboard space at the Loose Goose. Foxwoods is a good time for the weekend, but don't try and set up your retirement plan via blackjack. I've discovered that even the smallest gestures are much more meaningful when they are a surprise. Remember, your mother/great-aunt/boss is reading your Facebook profile or your blog, so don't post anything too ridiculous.

I think taking a chance every day is a healthy way to live. I'd debate the idea that there is a set path for any of us; if life hands you terrible luck, you don't have to assume that its part of some grand plan, fight for what you want, and don't ever give up chasing the important things, no matter the obstacles in your way. I will never doubt that October 27, 2004, will be one of the greatest nights of all of our lives. I can't think of a single good reason to drink Michelob Ultra, ever; for you calorie counters, Guinness only has 24 more, and it tastes far better. If you can, travel outside the United States, even if only for a short time.

Don't ever be afraid to kiss your family members goodnight. Once in a while, unless you drive an ambulance or fire truck, take the scenic route. I guarantee that each and every one of us has the power to change the world; the only thing stopping us is our doubts. It seems to me that there are only two worthwhile fast food places: Wendy's and Taco Bell. I'm pretty sure that having faith is more important than having a religion. I believe that the love of your life is absolutely worth fighting for, no matter how daunting the effort might seem. I'm wearing Pumas, but I'm pretty sure that Adidas is on to something when they say "Impossible is Nothing." I can't ever forget that death is coming for all of us, for some of us sooner than we think, and it's important to do what you want with your life; don't spend too much time in a cubicle.

And that, right there, is about all that I think I know. Just remember, if my advice fails you, just listen to the words of another UMass graduate, one who probably knows a lot more than me. Bill Cosby once said, "In order to succeed, your desire for success should be greater than your fear of failure." So if the thing you're chasing is worth it, give it your all. Good luck in the real world, UMass. Don't forget to write and tell me how it all turns out.

Put Saddam Hussein back in power

Kevin Dooley

In an article in the United Kingdom's Sunday Times, it was reported that Saddam Hussein told one of his defense lawyers that he was ready to die.

"I am not scared of execution," said the former brutal dictator of Iraq. While Saddam Hussein awaits the almost certain guilty verdict to be handed down in his ongoing trial, which resumed this week, he has taken up writing some of his own poetry. Here's a sample of his work from FoxNews.com:

From "Ode to Iraq"

"My spirit is still standing firm and will not fall,
And in my body runs the blood of the great.
Oh Iraq you are crowned in the heart
And on the tongue you are the poem of the poets.
Oh Iraq misfortune has shaken your sword, so stand tall
And gather your strength without bearing a grudge."

Even though Saddam may have all the time in the world now to write poetry (at least until he is publicly hanged), Saddam is needed somewhere else. And it's not as a writing instructor in a creative writing class here at the University of Massachusetts. Instead, Saddam Hussein needs to be put back in power as president/dictator of Iraq immediately.

Ever since Saddam Hussein was ousted from power in 2003, Iraq has been nothing short of a disaster area. The once secular nation has seen the rise of sectarian violence, mainly involving the Shiite and Sunni Muslims in their ongoing attempt to seize power in the chaotic political landscape. Some have said the way to solve the problem of sectarian violence in Iraq is to just simply split the country into three separate nations. After all, Iraq has only been an independent nation since 1932.

Long before Britain granted the country independence, the region was divided into three separate provinces under the Ottoman Empire. The problem with this plan, as Anthony Cordesman writes in his New York Times article "Three Iraqs would be one big problem," is that Iraq is not divided along a neat set of sectarian lines. As a result, the effort to divide Iraq along sectarian lines would result in massive "relocations." In addition, there would be fights over the control of oil in Iraq. According to Cordesman's article, "90 percent of Iraq's government revenues come from oil exports."

Ever since Saddam Hussein was ousted from power in 2003, Iraq has been nothing short of a disaster area.

So if dividing the country along sectarian lines is not the solution to creating regional stability, what is? Like I said earlier, all you have to do is tell Saddam Hussein he is back in power. Say what you want about the guy, and yes, I know he is a brutal dictator who is responsible for countless lives being lost, but he was the only one it seems that was able to keep the Shiite and Sunni Muslims from going at each other's throats. When Saddam Hussein was ousted from power, it created a political vacuum which the majority of Iraqis filled by democratically electing a Shiite government. However, this election has only alienated the Sunni Muslims in Iraq, and was one of the factors in the Shiite mosque being blown up a few months ago. The solution to this entire mess is to put Saddam back in power.

Like many people have said before, Saddam Hussein was absolutely no threat to the United States. The Bush administration blatantly lied to us when they said Saddam Hussein had ties to the terrorist organization Al-Qaida. As a result of the U.S. invasion, however, Iraq has become a recruiting dream for Al-Qaida. Sadly, Iraqis didn't dance and throw roses at our troops when they arrived on the scene. Instead, Iraqis grew bitter and desperate as they saw their country stampeded by American troops under the orders of President Bush. The desperation has led many Iraqis to turn towards Islamic Fundamentalism as a way to fight back against the imperialistic United States. Without any doubt, Iran will soon be looking to extend their extreme Islamic teachings to desperate Iraqis who are looking for anything to cling onto as they watch their country be torn apart.

And let us not forget the claim by the Bush administration that Saddam Hussein had an arsenal of weapons of mass destruction. Now, you would think that our government would be able to easily tell our troops where to find these weapons, since it was the United States who sold Saddam Hussein these lethal weapons when Iraq was at war with Iran. Back in the 1980s, Saddam was in fact a friend of the United States when they were at war with the "dangerous" Iranian nation, which was then under an extreme Islamic fundamentalist leadership (and still is) that had grown hostile towards the United States.

So, in my opinion, the only way that we can bring home our troops immediately and at the same time bring back some regional stability to Iraq before we invaded is to have Saddam Hussein regain power. Despite the fact that this is the same man who during the Gulf War I thought was going to steal all my presents under the Christmas tree. It's sobering to know that the only person who can bring back order to a chaotic nation is one of the most brutal dictators in history, but it is necessary in order to bring home our troops and to make sure Al-Qaida and Iran do not gain more influence in Iraq than they already have as a result of the invasion.

Competition is not the answer

Andrew Freeman

Quiz question: what can you do better, in the eyes of a CEO, than a talented graduate from India or China? Take a couple of moments to think about it. Ready? The answer is nothing.

That's not meant to be an insult. It's just a reflection of different economic values, namely, your work costs more. As a college graduate in this country, you probably expect a minimum income of $30,000 at an entry-level position, and much more over the course of your career. Prices in America are set to our high standards of living, and, as a result, we cannot suddenly see our wages fall to the levels in third-world countries and hope to survive.

Now what if I told you that people with similar levels of education and skill would do your job for much less, say for $10,000 a year. What self-respecting businessman would hire you over the competitor? You can't hope to compete, unless you accept unacceptable wage decreases, or move to the country of your competitor.

America faced this first with deindustrialization: the decline of America's manufacturing industry. All around us are the shells of former industrial cities: Hollyoke and Springfield provide two of the best examples, marked by corruption, high crime, and unemployment. What was once America's industry has deserted for Mexico, China, or wherever the wind blows, the wages are low and government is oppressive.

None of us are going to be working in industrial jobs. College students aim for work in areas like business, law and medicine, in professions where we expect only to compete with other Americans. However, increasingly any industry that can be exported or outsourced will be, because the new technology can support it. When you call for technical support on a product, oftentimes the person on the other end of the line will be in India. Medical tests such as MRI or CT scans can be interpreted in other countries. Outsourcing now occurs in healthcare, computers, law and research, and it will only grow, and there will be ever fewer good jobs.

Outsourcing and global competition are accepted, thanks to a little joke that's been running rampant in our society — trickle-down economics. This is the belief that by giving the rich people lower taxes, they will reinvest in the economy, propelling it to new heights. It isn't true. As a businessman, why would I invest in America, where the economy grows at 3 percent per year, when I can put my money in China, where economic growth tops 10 percent annually? The purveyors of this myth maintain that such efficiency keeps prices lower, but Americans without well-paying jobs will not be able to afford even slightly cheaper products.

Medical tests such as MRI or CT scans can be interpreted in other countries. Outsourcing now occurs in healthcare, computers, law and research, and it will only grow, and there will be ever fewer good jobs.

On a global scale, we will see a race to the bottom. Every industry that can be moved abroad to areas of cheaper labor will be. If wages should rise in an area, then companies can move on to the next cheap labor zone. This will play out idiotically. For example, China might become an economic powerhouse tomorrow, but the second wages rise too high there, or the government clamps down on business, the jobs will go elsewhere. Then if India tries to raise wages and better working conditions, companies will flee. Businesses will look out at the entire world and force everyone to compete against each other, while raking in enormous profits. The trends towards greater centralization of wealth will continue, until a few people scattered across the world will own most of it.

So how do we deal with global competition? There are two ways to approach this: protectionism is the national level, or rising above it. Protectionism is what we're used to — using tariffs and other governmental restrictions to encourage domestic business while keeping out foreign competition. However, this won't work, for a variety of reasons. The problem is not that American companies are being squeezed out — it's that most major companies have no loyalty to any country. All we can do to keep them here is try to lower standards, which doesn't work, or use the force of legislation.

As long as we try to compete, as long as we view workers in other parts of the world as enemies, we will be unable to succeed. A war of all against all will only line the pockets of the corporations, while sinking everyone — Chinese, Indians and Americans — into poverty. Instead, we need to rise above competition. We must cooperate across the oceans and across the world, to raise the value and standards of labor, and to limit corporate exploitation, because there is no viable alternative.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR

UMBRELLAS AND ANIMALS

As everyone is aware, God has sent down a second flood to cleanse the earth of all evil. It's been raining now for over a week and it doesn't seem like it's going to stop. I, for one, am getting some wood and reading up on ship-building. If you want in on salvation, start getting two of every animal and bring 'em over to my place.

But even before I went to Home Depot, after looking at the 10-day forecast and seeing nothing but clouds, I decided to bring out the umbrella and make it a daily addition to my effects. Now, I'm not here to rant about how I love my umbrella, which I do. Rather, I am trying to convey a selfless and altruistic message. You see, as I'm walking around feeling nice and dry, I see the miserable dregs around me who don't seem to own one of these wonderful shields, nor take proper precautions in general. It's been raining for so long that I can't remember the last time it was sunny, yet still these people chose to defy the conventional paraphernalia known as wet weather gear.

Today I saw a girl walking around in the pouring rain in clunking high heels and capris. Come on, take comfort over fashion. She was completely soaked from head to exposed toe and looked miserable. A friend was walking alongside her, and of course neither of them had an umbrella or raincoats. But this display isn't only confined to the Susie Sweatpants of the University of Massachusetts everywhere I go on campus, I can't turn my head without seeing somebody who is just drenched and miserable. For those who wear leather coats: you've got to be kidding me. Cows can get wet, your sweet T-Birds jacket can't.

Why don't you attempt to keep dry? I think it comes down to two reasons: one is that people are too vain to be seen with umbrellas (see examples above), and the other is that people see them as a hassle. Thus enters the stupidest accessory ever, the small pop-up user-friendly umbrella. This thoughtless buy was clearly made with the mindset of convenience of size over functionality. I see these struggling men and women around campus with these miniscule things with the only real benefit of keeping your hairdo intact. Other than that, you get completely soaked. Not to mention the fact that it's just going to break in 5 mph wind (if you don't forget it in the Dining Commons first).

As I make my trek through the rain from class to class, I look at you poor souls, and I see a former version of myself. I was once lost as you were, but then my grandparents sent me this sweet umbrella and I found the path. As this semester is coming to a close, you probably won't need an umbrella for much longer because you won't have to walk around so much, but think about what I have said, and plan for the next.

Don't abstain from buying an umbrella, and if you do splurge and purchase one, don't get one that a sneeze could turn inside out. If you are too vain or proud and can't do it for yourself, do it for the person next to you at the next lecture. They don't want someone sitting next to them who smells like one of the wet animals I'm loading up onto my ark.

True love can never be weak

Chris Reardon

I've said before that I'm too apathetic to go on about political issues, even things like gay marriage that have a specific impact on me. I had written off opposition to gay marriage as just another conservative agenda that is intended to keep money in the hands of the rich and deny civil rights to those who deserve them. Long ago, I realized that our country is run by the conservatives and there's not a whole lot that I can do to change the way they do things.

I realize now that I have a voice and that it's a total waste if I don't use it to say what needs to be said. That's because this time, it's personal. This past Thursday, in response to proposed Italian legislation that will give governmental recognition to unwed couples (in particular, to homosexual couples), Pope Benedict XVI said "Today, it has become urgent to avoid confusion between [marriage] and other types of unions which are based on a love that is weak."

Not allowing gays to marry because one is too greedy to share in the civil benefits of marriage is one thing, but to condemn unwed couples and suggest that homosexual love is weaker than heterosexual love is truly crossing the line. As a Catholic, I had previously been impressed by Benedict's seemingly liberal stances on other issues, but apparently he forgot to go see "Brokeback Mountain" when everyone said how great a movie it was. Maybe he could have learned a thing or two from the saga that is Ennis and Jack's love for each other.

Maybe I should call him up and tell him my story. I've had too many sleepless nights, had my heart broken too many times for anyone to try to belittle those feelings. Coming out of the closet to admit that your love is different from what people consider the "norm" is already one of the greatest challenges homosexuals will ever face. Now we have to defend the strength of the love we feel to Catholics and other conservative groups that share the Catholic Church's

Let me tell you something, Pope. We don't go through the anxiety and (sometimes) pain of coming out because we think it'll be fun. We do it for love. As a heterosexual, admitting one's love is encouraged and applauded. As a homosexual, admitting one's love is scary and often frowned upon by the heterosexual elite. We don't face all that just to admit a love that is weak. If anything, our love is stronger for all the obstacles we have to overcome to achieve it.

Gays are not the quiet minority that they were in the '80s and '90s. Gay marriage is inevitable, and the idea that gay love is something less than straight love is not going to fly for very long. When the policy makers and figureheads realize that 10 percent (the estimated number of homosexuals in the population) is a pretty big number, and that even some of their own are actually gay, perhaps this blatant discrimination will stop.

It seems there will always be those who denounce homosexuality because of the alleged dangers it poses to human procreation. Yet in this day and age, populating the earth is the least of all human worries. The main concern, particularly in richer areas like the United States and Europe, is to somehow maintain a level of satisfaction with life by doing things like earning money, having a family or finding love. With that in mind, the idea that certain people would rather homosexuals deny their sexual orientation in the interest of reproduction seems absurd. Straight couples that choose not to have children do not receive the same negative attention that gay couples get, even those gay couples that are willing to adopt or otherwise build a family.

The stigma against homosexuality stems from the inherent conservative fear of what is different, as is the case with all discrimination. The Catholic Church (and the United States, for that matter) is run by a group of people that projects strength and bravery, but in truth, these people are far less brave than any teenager who has the guts to come out of the closet in spite of the beliefs of the most powerful people in the world.

The road to social awareness

Jackie Hai

If you're reading this right now, there's a chance that you fall into a certain demographic of young adults. If so, then you probably like to read, and you are curious enough about the world at large to pick up a newspaper, at least a college paper, from time to time. You might have the desire to be better informed about things, but feel disillusioned about politics and the miserable state of the world. And even if you weren't, there are so many sources of information spouting so many different issues that you don't know where to start.

Maybe you know that Israel and Palestine hate each other, but are hazy on the details why. Maybe you've heard about talking-point issues like the war, energy, immigration, gun control, abortion, welfare, Medicare or social security. You might have some general opinions on some of these debates, but you're uncomfortable engaging in them on a deeper level. Does this sound like you? I know it did for me, as recently as a year ago.

There is a way to start, though, a roadmap to better understanding that I found through a lot of trial and error. Maybe you'll find some of it useful, too.

1) There's stuff, and then there's fluff: Politicians like to stir up button-pushing issues right before elections, and then pursue their real agendas after their seats are secured. Remember the 2004 campaigns? We were made to think that banning gay marriage and flag burning were of utmost importance to the moral integrity of our country. Later, these topics were dropped in a corner and forgotten like unwanted toys after Christmas.

Distinguishing the polarizing, yet ultimately insubstantial debates like whether or not "under God" should be in the Pledge of Allegiance, from problems that will have an actual impact on our future like immigration reform, will save you a lot of time and headaches when deciding which articles to read or news stories to watch.

2) Everything is connected. This is a big one. When I first started looking at the current events scene, there seemed to be a bewildering array of special interests and single issues jumbled into one big mess. After all, what do taxes, education, poverty and the war in Iraq have to do with each other?

As it turns out, everything. And it's not that hard to pick up one strand and follow it to all the others, like pulling up a net from under the sand.

What do taxes, education, poverty and the war in Iraq have to do with each other? As it turns out, everything.

To go back to our example, look at the way the Bush administration continually cuts taxes for big business and the wealthy, while the lower class and a dwindling middle class must shoulder the burden of ever-increased spending. What's the biggest sinkhole for money spent by the government today? The war in Iraq. What doesn't get enough funding, among countless other causes? Education. It's common knowledge that a good education helps reduce poverty, but far too many Americans don't have access to one. Who is the most likely to end up joining the military? The poor.

We can keep going, connecting the dots. It's not only a great mental exercise (try drawing a line to the energy crisis and peak oil next, or the influence of corporations on public policy), but a tremendous help putting everything in context and clarifying the big picture.

3) What isn't said speaks as loudly as what is. I know I devoted an earlier column to this the other month, but it bears mentioning again. The mainstream news media won't tell you everything you need to know. How often do CNN or FOX talk about Internet neutrality, or fair housing, or the prison-industrial complex? This is where independent sources, the blogosphere and local groups come in to fill the gaps left behind.

4) Read every day. We get free newspapers delivered to the Campus Center and to each dining commons all over campus every day. Pick one up and skim the front page, then read all the way through one or two stories that catch your interest. If you're a frequent reader of the Daily Collegian's Ed/Op section, try checking out what the pros have to say in the New York Times.

When you make getting up to date on current events a daily routine, you'll find after a few weeks that it gets easier and easier to stay up to date. Facts become familiar, and stories begin to develop a sense of continuity.

Welcome to the road. It's riddled with potholes and takes many twists and turns, but along the way, you'll experience far more encounters and sights than if you just stayed at home. Chances are, once you're on it, you won't want to turn back.

Lohan's luck is quickly running out

By Jake Monte
Collegian Correspondent

Like Ashley in "Just My Luck," Lindsay Lohan is a lucky girl. She's one of those actresses that people like to see, one who doesn't have to take off her clothes or win awards to get people in the theater. It must be the enormity of the teenage movie-going audience; they love her.

What's not to love? She's likable and easy to relate to. She's survived "Confessions of a Teenage Drama Queen" and "Herbie Fully Loaded" because she's still being carried by the success of "Freaky Friday" and "Mean Girls." "Mean Girls" was number one at the box-office and "Freaky Friday" made over 100 million.

"Just My Luck" is predicated on a similar grabber to "Freaky Friday." The grabber is the "old switcheroo," as Jerry Seinfeld would say. "Freaky Friday" was about an identity switch. "Just My Luck" is about an exchange of good fortune for bad fortune, and vice versa. Lindsay Lohan plays Ashley, who shows up wearing a flawless white coat looking like a twenty-year old girl playing dress up. It's difficult to believe that Ashley possesses enough sophistication, intelligence and drive to be as successful as she is, but thence the basic premise: she's lucky. The screenwriters — there are six of them — hammer the point home that Ashley is lucky, with elevators that open at just the right time, a mirror that's being carried in front of her so she may check her reflection, etc. The director, Donald Petrie, shows us a card on the left side of the screen that reads, "lucky." We see a card that reads "unlucky," when we're introduced to Jake (Chris Pine — "Princess Diaries 2"). With patronizing explanations like this, the film might be understandable if it was shown to a bunch of monkeys. When Jake and Ashley kiss at a masquerade ball, Jake starts getting lucky, and Ashley unlucky.

The funniest thing about "Just My Luck" is that at the masquerade ball Ashley isn't wearing a disguise, but the audience is supposed to believe that Jake doesn't recognize her later, because her eyes were covered by a see-through white veil. The least funny thing about this film is the jokes. When Ashley comes to the preposterous conclusion that the boy she kissed at the masquerade ball was responsible for her change in fortune, she starts kissing everyone that was at the ball in an attempt to reverse the fortune. After each kiss she tries another scratch ticket. For some reason, a great many of the gags have to do with excrement. Jake picks up a five dollar bill filled with doggy doo-doo. Ashley drops her contact in a cat's litter box that has recently been used. All of this must be part of the grossout factor, which is fun for some audiences. In a screenplay with so little going for it, Petrie must have hoped these scenes would be the high points.

The first half-hour of the film is tolerable, but after that it sinks to some of the lowest lows imaginable, and the best parts are the short intervals of mediocrity. At times the charming music makes scenes almost interesting, but it's impossible to overlook the writing, which displays no characterization and is as tawdry as you'd expect from a screenplay written by five people — probably all of whom are in the same fifth grade class. Petrie should be commended. The script is so bad that it's unredeemable, but the direction and acting puts some weight on the other side of the see-saw.

The gross-out scenes are good for crews of young girlfriends going, "Eeewwww," and Lohan's dream life of "luck" is the stuff of teenage girl fantasies. All other demographics beware. It may be that "Just My Luck" bombs at the box-office, in which case Lohan will have added another flop to her resume, and it remains to be seen how she'll recover — and if her luck will ever run out.

Director Tucker, Martin miss the mark with 'Shopgirl' DVD

By Ryan Gibbons
Collegian Correspondent

Sometimes even the most skilled performers miss their mark and resort to old cliches.

"Shopgirl," a film based on comedy legend Steve Martin's critically acclaimed novella of the same title, is yet another chapter in the book of tired Hollywood dynamics. The plot bubbles with familiarity and the dramatic beats manage to succumb to predictability. With little else to run on, "Shopgirl" is kept alive by the occasional spark of charm, which, particularly in the latter half of the film, comes few and far between. This film, directed by Anand Tucker ("Hilary and Jackie"), has many setups.

Mirabelle Buttersfield ("Romeo and Juliet's" Claire Danes) is a saleswoman in the glove department at Saks Fifth Avenue in Los Angeles, but despite the glamour that surrounds her, she lives the humble life of a struggling artist isolated from the rest of the world with only the company of her aptly-named cat, Sylvia, to keep. She eventually meets the acquaintance of two men. The first of the two is Jeremy (Max Fischer — err — Jason Schwartzman), an awkwardly ambitious stencil artist, who, after a shaky encounter at a Laundromat, tries to woo the reluctant Mirabelle. His attempts at romance fall flat, and Mirabelle takes interest in Ray Porter (Martin). Ray is a wealthy divorcee 30 years Mirabelle's senior, and although he is outwardly giving and affectionate to Mirabelle, Ray nonetheless tries to play the bachelor card and distances himself from forming a permanent relationship with her.

What follows is nothing more than a typical Hollywood romance. Mirabelle's efforts to try and parlay her physical relationship with Ray into a meaningful romance fail, and she eventually realizes that Jeremy is better suited for her. While structural similarities to other films are inevitable, it is up to the filmmakers to give the audience something to help overlook what essentially is an overused formula. Although the individual performances are notable, the actors do not seem to function well as a cast. Imagine a music group containing extraordinarily talented musicians that, instead of playing together in unison, try to perform solos on top of each other.

That being said, there are a few moments in the film during which everything seems to click. In one scene, a vindictive Saks coworker mistakenly seduces Jeremy, thinking he is the one who has been buying Mirabelle the expensive clothing. The revelation of this error is one of the few truly organic moments in the film. Tucker, unfortunately, is unable to stray away from those long-winded and utterly unnecessary CG-tainted transitional shots and periodic slow motion that did little else than overemphasize the dramatic beats in a scene. According to Tucker's commentary track on the DVD, the focus of his direction was to intensify the emotions of the characters with tricky camerawork. But what it does is to build a wall between the audience and the characters, and ultimately it ruins what could have been a good film.

The DVD itself does little to put the characters in perspective. It is a rather slim release, with only two deleted scenes and a lame featurette that is nothing more than a 21-minute pat on the back. With a film like this, a self-serving featurette is pretty much standard. The director's commentary is a little informative. Tucker is able to explain his motives behind his fancy camerawork, but seemingly can't stop talking about great this movie is. Unfortunately for Tucker, he is wrong.

Anand Tucker's film adaptation of "Shopgirl" hits a brick wall as it transitions to DVD format.

Decoding the 'Da Vinci' frenzy for Wednesday world premiere

By Tirdad Derakhshani
Knight Ridder Newspapers

The moment is nigh.

"The Da Vinci Code" will have its world premiere Wednesday at the Cannes Film Festival, two days before the movie adaptation of Dan Brown's gazillion-selling novel begins plying its dark magic around the globe.

Magic, indeed. Brown's historical-religious thriller — about a 2,000-year-old conspiracy by the Catholic Church to conceal the fact that Jesus and Mary Magdalene married and had a child — has sold more than 40 million hardback copies since its April 2003 release.

And it has generated the most heated debates and denunciations among Christians of all denominations — not to mention media overkill — since Martin Scorsese's 1988 film "The Last Temptation of Christ," in which Jesus merely fantasized about marrying Mary Magdalene.

Whether the "Da Vinci" movie, directed by Ron Howard, holds fresh controversies is anyone's guess: Sony is keeping it under wraps until Cannes.

Unlike the pickets and boycotts that met "Temptation," though, many Catholic and Protestant clergy are facing off, ready to debate "Da Vinci." They're armed with pamphlets, books, DVDs and Web sites, products of a cottage industry, which thoroughly and sometimes rousingly pokes holes in the story — so many that it's hard to believe Brown's claim that the book is "meticulously researched and very accurate."

Why such fuss about a movie starring Tom Hanks, whose best-known religious role is as the chocolate-nugget-dispensing simpleton-prophet Forrest Gump?

How could a book be so roundly dismissed and so preternaturally popular at the same time? Why do readers feel such an extraordinary link to "Da Vinci"?

"We're at a time when people are looking for new religious experiences and ideas," said Dan Burstein, editor of "Secrets of the Code." "Dan Brown is being accused of heresy, but he says he's taking people back to the origins of Christianity ... the Jesus in the desert."

"Da Vinci" is a "cleverly mixed cocktail" that "puts together questions about the Roman Catholic Church and sex and Jesus with questions about the nature of divinity, and packs it all into a love story — and one with espionage and pistols," said Robin Griffith-Jones, author of "The Da Vinci Code and the Secrets of the Temple."

Besides, Griffith-Jones said, it's a real page-turner. It follows Harvard symbologist Robert Langdon and French cryptologist Sophie Neveu, who fall in love and slowly fall into the truth about Jesus.

That truth, about Jesus's descendants, has been protected over the centuries by the Priory of Sion, a secret good-guy group that has thrived under the leadership of history's coolest artists and scientists — Sir Isaac Newton, Botticelli, Victor Hugo and Leonardo da Vinci (who buried clues to the truth in his paintings). But the truth is in danger of being destroyed by Opus Dei, presented as the Vatican's evil, clandestine Delta Force, and its nasty operative Silas, a sadistic albino monk.

Trouble is, the Priory of Sion, which Brown claims was founded in 1099, doesn't exist. It was created in 1956 by hoaxer Pierre Plantard. But Opus Dei, a group of laity and priests who try to integrate spirituality into their everyday lives, does exist, and Catholic leaders are incensed at how it's been portrayed.

Whatever the blend of fact and fiction, Catholics have objected. Opus Dei has objected. Albinos have objected.

Like dozens of religious organizations, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops has produced debating tools — a Jesus Decoded booklet, a TV special (May 21 on NBC), and a Web site (www.jesusdecoded.com) — to get the facts out.

Msgr. Francis J. Maniscalco, a conference spokesman who would rather see "people read up on church history and skip the movie," says, "We wanted to clarify to people where we see disinformation and distortion."

This "don't hate, educate" approach has been adopted by Camden, N.J., Bishop Joseph A. Galante and the archbishop of Philadelphia, Cardinal Justin Rigali. In a statement, Rigali said "Code" "falsely represents our Christian history and beliefs ... But it is my hope that would-be readers and movie viewers see this as an opportunity to learn the truth about Jesus." Both dioceses have information on their Web sites.

Darrell Bock, author of "Breaking the Da Vinci Code," said one of the good things to come out of the controversy is that it has united Catholics and evangelical Protestants — as debunkers.

A conservative Evangelical, Bock challenges "Da Vinci's" claim that Jesus's followers viewed him as Long-running jazz blends West with East

By K.S. Wang
The Orange County Register

When Hiroshima formed in the early 1970s, it was the first Asian-American band to make a mark in the American mainstream music scene. Today, seen as one of the pioneers in smooth jazz, it is still one of the rare groups to combine East and Western instruments and remains an icon in the Asian-American community.

Former husband-and-wife duo Dan Kuramoto and June Kuramoto, who founded the band, spearhead the group of six musicians, who also include percussionist Danny Yamamoto, Hawaiian jazz keyboardist Kimo Cornwell, bassist Dean Cortez and taiko drummer Shoji Kameda.

Dan Kuramoto, who grew up in the Boyle Heights section of Los Angeles, is sansei, third-generation Japanese-American. He was always keenly aware that his parents were sent to Manzanar, an internment camp, during World War II. It was mandatory that they, along with all Japanese-Americans, had to relocate during the war.

"The psychological impact of having an entire group of people in prison, we can go to slavery, that's another group of people who would know that situation in America," said Dan. "How it affects JAs (Japanese Americans) in particular hasn't found a resolution yet and never will. The damage done and how it impacts the family, the self-esteem, the culture and the dignity of the people is irreversible and I think will forever be in the minds of me and my family."

Dan said he felt most comfortable with people of color. "In East L.A. everyone had a common bond, and that is that everybody was poor." He took piano lessons for a year when he was about 7 and said he "hated it." It wasn't until Kuramoto was a bugler in a Japanese-American Boy Scout troop with a well-known drum and bugle corps, that he learned fundamentals of music.

In college, Kuramoto, an art major, took a break from painting and picked up the flute to jam with others in his department. "That was the start for me — experimenting with music in the context of groups and song ideas. It sort of evolved into playing these art concept bands that were on the edge of chaos but were interesting."

After graduating from Cal State Long Beach, Kuramoto was the first program chairman for Asian-American studies as he helped get the department going. Around that time, about 1971, Kuramoto played a gig with his brother John at an Asian-American community picnic, where he met June, who played the Japanese koto, a zither-like, 13-stringed instrument, at the event.

"June was playing classical koto," Kuramoto said. "I met this extraordinary, beautiful young woman playing this amazing instrument with unbelievable skill."

June asked her brother Tracy to ask Dan if he would like to collaborate musically. They started jamming with her on koto and him on flute. They also got married. By 1974 they added the taiko drums, and the band grew its sound to what it is known for today.

The band got its first record deal with Arista Records and released its self-titled debut album in 1979. Kuramoto said people at the label took bets that the album would not sell. To everyone's surprise the album sold 350,000 units in its first nine months. The CD "Obon" released last year was the band's 13th album, and its first instrumental effort.

Band members are also active playing on movie scores, with Dan having played the shakuhachi, a Japanese flute, on "Thin Red Line" and "Pirates of the Carihbean," while June played koto on the score of "The Last Samurai." Bass player Dean Cortes has also played music on several hundred movies.

The Kuramotos have a daughter, Lani, who is in her mid 20s. Although their marriage ended in the early 1980s, June Kuramoto maintains, "We're still a family." The couple continues to be the force behind the success of the longest-running Asian-American-led band, with the band's 1985 single "One Wish" still in regular rotation on smooth jazz radio today. The group also has a very loyal African-American fan base.

"The idea of Hiroshima was really about how cool it would be if there was a band, a voice for the Asian-American community like there were for the African-American community like Earth, Wind and Fire or Miles Davis or Santana for the Latin community," Kuramoto said. "All the media images of Asians at the time were negative, if you saw an Asian on television at all. We thought we could make the biggest dent in this racist society by having art and culture all in one thing. Just us standing up there being people of color and being Asian, we thought we were striking a blow towards our ability to start to generate our own sense of who we were instead of people telling us who we were."

Sykes excited for animated creature role

By Robert W. Butler
Knight Ridder Newspapers

The minute the animated character — a female skunk — opened her mouth and spoke, you could hear two words being whispered by moviegoers throughout the darkened theater where "Over the Hedge" was being previewed.

"Wanda Sykes."

She possesses one of the most recognizable voices in America, which is one reason stand-up comic Sykes has, in addition to acting roles, carved a sideline career voicing cartoon characters.

"It's not like I planned it or anything," Sykes, 42, said from Los Angeles. "It just kind of crept up on me."

In "Over the Hedge" she plays Stella, a crabby skunk who, at a crucial juncture in the plot, must pretend that she is a feline to seduce a tomcat guarding a suburban home.

Asked if she remembered Pepe Le Pew, the romantic skunk of the old Warner Bros. cartoons, Sykes chortled. "Pepe was my inspiration. He was a little freaky, you know what I mean? Always chasing the ladies, even if they weren't the appropriate species."

Not only does Stella the Skunk sound like Sykes, she moves like her.

"When you're recording your lines they've got this tiny camera in the recording booth taping your mannerisms," she said. "I didn't realize it until later, which is good because if I'd known there was a camera on me I might have started humming it up. But the artists studied the tape and borrowed my gestures and expressions for the character."

In addition to her work on "Over the Hedge," Sykes also provided the voice of Gladys Murphy on Comedy Central's "Crank Yankers."

Doing animation voices is easy, and the money is good, she said. The drawback is that it's solitary. She never saw her co-stars: Bruce Willis, Garry Shandling, Steve Carell, Eugene Levy, Catherine O'Hara, William Shatner and Nick Nolte.

"It's pretty much just you and the microphone," Sykes said. "It's the loneliest job I've ever had. At the time I recorded my lines I hadn't seen anything that would tell me what the movie would be like. There was no footage. I never saw a complete script — just my own lines. You've got to trust the director, who's talking to you over your headphones."

Over the three years "Over the Hedge" was in production, the script would change because of something another actor said. "Bruce or Garry might ad lib a line that the director wanted to use. But that meant I had to come back in and record new lines to play off the ad lib."

Though her professional efforts are concentrated on TV and movies, the stage is never far from Sykes' thoughts.

"That's where I got my start, and that's the thing that fires up my creativity. I just shot a new stand-up DVD in Seattle — my first in three years. And every weekend I'm doing stand-up.

"Movies are actually pretty easy work. Stand-up ... now that's challenging."

Target takes Concrete

By Ross Raihala
Knight Ridder Newspapers

The Concretes' name might not be familiar, but one of the Swedish band's songs probably is.

Last year, Target prominently featured the Concretes' single "Say Something New" in a TV ad campaign, exposing millions to the group's dreamy style of Motown pop laced with more sinister, Velvet Underground-style undercurrents.

Not only did the song earn the Concretes some new fans, but it also helped raise the profile of the band's new sophomore album, "In Colour."

So it was a good move, right?

"It's nothing we're proud of doing," said Victoria Bergsman during a phone interview from a tour stop in Montreal. "We were kind of forced to do it."

In the end, the band gave most of the proceeds from the spot to the advocacy group Corporate Watch and an HIV research charity.

"A few other good things did come from it," Bergsman said. "A 60-year-old man e-mailed us and said he would have never heard of us if it wasn't for the commercial."

The exposure also helped lead to the Concretes' first full North American tour that brings the eight-piece group to perform in the middle of the country for the first time. Their only previous experience in the Midwest was when they recorded part of "In Colour" in Lincoln, Neb., with Bright Eyes/Rilo Kiley producer Mike Mogis.

"We liked what he did on Bright Eyes' folk album ('I'm Wide Awake, It's Morning')," Bergsman said. "And he has a lot of experience working with a lot of people in a group. There are eight of us, but he could hear everything that was going on, even something [very minor that happened] in the background. He's very precise about things."

When they weren't in the studio, however, the Concretes explored the corners of Lincoln, which felt about a million miles away from their home base of Stockholm. Is it safe to assume they spent some of that off-time drinking?

"Of course," Bergsman said. "We're from Sweden.

"We ate, we drank beer and we became like zombies. There was some kind of baseball thing going on in town, so all the bars were quite macho. We finally found a gay bar where we felt at home. A lot of the band members started stripping one night, but I don't think they remember much."

Despite the debauchery, "In Colour" is a much brighter and straightforward take on the sometimes woozy and narcotic songs found on the band's self-titled 2004 debut. As such, some critics — particularly early supporters like New Musical Express and Pitchfork Media — have given the new disc less glowing notices.

Bergsman, as one might guess, begs to differ.

"In some of those reviews, they just wanted us to make another record exactly like the first, and that's not what we do. We believe in moving forward and trying something new. We're trying to see what we are capable of doing."

As such, the Concretes brought in numerous guests, at times doubling the size of the already-crowded band. Bergsman does plan to record a solo album at the end of the year, but she said the seemingly unwieldy size of the Concretes has more pluses than minuses.

"Of course, it's difficult to get everyone together," she said. "But it's also really nice to have so many people around. There's always someone there. Also, it's good when a song goes through eight different people — if you're a duo, you just have one person to talk about the music with.

"There is less money, though. That's a bad side."

And speaking of cash, the music-collecting band is burning through it at a rapid clip while on tour.

"Oh yeah, we're totally broke already. We were just doing an in-store performance and it was, like, 'Buy this one, and this one and this one.' We've got eight people, which means eight people to recommend albums to. The record stores make good money when we're in town."

MercyMe brings faith

By Teresa Hou
Spartan Daily (San Jose State U.)

SAN JOSE, Calif. — If the world of mainstream music were keen to the sounds of religious rock, then the enlightening lyrics and catchy melodies of Christian group MercyMe's latest album "Coming Up to Breathe" would be a winner. Since that's not the case, the fifth album from MercyMe does its best to produce rock-worthy songs but falls short in matching its mainstream counterparts.

With "Coming Up to Breathe," MercyMe sounds like what would happen if a fusion between rock groups Switchfoot and 3 Doors Down were to happen but with an abundance of religious flavor.

Lead singer Bart Millard does a good job in vocally displaying every emotion he feels throughout the 13 tracks on the album and fellow band mates do their job in blending their instruments with Millard's voice.

However, what stops MercyMe from being on the pinnacle of music channels such as MTV is the excessive emphasis of religion that the band displays in its lyrics.

It's tracks like "Bring the Rain" that will leave you wondering if you're in church, with lyrics like, "To turn my back on you, oh Lord/ My only shelter from the storm/ But instead I draw closer through these times/ So I pray, bring me joy, bring me peace/ Bring the chance to be free/ Bring me anything that brings You glory/ And I know there'll be days when this life brings me pain/ But if that's what it takes to praise You/ Jesus brings the rain."

In "Something About You" Millard croons, "How ... how can I describe/ The God of all the universe and make it rhyme/ I just wonder if it's worth painting You with so few words ... Still there's something about You that keeps me in pursuit of who You are/ I will spend my days, finding ways to praise the glory and the grace of who you are."

Spiritual lyrics aren't all that Millard sings.

Songs such as "Coming Up to Breathe" and "So Long Self" tell stories about wanting to break free. "I'm coming up to breathe/ Oh I'm coming up to breathe/ I've held my breath for all my life but I am breaking free tonight and I'm coming up to breathe," sings Millard.

If MercyMe wants to become a household name, it will lose the repetitiveness of religion in its lyrics so listeners won't want to rip their ears off from their heads by the end of the album.

A literary world not for U.S

By Carlin Romano
Knight Ridder Newspapers

NEW YORK — Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk, listing downsides of his native Istanbul during a panel on great cities, mentioned "U-Rhine." It sounded like some watery rival of the famous Bosporus.

Then the ever meticulous literary man corrected himself: "I-Excuse me urine."

Spanish poet and critic Bernardo Atxaga charmingly rose to a lectern a bit later and began his presentation with a big smile to the audience: "Good night!"

Well, at least he didn't wish everyone, "Good night and good luck!"

The setting could only be an international literary festival, in this case the second PEN World Voices Festival. Sponsored by PEN America Center, part of the international writers organization, it invited 135 writers from 33 countries for 54 programs at multiple venues around Manhattan last week.

Star turns by such global celebrities such as outgoing president Salman Rushdie vied for attention with modest appearances by such non-household names as Bulgaria's great poet, Lyubomir Levchev ("I speak English only after second bottle").

Yet many of the issues most crucial to the visiting writers emerged not in star turns, but at the many themed panels, some large enough to require a scorecard, some so linguistically varied they guaranteed a headache to anyone besides Kofi Annan.

By both force of numbers and abundant literary talent, however, many of the writers challenged America's stinginess toward other literary cultures, what Italian writer Roberto Calasso called "a lethal mixture of provincialism and imperialism."

At an opening session on "Translation and Globalization," moderator and former Los Angeles Times book editor Steve Wasserman reported that only 3 percent of books published in the United States are translations, compared with almost 70 percent in Italy. And of the 3 percent, Wasserman added, "many were technical manuals or reference works."

"There is something seriously wrong in the landscape of American publishing," echoed Calasso, who runs the prestigious Italian publishing house Adelphi. He suggested it's no wonder Americans often misunderstand the rest of the world, given how little we publish and read about it.

"To reduce translation to this miserable 3 percent is to lose your sense of what is out there," Calasso said. "I think the solution would be one word — courage." He meant courage to accept less profit by publishing broader and worthier material.

At a later seven-speaker panel titled "Mixed Media: Writers on Their Languages," moderator and Columbia University literature professor David Damrosch noted that the decline of translations in America comes at a time when scholars of "world literature" give a wider-than-ever meaning to that term.

While it once meant perhaps 75 writers from "mainly NATO countries," Damrosch noted that some modern "world literature" anthologies include hundreds of writers and many non-European languages.

Unlike the previous panel, the later one highlighted both joys and horrors of translation. While everyone agreed that a writer must make it into English these days to reach the literary big leagues, translation also obstructs unique ways of saying things elsewhere. In Hebrew, Israeli poet Agi Mishol explained, you can say "Once upon a time, I loved you" with one word.

The worldwide juggernaut of English-language fiction, and of English itself as the globe's new lingua franca, also poses dangers to smaller languages, from adulteration by English words to slippage toward endangered-species status.

Russia's best-selling mystery writer, Boris Akunin, took a droll approach. "Russians love and have always loved to read translated literature," he deadpanned. But now, he added, "I am not very happy, because I am constantly being chased off the top 10 list by Dan Brown or Harry Potter or some devil named Prada."

Dubravka Ugresic, the much-praised essayist and novelist ("The Ministry of Pain") from the former Yugoslavia, approached the matter more soberly. "Now you will hear from someone who writes in a currency of no value," she announced, referring to her native Serbo-Croatian. Already narrowly used, the language, explained Ugresic, is fragmenting further because of internecine hatreds into "Croatian," "Serbian," Bosnian," and perhaps even "Montenegrin."

Such linguistic disparities reminded some Americans at the festival of our non-linguistic privileges, such as travel rights. The United States lets us out, and — even post-9/11 — has to let us back in. For many international writers, it's not that easy.

Among those scheduled to attend "World Voices," Anna Politkovskaya, the Russian journalist whose tough books about Chechnya drive the Kremlin crazy, never made it. PEN learned that she'd been informed by Russian authorities, a few days previously, that she had to attend a court hearing.

PEN also invited Tariq Ramadan, the controversial Swiss-based scholar of Islam who had to give up a job at the University of Notre Dame last year after the State Department refused him a visa. PEN challenged the decision, and put Ramadan on the program as part of that campaign.

"We see it as part of a resurgence of ideological exclusion," said Larry Siems, director of PEN's Freedom to Write and international programs.

Yet governments are not the only exclusionists — political friction seeps into every international literary festival. A "conversation" slated for the last day of "World Voices" between Israeli novelist David Grossman and Lebanese novelist Elias Khoury never took place.

Khoury announced at an earlier session that he wouldn't participate in the session at the Center for Jewish History because he'd learned the Israeli government had paid some of Grossman's expenses. He said he didn't participate in government-sponsored events.

At the closing festival party at Diane von Furstenberg's chic studio, commentary and rumor about the sour note fueled conversations. Should PEN issue a statement distancing itself from Khoury's decision? Was Khoury's real reason fear of Syrian hit squads said to be targeting Muslim moderates?

Yet such off-key moments couldn't undermine the prevailing spirit of enthusiasm across cultural lines, the absurdism proof that, contrary to a line in the conference's program book — "Geography is literary destiny" — it isn't.

At a panel titled "51% Women Write the World," Nigerian-British novelist Helen Oyeyemi described how she'd decided, after flying in to Boston, to do a six-hour bus ride through Amherst, Mass., to see the house of her lifelong favorite writer, poet Emily Dickinson.

"It might seem unusual," Oyeyemi intoned to hearty laughter, "because we don't have anything in common."

Similarly, Belgian novelist Anne Provoost ("In the Shadow of the Ark") exulted in the thrill of meeting her longtime favorite — Toni Morrison.

"I have much more in common with my favorite writer than Helen does with hers," Provoost quipped.

Both she and Morrison, Provoost pointed out, are alive.

a human prophet who was promoted to the status of God only by a "close vote" at the Council of Nicea in A.D. 323.

A New Testament scholar at Dallas Theological Seminary, Bock said the literature produced in the two centuries before Nicea is clear: Jesus's earliest followers saw him as the son of God. The discussion at Nicea, he said, centered on a question about the nature of Jesus's divinity, not whether he was divine.

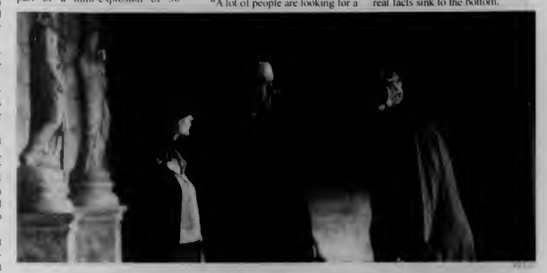
"Dan Brown did get one thing right: Paris is in France," said Catholic journalist Sandra Meisel, coauthor of "The Da Vinci Hoax: Exposing the Errors in the Da Vinci Code."

Meisel and Bock's books are part of a mini-explosion of 30 books about "Code," said Publishers Weekly religion editor Lynn Garrett, who expects the trend to intensify.

Griffith-Jones said the book has raised, however clumsily, religious issues in a vivid and imaginative way, captivating many people who feel that the church teaches nothing but dry, outdated doctrine.

"The book has given people permission to state openly questions they have been harboring for years, but have not asked because they seemed blasphemous," said Griffith-Jones, an Anglican minister who is master of Temple Church in London, where "Code's" climax was filmed (tourist traffic has since increased fivefold, he said).

It's this "permission" to question that worries evangelical writer Lee Strobel, coauthor of "Exploring the Da Vinci Code."



"A lot of people are looking for a religious out," he said. "Excuses not to believe, and shirk off the responsibilities of faith.

"For whatever reason, people are accepting Brown's spurious evidence and buying into his view of Christianity," he said. "And given their reactions, it is incumbent on the church to respond to the book."

Bill Edgar, a professor of apologetics at Westminster Theological Seminary in Glenside, Pa., said that when it comes to religion, many Americans are "gullible." The craving for "a quick meaning-fix leads one to readily accept half-truths, sound bites, and superficial spiritual salves," he said.

Meisel said the distinction between fact and fiction has become irrelevant to many.

"The world is sinking into a great warm puddle," she said, "in which real facts sink to the bottom."

Tom Hanks, Audrey Tautou and Ian McKellan star in "The Da Vinci Code," which premieres today at the Cannes Film Festival.

JEREMY RICE, FIELD HOCKEY, SKIING, SOFTBALL
CHRIS GRIFFIN

"You mean that I lied about my age to get into an Indian casino?"

I can't believe it's already been a year since I started writing for the Collegian. It's probably exactly a year since I finally realized I was living on the same floor as one of the assistant editors, and should probably go say hi.

I'm glad I did because working with the rest of the sports staff here at the Collegian has been the best thing I've done since coming to UMass. I've enjoyed every second of it, and I knew I would. I've wanted to be a sports writer since I was I kid and that fact that I'm actually doing it now still blows my mind.

From my very first interview with field hockey coach Patty Shea, to wondering why UMass skiing had no media relations agent, to chillin' at The Hangar with the softball team, watching the selection show where they found out Amherst was hosting an NCAA Regional, this year has been great.

I still remember my first interview last Fall when I covered field hockey. Fumbling around with my brand new recorder and hoping coach Shea didn't think my questions were dumb. If I looked as ridiculous as I felt, I'm sure it was quite a sight, just ask Seth Gerard.

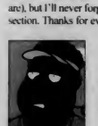
A special thanks to the UMass skiers. You guys made my life so much easier when you were so willing to talk to me. Chasing down your former coach on his cell phone was hard enough, but you guys – Rush Hawkins and Jason Small especially – made it a fun beat to cover solo. That story on Rotelune's firing was easily my best work since joining the Collegian and I would have had absolutely no story to tell if you weren't so cooperative and helpful, so thank you.

Jeff: It's too bad I only get to work with you for one year because it's been an awesome one. I've learned so much from you about how to be a journalist. You made learning the ropes down here a smooth transition and I owe you so much for everything. Good luck covering the Red Sox at the Metro. I'm sure you'll tear that place up, and I'm sure you'll be a true "professional."

Duggan: Same as Jeff, I wish I had more time to work with you. Now I'm starting to regret not writing more of my stories down in the Collegian office, but I still have learned so much in a short time, like that using my hotmail account instead of my student email is not such a great idea. There's that "professionalism" word again, haha.

Rob: I enjoyed working with you a lot this semester. You did a great job replacing Eric as assistant sports editor, and I know you'll do the same next year when you take Jeff's job as sport editor. My writing has definitely gotten better this semester and a lot of that is due to you, so thank you.

Eric: Thank god we both knew Chris Cornack or I probably never would have made it onto the staff. You've been a huge help to me the past year in learning how to be a sports writer. I enjoyed covering softball with you this year. Hopefully we can do another beat together next year and do an even better job. You did a great job handling becoming managing editor along with staying on the sports staff. That really impressed me. I can't imagine the hours you put in every week for the Collegian. Thanks for everything so far, I'm looking forward to the next two years working together.



Brendan: I read last year's Misty-eyed Memories, and since I'm a new guy this year, I don't know what happened in years past, but I do know that this year I loved working with you down at the Collegian. If it wasn't for you being the punch-line of almost every one of Jeff's jokes, Collegian meetings might have actually been a bit boring. I'm gonna miss you being around next year, but good luck with everything you go on to do.

Danny and Jon: First of all, congratulation to both you guys for getting the two assistant sports editor spots. You both deserve it immensely. I think the two of you, along with Rob can keep the sports section going the way Jeff, Duggan, Eric and Rob did this year. Danny, it's great to finally know someone else who actually watches Bruins games, and who watched all seven of those soul-crushing playoff games two years ago against Montreal. Of course, that was before the lockout, when we at least thought the B's were any good. To both of you, I look forward to working with you again next year. Let's keep the section going at full speed.

Domenic: You're in the same boat as me, working your way up to the bigger beats. Well, next year is our shot. With Jeff, Duggan and Brendan moving on, we'll have the chance we've been waiting for. If you're as excited as I am, I know you'll do really well.

Joey: Since you're a senior, I won't be seeing you around next year, but since I rarely saw you at the Collegian this spring, I'm guessing that things a going well at the Daily Hampshire Gazette, so I'm sure you'll be alright. Good luck next year man.

Like I said, I've loved every minute I spent writing stories, conducting interviews, and watching games this year. I'm sure there are more memories to come (there always are), but I'll never forget my first year on staff with the sports section. Thanks for everything guys.

"Oh, Peter, that tickles me in a way that if Loretta tickled me in that way, I'd say, Oh yea ... that's nice ... that's the spot."

Last June, when I was 18-year-old high school senior, my mother and I drove up from Quincy for UMass' walking-tour orientation. Once the tour was over, we strolled around campus to get a better feel of UMass Amherst. Eventually I told my mom that I just had to check out this great Daily Collegian that I had heard so much about. So, we set off to find a copy an issue. We finally found one near the U Store and I'll never forget what I read with my very own eyes, "The Morning Wood: News England's Largest Hard-on since 1890." I almost dropped a pantload when I read it.

I breezed through it and read about how Russian President Vladimir Putin and President George W. Bush had agreed to a wrestling match. In the sports section I read of a "pint-sized quarterback and all-around [great human being] Doug Flutie."

I was floored. This couldn't be the college daily that I had once heard was one of the best in the country. I said to my mother, "This is awful. What the heck is this piece of crap?" My mother was at a loss for words. Disappointed, I tucked the paper under my arm and the two of us resumed walking around. A little while later I decided to look at the newspaper again. That is when I noticed something on the back page. It read, "April Fools, [slang word for people you may or may not like]!!!!!!"

"Phew," I thought to myself. "I was only an April Fool's Day prank." My mother and I then went down to the Collegian office. We introduced ourselves to a young lady working down there and told her our story. She thought it was hysterical. I then asked for a real paper that I could take with me to look over and she gave me the previous day's issue which was, of course, very well done. After reading through it, I decided that UMass was where I wanted to attend college.

And that, Ladies and Gentlemen, was my first experience with The Daily Collegian. Since that time I have gained my more experiences and have enjoyed every one of them.

And now I'll go Around The Horn (get it?) to the guys who been up and down the roads with me for my first year.

Jeff, congrats on your job at the Boston Metro. You certainly deserve it. Thanks for being a great first editor and helping through a tough year. And remember, you're not tooting your own horn if you admit that you're tooting your own horn.

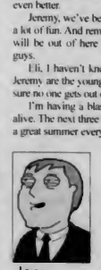
Dan, thanks for helping me all year long. You've been a great help. Good luck with your future. And thanks a lot for giving me the email address to the guy at the Sun. GO RED RAIDERS!!! And, of course, Go Minutemen!!

Eric, thanks for everything. I can't tell you enough how much you've helped me. You're doing a great as managing editor. Keep it up, but don't forget where you started off.

Rob, next year is your turn, kid. It's time for you to become captain of the ship. Fortunately, I know how to send out an SOS message. Just kidding, man. You've been doing an awesome job this semester as Assistant Sports Editor.

Joey, take care, buddy. It was great having you as my first beat partner. Good luck at the Gazette. Go Chatham As!

Hall, good luck at the Globe. I'm going to miss you around the office, man. Thanks for being so friendly. Later, bro.



Picard, you got the call up the Big Leagues. Congratulations. I'm looking forward to next year.

Pelland, congratulations on getting the call up with Picard. This year was awesome, but next year is going to be even better.

Jeremy, we've been learning the ropes together. It's been a lot of fun. And remember, in a couple of years these bums will be out of here and we'll be in charge. Just kidding, guys.

Eli, I haven't known you long, dude. But me, you and Jeremy are the youngins in this bunch and we have to make sure no one gets out of line, right?

I'm having a blast here. I'm just trying not to get eaten alive. The next three years are going to be a lot of fun. Have a great summer everyone.

"NO! WAIT! You can't print that! Thank God she's just a figment of my imagination."

I feel like Ichiro, in the sense that I was an old rookie on the sports staff. I am graduating at the end of the month with a degree in journalism and an economics minor.

I came down to the Dungeon in early September, which wasn't my first trip down to the basement, but the first time somebody gave me a chance. Sports Editor Jeff Howe informed me that all the beats were spoken for, but advised me to show up to the weekly meetings just in case somebody dropped out and quit.

My first meeting was all I needed to get my first beat as the track beat writers apparently failed to commit to the paper. I did not let the opportunity slip and took advantage and stuck with it the entire year.

In the winter I was assigned to swimming beat with the ever-so-talented Mr. Brendan Hall. I was assigned to both the track and crew beats in the spring, but I also had another great opportunity as I got an internship at the Daily Hampshire Gazette. The internship was the best experience I have had in the field yet, but with it came less time I could dedicate to the Collegian, so I took just the women's crew beat, which doesn't sound too thrilling but was my best beat of the year.

Coach Jim Dietz and the entire crew team were so grateful to have coverage in the paper, which made it so much easier for me to write about. The team invited me to go with them to Worcester for the ECAC Metro Cup championships, but I was unable to make the trip. But the coaches made sure they did something nice for me and they took me out to lunch for our last face-to-face interview.

As of now I'd like to give some space to the terrific sports staff that I had the privilege of working with this past year, even if I didn't get to make it to some of the "mandatory" sports meetings due to my internship.

Jeff – I'd like to thank you for giving me the opportunity of getting my name is such a great paper. At one point this semester I was seriously considering giving up because of the lack of time I had to commit to the Collegian, but you never gave up on me and convinced me to stick with it. I did and I'd like to thank you for your confidence in me. You tested me a few times, but you also taught me a thing or two along the way. Good luck to you in your future endeavors my classmate.

Duggan – You definitely have a talent and passion for the field. I think you have a big heart and it shows. What I thought was funny was that you always apologized to me for not getting my wrap in Monday's paper, which didn't really matter to me because I knew it would be in Tuesday's. Congratulations and good luck to you – I know you'll land a fine job somewhere, and hopefully we'll bump into each other in the future. Good thing we realized that my umail account had problems sending attachments before it was too late, huh?

Athas – You might not remember this, but as a new reporter on the staff, I didn't forget. After my first meeting when Jeff assigned me to the track beat, you came up to me and offered me any help I might need. For that I thank you. And as a managing editor, I believe the paper can only go forward with you at the helm.

Rob – The section is definitely in good hands with you as its editor. Thanks for your patience and always being helpful. Take care of Hall for us, he needs some guidance in his life or he'll get lost.

Danny – You definitely picked the wrong Carl Vigeland class in the fall – haha. While our "sports writing" class went to watch the UMass women's lacrosse a team (a team you were covering for the Collegian), Vigeland's other class traveled to see the Bruins. I am glad that you got on the baseball beat team. Good luck to you next year man.

Dom – Thanks for taking the track beat, I definitely couldn't handle both with my internship. I hope next year you get more of chance to show off your ability.

Hall – Or should I say "Big Red"? I couldn't ask for a better beat partner. You are a crazy mofo my friend, but you were always there if I needed help. You are a gifted writer and for the few minutes I saw you Halloween night, you were a perfect Hunter S. Thompson.

For the rest of the Collegian staff, even though it was a short tenure, it was great. Thank you for the experience.

I would also like to take the time out to thank others who have given me a great learning experience in the field (even though they most likely won't read this). But I'd like to thank Stan Moulton, the sports editor at the Gazette, for giving me the great opportunity of interning for them during the spring semester. I would also like to thank Jim Pignatiello – a Gazette staff writer and former Collegian sports editor – for teaching me the ropes and giving me a lot of advice.

With graduation facing me faster than I expected, I feel the need to address some friends that I have made at this fine university.

Dana (Jewmar, be who has a MILF) – sorry for puking on you last year coming out of the Hangar after "All You Can Eat" Tuesday. You got to admit thought it was pretty funny. I know you've got a few years left, and take advantage them. Some friggin' good times at Loudon man, and those photos prove nothing, haha. You're my homeboy – what's up C-town, what's up. What's up C-town, what's up, Chatham, jump on it, jump on it, jump on it! As for the rest of The Clique who will probably never read this, there more great times to come. Montreal (when Dana and I almost killed each other over a card game) – Weez Fighters/Foozer concert – throwing up at Faneuil Hall, twice – ping pong!

MOONTOWER!!!

Kev – being roommates with you for three of my four years was amazing. I know we had our differences, but I couldn't have asked for a better roommate. Plus I think I was the only one you could deal with your drunken madness – just kidding. I'll never forget staying up till like 7 in the morning playing poker and watching Super Troopers. I wish you the best of luck buddy.

Mikey, Sir Billiam, Kaz, Steve0 and Dowdah – I've known you Mikey since we were in like first grade, it's weird though that we hang out more here at school than we do in our little hometown on the elbow of Cape Cod – but I still wouldn't change it for anything. Bill, we missed you dearly while you were on duty in Africa, but the great times continued when you came back this spring. You were the one who could always stay up with me to the wee hours. Kaz, what can I say, but your aunt is friggin' hot! And your girlfriend Dani (who lived across the hallway from me freshman year) still has a secret crush on me – just kidding man. Hopefully I'll see you over the summer. Uncle Steve0, I will also remember you being my partner for the first 11 games of my 18-game Beirut winning streak. Good luck in Cali and at grad school. Dowdah, what can I say here, except that you kept it kool as an RA and didn't get Kev and I written up like some (cough*Steve0*cough). But you're a good friend and I know I can count on you.

Awwww-herrowwwww Carey! I could always get you to laugh with that, which is a good thing because your laugh is the best and I will miss it the most. And I think wilderness Erin has a secret crush on you – just kidding Erin, good luck in NC!

Amanda – I wish I knew you sooner. You're an amazing person to talk to and don't ever forget that you deserve nothing but the best. I have faith that you will find what you're looking for out there. And my town is better than yours!

Sarah and Rachel – boy have we had some good times. I still can't believe I fit in your skirt and top Rachel for the rugby Halloween party freshman year – and sorry about your necklace, I didn't mean to broke – oh, and your high heels, boy those things are hard to walk in. And Sarah, I cut really put into words what you've meant.

To save the best for last, my Tina-Wina – I wuv u so much. Nobody could ask for a better friend. You were always there for me to talk to. Freshman year was the best because you were there. Remember Boston Public and Home Movies and hiding from the scary Bob kid and chubby bunny with Steph? Good times. But most importantly you were always there to give biggest, best hugs in the world. Some friendships come and go, but I know this one will not, and by the way ... I DO THE MOSTEST!

Anyway, I feel like I've written enough here and it's time for me to sign off now. My four years at the Zoo have been the greatest of my life, and not only did I get to see the Patriots win two Super Bowls, but I also was witness to Red Sox breaking an 84-year-old drought and won the 2004 World Series.

As I embark in the next chapter of my life, my word of advice to you is to please do yourself a favor and don't take for granted what this great university has to offer.

"You owe it to yourself to be the best you can possibly be - in baseball and in life." – Pete Rose.

on that staff. Way to go, Stephen Glass 2.0, I'll see you in Hell.

Rob, you've pretty much had your head on straight since day one around here, and anyone else that tells you otherwise is kidding themselves. That's pretty cool how you got that Shaughnessy connection going at full strength, too—I'd tell you to make sure you use it, but you've already beat me to the punch hooking up that sweet job on the sports desk (possibly same shifts as me? Oh boy). Having never been an editor down here I'm in no position to judge or give any sort of prognosis, but I think it's safe to say the Collegian's in good hands with you at the helm next year. As for NBA Live, you definitely know some cheat code or something. I mean, the last time you came over to my room, Rasho Nesterovic burned your puny Celtics for 30 and 15 in the first half– and you still won. WTF?!? Oh, and don't ever pretend you've never played PS2 before, that's just bush-league. I'll be seeing you lots.

Duggan, you did an amazing job as assistant sports editor this year. That Chris Lowe feature is probably the finest work to date. I'm glad to hear you've got some work lined up with the Herald—they need something fresh. There was a noticeable amount of improvement with you from the first and second time we covered women's soccer together, and I'm glad to have worked with you on so many beats. You're headed places, just don't get sidetracked.

Moving on to Danny, a.k.a. King of the One-liners. Mr. Picard, I was told to look out for you this year by some of my folks—but honestly, who could have predicted we would meet on the first night of the semester? Never a dull moment with you, and like Rob you've been squared away since your first day here. Keep up the good work. I'll be expecting more DirtDogs shoutouts, too. I'll be seeing you lots in Southie, or as you call it, "God's Country." Introduce me to these "smokin' chicks" you've been waxing poetic about, too.

Okay, now I've gone on way too long, so these next ones are going to be precise. Not meant to offend any of you with the length here.

Athas, do you ever not smile? Man, you're perfect. That's all I really have to say at the moment, and I'm sure I'd have something to tell you at The Harp on Sunday night. The Collegian has a good Managing Editor for next year. Stay perfect.

Jeremy the Silencer, you are a hell of a reporter and surprisingly witty when you talk. No but seriously, you are this year's answer to Matt Barstow—silent but deadly. That skiing expose is a perfect example. Keep it up, you're destined for great things here.

Dom, no one is going to deny you've got a lot of enthusiasm for this, and while you've still got a ways to go I will say that you've improved substantially. Long story short, when I started out in this biz as a geeky high-schooler I was the same way—full of energy. Good things will come, just continue to pursue and it will come to you.

Joey, I'm not sure what to say about you, because you pretty much disappeared from sports meetings for a length of time. I will say that it was a good time working with you on the swim beat, and from what I hear you've been doing some good at the Gazette, so I guess you've got some things in motion. Good luck in your future endeavors.

Now for a few others down at the office I forgot to mention…that's you, Dan O'Brien, Matt Belliveau, Mike Busack, Kerry O'Grady, Katie Buonopane, Nick Belanger, Megan Daley…keep in touch. All of you. Seriously, I need all of your numbers and emails, because we need to stay in touch. It was a real treat hanging out with all of you, and we're going to bump into each other again down the road. Let's do lunch, my treat.

A few shout outs to some other folks who put up with my crap on a daily basis…

Chris, a.k.a. Kryas – Crossing my fingers here, but as of today we have yet to kill each other as roommates. Thanks for putting up with a lot of my horse-piece this year—I'm well aware of my tendencies to act like a complete ass. Here's to three years of getting drizzled, running friz, and giving tough guys the biz. You'll be off to London when I return from Boston, but there will be more hell to raise next year. Three down, one to go. I know, scary, but it's here. And I'll find a way to make it to L.A. sometime in the next year or so.

Mike a.k.a. Beast – Stop lying to everyone, you're not really graduating in a week. You're going to be up here every damn weekend next year, putting to full use the many phrases you and your Brookline minions coined—beasting, raging, animalizing, coppin', poppin', straight choppin'—and introducing me to "Jess, Nicole, Ragebag 1, Ragebag 2, Ragebag 3". Or how about that one time you just rolled up to that house, opened the door and said "Way to leave your door open" to seemingly no one. Seriously dude, it's another language with you, and you literally live like a wild animal. For those of you reading this, I'm not exaggerating, find out for yourself. Me and you in the same city this summer? I don't think that's a good idea, but neither were any of those other crazy ideas that magically worked.

George a.k.a. G-Kenns – You are definitely Vince Vaughn's character from Wedding Crashers. As the fourth roommate next year along with Jon, Chris and myself, it will be your civic duty every day to clean the living area and prepare food for everyone else in the apartment. But somehow, this will translate to you as "drink every night and blare loud annoying music with equally-annoying girls" – did I just say that? It's going to be an absolute disaster living with you in every literal sense of the word, and I can't wait.

Kuda a.k.a. Kuda Bloke – You lived on my futon for a semester, and you tell me I'm always using that fact to get what I want out of you, but for once I'm going to say something else: that was the most fun I've ever had in one semester. Listening to all your malapropisms in what can only be described as "the queen's language"—man, I'm just starting to understand half of the things you said. Don't you know the American way to speak English, not this British crap? No but seriously, you taught me about half of what I know about how to socially interact and be a kick in the pants at the same time, so I guess we're even. And I'm taking your brother up on that offer and coming to South Africa one of these days. Lord knows where you'll be a year—check that, a month—from now, but if we never see each other again I just want to say it's always been a pleasure. Thanks for all the good times, and here's hoping more are on the way.

Amanda and Brigid – Sorry that this is a joint thing, but thanks for putting up with me, Chris and your third roommate (Beast) all semester long. You should have banned me from 124 Amity Street for life, but you didn't and I'm grateful for that.

Now to some other peeps that need some props…that would be you, Drew a.k.a. Strass, Dan a.k.a. Deucester (face it, you're the Deuce), Sean a.k.a. Rikkilolous, Julian a.k.a. Juelz, Trish, Nicole, Lindsay, Marina, Shane, Jeff, Rybo, everyone I know named Kim (there's a lot), Todd a.k.a. T-Fo, Heather, Jimmy, Alex, Erika, John, Sarah…too many good times, let's continue making more.

Anybody else I forgot, drop me a line. I've written too much. Redness, out.

Eric Athas

ERIC ATHAS, FORMER ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR, CURRENT MANAGING EDITOR, FOOTBALL, MEN'S AND WOMEN'S BASKETBALL, SOFTBALL
BRIAN

"Hey, barkeep, whose leg do you have to hump to get a dry martini around here?"

Two years down, two years to go. It's hard to say exactly what I expected coming into this year, but it is obvious to me that it ended a lot differently than it began. Last summer I had the year somewhat mapped out, and I felt like I knew what it was going to compose of. It's safe to say a few wrenches were thrown into the mix — some good, some not so good — but in the end, I can honestly say I've learned a lot from this past year, both in and outside of the Campus Center Basement.

I came into this year as the assistant sports editor, and figured I'd keep that slot up until the end of the year when I took over the sports department of the Collegian. But then things took a turn and suddenly I wasn't in the corner of the newsroom where I had been for the previous year and a half, I wasn't covering men's basketball, and I wasn't the assistant sport editor — I was the managing editor.

Things were different, but I always know that it was that sports department where I got my feet wet last year.

Jeff: I know, I know, you were the one who hired and trained me, and you were the one who mentored me through football. Speaking of football, I wasn't sure what I was getting myself into that first road trip to Colgate. First, wandering aimlessly around Utica, New York trying to find the hotel. Then witnessing those crazy hicks in the hotel. Then leaving the hotel and realizing 25 minutes later that we were back at the hotel (compliments of Marc Bertrand and his driving skills). Then finally arriving at Colgate to watch the team I was covering give up eight turnovers. At least things quickly shaped up with the team. Until Hofstra, Marzelli can really whip a water bottle hard against the parking lot pavement, huh? Well, I know the WMUA listener(s) will really miss the Jeff Howe Halftime Special next season. Anyways, the sports section will take a major hit when you graduate. You became an icon at the Collegian, and the readers will miss your writing (although they just have to travel about an hour and a half east to read it). I'm not surprised about the Metro job, and I won't be surprised when your name is one well known in the sports world. I know you did not want me to move away from the sports section like I did, and believe me, telling my boss that I was not doing what he suggested, and not taking my boss' advice was one of the toughest things I had to do.

Duggan: I said it before, and I'll say it again: Your work at the Collegian has been as constant as the sports section itself. Your writing was always excellent and your contribution to the section this year was tremendous. The work you put in this past year will land you a great job somewhere, and I know you and Jeff will both be top sportswriters sometime in the future. I never would have imagined the impression you made this year, and I'm sure you did not conceive it as well. Good luck in the future, and come back to visit the Collegian every once and a while.

Greenfield: Well buddy, it's time to step up to the plate, for a lack of better words. The one thing that would have held me back from applying for man-ed last semester was what condition I would leave the sports section in. Training an assistant for one semester and then making him the sports editor is not how things normally worked. I really had to think about my decision and if sports would be in a good place. Well, I couldn't have left if I didn't think you would do a good job. You've impressed me and everyone in the newsroom — even if you spilled water on me. You are absolutely ready for the step up, and I know you will fill the spot.

Brendan: Big Red, Air Bud, Mr. Senior Staff Writer, or whatever it is they call you these days. There were a lot of people that didn't think you would be successful at the Collegian. I know this, and you do too. Congrats man, you worked through it. You became the model writer at the Collegian, writing for sports, news, the Telegram, and now the Globe. Keep your head straight, continue where you left off, and build upon this success, and I know you will be returning to UMass in a few years featured at Sports Night in the Bluewall.

Pelland: Just like Greenfield, it's time for you to step up. You finally got your chance, and now it's time to prove yourself as an editor. It's not going to be easy with an entirely new sports department, and you will become frustrated at times. Just keep with it. You made strides this year covering hockey, and I am confident that you will continue that hard work.

Danny: Rookie of the Year in my mind. You stunned people with your hard work and dedication. You deserve to be the assistant sports editor, and I can tell you that you will be an asset to the entire paper next year. As I told Pelland, training will be very difficult at times. You, Pelland and Greenfield will make an excellent team though, and I am looking forward to working with you as an editor.

Domenic and Jeremy: You guys are both relatively young, and will be the go-to guys for the sports staff next semester. You both rose above the rest, and proved that you could play important roles at the Collegian. I'm saying this to all of the writers, but especially to you two — keep it up.

Away from the newsroom:

Kage: Well, we made it…barely. When I wrote the Misty Eyes last year, things were different to say the least. Everything seemed to be flawless between the two of us. And while things changed a lot, I know everything will be all right, and I know by the time I'm writing next year's Misty Eyes, everything will be back to normal. You are so important to me, and I will never forget your resilience this year. You are so strong, and I promise everything will be OK. I love you…no matter what.

Ma and Pop: Thanks for supporting me through yet another school year. You guys are incredible, and all of my successes are a result of you two.

Em, Rob, and Nicole: You guys all have real jobs? Now I'm really the youngest in the family. Thanks for being the best siblings in the world, and for supporting me in my endeavors.

Jeff Howe and Dan Duggan, I wish you all the best in your future endeavors. You guys are hard workers and I know that you will succeed wherever you end up – as long as you lay off the booze.

Picard and Pelland, enjoy the summer fellas. That's all I have to say.

Rice Pilaf and Dorn, you're improving and will continue to do so. Keep working hard over the summer.

That's all I got. Have a good summer guys and thank you for all of your effort this year.

"Peter, I'm not retarded, I'm handicapped."

Three years down and just one to go. Somebody pinch me because it's all going by way too fast. The thought of leaving the dream world that is UMass and entering the real world scares the hell out of me.

By far the third time has definitely been the charm. This year has been quite the roller-coaster ride. Junior year beats the hell out of freshman and sophomore year combined.

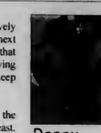
I have learned more in these past 12 months than in any other school year in my life, and not in class. The Collegian has taught me stuff no professor could ever and I've had a great time doing it.

Inmates of the Dungeon

Jeff- What more can be said about Jeff Howe? For those of you who are reading this and don't know, Jeff is one of the best most dedicated sportswriters that has ever had a byline in the Collegian. Just ask him and he'll tell you all about the accomplishments he's gained over the past few years.

Just kiddin' Jeff. Hockey was quite the experience this winter. Of all the things you taught me over those four months it was: never trust your hair to anybody but Truc's. Dragging me 50 miles out of our way just for a haircut made it all make sense. If you don't look good, your writing suffers. Alright I'll get serious now. You really have taught me just about everything I know about how to cover a team. Good luck out in the real world. Oh and hey, thanks for leavin' me the fade.

Rob- Mr. Greenfield, buddy and now Boss. I'm looking forward to next year and banging out this section with you. Crazy stuff man. You too in these past few months have helped me improve my writing in a lot of different ways.



Picard- Mr. Breaking News and official spokesman for Roger Clemens. You can find him this week on CBS' Red Sox this week. I'm really glad you came down this year. You're already rippin' it up and you don't even have a year under your belt. Next year me, you and Rob are gonna tear it up.

Brendan- Man I don't know what your problem is. You've been here longer than anybody on staff and you still have no clue what you're doing. Seriously, three years have gone by and you still don't know how to write a good lead. You are talentless garbage. I can't tell you how many times some one picks up the Collegian and asks me about your writing and how we could ever allow a hack like to you to grace our pages. Have fun big timin' it next year at the Globe.

Duggan- The silent assassin. Good Luck next year and congrats on the intramural championship.

Athas- Mr. Managing Editor it's crazy how fast you moved up here. I'm looking forward to next year and working with you again.

Jeremy and Domenic- I haven't really gotten a chance to really get to know you guys this year but I'm looking forward to doing that next year. As long as you guys stick with it you're going to have plenty of opportunities to move up at this paper.

"No, no. I'm sorry. It's just that I assumed that you were going to make it with milk, not crap."

I should be graduating this year. But I'm not.

Instead, I'm hanging around for one more year of college before I head out into the real world. Don't you hate when people use that phrase?

Well I don't. In fact, I can't wait to get out of college. Nothing against UMass, I just think that club sidewalk is getting old. The fake tough-guy act is way too played out at this school, and if I hear someone else who's not from Boston, say they're from Boston again, I'm going to stick my head into that homeless guy's white bucket, and let him drum away. By the way, why do people like this guy? I mean, I have nothing against homeless people, in fact, I'm not even positive he is homeless. But the last thing I need to hear while I'm walking out from a brutal night at Delano's is "Who let the dogs out" from a guy who somehow attracts more ladies than I do when the bars close. Not cool Benny.

Speaking of attracting ladies, The Panty Sniffers are in the Final Four for softball intramurals this week, and we plan on taking the title home. I'd like to thank all of those people who have come to our games, and who have supported in our panty sniffing ways.

To the team: You guys are the best group of panty sniffers I've ever been around. Keep up the good work, especially you, Chris Adams.

I can't forget Team Rammrd. Our team started off by winning the intramural hockey championship last year, and after a tough first round loss in 2005-06, we will work hard in the off-season to get back to the top. That is, if Chris Cobb decides to come back for his eighth year of college. Just kidding Chris, we all know you're on year 10, and we love you for it.

By the way, has anyone seen Mike Doran? If you have, please let me know, thanks.

I'm proud to say that my roommate, John Mcloughlin, is THE Guitar Hero. He can rock out to "More than a feeling" in that game better than anyone in this world. So next time you see him at Panera with his laptop and his thong sandals, make sure you ask him how it is that kid's from the South Shore get the curves on their hats like that.

I also want to give a shout out to my friends back home. It's not too often people write about how great South Boston is, so here's my chance. I like everyone there. I couldn't be more proud of where I come from. Unfortunately, there are many out-of-towners moving in, or as we used to write on the side of their cars, "yuppies." If you are graduating, and are thinking of paying the high price for an apartment in our city, just let it be known that you will not be well liked. Unless of course, you look like the girls who just moved in across the street from me. Then we just may give you a chance.

On a more serious note, this one goes out to the four athletic teams that I covered this year. While I did not cover the most popular UMass sports, I did learn one thing. It's what you put into it that counts. I put my heart and soul into everything I wrote for those four teams, and I wouldn't have been able to do any of it without the help of Seth Gerard, John Sinnett, Kimberly Gardner and Dave Quinn. Thank you.

I also want to thank the coaches and players who took the time out of their busy days to talk to me. Getting quotes from players and coaches is a huge part of the learning process in sports journalism, and for the times that some of my questions were just plain old stupid, I thank you all for bearing with me. So Patty Shea, Marnie Ducko, Carrie Holdiu, and Mike Stone: Thank you for everything.

Before we all pack up and move on, I want to thank Jeff Howe. I transferred to UMass last year, and if he never gave me the opportunity to write for the Collegian, I honestly would not even be in school right now. When I wrote a wiffle ball story last year for the news section, Jeff was there to open the door for me into the sports section, and everyone welcomed me with open arms. I also want to thank Dan Duggan, Eric Athas and Rob Greenfield for always being supportive during my first year of writing.

With Jeff and Dan graduating this year, I want to wish them the best of luck in the future. They deserve a lot of the credit for what goes on down here, and I'm sure they will have no problem finding a great career in this business. I want you two guys to know that I gave everything I possibly had into my work at this paper, and as the Assistant Sports Editor next year, I will continue my hard work. I grew into a much better writer because of you guys, and don't ever forget it. You were a great influence to us, and you will surely be missed at the Daily Collegian. Hopefully, your legacies will live on and one day we will be able to say, "Hey, I worked with those guys."

In closing, I want to thank Professor Bill Israel. Bill was my Journalism 300 teacher last year, and without his daunting ability to give us the most work I have ever had in any class in my life, I would not be where I am today. He taught me how to write. He taught me how to edit. He taught me everything I know about journalism. Before his class, I was just a stubborn kid from South Boston who thought I was ready for the big time without any prior help. Boy was I wrong. Bill made us edit hours of news stories, in fact, he gave us so much work one time that I actually contemplated going back to Southie to be a plumber with my Dad. A year later, I'm covering the UMass baseball team, and I couldn't be happier. This may all seem irrelevant, but Bill was a play college football on the PS2. Keep practicing, man. Sooo, ahhh, you wanna hit the Pheasant Lane Mall this summer? I'll wear my blue glasses. And tell Mrs. Locapo I'm really sorry. Or just show her this…

I had no idea it was you on the phone that day. My bad. I'm really a good kid, I swear. I mean, I don't swear. And don't let your son leave UMass.

All the girls—Who wants a margarita???

Robbie—OK, once before I hit the dusty trail… BAHHHHHHHHHHHH!!!!!!!!!

Kit—Thanks for being my Asian outlet when I'm away from Lowell. When you become a famous rapper, write a song about me. I mean, why does everyone else get one? Actually, you have until tomorrow to put me in an away message.

Bri—So, ahhh, how's that fantasy team of yours doing? I guess I could ask you or I could just look at the American League East standings under "New York Yankees" I hope your parents are happy with what they raised.

Foster—Say it slowly. La To-ma-ti-na.

Marzelli and McGovern—Guys… I actually did it.

This one-man sports meeting is officially adjourned.

Dan Duggan

DAN DUGGAN, ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR, WOMEN'S SOCCER, MEN'S BASKETBALL, MEN'S LACROSSE
PETER GRIFFIN

"No I'm not drunk, I'm just exhausted 'cause I've been up all night drinking."

If I was going to put a headline on the start of my time at the Collegian I would have to go with the most overused headline on every sports feature this year: "Dan Duggan has arrived." If I was going to put a headline now that I'm leaving, I'm hoping that it wouldn't be the other most overused sports headline: "Mixed results for Duggan."

That may be an inside joke that only the sports editors will get, but the truth is I really hope that I've done enough in my time at the paper that the reviews would be a bit more favorable.

I feel like I've written so many goodbye columns in the past few days, and I have so many people to mention and thank, that I'm going to skip another long sendoff and just get on to the shout-outs. I guess I'll start with those of you who have spent the better part of your college career deep in the bowels of the Campus Center basement.

Howe: We both wandered down here two and a half years ago, and you moved through the ranks faster than I ever could have imagined. I hope that this year I've closed the gap a little bit, but that was tough to do because you set the bar pretty high.

I wish we could have done more beats together, especially one that wasn't in our last semester when senioritis was at its peak because we would have completely knocked it out of the park. I still think we did a pretty damn good job with lax. Gotta love trying to coax that big quote out of Cannella. "Oh so this isn't a big game? Oh so every game means the same?" Thanks for that.

The week of The Score was just ridiculous. I don't think anyone outside of the handful of us who spent almost a week straight in the office putting out The Best Special Issue of the Collegian Ever can really understand what that experience was like. I'm not gonna lie there were a few moments that made me question what we were even doing, like when I almost fell asleep at the wheel while driving home at 9 a.m. and you having hallucinations by the end of the week, but I wouldn't trade that experience for anything.

I still don't know how you managed to get us kicked out of that bar at Penn State in under five minutes. But after further consideration, I am pretty sure that the bouncer didn't make any promises of free drinks. Also, you might want to look into getting a new ID so we don't have to put up with 20-minute hassles at every bar we try to get into.

That weekend pretty much summed up our friendship: spending half our time covering sports and the other half getting absolutely wasted. Over this past year you have gone from being my boss to becoming someone I don't hesitate to call a good friend. I still know that I can always look to you for advice on anything and everything related to sports writing, but I'm happier that I also know that I'll be able to call you any night and say let's go get loaded in Boston, and you'll be just as able to do that.

Athas: We all know that was you during Score week. You know what I'm talking about man, I don't want to call you out on it in the paper, but just know that we all know. Just kidding, but seriously you're one of the most impressive people I've ever met.

You've achieved so much in such a short time, and you're going to go onto so much more. You have an amazing way of keeping your calm demeanor no matter what's going on around you. I'm glad that I got to know you so well, and I know the paper is in good hands with you for the next two years.

You're still gonna have to come out with Jeff and me, though, so we can show you how sports editors really party.

Greenfield: You've been put in a pretty tough spot, trying to get started in the office with two guys on the way out. You've shown that you'll be able to lead this section well, and you better because Howe and I won't be far away, so if you screw it up we'll let you know about it.

I know you won't though. You're a hard-working kid and I know you'll do a good job. Don't get yourself too burnt out by it, sit back and enjoy the ride once and a while, and it'll be even more worthwhile.

Picard: You've really hit the big time with this column. Ride it for all it's worth. You remind me of myself in a lot of ways, and I'm hoping you take this assistant job and run with it the same way I did. I'm sure you will, and if you do you won't regret it.

You've got a big future in this, and I'm proud to know that I had some affect on that, no matter how small it may actually be. You're gonna have to come to Quincy with the Collins boys over the summer and we'll throw back a few.

Pelland: Just like Picard, you're a lot like I was a year ago. You have a ton of potential, and I just hope that you understand how much you have to gain next year if you go out and give it everything you have. You've always been one of the most reliable kids down here, so now it's up to you to take it to the next level. I have all the faith in the world that you'll do it.

Hall: I think you've always known that you have a ton of talent and I think that this year you finally realized how to harness that into something productive. You're one of the most well-intentioned, outgoing people I've ever met, and even if it does get you into a bit of hot water sometimes, I wouldn't change anything if I were you.

It's funny that I was basically your boss this year, because whether you know it or not I actually learned a lot from you, especially starting out. I think we kicked (no pun intended) soccer's ass in our two years on the beat.

You've really blossomed this year and it's been great to see you turn out the way you have. I have no doubt that you'll keep it going. Good luck with the Globe, I'm sure you'll knock it out of the park.

Jeremy: It's not easy to get noticed on the skiing beat, but you managed to do that this year. That should tell you all you need to know about you abilities as a reporter and a writer. You have a lot of time left at the Collegian and I'm expecting to hear big things from you in the future.

Dominic: You've improved as much as anyone this year, and it's been great to see. Never lose that work ethic and eagerness to learn, it'll take you far. If you stick with this I think you'll have a great future. Good luck with the Sun and everything else.

Joey: We didn't see as much of you this semester, but I know it's because you were working so much at the Gazette, and that was a great opportunity for you and I hope you make the most of it. If you ever need anything, don't hesitate to give me a call.

The new guys: I haven't gotten to know many of you very well, but if you ever need anything, well you have about a week to hit me up. But I know you guys will be in good hands with Greenfield, so just remember that if you want to do this, the Collegian is as good a place as anywhere to get your start.

Nick: It's hard to believe you're only a sophomore. I can already tell you're headed for big things and I think you know that too. I can't imagine what this paper would look like on a daily basis if it wasn't for your graphic ability. I know you're moving up the food chain, but make sure you give them a hand with the Score next year, they're gonna need it. Keep in touch man.

Believeau: You somehow managed to make working Thursday nights fun. That said, if I find out you're still working Thursdays next year I'm gonna come back and forcibly remove you from the office and drop you off uptown. And come to think of it, same goes if I find out you're still covering SGA.

You are gonna do an awesome job with news next year, even if we all know your heart is in sports. You're one of the most laidback people I've ever met and I wish I had gotten to know you before this year because I'm sure we would have been even better friends. I got about a week left here, and I'm making a guarantee that we will grab a beer together at some point.

Also, good job on the assistant hiring. If I knew you were gonna be that kind of news editor, I would have stuck around for another year.

I also have to give a shout-out to two people who have moved on from the Collegian, but played a major role in me becoming the journalist that I am today.

Marzelli: I can't lie, I didn't really like you at first. I thought you were a know-it-all, but I quickly came to realize that you could act like a know-it-all because you did in fact know it all, or at least a hell of a lot more than the rest of us. You know more about sports and journalism than anyone our age should ever be able to. I'll never forget the Calhoun press conference. That was an absolute classic; you stood your ground and handled yourself like the pro you are.

I know you're going to do big things in Arkansas, at least as big as you can in Arkansas, but I know you'll be back to write the "Rise of UMass Basketball Part II" some day. I know we'll keep in touch and you can guarantee that I'll be hitting you up for advice down the road.

McGovern: You've been gone for a year, but you were one of the people that got me into the Collegian. I always admire the way that you were able to be a free-thinker and do things your way. I learned a lot from you without you probably even knowing it. I'm glad we finally got to have that beer together at O'Malley's (who am I kidding it was like 15), but you get the idea. I'm sure we'll be having plenty more now that I'm headed back to Boston.

There are a ton of people outside of the newsroom who have had a major impact on me in these past four years, and I feel the need to thank you.

Mom and Dad: I would never be where I am today if it wasn't for your love and support. You both have done so much for me and I can never fully express to you how grateful I am for everything you've done. I love you both.

Ollie: There isn't a day that goes by that I don't think about you. Now that we're all graduating and we'd all be heading back to Quincy for the summer it's really hitting hard that you aren't gonna be there. It's just so hard to know that every time we have a good time now, I just now it would be even better if you were there.

You were a best friend and a brother, and someone that won't ever be replaced. I can't believe it's almost been seven months, you'll be remembered forever. True legend.

Dennis: That billboard was such a fitting tribute. You were always the life of the party while you were here, it's only right that you still are even now. It's weird because sometimes it doesn't even seem like you're gone, it just seems like you're away for a few months, but you'll be back. You got more out of life in 20 years that most people get in a lifetime. Miss you kid.

DiNardo and Chuck: When we moved into 41 we were good friends, but over the last two years I feel like we've become more like brothers. I'm gonna miss just sitting around the apartment talking with you two. Granted we're all going home to five live minutes apart, but it won't be the same as these last two years being five seconds away from two of my best friends.

The Quincy boys at UMass: Some of you that started here are gone and others started elsewhere but found your way here. The bottom line is that we've had some unbelievable times together in these four years, and it was made better knowing that I had a group of great friends to share all the memories with. And we finally got that damn intramural championship, ending the run of a true dynasty.

The boys back home: We've had to put up with a good amount of crap in the last two years, but we were also lucky in a way. We were lucky because we realized that we have such an unreal group of friends. You guys will be my boys for life, it'll be good to get back to Q-Town and party like the old days.

The rest of the boys at UMass: I came here not worried about making new friends because I had so many from home, but I've made some of the best friends I could have ever hoped for. So to you boys at 800, Meadow Street, Boyden and everyone else, the last four years have been crazy and I'm just glad that you were all as big of drunks as you were. It was a blast. Keep in touch.

Rachel: To steal a part of your quote, "You were someone that I absolutely needed to meet." Things may not be the same between us right now, but no matter what, when I look back on my four years here I'll always have great memories of our time together. I'll always love you.

Now onto those memories from the beats I've covered this year.

Soccer: The year really started during back-to-school with getting wasted at Charlie's with Howe. For soccer, back to cover Rudy again, nicest coach I've ever met. Still going to have to get together for those margaritas. Thanks for the jackets. Sitting in the pouring rain in Holy Cross—thanks for that press box HC. Hall throwing away his shot glass and then debuting for 10 minutes whether or not to reach into the trash for it. This was the first beat I ever had and it was the perfect spot for me to get my start.

Basketball: First brush with the big time. Nerves of knowing that people were actually going to read what I wrote. That Midnight Madness column, probably one of the best columns I've ever written. "Just take one night and go have fun in a way you won't be able to again once you pull onto the Mass Pike for the last time and leave this campus for good." Being with the team one year too early. Having everyone think that every year. Winning the opener. Bowers mysteriously gone before UAB game. Thomas' dunk on the break. UConn game. Preview section, one of the best layouts of the year. Ripping off Marzelli's column, things not quite working out as well this year. Sharing press row with Ainge, Rafferty, McDonough, Bilas, Katz. UConn cheerleaders. The two dorks covering the team for UConn. Sitting next to the NBA scout. Marzelli and Calhoun absolutely classic. Trip to NY. Kelly, he's a bartenderrrrr. Great trip with The Duke. Brett hooking me and my dad up. Not too impressed with the Mecca. Pay for press spread? BC debacle. Worst press conference ever. Actually looking good in the early A-10 play over break. Temple game. Couldn't be better, national TV, Pennie's 3… Now I really wish I tried to walk-on. Running intramurals with Tiki, expecting big things out of you next year.

Lacrosse: Finally got to partner up with Howe. Wish we could have had this beat a year earlier, but we still kicked its ass. Covering a team that was actually good. Sitting in the press box, tough to keep eyes on the field sometimes. Real road trips. Showing up at every game still half in the bag. Thanks for that noon start, Penn State. Pretty sure I slept through most of that one. Happy Valley, that's a college town. First of many bars to have a problem with your ID from sophomore year in high school. No idea how you made that drive back. Trip to beautiful up-upstate New York. Hate "Cuse as much as you now. Not too impressed with the Oswego nightlife, though that probably shouldn't have been too much of a surprise. Tom Brady is the greatest athlete of all-time, got it Gladdy? Worst student reporters. Yet another hung-over ride back home. Road trip to NY for the tourney. Not quite as crazy as the others. Weird waking up not hungover. Cheaters: classic. Tailgate part: little awkward. April Fools. Still got at least one more trip in us… back to beautiful New York this weekend.

I'd like to end with what little advice I can leave to everyone who isn't graduating. People always tell you how fast college will go by, but you probably don't believe them. But the truth is, it does. It seems like it was yesterday that I was pulling up to this campus with my parents to move into JQA, and now I'm getting ready to pack up the car again and leave Amherst for good.

The best thing I can say is to enjoy this experience as much as you can. Sure there will be times when school can be a grind, but don't get too caught up in worrying about your grades and stuff like that. You have the rest of your life to worry about responsibilities, college is really your last chance to have fun. So I would say just live it up for the four years you are here. Good luck and have a blast.

(Jeff's note: Hall moves up to the top for this one, guys. He deserves it.)

Brendan Hall

BRENDAN HALL, HONORARY SENIOR, WOMEN'S SOCCER, SWIMMING, WOMEN'S LACROSSE
QUAGMIRE

"My fellow Americans, I have not been entirely truthful with you. I did gogginsgogenyoko that girl. I gashmugged her gothabitv with my gongoo. And I am sorry."

Yeah, it's been a wild ride.

If you were here last year, you know that the terms "Brendan Hall" and "great things to say of him" didn't belong in the same sentence. I was a mess. I wasn't fun to be around, and I'm forever sorry if I dragged anyone through the mud in the process. I was on some razor-thin wire, and I'm glad to be back here.

There's one big reason why I'm so glad I made the effort to come back. This year has easily been the most fun I've ever had. Much more fun than last year, or the year before. I mean, for God's sake, who brought that Nerf ball down here, and who hasn't gotten plunked by it yet? For once, everybody down here just clicked at all times, and I enjoyed every minute of it. Judging by who's running this place next year and how they're already buddies, I like where this place is headed.

I don't consider my efforts this year work. In fact, I haven't worked a day in my life. You can't work and have fun at the same time, someone once told me ours ago, and this is your classic example of people having too much fun while working to chalk it up as just "work" or "a job". Shucking lobsters last summer for 12 hours a day on my off-days from the Telegram and Gazette? That's work. Covering UMass sports, writing the police log and schooling Matt Belliveau at NBA Live? That's fun.

I also want to give a big thanks to all the coaches I covered for the Collegian this year. That would be you, Carrie Holdiac, Bob Newcomb, Russ Yarworth and Jim Rudy. I'm glad to have covered your teams. You all gave me great stuff to work with, and your players all conveniently had glowing personalities, so my job was virtually stress-free.

Another big ups to John Sinnett, also known as the coolest guy at UMass Media Relations. Working with you on two beats (three if you count the basketball games) was a real shot at life, and we have the conversations to prove it. I hope you end up getting a great job somewhere, because you know how to get people what they want, when they want it, and painlessly. You obviously get the assist on all those great features I wrote, because you dropped me the 411 on them. I'll never get tired of your stories from back in the day at Wake Forest, either. The state of Massachusetts is sending its best hoops prospect to Winston-Salem, so here's to hoping the Deacs don't fall on their faces again.

A few things I need to get off my chest before I continue.

Mr. McGovern, I believe you said something in last year's Misty-eyed about me being the biggest pain in your ass, making you "yell" and "waiting for the day when you figure yourself out and turn into the spectacular reporter that is waiting to come out." I think I finally figured myself out, so is there a prize I get now or something? Kidding. It's taken me a while to learn, but I'm a little better because of the harsh criticism. I hear you're in Boston now…I'll be living in Southie for the summer and fall, so if you ever feel like hanging out you know how to reach me. But we never really hung out before, so if you'd rather keep your distance I don't blame you. I'm sure we'll meet up again somewhere down the road. Good luck in the future, it's always a sharp right down the path less traveled with you—that's a compliment, just so there's no confusion.

As for you Mr. Marzelli, good sire, you absolutely never held back in your blunt, often harsh criticism of me. This "pull your head out of your ass…you are your own worst enemy" business from last year's Misty-eyed is a perfect example. I busted my ass and bent over backwards for you guys, though, and I think you appreciated that to some extent. We have yet to speak to each other in this new year of 2006, but it's a freeze-out on both ends for whatever reason or another. The past is the past, let's just bury the hatchet. I can't continue having enemies. That's just not my style. I also want to wish you good luck in Arkansas—strange place for you to start, but you're covering Division I athletics, so there's little room for complaint.

Lastly, I was told ages ago by some Collegian sports folks who are no longer here that I would never learn anything writing for news. How wrong they all were. At the advice of an adviser in the journalism department, I began writing more and more for the news department before taking on the burdensome load of UMass Police beat writer this semester. To say I learned nothing is a complete lie. I am so much more of a well-balanced reporter because of it, so kudos to Dan O'Brien for giving me the job and UMass Police Deputy Chief Pat Archbald for all the weekly meetings. You never thought someone like me would be thanking a police officer, did you?

Moving on…

Merritt, you've always gone to bat for me, which is why I'm giving you props again this year. Lord knows there are very few people who have as upside-down a biological clock as me, and—ding, ding, ding—you're one of them. Makes for great random AIM conversations at 4 a.m. Just to let you know, I'm still holding you to those words (you know what I'm talking about), I WILL come out there to smack you if it's the same situation in October. You're a great friend to have in this business, so get ready for more of me racking your brain at the most random times of day. Oh yeah, and your Berkshire Eagle still owes me 50 bucks.

Jeff, I owe you everything. Whatever you need man, I've got you covered, got it? Money, rides, jobs, a place to crash, indentured servants, you name it and I'll find a way to get it to you. Out of all of the people here, you were pretty much the only one that had any faith in me when classes resumed in September of 2005. I told you I was going to come back a changed man, and lo and behold, look at us now. Me not giving you stress allowed you to kick ass with INCH and getting that sick job covering the Red Sox for the Metro, and me landing a co-op at The Boston Globe. I'm glad you trusted me to do a good job this year. I know that was rather brief, but for a man that's done so much for me I feel like words fall short. We know how we stand with each other. Let's keep in touch…and for God's sake, when you get to Boston give me a call.

Jon, you incompetent hack, I swear to God you are the worst reporter the Collegian has ever seen. Jesus, do you even know what a complete sentence looks like? Sometimes I even wonder if you actually went to any hockey games or just made it up off the top of your head. And how the hell did you get a good-looking woman to be your girlfriend? You look like someone's worst nightmare. I've heard those kids from the BC paper read every one of your baseball articles and piss their pants laughing out loud at the sheer awfulness—and we all know the lack of talent

2005-06 Misty-Eyed Memories

The waiting drove me mad
You're finally here
And I'm a mess
-Pearl Jam

I remember coming into my senior year last September saying I couldn't wait to graduate because classes suck, and when I get a real job writing about sports, well, that's simply just not a real job at all.

But I pretty much realized maybe one hour into September once I moved back to Amherst that leaving this place was absolutely not even close to one of my top priorities. How could I be so young, so stupid?

I walked out of my last final right before putting this page together last night, and my head was spinning all over the place.

Take that in. Remember that building. Don't walk into that huge yellow tractor. I'm really done? I can't take one more class? Hey, now, where did that fence come from? Will I be walking into this building ever again? Wow, look at her.

I told you it was spinning. Anyway, college ends fast, guys. Make sure you enjoy it. Don't pass up on anything – not one, single thing.

And I've been burnt out after a long career here at the Collegian, like probably just about every senior on staff, but I would kill to put out one more sports page or write one more feature or go to BOE just one more time (which might actually double my attendance all year, but who's counting?).

This was some pretty phenomenal stuff, and if you don't believe a word of what I'm saying, cut this blurb out and save it until the end of your senior year and re-read it.

I don't know what else to say. Saying goodbye to this magical ride is only supposed to be for kids who are a year older than you. It's finally here, and I'm a mess.

But I know how I'll get through it. It's time for some Misty-Eyed Memories, a longstanding sports tradition.

I don't know if anything will top our sports movie characters for a theme, but picking Family Guy characters is always a safe bet. The elder assistant and I picked these out for the whole staff without any of them knowing which character they are.

But like someone smart once said, "That makes it that much more fun for us sarcastic editors as we snicker to ourselves one last time in the Campus Center basement."

-Jeff Howe, Sports Editor

JEFF HOWE – SPORTS EDITOR, FOOTBALL, HOCKEY, MEN'S LACROSSE
STEWIE GRIFFIN

"Hahaha, oh my God! I almost didn't do it, I almost didn't do it! I thought, 'Is this in bad taste?' But you know what, I went for it. I went for it, and I'm so glad I did! Ooooh, worth it, totally worth it."

Jeff Howe

Wow, this truly was the final year of my five-year ride. I've been running the countdown on the top line of the Misty Eyes for three years now, and I'm very humbled by this whole thing. I almost want to shed a tear.

I've got a question for UMass, though. With the 900 billion construction vehicles, fences, holes and God knows what else is lurking around this ugly-turned-ugliest campus, do you think you could loan some of these resources to the rebuilding process of the Boston Bruins? If I go any further on either of these subjects, I might puke in my mouth.

Ok, let's take a step back and touch upon one of my favorite subjects. The New York Knicks are giving up on Larry Brown after ONE season?! Now, Larry Brown might just be a little past his prime, a la Ben Affleck exactly one second after his "You keep your ear to the grindstone" line in "Good Will Hunting" but the guy is a legend. If he can't turn the Knicks around, do you think, possibly, maybe it might be the guys on the roster?

Never mind, I forgot about my good friend Isaiah in the front office. "I've ruined more teams/organizations/leagues than anyone in history, I've assembled a 12-man rotation with nine small forwards. I've got two ball-hawking primadonas in the backcourt. I know! I'll blame the Hall-of-Fame head coach! Brilliant!"

It's a Guinness commercial waiting to happen.

By the way, Alex Rodriguez didn't wear a pink wristband on Sunday just to commemorate Mother's Day, he just wanted to see what Bronson Arroyo's wrist looked like after he slapped it two years ago.

(Insert insensitive Duke lacrosse comment here. Even I have some standards.)

So John Daly released a book about his escapades on and off the golf course? Hey, John Daly should be a god to all men who have a pulse. Jimmy Kimmel and Adam Corolla absolutely needed a shrine of him on "The Man Show". Anyway, there has been a lot made about his gambling addiction and all that, but I think we're missing one huge point here. John Daly has sex!!? With living, breathing women? You've got to be kidding me.

What's next? The Clippers in the NBA Playoffs? Please.

Now, when the Minnesota Vikings originally got their name, what exactly did their ownership THINK was going to happen? Do these people know what vikings once did? They were human savages who waged war on the seas, stole whatever they could get their hands on and raped the women they captured. And the notorious Love Boat scandal was considered a crime? This was their calling.

Ahh, I've said too much. It's time for a one-man sports meeting.

This is the end of an era. No offense to the guys who came before us and the staffers who worked their tails off this year (especially Duggan), but I officially represent the last leg of the Marzelli-McGovern-Howe Dynasty. I carried the torch the best I could this year to represent the two of you well. You both know exactly what you have meant to me as a writer and a person, and I hope the final act did the sports section justice this year after your performances. It's our time to shine.

This football season started out with a bang. Forget that – a kablam! Mike, that pool sure was leavy. That was a sick two-hour tour of Richmond, too, but we damn sure found a great sports bar within walking distance of the ho-tel. RJ was doing his thing. Why did Stacy Tutt only touch the ball a total of three times again?

Besides the game itself, that Colgate trip was pretty sweet. Athas, Bertrand and myself officially crashed a wedding. Welcome to the club, boys. Oh, baby, I'm going back to The Cow Bell Diner!

Three safeties on Public Safety Day. Cuko's heroics against the champs.

Then, there was the trip to Maine. Joel was the most real-life cartoon figure of a human being I've ever seen. That didn't make sense, and neither did he. But he instantly deserves an induction to the Ordinary Joe(l) Hall of Fame. I could write a book on the kid, but I'll stop with this. Wait, can I get another verse from ICP, Joel? Please?

Anywho, howbout the unanticipated clutch performance from Big Doug? Or the potato gun straight into the door from the INSIDE? Or sneaking into Ushuaia? Or the random Maine-UAH game? Or all those sports? Or the sign on the way home? Or the discovery of hand grenades in the Ludacris song? Or how we can go on a four-day trip and truly remember about six hours of it? By the way, congrats, Doug.

And then there was Delaware. Hey, Keeler, nice shades, buddy. Derek, good looks getting work off for that one and coming up clutch by taking the trip down with us.

Honestly, Mike, was there a better trip than Army? We owned that football field. Literally. For three hours, it was our damn field. If I ever catch another 80-somodd-yard touchdown pass again, though, I may never walk again. Those refs loved us. Good thing we got the guy in The Score. Also a good thing we came out of that tour alive, especially after we got lost, broke into the barracks, survived Little Russia and climbed up the biggest hills ever. I think our country is in good hands.

Hey, McGovern, I almost forgot you were there, too. Man, we would have walked up that hill forever if we didn't somehow run into Rich. And even though those Army fans didn't know a single thing about their team, they were pretty cool for letting us chill on the side of that hill with them.

And then there was Hofstra. Athas, you're never allowed to navigate another road trip again. I still don't know how you screwed those directions up. Oh, and did that game even happen? Nope, nope, it didn't.

That hockey season was something else. How I got put in charge of covering all of Hockey East for the world's greatest college hockey website is beyond me, but I had the time of my life with it. I really hoped I earned that lifetime membership with INCH because I'll be knocking down the doors until you let me back in if I didn't. Hey, Skalko. I'm Jeff. Now that I've got the hard part out of the way…

With the way the UMass season went, it still involved some of the greatest wins I've ever seen. Colorado College, UNH and then Boston College? Damn, guys. Nice job. Good luck in the pros, Marv.

I still can't believe I covered that UVM/BC game with gauze in my mouth after the gum surgery. Too many jokes, too many jokes.

But seriously, that win over BC on Feb. 3 was one of the greatest things I've ever seen in my life. Woo baby!

I met a lot of unbelievable people during this past hockey season, and I had the greatest five days of my life out in Milwaukee to cap it all off. By the way, I'm still looking for Laura if anyone knows her whereabouts. I'm assuming I can just schedule the wedding, and she'll show up. I mean, we did have a connection. A looooooooove connection.

I swallowed a bug.

I might have been looking forward to this lacrosse season as much as anyone on the actual team, mainly because of what happened in Baltimore last year.

Duggan, you did a hell of a job filling in for McGovern. I just wish you were there to witness that kid from the Yale Herald. I'm still not even sure he really existed. You ate a whole wheel of cheese? I'm not even mad. That's impressive.

What?

Hofstra really didn't impress me during the first week of the season. I'm sure they won't impress me again on Saturday.

Playing Harvard only counts when you play Harvard in Cambridge because it gives you an excuse to use as many "Good Will Hunting" quotes as humanly possible, an obvious favorite pastime of mine.

I don't understand Albany's deal. I really don't.

Another thing I don't know is where to begin with Penn State. We made it all the way down there on three wheels. We somehow made it through the murder mile or whatever that messed up section of highway was called. But we definitely refilled when we made it through a certain someone's relative's Pleasant Gap.

Definitely key that we left late to skip out on the traffic and made it there in time to hit the bars. Before I forget, that was the greatest campus ever – with the obvious exception of Hobart. Don't worry, Bob. I didn't cheat on Hobart with Penn State.

Those cheese steaks were horrendous. My ID is also apparently horrendous. I still stand by the fact that the bouncer told me we were getting free drinks for paying the cover. That bartender just didn't understand. I still to this day don't know how we made it to the game. I mean, those MapQuest directions just led us in the wrong direction. Yeah, that was it.

Was that radio guy actually calling the game, or did he just love saying which hand the player shot with, or did he just love saying which team was wearing which colors. Props to Billy Donovan for sneaking in "With no regard for human life!"

May the greatest Red Sox hat in history rest in peace. It was on my head for three Super Bowls, a World Series, made it in and out of Yankee Stadium for Game 7 and a countless amount of other things. I love you, hat. I love you.

I'd talk much more about the "Cuse trip if I didn't already run a 1,000-word running diary. "I know so much about sports [because I'm a huge tool]." Yeah, that's what he meant. Hey, that lady knew the Carrier Dome like she worked there or something. And I don't even know how to describe that wind.

I'm happy I introduced you two to "Cheaters". I definitely changed your lives forever, especially since we saw the greatest episode in the history of television. Anyone wanna hit up downtown Germany. I mean downtown Russia?

And, no, Sebastian Telfair didn't have it bad at ALL. Anyone who lives in the woods of upstate New York has it bad. Wow, talk about a hole.

I hope everyone is ready for a ride to Philly.

Did I forget The Score? No, not one bit. At least not the parts I remember about it anyway. Whatever I just said pretty much sums up those 75 consecutive sleepless hours. Instead of spending a thousand words trying to ask myself how in the world we all pulled that off, I'm just going to give The Score a moment of silence …( )

Well, that was fun.

Duggan – Man, you did yourself one hell of a job this year. I knew you'd come in and contribute, but I had no idea you would be the glue that held this section together. This year would have been a lot harder without you on staff, and I'm real happy with the effort you put forth to make yourself a better writer, reporter and editor nearly each and every day. You have the ability to really make something of yourself in this business, and I know you're not going to do anything that will screw that up. I was hoping at this point last year that this is something I could be saying to you, but you far and away exceeded my expectations. I know these road trips probably scared the hell out of you with that whole "tire problem," but didn't that just make you appreciate life that much more every time we survived and made it back to Amherst? I was probably just doing you a favor. I'm happy you caught the lacrosse bug this year, too. Me, you and McGovern are definitely going to be those "drunken idiots" on the hill someday, and I'm completely fine with that. Hey, let's cover the Sox for the Globe someday or something. And one last thing, give that tee shirt back to the poor kid you stole it from. We all know you didn't win a real intramural championship. You're only kidding yourself, and no one wins when you do something like that.

Athas – Someone had themselves a pretty damn crazy year, huh? You must be pretty relieved knowing you won't have me around next year busting your balls on an hourly basis, but you'll miss it since I guess you're now the elder statesman down there. Scary if you ask me. I don't know what your plans are with the sports section next year, but I hope you can at least stick with football. If nothing else, you have to be the third guy on the beat. If you happen to take Randy Lively's seat in the press box, so be it. It was about a year-and-a-half ago when I told you that big things were in store for you at this place, and you pretty much proved me right. I like being right, as you very well know, but make sure you keep working to continuously improve every single day. I'm counting on you to keep this whole thing together, especially The Score. That's going to be your baby next year so start thinking about it now. And if you happen to top this year's product, I'll be back to Nancy Kerrigan your ass.

Greenfield – I'm going to put this the best way I know how. You've got a long line of sports editors to live up to, and if you don't, you're going to hear about it from each and every one of them. There is a lot of pride from the section's alumni, and you've had the least amount of time to groom for this position out of anyone in the last few years. You have to constantly be aware that you need to put out a quality product five days a week while you also work to make yourself a better reporter in the process. That's a lot of work put on your plate, and while I know you're willing to put in the effort, don't burn yourself out by October. Use your Collegian resources. There are a lot of people who will be willing to help you out if you ask. And don't screw up The Score. Other than that, chill out for a couple months before the big return because it's going to be a looooonnggggg year.

Hey, you wanna work for me on Tuesday?

Hall – You amazed the hell out of me this year. I didn't know if you'd last past Sept. 15, let alone all the way until May. You've got a good thing going for you, and you know that. Good luck with the Globe. It's going to open up a lot of doors for you – not that you needed anyone to really tell you that. You were as valuable to this staff as any editor, and that is something I've been telling you for two years. You gave swimming its best coverage in the history of the sport, and you swallowed up the other sports you covered without even missing a beat. It would have been easy for you to walk away this year considering the circumstances, but your loyalty to the section and to me is a huge testament to who you are as a person. Your writing will take you places. Your personality will take you places. Your willingness to give a solid effort every single day will take you places. And your loyalty and dedication to everything you do will take you places. Not many people have that package the way you do. Good luck with everything, man. I'm gonna miss the hell out of working alongside you.

Pelland – Good thing you somehow managed to get me to Agganis that one time. I don't know what my deal with driving in that city is. You've got yourself a good gig next year so take advantage of it. I know you're going to work hard to keep getting yourself better, and never for one second hesitate to give me a call if you need something. You've got your work cut out for you with hockey next year. There are a long line of great hockey writers here like Merritt and Brady (and obviously yours truly) so you've got a tradition to uphold. If you screw this beat up, Kimberly will damn sure call me to tell me about it. If you ever turn 21, you better let me know about it. I'll see you at the Garden next year for Hockey East.

Danny Pee-Card – I don't know why I can't get your name right, but it looks like I'm going to have to now that you're a big shot. I'd like to tell you not to let it all go to your head, but I'd be a hypocrite if I did – ya know, with the whole WEEI and Metro thing. Anyway, you were the staff's Rookie of the Year this year. You came out of nowhere and dominated absolutely everything you did. I hope you jump on hockey next year with Pelland, but I can understand if you don't. I'm obviously going to be in Boston a lot this year so I'll be hitting you up. I don't know what it's going to be like going to a bar with you not named Delano's, but I'm willing to adapt if you are. You do a great job with this staff so keep it up, and make sure you guys find someone else with a Boston accent to hire as an editor to keep this long line that I started going.

Jeremy – Sorry about that whole E-mail fiasco in the war room, although I'll be laughing about that one for awhile. There's nothing I can really say to you here that I didn't already say to you during my rant about softball a couple weeks ago. You're a solid writer and reporter, and if you're not an editor at this time next year, you've really done something wrong. The future is bright for you if you keep up the work you've been doing. Hey, I hear the ski team is hiring a new coach if all else fails. Have a good summer, man.

Dom – If you continue to improve on the same scale that you improved from March until now, you're going to do some great things next year. Stick with this, and keep working hard. People who have a work ethic like yours succeed in life 100 times out of 100 no matter what it is that they're trying to do. I can't thank you enough for the hard work you put in this year, and I will always vouch for you if you're ever applying for a job somewhere.

Joey – I'm not one to lie. I don't know a damn thing about you, man. I just hope your next sports editor can get it through your head to stop double-spacing stories, changing the font on your byline and giving it a headline. Good luck wherever you end up.

Nick – I like calling you the honorary member of the sports staff, but let's try writing for sports next year so we can drop the "honorary" tag. You wanted to write for the Collegian … or something, so let's try that something out on the cool side of the newsroom. I don't know where this is all going to lead you, but your future looks as bright as anyone down there (except me, of course). Just kidding, man. You're going to do a phenomenal job next year, and I say that without a single ounce of doubt. I'd tell you how much you meant to The Score if I hadn't already beaten that to a dead horse, and it's not like you don't know it anyway. You're a great worker, but you're an even better guy. There's a lot to be said about that. Keep in touch.

P.S. What's your sister up to these days?

Bellveau – Same to you, write some damn sports next year, will ya? Either way, I know you got the news section locked down. You were a great addition to the newsroom this year, even if it took you to drive to the wrong Amherst before you even started. There aren't many people who show me up with pure stupidity, but you definitely took the cake with that move. Oh, and there was one more thing I had to add. Thinking…thinking…thinking… Oh yeah, Duke sucks!

Marissa – OK, so there was that graphical error that cut you out of The Score. Wasn't my fault, I swear. That's why you get the first mention from the business department. Wait, do I even know you?

KerryO – Hey, thanks for the shout-out in the grad guide. Cool. I see how it is. Sorry about Charlie's on my birthday. Or maybe I'm not. Either way, it makes for a good story. Scout out ASU for me because you know I'll be down there at some point. We're hitting up a Cardinals game. And since you're my richest friend, you're buying.

Lauren and Mel – You two crack me up. I feel bad for graphics next year because they're losing a couple all stars. Mel, maybe I'll see you at The Claddagh – or however you spell it – at some point. You two take care.

Everyone who worked on The Score – Thank you once again.

Every girl in the business office – Call me. Come on. Seriously. Please? This isn't begging is it? No, no, no, it's not begging. It's not even close to begging.

And now to everyone who lives above the ground…

Derek – I think there was something I was supposed to say to you about satin rugs, long drives through eastern Mass., early morning breakfasts, earmuffs, Lindsey Lohan, Another Bad Creation, Peking Garden, barber shops, being my favorite assistant, hair bands, the 1980s and some of the early 1990s, bandanas, pita bread, Boy Meets World and standing me up when I didn't have the strength in my own two legs. I love you.

HAHAHAHA!

Boothie – The Collegian's favorite photographer. If I talked about the two trips to that one city on the other side of the state for a certain sporting event and everything that may or may not have happened before, during and afterward, I might be in jail. So I'll leave that for 40 years from now when we're chillin on the front porch somewhere in some random state with 40s of God only knows what. Hey! What's your favorite planet? Mine's the sun!

Locapo – I still don't know where you came from this semester, but wherever it was, they sure don't know how to

DEAR CLASS OF 2006, UMASS UNDERGRADS, FACULTY, AND STAFF,

On behalf of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, I am proud to present The 2006 Graduation Guide. This year, we've decided to cater to undergraduate UMass students who have questions on how to successfully graduate. Our purpose in producing this Guide is multifaceted: To prepare undergraduate students for activities post-graduation, to celebrate and congratulate the class of 2006, and give The Collegian's senior staff a chance to say a proper goodbye to their years of hard work and dedication at the paper.

This publication truly wouldn't have been possible without the amazing staff I work with. First, a big thank you to Eric Athas, our amazing managing editor, who worked tirelessly in the newsroom to make sure this Guide was nothing but an achievement. He and his talented team of writers have done an amazing job with the content for this piece and I thank both him and his staff immensely. Specifically, I would like to thank The Collegian's board of editors for their dedication to this project: Dan O'Brien in news, Ian Jones in arts, Kristen LaCasse in ed-op, and Jeff Howe in sports. Secondly, I'd like to thank Nick Belanger for dividing his duties between E.I.C.-elect, production manager, and an amazingly talented graphic artist to make every special issue produced this year something The Collegian can be proud of for years to come. Both he and his equally talented assistant Amanda Allen have turned my awkward vision into a work of art and have worked tirelessly in order to do so. In addition, I would like to thank Lauren Egavian and her day graphics staff for their efforts in making the great ads they did, my advertisers will be thrilled with all your hard work. Finally, I would like to extend a big thank you to Marissa Eson and Nicole Puddester, who led the way in sales for this publication. Their effort and determination to meet their goal was not only admirable, but only further showcased their abilities as successful ad reps. I'm so proud to be both their managers.

Advertisers, Collegian staff, students, and faculty — please enjoy The 2006 Graduation Guide. We hope this publication not only assists in helping undergraduates plan for post-grad, but also gives insight into the personalities you can find here in 113 Campus Center basement, where many of us call home.

THANK YOU TO ALL

Tips on

Writing the perfect resume

By IAN JONES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For seniors who are graduating and entering the work force, making a good first impression with future employers should be something that's in the front of your mind right now. Although many people might have compiled resumes at some point during their college careers, it's a good idea to look it over and give it a touchup before sending it out, and for those who haven't ever made one, there's no time like the present.

Although many people might have compiled resumes at some point during their college careers, it's a good idea to look it over and give it a touchup before sending it out, and for those who haven't ever made one, there's no time like the present.

First, remember to limit yourself to one page. Your potential employer is probably reading more resumes than just yours, and even if he or she isn't, more than one page will probably seem obnoxious. After you have years of experience, you may find that you need more than one, but in general it's good to try cropping it if you can. The goal is to be as effective as possible in the one page you have.

Second, make sure you're working with a good format. Your name, address, phone number and e-mail address should all be right up at the top, with your name prominent. Those are really the most important things on there, so make sure it's clear. After that, make a list of your present and past jobs, skills and accomplishments. Try to keep this section as clean as possible — use one or two fonts, and make sure you're consistent with bulleting, italics and bold letters.

Right out of college, unless you have had relevant job experience, it's better to put your education at the top, followed by your job experience. Make sure you list anything that shows commitment, leadership ability and a good work ethic to a future employer, such as long-term and active membership in clubs, leadership positions on and off campus and any volunteer work you have done.

You do not need to list job duties for routine jobs you have had. For instance, if you list "Counter person at Taco Heaven," it's pretty obvious that you took orders, made change and cleaned an occasional table. If, however, there is something that set you apart in that job, such as having always balanced your cash drawer to the penny or having been named Employee of the Month, make sure that goes on your resume.

The tone of your resume is also extremely important, particularly when you are just starting out in the business world. Instead of listing duties performed, make your resume as achievement-oriented as possible.

Only list personal information about yourself if it is relevant to the job or says something about your work ethic. The only exception to this is if you know that the hiring manager has an interest in common with you, in which case that information might be more relevant.

The tone of your resume is also extremely important, particularly when you are just starting out in the business world. Instead of listing duties performed, make your resume as achievement-oriented as possible. For example, instead of saying "developed new filing system," say, "increased efficiency of records filing by 20% by developing new filing system." Sound as enthusiastic and committed to your work as possible. How you describe your work is as important as what you did and might just be the thing that sets you apart.

Speaking of setting yourself apart, do so by making your resume neat, accurate and easy to read. Don't try to make your resume unique by using unusual fonts, humor, cartoons and the like, unless the job for which you are applying would value such gimmicks and you're sure it won't backfire on you. And, unless you're applying for a job as a model, leave your picture off your resume. Your resume should say, "I'm a conscientious, eager hard worker," not "I'll do anything to get attention."

Only list personal information about yourself if it is relevant to the job or says something about your work ethic. If you were on the Olympic crew team or coached a children's soccer team, list it. If you like boats and play soccer in your spare time, don't bother. The only exception to this is if you know that the hiring manager has an interest in common with you, in which case that information might be more relevant.

Finally, proofread, spell-check and proofread again. Your resume must be perfect. It's a reflection of you. Have several people look over it before you send it off to anyone; a few more pairs of eyes looking for mistakes never hurts, and they might catch something you missed that your potential employer would not.

These are just a few tips to help you put together your resume and catch the eye of an employer. No matter how qualified you are, a good resume might be what sets you apart from the competition and gets your foot in the door.

HOW TO:
Write a Resume

When drafting your resume, be sure to keep these tips in mind.

- Fit it all onto one page.
- Be consistant with fonts and bullets.
- Keep it simple. Make it as neat and easy to read as possible.
- List your education first, followed by your job experience.
- Put your contact information at the top, where it's easy to find.
- Don't forget to proofread!

Giving the perfect interview: what you need to know

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Your resumes have been sent, the applications have been filled and you got a callback. So what's the next step for getting that dream job, or at the very least that job that'll pay the bills? A great resume will only get your foot in the door; to get that job, you'll need a great interview as well.

The experts at UMass Career Services agree that preparation is the first step to a successful interview. Before a prospective employee even steps into the interviewer's office, he or she should have thoroughly researched the company and position.

"Research can help you assess the stability of the company, the culture, the potential for growth, benefits, and most importantly, if you might fit in well and flourish there," according to the Career Services Web site.

Most companies have Web pages with information for potential employees. Read through it. If the company to which you are applying manufactures something, research that too. The more information you have about a company, the better the idea you will have about how you might fit in there.

Anther way for an interviewee to be prepared is to get good directions to the company and budget enough time to get there. The last thing any one wants is to be late to make that first impression. Vault.com, a career advice Web site, has conducted several surveys of employers to find the behaviors that win and lose jobs for interviewees. Being more than 10 minutes late was enough for 30 percent of surveyed interviewers to disqualify a candidate.

Dress nicely for your interview, even if the place you are applying to has a casual dress code. Show your potential employer that you know how to handle a professional situation. According to "A Guide to Career Services," a pamphlet available for students from the Career Services office, safe bets for clothing choices include conservative, two-piece suits for men and a knee-length skirt and tailored blouse for women.

The trickiest part of the interview is, of course, answering the questions that you will be asked. However, there are some pretty common questions that most interviewers will ask, such as "What strengths and attributes would you bring to this position?" or "What are your career goals for the future?" Practice your answers to these kinds of questions before the interview. Also, it is important to be completely honest when answering the questions. If you are asked what a weakness of yours is, give a truthful answer and don't try to sugarcoat it or use the old "I'm too much of a perfectionist" answer. Interviewers are not looking for perfection, but for evidence of progress and your ability to work on and handle your own weaknesses.

It is a "missed opportunity to find out information about the company" if you try to play it safe and ask no questions of the interviewer. You are also missing an opportunity to show that you've researched the company and have intelligent and thoughtful questions about your potential responsibilities.

An interviewer may also give you a theoretical situation and ask you how you might handle it. Take your time to think about this question before answering. As "A Guide to Career Services" says, "substance counts more than speed." Interviewers are more concerned with a well thought-out and honest answer than a fast one. Also, it is important when you are answering any questions that you not speak negatively about your former employer or complain about your old job as this paints you as unprofessional.

At some point during the interview, it is very likely that a potential employer will give you the opportunity to ask any questions about the position or the company that you might have. According to Carol Martin, one of Monster.com's career-advice columnists, it is a "missed opportunity to find out information about the company" if you try to play it safe and ask no questions of the interviewer. You are also, she says, missing an opportunity to show that you've researched the company and have intelligent and thoughtful questions about your potential responsibilities.

For those who get a bit tongue-tied at the thought of turning the tables and asking their own questions during an interview, Career Services offers several questions that you might ask an interviewer. Questions like, "What are your expectations for this position...can I expect to be closely supervised, or will you expect me to work independently," and "how would you characterize the management philosophy of this organization?" will all help you to make the decision if the company to which you are applying is really the right place for you.

After your interview is over, it is important to follow it up with a thank you letter to the interviewer. You should send this letter within 24 hours of the interview and use it as a tool to remind the interviewer who you are and why you are qualified for the position. According to "A Guide to Career Services" this letter should be "short, summarizing the most important points made during the interview."

For more information about interviewing and preparing to make that first impression, visit University Career Services and pick up some literature on the subject, or visit Monster.com and Vault.com for several articles advising on different aspects of preparing for an interview and job searches in general.

How To:
Successfully Interview

When preparing for an interview, be sure to keep these tips in mind.

- Research both the company and the position you are applying to.
- Get good driving directions and leave plenty of time to get there.
- Dress to impress.
- Prepare answers to questions you are likely to be asked.
- Take your time answering questions. Think them through.
- Don't be afraid to ask them questions.
- Send your interviewer a thank-you letter within 24 hours.

Lyon Graulty: He likes jazz and coffee!

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

His name is Lyon Graulty, and with a name like that, it's hard to go wrong in any aspect.

There is an almost universal human desire to assimilate to people who will go on to accomplish great things. Take, for instance, Lyon Graulty, a twenty-something Berkshire county native who digs music and cultural anthropology. He is so in-tuned with these aspects of education that he created his own BDIC major with them.

"I love music," he proclaimed in the corner of Rao's café. "It's a love I've had ever since I was a little boy growing up. I find myself, especially in the past couple years, asking how it reaches across borders."

Led Zeppelin, the Grateful Dead, The Doors, along with a substantial jazz assortment riddled his parent's record collection which he found himself digging into at an early age. They brought, for him, a world that was uncharted and magical — a place that was uninhabited in the quiet 1200-person town of Great Barrington.

"In the third grade, I was introduced to the recorder," he giggled, "and from there, it was the clarinet, then guitar."

Music never left his life from then on. He hand hopped all through high school, playing the clarinet and guitar to his delight. Even still, he is in several bands, including The Amnity Front, a five-man collaboration that fuses different styles from jazz to folk to simply jamming.

After high school, Lyon found himself at crossroads, wondering where he should put himself. He wasn't too thrilled with the idea of more school, but also figured it was inevitable to go. So he took a year off. Then, in the spring of 2002, he applied to a couple colleges, two of which were the University of Vermont and the University of Massachusetts. After little deliberation, he decided to jump aboard UMass.

"I plan on continuing to play music and I hope at some point I get to travel a lot. I'd like to go to South America and Europe. Teaching would be fun. But the way I see it, learning is something that just never ends."

In between guitar chords, Lyon works at the People's Market in the Student Union. To him, it's more than just a job - it's an experience with loving and unique individuals.

"I've been there two years, and I can easily say that the people who I work with are the closest to me in my heart. It's a very intimate environment to be apart of."

When the ominous question was asked of what the future holds in store, he simply smiled.

"Um... I'm not quite sure. I don't see graduate school in the near future. I plan on continuing to play music and I hope at some point I get to travel a lot. I'd like to go to South America and Europe. Teaching would be fun. But the way I see it, learning is something that just never ends."

Tips on

Deciphering standardized tests

By Tucker Merrick
Collegian Staff

So you're planning on furthering your education? You want enlightenment, a big house, five cars, you're in charge? If that's the case, then you probably want to think about how exactly you plan to accomplish these goals. If you're thinking about being a doctor, lawyer, or graduate student, this is the column for you. See, there are several obstacles to overcome before you take your studies to the next level, most specifically some pretty hefty standardized tests for each direction — standardized tests that you need to be aware of and ready for.

The first is the MCAT (Medical College Admissions Test) which is for all potential Med-School students. Now as it stands, the MCAT is a total of seven and ½ hours (five and ¼ if excluding proctor procedures). It is offered twice a year, in August and April. It contains four main sections: 1) Physical Sciences 2) Verbal Reasoning 3) Writing Sample 4) Biological Sciences. The two sections dealing with sciences are the first and the last. The former covers Physics and Organic Chemistry, while the latter tests your knowledge in Biology and Organic Chemistry. Both of these sections contain all multiple choice questions with varying prompts (in terms of length and style) One question may have a paragraph preceding it, with several relating questions, or it will just be a short and straightforward Q & A. The second section, Verbal Reasoning, can most closely be compared to the SAT verbal section (no analogies, but readings that ask you to pick out main ideas with multiple choice). The third section is the Writing Sample, where you will be asked to read a brief, broad statement and then reflect on it to your hearts (and word counts) content — but don't write too much.

Of course, some of these established norms of the MCAT will be changing in 2007, when everything goes electronic. Don't get anxious though, this change cannot possibly hurt you. In fact, the new MCATs are shorter. This new computerized form of MCAT will reduce the total test time to around five hours, along with decreasing the multiple choice by 33 percent and taking away one of two essay questions. You will also be able to receive your grades in about two weeks by 2008 (30 days in 2007). Finally, instead of only being able to take the test at two times a year, your will have 20 opportunities throughout the year in which to take the MCAT. This doesn't mean you can mess around 19 times, but it does give you so leeway in planning and preparation.

But what about law school? If you are planning on evaluating the lady with the blindfold and scales for the next four years, then you better prepare yourself for the LSAT (Law School Admissions Test). This test is three and ½ hours, and contains six different sections. Each is 35 min. long, but the interesting part is that only four contribute to your final score. There is one experimental section (for future testing information) that is not graded and a final essay section that is sent to schools for their own personal review. This writing sample always has the same format: two different scenarios are presented and it is your job to argue which is superior. This is used by colleges to make some tough decisions between two equal applicants.

There are several obstacles to overcome before you take your studies to the next level, most specifically some pretty hefty standardized tests for each direction — standardized tests that you need to be aware of and ready for.

Now, the interesting part of this test is it's boasting that it "is unlike any test you've ever taken during your academic career." (kaptest.com) This statement is near to the truth if not exactly right-on. Why? Well you need not remember any facts or math equations, because "the LSAT is designed to test the critical reading and analytical thinking skills that the governing body of law schools deem critical for success in the first year of law school." Since anyone from a pre-law major to English or History can take this test, the questions hold everyone to an equal standard of analysis and comprehension.

On another note, most law schools require that the LSATs be taken in January, nine months before your admittance into law school. Yet it is further recommended that you bring back this date to more than a year before you expect to enter law school, so perhaps one of the semesters of your junior year.

Test dates for 2006-2007 are in October, December, February, and June.

Finally, try to get this test right the first time. Unlike the SATs, colleges have access to all your scores, and can either take the best score, the worst, or average them together.

The final exam discussed here today is the GRE (Graduate Record Examination), for those of you planning on going onto Graduate School. The GREs however are slightly different, and you should look into what exactly you want out of them. See, there are two different types of tests. The first is the "General Test," which most students take. This test is divided up into three sections, Analytical, Verbal, and Quantitative reasoning. Does this seem similar to the SATs? Well that's because it is. Think of all the sections from the SATs, and you will begin to have a general idea of how the GREs work. (Yes, there is a math section that will ask you information up to precalc.)

Now, the second GRE is known as the "Subject Test," something that can most closely be compared with the SAT II Subject Tests. There are eight different tests: Biochemistry, Cell and Molecular Biology, Chemistry, Biology, Computer Science, Literature in English, Mathematics, Psychology, and Physics. While the General Test is given throughout the year, the Subject Test is only given three times a year: November, December, and April.

Most schools will require only the General Test, but other will require the Subject, or both. Look into what graduate school programs you are interested in, and then find out about their requirements.

Well that about wraps it up. Yet don't take this article as comprehensive information, word-count limit only allows for so much. This small commentary cannot possibly answer all the questions you have and will have. Entire books have been written on the subject of these three tests. As such, you may want to look into such companies as Kaplan and Princeton Review to see what kind of help they can offer you, from courses to books. But be warned, this type of help can be expensive, and you will have to decide what kind of studying you want to do. Would it be worth it for you to spend the money on a course? Would that act as a motivator to you to actually study properly? Or are you the type of person who has the discipline to do the studying on their own, just by buying the books? These are some things to think about.

The best advice that we can give you at this time is that if you have not even begun thinking about this upcoming examination (whichever one you choose to do), at least put it in the backburner of your mind. Look online to see what is out there. Go to a site and try doing some problems or take a practice test. Understand the examinations. For MCATs, you won't be asked specific questions from upper-level courses like histology, nor will you be forced to regurgitate specific math knowledge, but you will have to know human physiology. LSATs will rattle your self-confidence in your reading and analytical skills. Confront this fact, and learn how to answer the questions. For GREs you will have to answer math questions, be prepared.

By affiliating yourself with all aspects of whatever test you plan on taking, you will score is guaranteed to improve. If you're scared or apprehensive, don't do nothing. Use these emotions and get started. For more information, go see your major advisor, or visit www.kaptest.com (www.aamc.org is also a helpful site for MCAT, www.lsac.org for LSATS and www.ets.org/gre for GREs). That's where most of the information was found for this write-up. See what the sources have to say, and do it now. Good Luck.

Don't let these exams sneak up on you! Decide what tests you need to take as soon as possible and know when they are available for you to take. This way you will have plenty of time to familiarize yourself with the exam.

Family matters: mother and daughter to graduate together

By Heather DiMaio
Collegian Correspondent

Sunday, May 28th, rain or shine, marks the commencement for University of Massachusetts undergraduate students and will be an exciting and commemorative day for two relatives Deloris King and Shauna-Gaye Bogle, who will graduate from the university not as sisters or cousins, but as mother and daughter.

Shauna-Gaye, 21, is a psychology major who spent her freshman year at Bay Path College before transferring to UMass. Her mother Delores, 41, had already enrolled at UMass in the spring of 2003. King, who participated in the University Without Walls (UWW) at UMass, will be receiving her bachelor's degree this upcoming May in human services. UWW offers adult degree programs at UMass, and gives students the opportunity to earn flexible and individually designed B.A. or B.S. degrees.

King, who has a slight accent as a Jamaica native, recalled, "There were times I thought I wasn't going to make it, being a full-time mom and having to commute back and forth from Springfield." A mother of four, she came to the United States with Shauna-Gaye and her other children in 1986. They settled in New York, where she worked at a law school for eight years and attended classes at a community college. In 1999 she moved to western Massachusetts.

King spent her first three years in Springfield at home caring for her youngest daughter who has a disability. Her daughter's situation sparked her interest in working for the Department of Mental Retardation, where she found employment in 2001. Still working for the department, King said of her observations with those she worked with, "I was amazed." After seeing an advertisement for the program in which she is now enrolled, this amazement and the encouragement from her daughters, motivated her to become a full-time student at UMass at the age of 38.

"There were times I thought I wasn't going to make it, being a full-time mom and having to commute back and forth from Springfield."

Bogle, a daytime student, said, "I hardly ever ran into her because she took night classes." Despite their conflicting schedules, having her mom at school made it a bit easier to commute. "I managed to catch rides from her off and on," Bogle said. King agreed that it was rare to see one another on campus, and the only definite dates they made with one another were their visits to the financial aid office. She said it was humorous to see the confused look on people's faces when they got there because they both have different last names but look strikingly similar. "You look at her and you know she's my daughter," King said.

During one summer semester, King enrolled in an oceanography class. Though the mother and daughter never took any classes together, King laughed and said that Shauna-Gaye thought about taking the oceanography with her. King said that during the course of the semester, another student kept telling her, "You look familiar." King told her she had a daughter who went to UMass and showed the classmate her daughter's picture. King laughed and said that the classmate, who turned out to be friends with Shauna-Gaye, had recognized Delores because of her close resemblance to her daughter.

King described her experience at UMass as being extremely rewarding. "You learn so much from the younger generation." She was also amazed by the technology of this generation, especially the computers. "Coming from the island, we never had that."

King described her experience at UMass as being extremely rewarding. "You learn so much from the younger generation." She was also amazed by the technology of this generation, especially the computers. "Coming from the island, we never had that."

Upon graduating from UMass, Bogle said, "I'm going right back to school." She said she plans on going to graduate school though she is not sure where. She wants to obtain her bachelor's degree in nursing, and is still thinking about what she will do with both degrees. King said she is going to try and get a promotion within the Department of Mental Retardation. She substitute teaches for the Springfield school system on her days off from the department, and said that she may want to become a full-time teacher.

With her 42nd birthday coming this Thursday, and her and her daughter's college graduation in one month, King stressed the importance of her children throughout her journey. "They always motivate me to go on." She offered words of encouragement to prospective college students of all ages, saying, "I would recommend going back to school. Don't look at age, it's only a number."

UMass senior looks back on college career, ahead to future

By Emily Maloney
Collegian Correspondent

This one's for the seniors. Where are you right now as you read this? Riding the bus on your way to campus? Attempting to be stealthy and reading it during a lecture unnoticed? Or is this some leisure reading during your lunch break at the DC? Either way, I know when you are finished reading this and you continue to your next destination this article will be nothing more than a few printed words. But that's okay. My goal is not for you to remember the words. My goal is for you to remember how you felt while you read those words, because I know that how you feel is what you will remember in twenty, thirty or forty years. After reading this article I hope you will have felt happy, nostalgic, accomplished and excited about the future. But most of all, I hope you will feel proud. I know that I am proud of myself, because UMass wasn't easy. I hope you will feel proud of yourself for making it to this point, proud to be part of this University, and proud to be a member of the graduating class of 2006.

I hope you will feel proud of yourself for making it to this point, proud to be part of this University, and proud to be a member of the graduating class of 2006.

Not too long ago we became very familiar with a quote that changed the way we looked at Russell Stover candies. "Life's like a box of chocolates, you never know what you're gonna get." The UMass experience is a lot like a box of chocolates: unpredictable, full of surprise and excitement, occasionally not so tasty. However, each experience leaves us wanting to try another one. We all arrived here feeling differently. Some of us were excited, some nervous and scared. I remember feeling young and clueless. Luckily enough, UMass handed me caramel. I made great friends with whom I shared some memorable, life-changing moments. Together we adopted shower shoes, discovered the glory of Wings at 1 AM and mastered the four-digit phone number. We also understood the hardships of a yellow lot sticker or not having enough quarters to dry your clothes. Some of us started relishing the independence, and looked forward to challenges that began to feel more like adventures. The possibility of what that next candy might hold was just too enticing to give up on the box.

I learned how to study and compete at a college level, and I excelled in classes that I had feared were going to be close to impossible. The sense of achievement I received from that was overwhelming. I gained a confidence I had never known before.

This new confidence allowed me to dive wholeheartedly into all aspects of my new life. I learned the ins and outs of campus that only a UMass graduate will understand. Things like, the miraculous waffle makers in the DC. Or wondering if anyone has actually been blown away when walking by the library on a windy day. We have all experienced the frustrations of SPIRE and learned to make the most of cold winters. There is nothing better than sledding down campus hills on borrowed DC trays. Or who could forget being rescued from that one endless lecture by the Daily Collegian crossword puzzle? We know the gratification of having achieved the perfect schedule, getting an A on a paper it took an all-nighter to write, or catching the bus just before it pulls away on a rainy day.

Every experience, whether it was up or down, was a lesson learned. We've survived finals weeks with the help of the french toast sticks at the midnight breakfasts. We've discovered new passions and built our studies around them. Conversely we may never have known we had a passion for something if UMass had not opened the door for us to discover them.

After four years, the box is almost empty. I am truly grateful that I can say I feel that I made the most of my four short years here. I tried every aspect of college life that interested me, and never gave in to fears of the unknown. College is a time we will never forget, and UMass will always be a part of us as we move forward. So where do we go from here?

"Life is like a box of chocolates. You never know what you're gonna get." All I can say is open that new box and take what we learned from the one we shared here. We are all forever changed after our experiences here, and my greatest wish for you is that UMass left a sweet taste in your mouth.

So as the future lies before you, you may not know what you're gonna get. But whatever may come, use your new found independence, positivism, and courage. I hope that your first taste of the real world is nothing short of delicious.

Writers offer the ins and outs of life after college

By Kristen LaCasse
Collegian Staff

Graduating from college is a big life transition. There are certain things former students should prepare for. All we as students can do is listen to those who have gone before us and try to learn from what they have to say.

I won't pretend to know everything, but I have learned quite a bit during my time at UMass and during the National Writer's Workshop (NWW) sponsored by The Hartford Courant held in April. I have had many experiences, not all of them good, but they all taught me something. Learning from your mistakes and past experiences is a part of growing up.

Apartments

When I got my first apartment I was totally naïve. You don't want to be like I was. If you will be getting an apartment for the first time after you graduate keep a few things in mind. You need more than a bed, a desk and a dresser. It's a lot bigger than a dorm room. Prepare for being totally independent. Kitchen utensils, curtains, a vacuum cleaner and extra furniture are all things you will need, not to mention coming up with first, last and security. Plus, if you have to break the lease they sock you with charges for cleaning, painting and a charge for breaking the lease itself.

Budget accordingly. If you only get paid $700 a month, don't get an apartment that is $650 a month, even if the utilities are included. Factor in groceries, toiletries and whatever else you need to survive, and put money aside for the unexpected, like having to break the lease.

When you start thinking about moving out on your own you need to come up with a backup plan. I thought I would be able to do it, but then the restaurant I worked at closed, and I had to move back home. Don't be in denial that nothing had can happen to you. That's when you are caught the most off-guard. Your car could break down, or you could get sick and have to miss work. It can always happen to you.

Act more responsible

I've heard that a lot of students who graduate have a hard time kicking the habit of drinking all the time. Sure, college consists of a lot of parties, but now you have to really focus. What do you want out of life? Do you want to continue on just getting by, or do you want to compete with the best in your field?

You're a contender and you have to think of yourself as one. I'm not saying you can never drink socially and have a good time, but tone it down a notch. If you have pictures of your drunken escapades on Myspace or Facebook, an employer could easily come across them. It's all about sending the right message and striving for success. You have to set yourself apart from all the other students graduating this year. The best jobs are going to go to the ones who want it the most.

Graduate school

When you graduate it is probably a good idea to set some goals for yourself. Do you want to go to graduate school? Find out when you should apply, what entry exams you have to take and which school you can afford.

When do you want to start a family? This is a big question. If you do want a family someday, you have to figure out if you want your career to work around that. In this day and age more and more women are becoming the breadwinners of the family. You should figure out what's important to you before you make these big decisions.

How will you pay those loans off? Finding a job as soon as possible is important. You can't afford to live on your own without an income, and once you finish school those loans need to start being paid. You don't want interest to accrue.

Entry-level

Even though you have earned a degree you are still at the bottom of the barrel. Don't expect to get the most fabulous, most desirable job right off the bat. You have to work from the bottom up. Don't pass up a job in the field you want to work in just because you don't think it's for you. Making contacts and building relationships with people in that field is half the battle. You can't do that sitting on your couch at home.

Have fun with it

You don't have to be miserable though. Cora Daniels, an award winning journalist and author, who recently spoke at the NWW confessed she comes from a long Daniels line of folks who don't have money in their pockets, and she had some very interesting insight. She said don't be afraid to have fun. Sometimes the easiest way to get a raise is to quit your job and get a new one. There are even classes that teach you how to quit. Mediahistro.com is a good resource to find more information on classes like that.

If you are miserable and think you can do better, use the job you have now on your resume and search for something better. You can't wait for the great jobs to come to you; you have to work for them.

Changing your style as you grow older is an unavoidable part of life. You don't have to dress like your grandparents, but sending the right message every day is important for your career. You can still be stylish, an individual and professional all at the same time.

Dressing for success

Now, we all like to be comfortable, and many people don't like to shop for clothes. Nevertheless, dressing for success is very important. You never know who you will bump into on the street. If you're wearing a cleavage tank top and a mini skirt, or if you're wearing a t-shirt with a beer slogan on it, chances are that won't make the best first impression. Changing your style as you grow older is an unavoidable part of life. You don't have to dress like your grandparents, but sending the right message every day is important for your career. You can still be stylish, an individual and professional all at the same time.

If you are someone who does not enjoy shopping here is a tip for you. Go to only a few stores and instead of looking for individual pieces pick something out you like, and then find pieces that will match it. Stores generally carry lines of clothing that have matching colors so it is easier for you to assemble outfits. They do want you to buy their clothes after all. That way when you try everything on in the dressing room you have a better idea of what it really will look like with things that match. Plus you will have a complete outfit instead of worrying about what will go with what you bought once you get home. Taking this advice will make you look polished and sophisticated without even having to say a word. It's worth a try right?

Prepare for being totally independent. Kitchen utensils, curtains, a vacuum cleaner and extra furniture are all things you will need, not to mention coming up with first, last and security.

Presenting yourself on paper

Most of us, regardless of our field of interest, will have to write something sooner or later. That's why we do so many writing assignments in college and high school.

A lot of students fight an on-going battle with procrastination. While I was at the NWW I learned a very valuable thing. Roy Peter Clark, the vice president and senior scholar at the Poynter Institute, said something I will never forget: "Turn procrastination into rehearsal."

Clark said when you look like you're not writing you may actually be preparing to write. Turn that negative feeling of procrastination into a positive feeling. Think of what to write in your head and how you will structure it. Think of a beginning, middle and end, and when you sit down to write you will have a much easier time.

Will Sutton, an editor and writer for nearly 30 years, said to just start writing. He believes there is no such thing as writer's block unless you block yourself. Your hands still work. "Just write what you had for breakfast and read it out loud." You can always cut it out later, but it will help you get started.

He also emphasized that we all want to be that fine craftsman who is always the one called upon. There are no shortcuts in life. He told this story: a master craftsman-builder was asked by his boss to build one more house before the craftsman could retire. He went against all his high standards and cut corners just to get done faster. When he was done the house was standing, but it was nowhere near the usual high quality of his work. His boss then surprised him and handed him a set of keys and said welcome to your new house. The moral? Doing your absolute best will always pay off.

If you have pictures of your drunken escapades on Myspace or Facebook, an employer could easily come across them. It's all about sending the right message and striving for success. You have to set yourself apart from all the other students graduating this year.

Nuala O'Faolain, a columnist for The Irish Times in Dublin and an internationally successful author, had this to say at the NWW. "The runners in the Olympics aren't waiting for inspiration, they've trained, you have to work."

As you venture off into the world, take the experiences you've had at UMass with you and learn from them what you can. You're about to learn a lot more just by trying new things and taking risks. Always trust yourself and your instincts and you'll be just fine.

UM professors give advice to class of '06

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The real world can be a scary thing. Paying bills will put a dent in the wallet. Getting a job could be difficult, and all of the sudden responsibility is thrown on your shoulders.

For us college students, having a summer job or working part-time during the school year is probably the most we've done to pay our own way. Some of you out there are financially independent already, and are already used to the concept of Easy-Mac, Ramen and instant oatmeal comprising your three meals of the day.

But for those of us who haven't been exposed to the unmerciful world of responsibility, life after college — where not showing up can get you more than just an unexcused absence — is an intimidating thought.

For this piece, the Collegian interviewed some people who have already been there.

Christopher Sullivan, a teacher of the "Islam and the Crusades" class, is especially lenient towards students who have to work during school to get spending money. If a paper is turned in late, so be it, as long as you are working hard outside of the classroom.

"The thing that most professors don't understand is that kids have an entire life outside of the classroom that we don't see," Sullivan said. "It would be naïve to assume that the classroom is the center of the world for these kids. We don't have a lot of trust-fund babies at UMass, so I try to be flexible with kids who work 40 hours a week."

"Being reliable is half of the battle. If they know that you are reliable it doesn't really matter if you are good or great at your job. Just being reliable will get you a long way."

Any advice for the students on their way out?

"It's just about working hard," he said. "You could be the smartest kid in the world, but if you don't put the effort into it, you aren't going to get anywhere."

Stephen Pelz, another history professor who teaches a "US and the Cold War" class, claimed that being shy is next to stupid.

"The main thing is, you can't be afraid to promote yourself," Pelz said. "Don't be shy about telling everyone that you're the right person for the job. Otherwise, you'll come off as passive and another person will come off as ambitious and they'll get the job.

"You have to be available and reliable," he continued. "Make sure that you are there when [your employer] asks you to do something. Being reliable is half of the battle. If they know that you are reliable it doesn't really matter if you are good or great at your job. Just being reliable will get you a long way."

Be reliable and work hard — two things that don't take much talent or natural ability. According to these two individuals — professors at a major university — doing what you want to do doesn't take extraordinary talent or smarts. You just need to crank those sleeves up and put yourself out there.

Can't be too hard, right?

Company counsels new graduates on the job search

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

A recent poll involving numerous human resource executives said that about 85 percent of job applicants were poorly prepared for the job search process.

One human resource expert recently said, "95 percent of resumes never get looked at, and those that are reviewed are given less than 20 seconds of scrutiny by any individual screener."

And despite a recent increase in United States employment numbers, facts surrounding the entry-level job market are sobering.

According to a 2004 National Association of Colleges and Employers (NACE) annual survey, 1.4 million students graduate from United States colleges and universities on an annual basis, a number that has increased 12 percent in the last 2 years.

Where the problem lies for graduating students, however, is in the fact that the entry-level job market remains 23 percent below 2000 levels.

Those are scary statistics for tens of thousands of prospective job seekers and interviewees that graduate very year.

But statistics aside, students may find solace in the creation of a new company.

The Boston-based group Hayden-Wilder is a new counseling resource designed to support college graduates as they embark on their first job searches. The company, founded in 2005, was developed in response to the growing need to better prepare college graduates for the job search process.

The Boston-based group Hayden-Wilder is a new counseling resource designed to support college graduates as they embark on their first job searches. The company, founded in 2005, was developed in response to the growing need to better prepare college graduates for the job search process.

The course provides each of its clients with a 12-hour, eight-session curriculum. All sessions are conducted strictly on a one-on-one basis and taught by company founders DA Hayden and Michael Wilder. There is also approximately three hours of independent study required in preparation for each 90-minute session.

Hayden and Wilder are experts who have spent their careers in the marketing communications business. Through the years, they have interviewed thousands of entry-level candidates.

That experience has produced a number of fundamental observations, one of those being the importance of the interviewee putting the spotlight on himself or herself while walking the line between arrogance and confidence.

"Many people graduate and don't know what to say," said Hayden. "Our society hasn't been trained to talk about ourselves. We teach students how to do that in a new way and shape."

Hayden-Wilder believes every job search is fundamentally a marketing campaign, requiring a strong brand concept, strategy, implementation plan and measurement of effectiveness.

Hayden contends the concept that a job search is really a personal marketing campaign is an eye-opener, and the college student who has developed his or her own personal brand is as rare as an interesting, exciting, and high-paying first job.

Hayden-Wilder's proprietary process, "Candidate Illumination," provides a customized curriculum of one-on-one counseling on every aspect of the job search process. Each Hayden-Wilder client participates in a 12-hour, eight-session curriculum. Approximately three hours of independent study are required following each 90-minute session.

"Videotaped interviews and feedback are important components of the curriculum," said Hayden.

The Hayden-Wilder training has been likened to a college course, but while the content is so important, this is one course not offered by colleges or universities.

"Interviewers aren't going to tell you what you're doing wrong, so it's easy for interviewees to continue making the same mistakes over and over again. The videotape process allows us to fix those mistakes."

Hayden said it was important to conduct extensive research on the company you're interviewing for.

"Looking at the company Web site doesn't cut it," said Hayden.

Hayden added that being able to express verbally what you want to do and why you want to work at the company is vital.

"You have to go beyond saying 'I'm looking for a job,'" said Hayden. "That's not enough."

Hayden and Wilder both agreed that resume writing needs to be improved nationwide.

"So many students graduate with deplorable writing skills," said Hayden. "And it shows in their resumes."

"Hence the common lament, 'I can't understand it. I sent out over 200 resumes and haven't received any response,'" said Wilder.

Hayden understands that students can find tips and pointers online, but that without practice, it's unlikely that students will be able to implement their new knowledge correctly.

"You might read online that it's important to maintain eye contact with the interviewer while speaking, but without practice you may struggle to keep eye contact and make sense while talking at the same time," said Hayden.

"Parents spend thousands of dollars on consultants for college entrance, tutoring and other skill-enhancing services in an effort to increase the chances of getting their children into the best colleges possible. They then invest hundreds of thousands of dollars in the education itself," said Hayden. "Yet when it comes to finding a job after college, young adults are left on their own. Hayden-Wilder was established to provide these graduates with a place to turn for guidance and support."

Of one Hayden-Wilder's current clients, Ana Dabrowski from Plymouth, Mass., said that the sessions have helped her enormously in preparing her for the interview process.

"Over Christmas break, I remember talking to my parents saying that I wished my school had a course that I could take about getting your feet wet and going out into the world," said Dabrowski. "A week later, my mother read an article on Hayden-Wilder and I signed up."

"Over Christmas break, I remember talking to my parents saying that I wished my school had a course that I could take about getting your feet wet and going out into the world. A week later, my mother read an article on Hayden-Wilder and I signed up."

Dabrowski, who's in the final stages of the program, said that the instructors' constructive criticism after the frequent videotape sessions was extremely helpful.

"I have a tendency to talk fast, and the videotapes showed that and it's been fixed," said Dabrowski.

Dabrowski said the program has showed her how to "go the extra mile" in her upcoming interviews.

"The program is intense, it goes beyond one-on-one, it's two-on-one," said Dabrowski. "You learn how to control the interview."

Dabrowski learned that it was important to do extensive research on the company she was interviewing for.

"I'm looking to interview at Arnolds Communications in Boston. One of their clients is Ocean Spray," said Dabrowski. "They have a tour in Plymouth; I took it and learned more on how the company is run. That's something I could talk about during the interview rather then just saying, 'I went to your Web site.'

"I definitely gained more confidence. I'm able to think of myself as a brand," said Dabrowski. "If you can afford it, do it. It gives you an edge on everyone else."

Commencement '06: where, when and more

By Meaghann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

Rain or shine, the 2006 undergraduate commencement will take place on Sunday, May 28 at 10:00 a.m. at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. Graduates should arrive at Yellow Lot 11, north of the Stadium, carrying their caps and gowns, no later than 9:00 a.m.

Posted signs will guide students to the areas of their respective school or college. Commencement marshals will line up students for the procession, and then escort them onto the field. If students have not picked up their caps and gowns by that time, they can obtain them in Yellow Lot 11 after 8:30 a.m.

However, students are strongly advised to pick up their caps, gowns, and tassels – already paid for by the student's Graduating Fees – at the Textbook Annex beginning on May 8th. The hours for pick-up are Monday through Friday, between 9 a.m. and 4 p.m. until May 26. Students will need to present their UMass ID card to confirm eligibility.

Anyone may attend the graduation ceremony and seating is unreserved. No advanced registration is required. However, since major campus construction will affect both traffic flow and parking, any guests should plan on arriving early, at about 9 a.m., to minimize transportation and parking stress before the commencement begins. Police will direct guests to parking lots based on their arrival time and entry point.

The fastest and most convenient mode of transportation on commencement day will be the shuttle buses, since traffic on campus and the surrounding area will be heavy. The shuttle bus service will operate between parking lots and the stadium throughout the day, beginning at 8 a.m., so commencement guests will have transportation back to their vehicles after the ceremony. Due to a high capacity of visitors on that day, guests should allow themselves at least 40 minutes after parking to be bussed to the stadium.

Alcohol is not allowed at the stadium, according to University regulations, but guests can count on coffee, bottled water, juices, breakfast pastries, and other snacks to be on sale inside and outside the stadium, as well as fresh-cut roses, flower bouquets, and balloons.

At 9:15 a.m. degree candidates will assemble by their school or college, at which time they will put on their robes and receive processional instructions from marshals.

At 9:40 a.m. there will be photos taken of individual graduates in the processional, until the ceremony begins, at 10:00 a.m. Proofs of commencement photographs will be mailed to graduates along with order forms and information for those wishing to purchase prints.

The ceremony should run for two hours and conclude at about noon. Commencement at UMass Amherst traditionally ends with the singing of the Alma Mater, "Twilight Shadows."

After the ceremony, a Chancellor's reception for graduates and guests will be held at the Reception Tent at McGuirk Alumni Stadium, where punch and cookies will be served. Chancellor Lombardi will greet graduates and pose for family photos.

Graduates should note that there is no pre-commencement rehearsal for students. Instead they will receive a handout containing important information about the assembly area, gate assignments, seating locations, and related matters when they pick up their caps and gowns at the UMass Textbook Annex.

To ensure the delivery of diplomas, all graduates should check SPIRE to make sure that their permanent mailing address is recorded correctly. Diplomas are usually mailed by the end of the summer. If students have questions regarding diplomas, they can get more information at the UMass Registrar's Office at 207 Whitmore, (413) 545-0855. For additional information on the days surrounding the graduation ceremony, students can visit www.umass.edu/commencement.

Fox gears up for May's Commencement

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Correspondent

This spring approximately 4,000 students will graduate from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Roughly 22,000 guests are expected to attend the event at McGuirk Stadium. Many students however, whether unmotivated to show up or disappointed with the lack of intimacy at UMass graduations, have claimed that they will not be present at the 136th commencement ceremony.

Commencement director Gloria Fox has been working hard since 1999 to create a celebration that students won't forget.

"Commencement is the culmination of a student's education," said Fox. "This is a time not only for them to celebrate but also their parents and families. This is a milestone."

"Commencement is the culmination of a student's education. This is a time not only for them to celebrate but also their parents and families. This is a milestone."

Inside her office in Whitmore, Fox has been running around for the last few days trying to finalize the commencement program. The planning process usually begins in October.

"We work until our hair turns gray leading up to the ceremony," said Fox. But, there is no greater thrill.

Since 2003, Commencement has included the 21st Century Leader Awards. Students can be nominated by anyone, even employers. Nominees are evaluated based on their academic performance, community service, achievements, and anything else that sets them apart from other students.

"We always look for those students that have gone the extra mile," said Fox. "Sometimes this could mean that they have overcome challenging life obstacles." This year 15 students will be recognized as 21st Century Leaders. They were selected from 70 nominations.

The 21st Century Leader's Program was created in part to put the focus back on students.

"There was a time when there was more focus on the people sitting on the stage than on the students," said Fox. In the past, speeches were given by the honorary degree recipients. They have now been replaced by student speakers.

During the main ceremony degrees are conferred en masse to the students by school.

"The schools by themselves are very small groups compared to the rest of the university," said Fox. "At Commencement students are able to realize the power of the network they have become a part of."

Following Commencement a reception with Chancellor John V. Lombardi will take place in a monster-sized tent outside the stadium. For several hours Lombardi will be available to talk with students, parents, and families.

"He tells me that it his favorite day of the academic year," said Fox.

On May 26, the Friday before undergraduate commencement, the Student Alumni Association will be hosting the 10th annual Commencement Ball. Taking place right after finals but before graduation, this is a perfect opportunity for students to celebrate with their friends.

The ball will take place in an extravagantly decorated Student Union. The theme this year is called "Rendevezous Around the World."

"The ballroom will resemble a Paris cityscape," said Melanie Corbeil, Associate Director for Student and Alumni Programs. "Outside we are trying to create a Central Park theme."

Festivities begin at 9:00 p.m. and end at 1:00 a.m. Desserts and appetizers will be served throughout the evening. There will also be a cash bar and a DJ.

"In the past we had a chocolate fountain," said Corbeil. "This year we may have a cupcake tree."

For $10 students can take a ride around the campus pond in a horse-drawn carriage. The program has been run in partnership with the Fuller's Horse Farm of Westhampton for the last five years.

"We have had a few people get proposed to," said Corbeil.

Tickets are $20 and are available online or at the Student Alumni Association office. Last year's attendance exceeded 550 people. Anyone can be invited as the ball is not limited to seniors.

"After spending four or five years in school this is a great tradition to be part of," said Corbeil. "We want students to be able to celebrate their accomplishments and leave here with a good feeling about the university."

Viggiano seeks to extend his athletic career

By Dan Dougan
Collegian Staff

Like most graduating seniors, Jeff Viggiano is in no rush to begin the grind of 40-hour work weeks sitting behind a desk. But unlike most of his classmates, Viggiano is 6-foot-6 with a jump shot, giving him a few more options.

Viggiano, who finished a stellar four-year career on the hardwood for UMass in March, won't be hanging up his basketball sneakers just yet, as he is planning on pursuing a professional playing career overseas.

The decision to try to make a career out of something that has been just a game for the past 21 years has made these last few months unusual for Viggiano. While his peers have been frantically getting resumes and cover letters together and trying to figure out a way to avoid moving back home, Viggiano has been searching for an agent and preparing for a move that will take him across the Atlantic.

Picking the right agent is a huge decision for any professional athlete, but more so for international players, as they must find someone who is adept at handling contracts in an environment where the rules are less stable than in the United States.

"The most important step is signing with a good agent," Viggiano says. "There are a lot of opportunities to play overseas, but there are also a lot of things that can go wrong. The rules and contracts for paying players aren't as strict as the NBA, so signing with an agent is very important."

Viggiano has narrowed his search to two agents and expects to make his decision in the near future. He compares the selection process to the experience of getting recruited to college — both are times that potential suitors tell players what they want to hear — and he feels that it's most important to go with his gut instinct on whom to choose.

Viggiano says he feels comfortable with each of his potential agents, but says a lot goes into the decision.

"There's two ways to go with agents," he says. "You can get one who represents a lot of players over there, but you might not get as much attention. Or you can get one with fewer players, so you'll get a lot of attention, but then they might not have the same experience."

Once Viggiano picks an agent, the next major decision will be where he chooses to take his game. He has narrowed his options to either Italy or Spain, but where he ends up will be based heavily on the connections that his chosen agent has with organizations in those countries.

Playing in Italy could prove to be the most profitable for Viggiano — who is of Italian descent — if he is able to obtain dual citizenship. Though he has to go back a ways on the family tree to find ancestors who were born in Italy, Viggiano believes that once he fills out the proper paperwork he should be granted Italian citizenship.

Such a move would give Viggiano a considerable advantage over fellow American prospects, as the Italian leagues have maximums on the number of Americans allowed on a roster and also require a minimum number of Italian players on each team.

"Getting dual citizenship is key," Viggiano says. "You get paid more and are more valuable as an Italian citizen [because of the cap on American players]. It would be easier if my parents were born there, but I think my great-great grandparents were born there, so I should be able to get it. It'll just be a lot more paperwork."

If Viggiano is able to attain dual citizenship, there is still the question of which league he will play in. The pay scale in professional basketball overseas is based on the prominence of the league, and each country has multiple divisions.

In Italy there are essentially two professional leagues, although there are several semi-pro leagues as well. The main league, Serie A, is made up of 18 teams, and features the best arenas and organizations with larger budgets. The second-tier league, Lega 2, has fewer teams and does not pay as well.

Viggiano, who obviously would like to play in the upper-level league, says salaries can range from $50,000 up to $500,000 a year. With figures like that potentially in reach, Viggiano has come to realize the business aspect of the game.

"It's weird getting into the business side of it," he says. "I've played my whole life for fun. It's crazy to think I could make that much money playing basketball."

After Viggiano selects an agent, he will put his skills on display in an attempt to attract potential teams. There is a showcase tournament in Italy in July, as well as numerous summer leagues, but Viggiano will leave the decision of what he will participate in to his agent.

While Viggiano doesn't know where he'll play this summer, it's not as if he's waiting around until then. Since the UMass season ended Viggiano has been playing pick-up games with his teammates and working on improving his game to get ready for play at the next level, including a change in position from being a small forward/power forward combo to strictly a wing player.

"I've heard that if you can shoot over there you can have a long career," Viggiano says. "Shooting has been a problem for me, so I've been working on my 3-point shooting. I also need to work on my ball handling because I'll be more of a three over there instead of being a three four like I was here."

Viggiano has also been working with a trainer to get stronger in order to prepare for a season almost as long as the NBA's and opponents who are much more physically mature than most college foes.

"The biggest thing is that it'll be much more physical," Viggiano says. "I'm just trying to stay in the best shape I can. I'm only 21 years old and I'll be playing against 34- and 35-year-old guys, so it'll be different playing against men that are playing for their livelihood."

The thought of continuing his playing career after graduation didn't occur to Viggiano until midway through his senior year, when he began hearing from some of his former coaches that agents wanted to talk to him after the season ended.

Viggiano has looked to John Leonard, a former UMass assistant under Steve Lappas, and his former AAU coach Kevin Kehoe for advice. It has helped Viggiano to have two former coaches with knowledge about pro basketball in Europe to turn to for guidance at a time when a lot of information is being thrown his way.

"It's tough because everything has happened very fast," Viggiano says. "The NCAA has rules against talking to agents during the season, so now I've been getting a lot of phone calls and e-mails. It's helped because Coach Kehoe and Coach Leonard knew a lot about it."

The thought of an impending pro career has made it difficult for Viggiano to focus on his final semester of college, although he has benefited from having a Matt Leinartesque workload.

"School is important to me, but I only have two classes this semester," Viggiano says. "A lot of the time I'll be sitting there just thinking about getting out on the court to work on my game."

Playing professionally has been a dream for Viggiano since the first day he picked up a basketball, and he isn't taking it for granted. He understands the special opportunity he has to make a great deal of money playing a game and he hopes to make the experience last as long as possible.

"I know that anyone would like to have this opportunity," Viggiano says. "I don't know what to expect; it could be one, two or three years, or it could be a 10-year career. I'm just trying to delay the real world as long as possible. This is a lifelong dream, and it's crazy to think that it's actually going to happen."

EDITOR IN CHIEF

MOST LIKELY TO SUCCEED

When I was younger I had a crust prejudice. Peanut butter and jelly, grilled cheese, pizza, if it had a crust, I didn't want any part of it. There was no reason for it besides my fear of the unknown.

As I got a little older, a little bolder in my reasoning, I began to see the people I loved and respected eating their crust. And on one special day, the thought occurred to me — "Maybe crust isn't all that bad."

I remember the first bite I ever took. I think I actually shook a little. In my head I pictured it tasting awful, like dirt. I forced myself to face these fears, and as I finally sank my teeth into my crusted fluffernutter, an epiphany. Rapture, a whole new world of sandwich. I suddenly realized just how silly my fear of crust was.

While my days of crust discrimination and fluffernutters are gone, that feeling of the first bite is something that I revisit each day. Four years ago when I thought about the prospects that college presented, I admit, I was scared. It was a new world that included my first taste of independence, but yet the pressure to succeed, autonomy, but also the freedom to mess up my own life. I was forced to think about the fact that I soon would be spending far more money on textbooks than on movies and pizza with friends, and mom wasn't going to be doing my laundry anymore. It was the grades and the homesickness. It was leaving the safety of high school and moving on. It was stepping out of my comfort zone.

However, I looked to the family and friends who had faced the same challenges that I did. Each of them grew from their experiences. They were richer and stronger people for facing, head on, the fear of the indefinite.

I can't say that every day I have spent in college has been an easy one, especially not during my time at the Collegian. I have vivid memories of all-nighters and late-night breakdowns. But for as many difficult nights that we spent hard at work in our dusty basement offices, there were as many sunny mornings that I found solace in seeing students enjoy something that we had created as a team.

People often fail to realize the amount of hard work put in by my fellow insomniacs, with the bold hopes that we may provide students with a service. I am proud to say that the great many students that I have had the pleasure to work with in my time at the Collegian have not only succeeded at providing a service, they have provided one of the best services a student-run group can.

A free and honest independent press is something UMass students should hold in high regard. A dwindling number of universities have an open forum to voice opinions, ideas, controversial topics, and the day-to-day news without fear of repercussions from the University. Since the 1890 release of the Collegian's first issue as "Aggie Life," students have been working toward this goal. We are underpaid, overworked, high-strung, and pale because we rarely see the sun. It is not a simple path we take as students, but each of us has thicker skin for taking it.

As editor of the Collegian, the most difficult aspect of my job has also been the part I have loved most about this university.

There is a palpable fervor that is strong in our student body. In my years here I have seen more protests and rallies than most people will see in a lifetime. Students here are courageous, outspoken and bold. We have a respect for diversity and the human spirit. Keep this passion at your heart, it will guide you to greater things.

It would be unfair for any graduating U Mass student to stop here. As you leave this beautiful campus, some of you for the last time, you will begin a true adulthood. Capitalize on your success thus far. The greatest challenge we will face for the rest of our lives is mediocrity.

An idol of mine, and probably many of yours, once said, "If you want to view paradise, simply look around and view it." Anything you want to, do it. Want to change the world, there's nothing to it."

Willy Wonka was right. Your destiny will be what you make of it. You are all graduates of UMass, may you have pride in your accomplishments, but let this not be your last. Congratulations, and good luck.

Some things I should have said to people along the way:

Dan — The news finds you. You were a great news editor, and a better friend. I can't wait to read your byline somewhere great. PS. Crow man is watching.

paper and I needed you most. You're the future of this great publication, and I am confident you will see that it is bright. And you're right, "we aren't proper."

Nick – I had you pegged long before we gave you the job. If you work hard and with conscience, the fires will put themselves out. You have a great staff, and many good issues to look forward to. Lead through example, and remember that in the end, we are all college students trying to get an experience that isn't found in the classroom. PS: Yale sucks! We know it, they know it, and Turley knows it.

Kerry - Ups and downs, through it all you did a good job. Good luck on the West Coast.

Megan – Who am I going to have copy edit my work from now on? Better yet, who will listen to me bitch about my life during the middle of the day? You have been a great friend in good and bad.

Katie – It was my pleasure pissing you off this semester Husston. You took it like a champ, though. When you return from your journey to South Africa, we must catch an Ellis Paul concert together, or at least get some risotto cakes at the Faculty Club.

Sheryl – The first of my night copy supervisors to leave me for Cape Town. You would be proud to know that I kept my green men all year. You were missed second semester. The Collegian is lucky to be getting such a great personality back next year.

Jeff – Somewhere along the way things got lost. You should, however, know that I never stopped respecting you and the work you do. You are and have always been an asset to this team. You are going to be one of the best sports writers in New England, and we all know this is the home of the true sports writing legends.

Ian – You have been the greatest source of tranquility in this ulcer-filled newsroom. I have always been able to count on you, even if it was to destroy the new managing editors desk. Have fun being anthropological, and if I am ever in LA, you must give me the real tour.

Lauren – "Does Lauren Igavian have to smack a bitch?" I don't know what I am going to do without your booty drops and background Sade. You have seen me ready to crack with stress and laughter, and you have always been a friend. Thank you for everything you have done to keep me together.

Mel – My only boss this year, you make working fun. I remember seeing you on the PVTA this winter when I was all stressed out, and with one conversation you calmed things down. I'm going to miss having you around every Sunday.

Amanda – Virgos rock! I am going to miss scaring the hell out of you. Make sure you keep up the good work next year, but please respect the no boy band rule in graphics.

Erika – Our debates rivaled Kennedy Nixon. You handled last year with grace and true friendship. I think you are the only person I know that wants and loves journalism more than I do. The Collegian owes you a great deal of thanks for four years of dedication. I know our paths will cross in the future, I hope again on the same team.

Marty & Linda – Collegian moms, we wouldn't work without you. While the Collegian is student-run, what many people don't realize is that it is all done with the guidance of two amazing adults. Whether I was busy trying to get loans, hold rallies or talk to CNN, you both were there for me every step of the way. You are the true key to the Collegian's past, and the success of its future. Thank you for all that you do.

Belliveau – Statutory, I think a kid got hit by a car in front of the Homer Simpson frat. And, yes, she is wicked hardcore. You have a good eye for news, even if it is about the SGA. You are going to be wicked good next year, no doubt. Stay away from the dance floor at the Palace though, I heard Saugus is dangerous.

To all the other Collegianites, thank you for letting me into your world a little this year. This was a difficult year for the Collegian, but because of you all it was not that difficult for me. I could not have asked for a better staff, and the day I walk out of the Collegian for the last time will be a truly sad one.

Some non-Collegian people who need a mention

Chris – My favorite assistant arts editor. I don't know what college would have been without you. This would be a long column if I thanked you for all you have done for me. There are a lot of things that have to be said about our time in college, including the breakfast after that first all-nighter, Mufino's, Roseanne, Pita Pizzle, 7th floor campus center, Beauty Shop, campus pond, Lord Byron McFisherson, the red and tan shag carpet, Naturi, Ray, Gardner Jade, Francine, Gardner, Baldwinville, and Cape Cod, tea lights, 70s and 80s, babysito, coffee with Jan before the Peace Corps stole her, Bev, Beverage, Non-Alcoholic Beverage, Chicken fingers at the Sub, long drives through Greenfield, cold ears, the fan, Liana and Laura, lillies, my coupons, Kinetics, Euro-Futon, Ridonkulous, Kanye, Rufus, Billy, BBC, Carmelina's, Britney, fish don't fry in the kitchen, gravy and rice, and the talk in Durfee Garden. You are a gigantic part of my world, and I look forward to our future. Thank you for staying, listening and understanding, even when it wasn't easy. Thank for propping me up during my saddest times when I had nothing to lean on. I would not have made it through college if it weren't for you. I love you.

Olivia – You're my best friend, and my favorite coffee buddy. You have been there for me every step of the way since we worked at Scoops together. My high school, college, and life wouldn't be the same without you, but "is he the Dean of something or does she not realize that is his name?" In the future, have fun at your town meetings, and try not to burn anymore eyebrows off, you big EZ-ass. Even though I am going to still see you all the time, I still will always think about your George Clooney report and whispering about whispering. I love you like my sister and can't wait to have more great times for the rest of our lives.

Mac Mac – Mrs. Tierney loves you because you are my lova... juice me. Some of the happest moments of my life have been spent with you. Key memories during college – Thirsty turtle, dancing under the influence with Chris in my room during the credits of "Unzipped," Boston on your birthday, cups of coffee at Amherst Coffee/Bluewall/Dunkin's/Rao's, and much much more. It didn't begin there though. I will always cherish escapades in sexy Glenice's class, or peeling into awards night, or like I mentioned to an earlier friend, whispering about whispering. You too are a sister from another Mister.

Finally, something must be said about the power of a strong family. Mom and Dad, it is your hard work and passion for life and family that have taught me all that I know. No matter how difficult things got for me during college, I always had you. It has been this way my entire life.

I could write volumes about what you have taught me about work ethic, love, family, friendship, or life, but it would still be difficult to put into words what you have accomplished as parents. I'm sure there have been many times that I have disappointed you, but if so, you have never let me know. I thank you first for giving me life, but I thank you more for teaching me how to live. I love you.

Cameron, you are going to read this someday and I hope you will truly understand how in seven years of life you have showed me so much. Our 14-year age difference is unusual, but it has given us the chance to have a relationship that most brothers will never have. You have the biggest heart I have ever seen in such a small package. You are intelligent, honest, sincere, and most of all loving. Every time I have been asked what the greatest day of my life has been I have not hesitated to answer the day you were born. I am proud to be your brother. I love you.

JEFF HOWE
SPORTS EDITOR

NEWSROOM'S LIFE OF THE OFFICE AND THE DEPARTMENT COMEDIAN.

I don't know how I got here. I don't know how four long years turned into five short ones. I don't know how a business major at UNH became the Sports Editor at UMass.

But it's probably better that way. No one goes into college thinking they're about to embark on a three-school tour in which the shape of their entire life will drastically change in so many different ways.

Walking into my dorm room at Stoke Hall the first day of my freshman year, I was an angry Boston sports fan. Three Super Bowls and a World Series later, I'm now a cocky, angry Boston sports fan. Those of you who follow me know the difference.

It's that unpredictability that kept me on my toes, though. Who wants to live their life following an outline? That's my silver lining, anyway.

But it's all been worth it. I wouldn't be where I am right now if I continued with a more conventional path. I needed that experience at UNH and those teachers at Middlesex, and it all culminated perfectly here at UMass over the last five semesters.

I know I'll move into the working world with a better stance because of everything that's been thrown my way.

I've always said that no one deserves to graduate from college more than I do. I completely understand why kids leave school early to play sports in the pros. Taking classes sucks. I loved having to fulfill all of these random requirements for the sake of earning a magical piece of paper that's supposed to be my ticket into a heralded job market and its unlimited amount of options.

I can't wait to write an article in Spanish somewhere down the road in my career. My newfound knowledge of natural disasters will definitely help me out at some point. And you better believe I can take a multiple choice test with the best of them. A and C but not B, D or F, except when D happens in place of C? Cake.

My real learning happened right here on this page five days a week for the last two years. This is the place that taught me everything I know about writing, covering a team, staying awake for 75 straight hours, driving all over the country and everything else that doing the greatest job in the world entails.

Honestly, someone upstairs must like me. I can't believe I get paid to write about sports. The fact that someone respects my opinion enough to allow me to do my best to entertain sports fans around the country is a pretty cool realization. I'm living the dream.

A business major, Jeff? What were you thinking?

I've really turned into a big believer of that corny "everything happens for a reason" philosophy. I'm learning from it all, taking everything in and using it every day. If I didn't pay an unexpected visit to UNH six years ago, I don't know if these words ever would have existed.

Maybe it was inevitable, though. Maybe I would have ended up at UMass either way.

But maybe not. If I went to Bentley, would I have graduated last year? Would I be making a ton of money crunching numbers in my cubicle from 9 to 5 every day of the week right now? And if I were, would I know that I passed up the greatest job ever?

It's scary to think about the things that might have been, but I'm always looking forward at what's to come. I've put myself in good position to take an amazing ride, and I can't argue with that.

After being told I wasn't good enough to succeed in college, the fact that I'm about to graduate feels pretty damn gratifying.

So I guess these are just about the last words I have with the Collegian. There's no real way I can write anything that could describe just how valuable this place was to me, and it would take an infinite amount of words for me to even begin to try.

The show is over. Turn out the lights.

OLD RELIABLE, AND THE COLLEGIAN 'TICKING TIME BOMB.'

After four years of partying with some studying mixed in between, and two years working as an editor at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, I can proudly say that I have escaped the curse that plagues room 113 in the Campus Center. And it's been an eventful ride.

It all started when I first got to the University of Massachusetts and made my biggest mistake of the next four years: my decision to become a journalist. I could have continued with my academic experience of doing nothing but partying, but around April 2003 I decided to get crackin, and start writing for the Collegian.

I am not a very superstitious person, but I am 100 percent positive that there is a curse over the Collegian offices. Once you're in, you're in until you graduate. It's not as bad as being appointed to the Supreme Court, but in UMass years, it's about the same.

My first true role at the Collegian was reporting on the Faculty Senate meetings during the spring 2004 semester. Despite the fact that the meetings were very monotonous, one thing led to another and I was suddenly named assistant news editor for New England's largest college newspaper in May 2004. I can't remember if I was happy to have just made such an accomplishment when I got the call, or if I was ecstatic about not having to scrub pans at Bertucci's anymore. But either way, it was one of those.

Sadly, my life would largely revolve around the Collegian for the next two years. I was cursed. On the good side, I gained much practical experience and met some amazing people who I hope to stay in touch with as the years pass.

These people, whom I often found myself living with in a rat hole in the basement of the Campus Center, and I have shared some memorable experiences, to say the least. Here is a brief run down of unusual, yet memorable Collegian events that I will never forget.

SMASH HEARD ROUND THE WORLD

I couldn't believe it when this happened because it was the one time that I actually wasn't in the Collegian office. So all I can say is that according to eyewitness accounts, this particular evening's night editor – who will remain nameless – got into a heated argument with his girlfriend over the phone, which was unbeknownst to everyone around him because he had been speaking so quietly. Suddenly, the editor picked up the phone's receiver and began smashing it repeatedly onto the phone itself in a fit of rage. Buttons were smashed, and until this day, nobody can make outgoing calls from this particular phone. Unfortunately, the downside of being an independent newspaper was that we couldn't afford to buy a new one.

AMATEUR WRITING

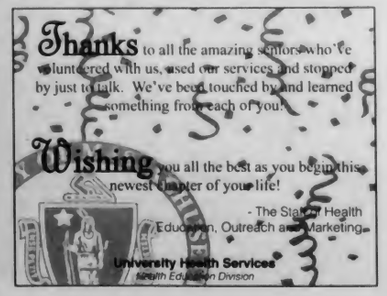
It was the spring semester of 2005 and crap was about to hit the fan. An innocent female night graphics employee went to the copy machine to make copies. She was shocked and appalled to find pages and pages of writing that went into detail about explicit sexual experiences, including one scene that showcased a man "pounding a woman from behind" before ejaculating on her stomach. "Whose is this!?" the innocent female employee exclaimed. Quietly, the night editor for that evening emerged from the shadows to say, yes, the writings were, in fact, his. He was apparently working on a novel of some sort. Word spread like wildfire. The night editor had been writing porn. "I know it's not a big deal, but I was definitely offended," said the surprised female night graphics staffer, who, in the end, decided not to make a big deal out of the event. But that didn't stop the staff from talking about the event for months to come.

L.A. TRIP

This past March, I joined three other Collegian editors on a trip to Los Angeles, California for a conference of college newspapers. The amount of shenanigans that happened on that trip could fill up the entire length of a column itself, but the bottom line is that 75 percent of the trip was spent having a good time. We got kicked out of the hotel Jacuzzi numerous times, ordered alcohol to our hotel (it's legal in Cali), were exposed to a prescription that is only legal in 11 states (also legal in Cali), crashed a rich person's ball, broke things, and got random shout-outs from kids we didn't even know. Not to mention that extremely hilarious and memorable prank phone call we collectively made to Assistant News Editor Matt Belliveau, claiming that a seventh UMass student had been just been hit by a car in the past 10 days. We all agreed, we represented UMass Amherst well. And we weren't proper.

UGLINESS BEHIND THE SCENES

Believe it or not, sometimes us editors get into disagreements behind the scenes at the Collegian. Most readers will never realize just how much discussion goes into their daily source of news. In my case, the ugliness between myself and another editor all came to the surface one cold night in February or March of 2005. I was the desk editor for the news section. Erika Lovley, the News Editor at the time, my direct boss, was also the night editor. In other words, she was ultimately in charge of the paper that evening. Unbeknownst to me, I did a horrible layout. A feature photo was right in the middle of the front page (a big no-no), stories were all over the place and it looked like a mess. Me, being the stubborn bastard I am, loved it. Erika clearly hated it. At midnight, just when I thought I was going home for the night, she told me "change your layout." I was floored. A civil discussion quickly turned into me raising my voice at her. "Why don't you just finish the rest of the page!?" I exclaimed. "Your layout is horrible!" she yelled back. I tried to walk out of the Collegian that night. I was completely prepared to quit. The fight that night was definitely the talk of the week around the office. Erika and I sort of made up a few weeks later – or just never spoke about it, I can't remember which. But it didn't matter. The funniest thing about that whole incident is that, despite that one night of fighting, I now consider Erika one of my best friends at UMass.



FINAL THOUGHTS

There were many moments at the Collegian that I am going to take with me for the rest of my life. Some of the stories we covered were once-in-a-lifetime experiences, and these times will make me a stronger journalist. But more important are the people I shared these experiences with. I'll always remember working until 4:30 a.m. with Lauren Igavian, Mel Natal and Mike Busack in graphics after the Coolidge fire, trying to think of creative headlines. When Jill Carroll was released, Busack called me at 6:30 a.m. and I met him and Eric Athas at the office around 8 o'clock, where we worked until 5 a.m. the next morning with Matt Belliveau, Nick Belanger, Amanda Allen, Katie Huston, Megan Daley, Rob Greenfield, Alex Butler and others throughout the day. There was the time when Aly Zillmann and I had to download pictures from my laptop in my apartment because the Collegian's computers crashed one night. For the first "Back to School" issue this year, I stayed on the phone with Samantha Nielsen for five hours doing headlines and cutlines because our computers crashed again and I was home in Watertown. Then, there were the days that Meghan Healy was my personal Collegian therapist. And thank god for "O Time."

Even if some of us don't pursue journalism as a career, the hard work we did and all of the late nights we had will only made us stronger. I truly wish all of my co-workers nothing but the best of luck as we embark upon the "real world."

MEGAN DALEY
ASSISTANT NEWS EDITOR

COLLEGIAN'S MOST LIKELY TO BE MISTAKEN FOR A FRESHMAN, AND OUR BEST DRESSED

When I got a phone call from Dan O'Brien telling me that I'd gotten the job as one of his assistant news editors, my thoughts flew in a thousand directions at once. I was elated to have a job, thrilled to have had my application accepted and excited about working more closely with the Collegian than I ever had as a news writer.

Soon, however, I was kicking myself for ever agreeing to even apply for the job. Would I even have the time to work at the Collegian, I wondered. Could I ever figure out the layout sheets and graphics program? What if I screwed up in a publication that the student body would be scrutinizing the next day?

Now, as the year comes to an end, I look upon layout sheets and a night of editing stories without fear. As for horrendous mistakes scrutinized by the student body, I've done my fair share of those as well and I've found that I can learn from them.

They say that to survive in a big university like UMass, you have to find your niche, the small slice of the school that keeps you from getting lost in the shuffle of thousands of students. For me, that place has been the Collegian.

I know that it has become very trendy to bash the Collegian even without reading a single article. In fact, I soon found that the news section of the paper was, for many students, a distraction on their way to the crossword puzzle and that my real job was to make a good-looking layout, an eye-catching headline, a huge feature photo, anything to distract the students long enough to get them to look at our section. I like to think this job has prepared me for the real world.

Recently, someone asked me if I would miss the Collegian. To tell the truth, it was the first time I really realized that I'd be leaving not only the paper, but also my college career. I've spent the year trying to get things done, racing to the finish line, only to find that it was so much closer than I ever realized. When I lay out my final newspaper for this year, I will be leaving behind the Collegian. But will I miss it? I won't miss the occasional nights when the paper wasn't completed until 5:00 a.m. I won't miss the office space with its cockroach and mice sightings, it's missing ceiling tiles and the mysterious drafts in the graphics room. I won't miss the panic I feel when I realize that, even after the paper is sent to the printer, I won't be done for the night until I've completed all the homework I didn't have time to do. I won't miss the people who call to complain about the crossword solutions not being put online quickly enough, or those who came to us with conspiracy theories and an insistence that "the public wants to know."

Still, it's going to be strange to come back to UMass for a visit, to pick up the Collegian and know that I had no part in making it. I'll miss the sense of accomplishment I feel when I see people reading the newspaper when I overhear people on the bus discussing an article or column they read. I will miss the phone calls from people thanking us for covering their event (as rare as those phone calls were.)

Most of all, I will miss all the people I have met here, the ones who went through all the shit that running a newspaper brings and still put out a newspaper everyday. Dan O'Brien, you were an awesome news editor and I've learned a lot from you. Matt Belliveau, have the best of luck next year. I know the news section is in great hands and will only get better with you at the helm. Mike Busack, Eric Athas and Nick Belanger, thanks for all you've done to keep the newspaper going. And to everyone else who troops down to the basement office to produce an underappreciated daily newspaper, I was lucky to have worked with you.

Life of the office, and best personality

For the past four semesters I have spent five days a week, sometimes six, in the warm, windowless Campus Center basement working at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. I started out at the paper my junior year as an advertising representative. My motivation for seeking employment was my rapidly depleting bank account after two years of college leisure.

This past year I took on the challenging position of Assistant Advertising Manager. For me, what started out as just another job evolved in to a defining part of my college career.

During my past two years at The Collegian I have gained invaluable experience. The knowledge and skills that I have compiled while working here has set me apart from so many others. It has allowed me a competitive edge that has opened many doors, securing my successful future outside of UMass. My advertising background from The Collegian will continue to benefit me as I pursue a graduate degree in Integrated Marketing from Emerson College.

Leaving the Collegian is going to be tough. It is a place I have grown attached to over the last two years. It has become like another home, second only to Hobart 22. Everything I am taking away from the Collegian was worth all of the long hours and hard work.

More important than the professional opportunities the Collegian has afforded me are the people I have had the fortune of meeting and working with. Everyone's attitude, unique personality, and sense of humor have made me love coming to work everyday. My staff is not just a group of colleagues; they are a second set of friends. Together we have dealt with difficult clients and slow sales, as well as celebrate all of our successes. I have bonded and formed friendships on not just a professional level but on a personal level as well.

Special Thanks

Nicole, Marissa, Jaime, Theresa, and John. What an awesome staff! You each brought something exciting and unique to the office. Your talent shined in each of your positions. I am not sure if any other staff will click as well as we did. You're wonderful people and friends.

Amanda: Our friendship has come a long way since meeting freshman year in Moore. I had the best time working with you. I'm glad you signed on at the Collegian. Good luck in Atlanta, I miss you already!

Jackie: We made it from orientation to graduation together. The Collegian was lucky to have you as an employee, and I am lucky to have you as a friend.

Nate: I could not have asked for a better business manager. It was great having you in the office, at least on the days you decided to come in.

Marty: You have always been the voice of reason. Thanks for always helping Kerry and I see things from a different angle. I will miss you.

Kerry: The Collegian superstar! My time at the paper would not have been so spectacular had it not been for you. You were more than my boss; this year you became one of my closest friends. The five phone calls a day and our coffee dates are unforgettable. You have done more for this paper than anyone can ever thank you for! Knock em' dead in Arizona, they do not know how lucky they are to have you. Never forget that you deserve the world, you earned it!

LIFE OF THE OFFICE, AND THE BIGGEST FLIRT.

When given the option to write a "senior send-off" I was a bit hesitant. I found it near to impossible to produce a piece that encompasses all the phenomenal facets of this four-year chapter of my life. There are really no words that describe the motley array of sublime individuals and experiences I've encountered on this journey. Attending this university is probably one of the best decisions I have ever made in my life. No regrets. After several File, Control N's later, I realized the best way to go about this "senior send-off" was to compose a brainstormed list of what I'm taking away with me from these four extraordinary years.

1. There isn't one definition or explanation for things.
2. Bob Marley and Sut Jhally are enlightening prophets.
3. Antonio's avocado quesadilla slice complimented with a honey-mustard chicken Sicilian slice is absolutely orgasmic.
4. It is essential to listen, relate, respect, and talk to people because we all have a unique flair about us that will make each of us grow.
5. Warm fall and spring days sitting outside on ABC's patio sipping a margarita on the rocks with Patron in a salted rimmed glass, is just, well, simply heaven.
6. You're your own best friend, I know this phrase is so Cliché but you have to learn to love yourself before you love anyone else.
7. Bikram yoga kicks ass!
8. Hennessey and pineapple, who would have thought.
9. Ski Lodge ladies - Mel, Marge, Sera, Eva, Casey and Iva, I have so much admiration for each of you.
10. Mary Jane is the wife that will never leave, she comforts, consoles and soothes the soul.
11. Mel and Marge teaching me how to perfect the 'heel toe' and the 'booty drop.'
12. If you're a Communication Major, you must take the 400 level course, Playing With Nature with Gordon Chase... trust me.
13. Smile, it does a body good.
14. Our Day Graphics crew was all about the genuine "beeeyyy's" and the drawn out hugs, upon each of us entering the door. Jenna, Mel, Mel, Molly, Zolga, Alice, Jess, Liza and Elaine you ladies rock!
15. Living in a complex is simple yet living simply is complex.

ERIC ATHAS

MANAGING EDITOR

A FAREWELL TO THE NEWSROOM SENIORS

There were plenty of words that could be used when a sophomore was chosen to manage New England's largest college daily newsroom in December. A sophomore who had only experienced less than one year as an assistant sports editor, and was younger than most of the editors. It was a dicey decision to make, one that could have understandably appeared questionable to the editors and writers in the Collegian newsroom.

When I received the phone call informing me that I was hired as the new managing editor, I have to admit it was a little surreal, even to myself. But there was not a single moment that I was ever nervous. There was not even a smidgen of anxiety when I sat at the big desk for the first time. And ice water does not run through my veins either, I get edgy in pressure situations with the best of them.

The fact is I had no reason to be uneasy. All I had to do was swivel my chair and do a 360 degree turn in the newsroom. I was actually in an ideal situation, because I was surrounded by veterans — dinosaurs as I'd like to call them. Let's be really cliche and say that I had a great supporting cast this past semester. It's true, and I have learned an indescribable amount from each member of that cast. The seniors who will be wearing that cap and gown in a matter of days each hold remarkable talents, which will lead them to success after they walk out of the campus center basement for good.

What is most outstanding about the Collegian Class of 2006 is that each of them have unique personalities that made for an interesting semester, to say the least.

Mike Busack, Editor in Chief: I don't think there was ever a time when I witnessed Mike when he wasn't tired or sick. The man worked his tail off from the moment he was voted in as EIC until he passed the reins on to Nick Belanger. As the EIC during a historical Collegian year, Mike took on the stress and duties that the paper endured, and worked at the Boston Globe in his "free time." Not only did Mike do what he could to make this publication as close to perfect as it could be, he gave us cushion for next year. Whether he was talking to CNN or trying to calm down an angry reader, Mike represented the Collegian, and did so with respect, class, and integrity. Mike ran the Collegian, while utilizing his reporting background, and standing strong by his journalistic mindset.

Jeff Howe, Sports Editor: It's safe to say that Jeff's college career was the tale of two halves. A once — UNH business major, and now the Red Sox beat writer for the Boston Metro Newspaper. But his personality is one that combines a sharp competitive nature (one essential to advance in this business, I think) and a, sometimes, or always over the top sense of humor. Jeff is the one who can take credit for hiring me in sports, teaching me how to cover a sport, how to write, and how to crash a wedding party. When I was hired in December for this position, the Sports department of the Collegian was the section I had to think about the least. A little of that was bias, but for the most part, I just knew that I was almost guaranteed a product of excellence on the back of the Collegian every day, and it was because of the sports editor.

Dan O'Brien, News Editor: Dan has become Mr. News around UMass and at the Collegian. With the News section getting thrust into the public eye this year with cutting-edge features, SGA election controversies, the nationally recognized Bryan Johnston murder trial, and most of all, the 82-day kidnapping of former Collegian news editor Jill Carroll, Dan had to stay focused, and he did. Not only did Dan carry the face of this publication on his shoulders, he set a precedent for next year. He was one of four members of this staff to take on Los Angeles in the spring at the Associated Collegiate Press, and he made his mark in the City of Angels. The day after I was hired as managing editor, Dan approached me, congratulated me and made it clear that he was there for help if I needed it — he kept his promise.

Ian Jones, Arts Editor: There were plenty of times during this past semester that editors at the Collegian were in states of confusion, stress, and sometimes fury. I can assure you that during these times, Ian kept his cool. Even during the Dining Out Guide, a project that Ian had to grind out with myself, production manager Nick Belanger and advertising manager Kerry O'Grady, Ian got it done. Regardless of the task, he made sure to produce a product of quality. I'm not sure Ian's calm presence will be filled next year, but at least when we are all frantically scrambling around, we can remember to just keep our cool — like the former arts editor.

Dan Duggan, Assistant Sports Editor: Like the Sports section, no one ever had to worry about Duggan. His writing was like clockwork and his layouts were practically flawless. I'm not really sure where Dan Duggan came from this semester, but his writing impressed every editor and reader who laid eyes on it. He even managed to finally win an intramural championship by the years' end. Dan and Jeff will be sorely missed next year, and while I am confident that newly appointed sports editor Rob Greenfield will fill in nicely, an era is now over within the Collegian sports section. An era that Duggan was a huge part of these past two years. Make sure to look for Dan Duggan's byline over a prominent newspaper in the near future.

Megan Daley, Assistant News Editor: With just one year to fulfill her career as a Collegian editor, Megan did just that. She brought a presence and personality to the newsroom that lightened it up at times when it was desperately needed. While I can say every editor at the Collegian works hard, Megan was one of the editors that worked the hardest, and she proved that this semester. As an assistant, Megan offered input in some of the most important issues this year. During the legendary time period when Jill Carroll was finally freed on March 30, Megan was one of several editors who contributed to the Collegian's most important news section of the year.

Brendan Hall, Staff Writer: Brendan is an honorary senior. While he still has one more collegiate year left, Brendan will spend it away from the Collegian, doing a well-deserved co-op with the Boston Globe. At this point last year, I'm not sure what people thought Brendan's future at the Collegian would be like; I can't lie, he has stunned everyone. As the only non-editor I decided to write about, Brendan has contributed just as much as many editors at the Collegian have. Writing for sports, news, and for the Worcester Telegram and Gazette, Brendan has become a staple at this paper. He has a funny sense of humor, and tops that off with an extraordinary work ethic. Brendan was faced with several road bumps at the Collegian over the past three years, and without flinching, he walked right over them.

Erika Lowle, Copy Editor, former News Editor, former Managing Editor: The first day I ever stepped into the Collegian newsroom, an enthusiastic, prominent news editor was speaking to a group of eager writers. I wandered over, and Erika handed me a news assignment to write. It was the first story I ever wrote in the Collegian, but certainly not the last. In my mind, Erika has always been a member of the hierarchy at the Collegian, and she has played a major role at this publication, while managing to fit in a semester at the Boston Globe. She has the type of reporter-savvy to make it big in this business, and she absolutely will. It is hard to imagine a Collegian without Erika Lowely's byline somewhere on it.

Kerry O'Grady, Advertising Manager: Kerry is an honorary newsroom member. She crossed the threshold into the newsroom this semester — something that an advertising manager certainly does not have to do. Kerry and myself worked on this guide, as well as the Dining Out Guide, to make sure that they both represented the Collegian with superiority, and they did. To be honest, the driver behind the Graduation Guide was Kerry, as the original idea was born within her staff. Everyone — editors, writers, managers, staff members — respects Kerry, and it's because she worked vigorously all year long. It is no surprise that Kerry is moving on to bigger and better things in Arizona. The energy, work ethic, and intelligence that she brought to this paper was priceless.

IAN JONES
ARTS EDITOR

BEST PERSON TO BE STRANDED ON A DESERT ISLAND WITH, AND WAIT — YOU WORK HERE!?

Looking back at my Collegian career, it's difficult for me to come up with an appropriate way to say goodbye. I figure before I do, it's probably fair to reminisce and share some of my more memorable experiences down here.

My first real introduction to the Collegian, aside from writing, came just over a year ago, when then-Assistant Arts Editor Matt O'Rourke told me that the Assistant Arts Editor position was opening up. I was interested, so I asked him what I should do, and he told me that I should come down and see what it was like. So, later that week, I went down to the Collegian offices, where he set me to work cleaning off his desk. I knew then that this was the job for me, and the lesson stuck. I have not cleaned my desk since.

The first semester I was Assistant Arts Editor, we had a lot of late nights down at the Collegian for whatever reason, and often we would get a bit tired and edgy. One night, I walked into the news office from the graphics room to discover Mike Busack — our Editor in Chief — trying to hang a clock on the wall. I suppose this doesn't really sound weird, except that he was attempting to do this by using a letter opener to "drill" a hole to put a nail into. Needless to say, the clock didn't stay on the wall very long, although the giant hole did. Sadly, I was not present to witness then-Managing Editor Cameron J. Woods's infamous unintentional attempt to do a back flip while sitting in his chair, but I feel it's worth mentioning, because he managed to do it and not even drop the phone from his ear in the process.

When I became for-real Arts Editor, Mike decided that the cabinets in the Arts section looked too neat. I assume, and welcomed me to the job by pulling one over on its side. Considering there was nothing in the cabinet, I didn't think it was a big loss, and actually rather liked both the way it looked and the fact that it provided a new place to sit. I never ended up putting it back up the right way, and I stand by that decision.

My welcoming was nothing compared to the ceremony that Managing Editor Eric Athas received, though A group that included several Editors in Chief and certainly not myself, took virtually everything in the Collegian offices that wasn't bolted down — and several things that at one time probably were — and put it on his desk, making it impossible to sit down — or get within five feet of it — without cleaning it up. That's just the kind of people you find down at the Collegian, though; there's never a lost opportunity to do something nice for someone else.

And who could forget the various objects thrown at, well, pretty much everyone who works at the Collegian. My favorite time was when I threw every pencil and pen I could find at Assistant News Editor Matt Belliveau, although as I recall he was not as thrilled about that. And then there was the time Mike threw a foam basketball at my head as hard as he possibly could — luckily, his accuracy needs some work. Actually, the basketball has been thrown at almost everyone at the Collegian now; I really can't imagine life down there without it. Sigh, memories.

And then there was the time Mike threw a foam basketball at my head as hard as he possibly could – luckily, his accuracy needs some work.

I suppose I should also take this opportunity to thank everyone who's made my time at the Collegian so enjoyable and rewarding. Thank you to all of the other editors, all of the Arts writers, the graphics staff and, of course, the Assistant Arts Editors, Alex Butler and Morgan-ann Rousseau, who made my life a lot easier this semester, and Nick Belanger, who made everyone's lives a lot easier this semester. Most of all, I'd like to thank the good people at the Blue Wall, who've provided me with countless burritos, some more ball-shaped than others. They've kept me alive.

So, goodbye, Daily Collegian. It's been real, and I've had a great time down here. It's a bittersweet farewell. I'm sad to go, but at the same time excited about doing other things — but I'll probably always think about the times I had down here fondly. Probably.

With that in mind, I've compiled my will. To the Assistant Arts Editors, Alex and Morgan-ann, I leave my gigantic pile of mail. I wish you the best of luck in cleaning it off the desk that you'll also inherit from me. To Matt, I leave my stash of pens and pencils, which I hope will given to you by throwing them at you while you're trying to finish putting your section together. And finally, to Nick, I leave all of the burritos I would have eaten next year, since you'll be living at the Collegian. I figure you have more use for them than I will.

ERIKA LOVLEY
FORMER NEWS EDITOR, AND COPY EDITOR

COLLEGIAN'S BIGGEST FLIRT

My first impression of the Daily Collegian newsroom was nothing out of the ordinary.

A skinny, flamboyantly gay man line danced on top of a newsroom desk while a small Asian girl struggled to pull him down. In the sports corner, which was littered with Wendy's French fry cartons and Gatorade bottles, three sports reporters busily whipped mini basketballs at each other, screaming "Gggggoooaaalll!" after each direct hit.

So this was journalism. I probably should have trusted my first instinct and fled. But for some strange reason, I was enthralled. Worse yet, I decided I wanted a job there. Badly.

Since that day, I've grown from a columnist writing editorials about tanning booths to a real live reporter, covering everything from murders to riots. I've held the position of Collegian news editor and managing editor, and written for publications like the Boston Globe, the Associated Press, and National Public Radio – just to name a few. While my experience at the Collegian has been priceless, the friends I made there are what truly made it one of the best times of my life. I can't even attempt to name everyone down there who has meant something to me. And as the great Dan O'Brien says, "I'll probably forget someone and offend them."

So instead, I'm leaving the most important lessons I learned as a college journalist from the Daily Collegian.

LESSON I: BE CAREFUL WHO YOU SLEEP WITH

A career in journalism will train you to sleep anywhere at anytime. The late nights, early mornings, and endless stress is the perfect recipe for exhaustion. But wherever you fall asleep, just be aware of who, or what else is around.

This includes falling asleep at 3 a.m. on your neighbor's couch. Especially while Chinny, his pet Chinchilla, is running rampant around the dorm room, looking for nest building materials. Snip. Snip.

"Oh my gawd! Chinny just ate my pony tail!"

"Oh wow. You know, that doesn't surprise me. He just ate my roommate's arm pit hair the other night."

LESSON II: SAVE THE EARTH

An environmental reporter must be in sync with, well, the environment. That means when you're test driving the only 8.7 gallon Smart Car on the East Coast, don't be the journalist that mows down wildlife with the environmentally friendly 5 x 8 foot convertible. Squirrel hair does not come out of small tires.

LESSON III: FOLLOW DIRECTIONS

Always listen to the directions of the public relations people. At no time should you try to get through the metal detectors of a prison while wearing a belly button ring and an underwire bra. Remember, everything that beeps must come off.

LESSON IV: LINGO IS A NO-GO

Do not make up media catch phrases. KKK-9 is a three headed police dog, not a bunch of "SGA and SCERA students photographed drinking in a University office and mocking a caricature of a Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard."

LESSON V: TREAT CELEBRITIES LIKE PEOPLE

Celebrities do not like reporters who scream things like "I'll never wash this hand again!" after a handshake. (That was SO I met.) Refrain from calling celebs by their movie/tv character's name. "Hey Doctor Huxtable!" Or singing a related show tune under your breath. "DA-DA-DA."

LESSON VI: TIME AND PLACE

Know when not to ask questions. Do not approach riot police while students are busy setting trees on fire and jumping off the DC in Southwest. You will get shot with pepper spray.

Even if you are wearing a big orange and yellow vest that says PRESS on it.

LESSON VII: BIAS

Do not judge anyone on first impressions. Trust your gut instinct.

CASE #1:

A Boston Globe intern named Michael Busack applies to be my assistant news editor. I love the applicant, but reject him on the advice of Managing Editor A, who says, "Being printed on the front page of the Globe really means nothing."

Michael Busack's current position at the Daily Collegian is Editor in Chief.

CASE #2:

I apply to become a Collegian editor. I show up to the interview in a skirt and suit jacket, while Managing Editor B shows up in athletic shorts, and basketball shoes to interview me. He grills me in the interview, and even though he hires me, I leave hating his guts. I spend the summer complaining to my mother about him. "He and I are going to come to blows." I tell her. "You know me. I don't take crap from anyone."

The former managing editor's current position is Boyfriend of 2 ½ years.

So much for first impressions.

Dan Duggan

Assistant Sports Editor

Newsroom's best personality, and nicest eyes.

As my college career comes to an end, I can't help but think of the opening lines from the Paul Simon song 'Kodachrome': "When I think back on all the crap I learned in high school, it's a wonder I can think at all."

While those lyrics definitely applied to my high school experience, college was different. Over the past four years at UMass – between the times I spent bi-ing countless papers and studying (easiest enough for tests to get by – I've actually learned a few things.

I've learned UMass is 10 times more fun when the weather is warm at the beginning of the year and in the spring. This realization has led me to think that I probably should have just gone to a school that has nice weather all year round, but there's something about the miserable winters of New England that I just don't think I could live without.

I've learned that hot girls do not go to class from the month of November to the month of March. Maybe they've worked out some deal with their professors or something, because I don't know how these girls manage to pass classes seeing as how they are nowhere to be found on campus for nearly five months. But seeing as how it's 70 degrees out as I write this, I'm not complaining. In fact, I have to run to the horseshoe real quick, I'll be right back.

I've learned from the PVTA that I don't ever want to take public transportation again for the rest of my life. You guys do a fine job and I shouldn't complain because it's free, but would it kill the Sunderland bus to make that damn stop at Crestview?

I've learned that those are some strange cats hanging out in front of the Student Union. I'm not knocking you guys, but there's a reason why I've avoided stepping foot in that building for the past four years… Umm, I just realized that my photo is at the top of this column, all but assuring that I will have a Frisbee thrown at me by a dude in sandals and a hemp necklace next time I walk by the Student Union.

I've learned that while the DC food may be gross, you'll miss it a lot more when you get off campus and realize that you either have to cook your meals or pay for food every time you eat.

I've learned that the dorms are the worst place and the best place to live. Sure it sucks dealing with RA's and the nasty bathrooms (FYI: always go fourth stall), but you'll miss having a floor of people to hang out with all the time and being within walking distance of classes when you move off campus.

I've learned that when you move off campus you will never pay your bills on time. As a result, I've also learned that Comcast isn't joking when they threaten to shut off your service.

I've learned that UMass is extremely efficient when it comes to campus construction and renovations. In fact, let's all take a moment to give a round of applause to the rousing success that is "New Dirt."

I've learned that I can never get any work done in the basement of the library because instead I spend all my time watching everyone walk by.

I've learned that the lacrosse team is the best on campus and yet no one knows about it. Well except for hot girls. If you go to the games, you realize that hot girls definitely know about the lacrosse team.

I've learned that any time you walk into a huge lecture hall and there's a large contingent of football players sitting in the back of the room, you're probably not in for the most grueling class.

I've learned that if I had it to do all over again, I wouldn't change anything. Actually I would have slept with more girls. But hey, there's still another week, so ladies…

I've learned that every night you go uptown you'll say you're going there to get chicks, but most of the time you'll leave with nothing more than two slices of hot cheese up front. And in the end you'll be just as happy.

I've learned that Rafters is the most undermined bar in Amherst. Sure if you want to get girls (OK Antonio's) you have to go uptown, but I'll take a bar where you can watch the Sox while playing that basketball shooting game and air hockey over every overcrowded watering hole uptown.

I've learned to buy my alcohol at Watroba's because the beers at Big Guy's are always inexplicably warm.

I've learned that I should have been an accounting major. Sure you future accountants may hate your job for the rest of your life, but take some solace in the fact that your pay check will have many more zeroes on the end of it than mine.

I've learned, more importantly, that I'd rather do what I love (a.k.a. this) than have majored in something that offered financial security but not the opportunity to have a career that I will thoroughly enjoy for the rest of my life.

I've learned that I've learned more at the Collegian than I have in all of my journalism classes combined. I've also learned that's the key to getting better at anything. Get your nose out of the books and get real experience. That 4.0 GPA might make your mom proud, but your future boss isn't going to care. No employer will ever ask to see that piece of paper they give you on May 28.

I've learned that I'm not nearly as smart as I thought I was four years ago. I've also learned that I've gotten a lot smarter in the past four years.

I've learned a lot in these past four years, and most of all, I've learned that I've loved my time at UMass and I'm going to miss this place like crazy when I leave.

Kerry O'Grady

Advertising Manager

Most likely to succeed, and Collegian cheerleader!

It's hard to imagine life after The Collegian, and to be honest, I'm not quite ready to yet. I spend hours a day at my desk, brainstorming, note-taking, or simply being there. There are many times when my co-workers find me at my desk way past the day's end and ask, "Don't you ever go home?" I always answer yes. Home is where the heart is, and for me, that's at my little desk in 113 Campus Center Basement.

It was summer before my sophomore year. I was broke and in desperate need of a job when I stumbled upon an opening as an ad rep at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Who knew three years later that this college job would completely change my career path and be my first profession post-graduation.

Two years as an advertising rep and this year as advertising manager has taught me so much about myself, and has given me opportunities I've never dreamed of. These past years also produced lasting memories and friendships that I will forever cherish. The following is an attempt to put these experiences into words, although it's certain I won't do them justice.

In July, I will leave the safe haven of The Collegian and begin work as an advertising account manager at The Arizona Republic in Phoenix, Arizona. Accepting this position is by far both the scariest and most exciting thing I've ever done, but I feel ready, and I credit my confidence to my experiences here. Not only did this place train me to be nothing but successful in the advertising field post-graduation, but also has showcased my abilities as a team player, hard-worker, and this year, effective manager. This year as manager has truly been, thus far, the best experience of my life. I can't begin to explain the lessons I've learned while in this position, and I won't try, but I can say that each lesson has bettered me as a person and has taught me something about who I am, or want to be in the future. Every day, there are new adventures, problems to solve, ideas to play with, and a fantastic staff that each day at work so much fun. The Collegian has been the Sparknotes to life's most valuable lessons, and being in college, I'm a lucky girl to have fallen into a job where each day is a tutorial to life after UMass.

I absolutely love my job. Every day in advertising is high-paced, stressful, unpredictable, and always exciting. In the past three years, I've learned how to be both artistically and verbally creative, how to efficiently problem solve, work under pressure, and tune my public speaking and argumentation skills. I got to reach out to the community, make connections, and attend great workshops and conferences. Through it all, I grew as a person and more importantly, as an individual.

Trust me, working here isn't always peaches and cream. This year especially, there have been many challenges and hardships to face. Through it all, I've learned that teamwork and support are the most important elements in getting through the tough stuff. Down in our little campus center dungeon, as much as we all hate to admit it, we're a sick, twisted, and wonderful family. Every day we spend hours together to put out a great publication, and you better believe there are as many tears and fights as there are laughter and hugs. We've all hated each other once or twice, loved each other more, and have realized that despite any differences, we all have one passion: Our paper. This is not a concept I could have learned in any classroom. All I've learned about relationships, compromise, maturity, and teamwork I've learned at The Collegian and all of these lessons will be nothing but assets to my future endeavors.

It's hard to imagine life after The Collegian, and to be honest, I'm not quite ready to yet. I spend hours a day at my desk, brainstorming, note-taking, or simply being there. There are many times when my co-workers find me at my desk way past the day's end and ask, "Don't you ever go home?" I always answer yes. Home is where the heart is, and for me, that's at my little desk in 113 Campus Center Basement, where my heart is with my co-workers, my staff, and most of all, with ads.

Congratulations Collegian staff. It's been a great year.

Congratulations Collegian graduating staff. The world is waiting.

Congratulations class of 2006. We did it.

Special Thanks:

John, Theresa, Jaime, Nicole, Jackie, Amanda, Marissa: Thank you for an incredible year. Your hard work and dedication to ad sales have made this year one of the most successful. I've loved working with all of you and I know every one of you will go on to amazing things. Thanks for being great employees and friends.

Caren: My "best" friend and the best assistant anyone could ever ask for. Thanks for keeping me sane through the tough stuff and being there to laugh and celebrate with me during the great stuff. I can't thank you enough for what you have done this year. Good luck at grad school, they don't know what's coming.

Marty: I can't leave you. I'm packing you in a suitcase and you are moving to Arizona with me. My Buddha, my Mom, my friend, my support system of three years. I can't begin to thank you for everything you've done. You mean so much to me. I looooooove you.

Mike: This year has been a challenge for us both. You can only play the hand you're dealt with, and you were dealt with a very stubborn and "intense" ad manager. Thank you.

Graphics staffers: Advertising wouldn't happen without you. Enough said. Thanks.

Eric: You are amazing and a lifesaver. Thank you for supporting my ideas and your hard work to keep them afloat. Good luck next year!

Nate: Thank you for the bonuses and the motivation. Kudos for stepping in the ring mid-fight. You've done well.

Nick: Thanks for jumping off the top of the library with me. It was both unexpected and quite a rush. Hitting the ground, nothing broke, and once realizing we were scared for nothing, jumps after seemed effortless. The anticipation was exciting, but the actual fall was the best part. You are going to make all of us proud next year as E.I.C., do good things and keep following your head and heart. You won't lose.

NICK BELANGER
PRODUCTION MANAGER
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF ELECT

Editor-in-Chief elect bids seniors farewell

A look back at 2005-06

I'm editor-in-chief now, the "graphics guy" finally gets his shot. But before I look forward, I want to look back at the year that was, and the people who make the Collegian what it is.

I THINK I WANT TO WRITE FOR THE PAPER, OR SOMETHING.

Or something was right, September 2004 I was a first semester freshman with aspirations of becoming a journalist. I don't exactly know how I wound up down at the Collegian, but there I found myself staring in the face of Pete Fondas, the Editor-in-Chief himself. I told him I wanted to write for the paper...or something. Pete and I got to talking, I had told him about being Editor-in-Chief at my high school newspaper, and it came out that I happen to know how to use the same publishing software that the Collegian had been using. Before I knew it I was interviewed and hired as a graphics staffer, I had no idea what I was getting myself into.

Pete referred to me as an Editor-in-Chief that day while speaking to me, he said "from one editor to another" and he told me about the opportunity the Collegian presented. Little did Pete know he was talking to a kid who would step into his shoes two short years later. Thanks for giving a freshman a shot Pete, I owe you one.

GETTING MY FEET WET, THEN DROWNING.

I began this school year as Editorial Production Manager. I thought I would ease into the paper and slowly work my way up. I was only a sophomore, and I barely knew what I was doing. I was ambitious though, and when my boss wasn't pulling through I filled in. Then she up in quit, and the entire graphics department fell in my lap.

I was screwed.

HEY, DO YOU LIVE HERE?

Our computers didn't work thanks to Charlie Higgins, a full time professional whose only real skills were bootlegging fonts and removing iTunes. How did it feel to be laid off by 20-year-olds? Someone had to say it.

With technology on the fritz, a new staff and new software, the Collegian came dangerously close to missing publication on several occasions. I spent more time in the graphics room first semester than I did in my dorm room. We never missed publication, no amount of mystery glyphs, broken computers, slow printers and crying assistant arts editors could stop us.

Now that's perseverance.

If it wasn't for my assistant Lauren Egavian the place would have completely fallen apart. Day graphics was always consistent; Lauren managed to pull her girls together all year and "bang out" ads day after day. I know I went on a few power trips this year, but I appreciated it all Lauren, and you're a hell of a lot of fun to work with.

WHAT'S THE SCORE?

Jeff Howe, Dan Duggan and Eric Athas know. The sports guys and I pulled off back-to-back all-nighters to put out the best special issue the Collegian has ever produced. Could it be that Jeff Howe's ability to stay awake for 72 hours straight allowed us to pull off the Score...of course. Athas and I are left to attempt to match the 2005-2006 Score, but I doubt we will. Talent like Jeff's doesn't just walk into the office every day. Hands down he's the best writer I've seen, and my vote for most likely to succeed. Just stay away from my sister.

Dan Duggan will forever be the king of the perfect layout. I highly doubt that he'll ever be considered "captain average" by anyone.

Insert Mark Matheson joke here.

THOSE BOYS AREN'T PROPER.

There's a fine line between loving your job and being obsessed with your job. Eric Athas and I walked that line while sitting at the Universal Hilton bar in LA. Improper indeed. Dan O'Brien and I, as we have done on a number of occasions, represented. We represented all the way to Carl's Jr. two days in a row. As news editor Dan always seemed to have the big story fall in his lap. I'm thinking it's a gift that a certain few great reporters have. It's only a matter of time before his byline lands in the Times...mark my words. Just don't try to go pro playing quarters Dan.

COLOR ME...YELLOW.

At the Collegian we fight about things that ordinary people couldn't possibly understand. I went to board of editor meetings for the show.

A few people, however, always seem to keep the mood light in the office. News won't be as fun without Megan Dailey's sarcasm and the occasional Dan O'Brien joke. Of course we're all going to miss Ian Jones; if we could all be as laid back as Ian I think the paper would be a lot better off. Also, Ian was my only rival for number of Blue Wall burritos consumed, now I'm number one.

RULE NUMBER 18

Thou shall not mess with Mike Busack's desk and or private documents of the Editor-in-Chief. I've learned a lot from Mike this year, and we had a blast in LA. You're leaving the paper better than you found it, and for that on behalf of those you leave behind I thank you.

CANDY DOESN'T LIE.

Life is funny; sometimes everything you're looking for is right in front of you, and all the wisdom in the world can be printed on a candy heart. Love is funny, because once you find it, no candy heart in the world can tell you where it's going to take you. You crashed my party and stole my heart, feel free to hang onto it in Arizona.

So Kerry, I think we got the memo too late, turns out the Ad manager and Production manger aren't supposed to get along. We definitely screwed that up... It's been an absolute pleasure to have worked with you; I can't wait to see all the great things you do in the future. Here's to Hope Kerry.

TAKING ON NO CONFIDENCE.

I won an election for Editor-in-Chief against a no confidence vote. Sweet. If only Ralph Nader could be so lucky. Regardless, I'm the man for the job at hand, with a talented staff returning next year the Collegian will continue to do what we do best, put out daily.

Seeing the seniors leave is surreal. I feel like this year has taught me so much, and I've come so far that I too should be graduating. For the record, I'll be a junior. I'm truly honored to have this paper left in my hands next year. If someone was to tell me that I would be in this position a year ago I wouldn't have believed them. But now I know you get out of the Collegian what you put in. Having said that, I believe our seniors are bound for greatness.

To those I've already mentioned, and to the entire Collegian class of 2006, I bid you farewell and I wish all of you the best of luck.

Rising tuition costs hit UMass

According to a MASSPIRG report, a rise in student debt at UMass came primarily as a result of increases in tuition and loans, and decreases in grants.

By Anna Dollanitis, Collegian Staff

A report released early last month by the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) addressed a correlation between increasing student debt and the amount of students able to pursue careers in civil service.

The report, entitled, "Paying Back, Not Giving Back," addressed the issue of recent graduates incurring what they called "unmanageable debt," saying that "loan payments would have a measurable and burdensome impact on their lives and would likely hinder their ability to pay for basic necessities."

Those who choose to enter into civil service careers such as teaching, social work, and any non-profit work, are most susceptible to facing unmanageable debt, as they receive the lowest salaries, according to the report.

Allia Matta, a teaching assistant in the Women's Studies department, estimated her student loan debt after finishing her graduate studies at approximately $65,000-70,000, "on the low side."

"Students are unable to go into the career of their choice," said Kate Gilbert, the campus organizer of MassPIRG at UMass.

According to the report, "recent graduates with very low salaries - about half of the median individual income in the U.S. - cannot manageably repay their student loan debt while meeting other needs."

The study found that in 2004, two-thirds of all four-year college graduates left school with student debt, compared with less than one-third in 1993.

The increase in student debt comes primarily as a result of increases in tuition and loans, and decreases in grants.

On February 1, Congress reauthorized the Higher Education Act, originally enacted by President Johnson in 1965, "to strengthen the educational resources of our colleges and universities and to provide financial assistance for students in post-secondary education."

The reauthorization of the bill called for a $12 billion cut in student federal aid, and beginning on July 1, the interest rates on Stafford loans, the main source of federal student loans, will move to a fixed rate of 6.8 percent, according to the report.

Gilbert called this development, "the biggest cut to federal student aid in American history."

With tuition rapidly increasing nationwide, the impact on college students is becoming even more severe.

Chancellor John Lombardi said, "Tuition and fees have been increasing across the country in all states as the public has chosen to shift much of the burden of paying for college from the taxpayers to the students and their families."

"Because I am the first person in my family to go to college, my parents didn't know what to do, and I sure didn't either. We just thought you fill out the FAFSA and it would be all set. Well, it was, except I have paid for my college education thus far in loans," said sophomore Richard Kenney, who plans to pursue a career as a history teacher.

"I don't think it's fair, but unfortunately, because of this country's education policy or lack thereof, many students are forced to deal with it if they really want to receive an education," said Matta.

Sophomore, Lindsey Farina, who plans to pursue a career in education said, "I feel that our communities will ultimately suffer the most. With these heavy financial burdens, students are often not able to give back as much as they would like, or are forced to switch to different, more high paying positions."

Matta said, "Some states have decent teaching rates for teachers from K-12 and some universities also offer decent salaries but this is such a conditional issue. The faculty salaries depend on whether one selects a private school over public. I so feel that because teaching is not completely valued across the board, for many, the impetus to raise salaries is practically non-existent."

The study found that, "23 percent of public college and 38 percent of private college graduates would have unmanageable debt as a starting teacher," and "37 percent of public college and 55 percent of private college graduates would have unmanageable debt as a starting social worker."

Farina said, "In the past, I never questioned not teaching because of the salary. However, as I am getting

Kidnapped journalist set free

Collegian alum returns home

By Katie Huston, Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts alumna Jill Carroll, the American journalist who was kidnapped in Iraq on Jan. 7, was freed Thursday morning after 82 days of captivity.

"I was treated well, but I don't know why I was kidnapped," Carroll said in a brief interview on Baghdad Television yesterday, wearing a green head scarf and a gray Islamic robe.

Carroll was on her way to interview prominent Sunni Arab politician Adnan al-Dulaimi in a dangerous western Baghdad neighborhood, on assignment for the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor, when gunmen ambushed her car 300 yards from Dulaimi's office. Her translator Allan Enwiya was shot and killed.

Carroll appeared begging for her freedom on three videos that were broadcast on Arab television, the last of which was released on Feb. 9.

An insurgent group, the Revenge Brigades, claimed responsibility for the attack and threatened in two videotapes to kill Carroll if all female detainees in Iraq were not released by Feb. 26.

U.S. policymakers refuse to negotiate with terrorists, and the insurgency's demands remained un-met as the deadline passed.

On Feb. 28, Iraq's Interior Minister Bayan Jabr said Carroll was being held by the Islamic Army in Iraq, an insurgent group that freed two captive French journalists in 2004.

Over a month of silence later, Jill's father Jim woke at 6 a.m. yesterday in his North Carolina home to the phone ringing. "Hi, Dad. This is Jill. I'm released," he heard his daughter say.

"It was quite a wakeup call, to say the least," he said. "I was glad to see her on TV this morning. She's apparently in good health and mentally strong and we're all very pleased about that."

Carroll was dropped off near a branch office of the Iraqi Islamic Party at about 12:15 p.m.

She "introduced herself as Jill Carroll ... and gave us a written letter in Arabic that asked the Islamic Party help her," Alaa Maki, a party member, told reporters.

Carroll was taken by armored car to the party headquarters, where she was met by American officials and journalists and given gifts, including a Quran, according to the Associated Press.

"I don't know what happened," Carroll said in the televised interview. "They just came to me early this morning and said, 'OK, we are letting you go now.'"

Carroll emphasized that she was treated well in captivity. "It's important people know that - that I was not harmed," she said. "I was kept in a very good small, safe place. They gave me clothing, plenty of food. I was allowed to take showers, go to the bathroom when I wanted. They never hit me or even threatened to hit me."

She did not know where she was being held. "I once did watch television, but I didn't really know what was going on in the outside world," she said. "One time they brought me a newspaper."

Jill's freedom came only a day after her twin sister Katie made an appeal for her release, calling her sister an "innocent woman." The sisters spoke on the phone yesterday.

"She called me because she remembered my number. I was dreaming that this would be the way I'd find out - that she'd call me in the middle of the night like this," Katie said, according to the Monitor. "She sounded great.

Johnston found guilty of murder

By Adam Goreick, Associated Press

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — A former Westfield State College student was convicted of murder Friday in the shooting death of his longtime friend.

Bryan Johnston's lawyers argued he was insane when he shot David Sullivan, a senior at the University of Massachusetts, in December 2004.

But prosecutors said Johnston — a one-time criminal justice major — was clear-minded at the time, and only behaved erratically when he was using a heavy mix of drugs, alcohol and steroids.

Johnston was immediately sentenced to life in prison without parole.

He also was found guilty of burglary and weapons charges, for which he will be sentenced on Tuesday.

Johnston and Sullivan were childhood friends who went to the same high school in Dalton.

Sullivan's family members left the court without commenting, but prosecutor Renee Steese described them as "relieved and pleased with the verdict."

Jurors had begun deliberating the case Thursday afternoon.

Defense attorney Alex Nappan said he was shocked that they returned a verdict so quickly.

"It took a month to try, 150 hours of testimony, and the jury took seven hours to reach its verdict," he said.

"I don't question the jury," he said. "I don't understand what they did."

He said Johnston is "OK," but his family, who sat in the courtroom throughout the trial, is "devastated."

Throughout the four-week trial in Northampton Superior Court, Nappan tried to paint Johnston as an ordinary college student who began to unravel in the grips of mental illness. Friends of Johnston testified he would seem unstable when he drank alcohol, which they said he did often.

Sometimes he would brandish the handguns he owned, and once held a gun to a friend's head, they said.

Nappan said Johnston became convinced that Sullivan wanted to harm him, and began collecting guns to protect himself.

A forensic psychologist who evaluated Johnston at Bridgewater State Hospital testified that Johnston did not seem delusional after the killing.

Bryan Johnston was convicted Friday, April 28, 2006 of murdering his longtime friend and UMass student David Sullivan.

Congress examines book prices

By Matt Belliveau, Collegian Staff

As students return to their respective colleges, the majority will unwillingly throw hundreds of dollars towards purchasing the necessary textbooks for their classes. This harsh reality hits nearly every student at universities from California to Massachusetts, and produces the same question: Why are textbook prices so high?

Congress has joined the search for that very answer.

Recent reports of escalating textbook prices and instances in which publishers sell U.S. textbooks in other countries at lower prices have heightened congressional concern and raised questions about textbook pricing practices.

These concerns recently led Congress to assemble the Government Accountability Office to determine the change in textbook prices and the factors that may have contributed to changes in textbook prices.

The results, which were originally released by the GAO in August 2005, found that the average student spends nearly $900 on textbooks and supplies, or 26 percent of tuition and fees, per year at typical public four-year colleges.

Increasing at an average of 6 percent per year, textbook prices nearly tripled from December 1986 to December 2004, while tuition and fees increased by 240 percent and overall inflation was 72 percent.

At two-year colleges, which are cheaper but more likely to attract low-income students, the textbook and supply bill amounts to 72 percent of tuition and fees.

Researchers contend that the main reason for the hike in textbook prices can be attributed to the increase in costs associated with the "bundling" of new features, such as Web sites and other instructional supplements. Other factors that affect pricing include production costs, availability of used books, and the demand for textbooks.

Wholesalers, retailers, and some public interest groups, who were interviewed by researchers, agreed that there has been a proliferation of supplements in recent years, and they have expressed concern about the increasing practice of selling supplements and textbooks bundled together in a package.

Some publishers acknowledged that there has been resistance to the practice of bundling, and were cited as saying that they are now more carefully considering when bundling may be appropriate.

"While the practice is designed to provide students with greater value, we understand that students must perceive that value for a bundle to sell," said one unnamed publisher.

Publishers say they are also beginning to understand that as students may be sensitive to high prices, they must strike a balance between quality and price.

For example, one publisher provided an example of a bundle that did not sell well because the number of components increased the price beyond what students were willing to pay. While the publisher knew that the textbook and the individual components would retail separately for much more, students perceived the price as too high.

Another prevalent complaint sounded by most students is the constant "revisions" that publishers place on certain texts.

A used book in its third year of circulation may cost $65. But when publishers revise or add certain chapters to a text, it becomes a new edition and can be sold upwards of $100.

Industry representatives and some public interest groups also suggested that publishers are revising textbooks more frequently, and some expressed con-

Fraternity housing in jeopardy

By Eric Athas, Collegian Staff

Two fraternity presidents and one sorority president claim that their houses and two other Greek residences will be sold to the University of Massachusetts soon, putting the future of "Frat Row" in jeopardy.

The three presidents, Ben Levine of Alpha Epsilon Pi, Long Tran of Pi Delta Psi, and Teavy Moeung of the Sigma Psi Zeta sorority say that in early April they were each told by Susan Haynes, who manages all three houses, that they will have to move out because UMass will own the residences soon. The three presidents agree that an offer purposed by UMass officials was accepted by the company that owns the territory.

"We're homeless," said Levine. "[Negotiations] escalated to the point where the deal was agreed to."

Despite assumptions by the three presidents, neither the University, nor the company that owns the property, Alpha Tau Gamma, Inc. (ATG, Inc.), has confirmed whether or not a deal was reached.

The properties, which are currently on sale and owned by ATG, Inc., are located at 375, 387, 389, 395, and 401 North Pleasant St. The houses located at 389 and 401 North Pleasant St. are both operating fraternities, while the house located at 387 North Pleasant St. is a sorority. The other two locations, 375 and 395 North Pleasant St., are not currently operating under Greek Life and are vacant.

"The last offer was made over a year ago, and at the moment, [ATG] is still very interested in that offer," said Joyce Hatch, vice chancellor for Administration and Finance. Hatch says that the University doesn't do the

Students rally for immigration rights

By Nicole Boonjakuakul
Collegian Staff

From Los Angeles to Chicago, from Miami to Boston, the national immigration strike, "A Day Without Immigrants," had citizens and immigrants alike protesting for immigration rights yesterday afternoon.

Many University of Massachusetts students showed their support for the cause with the "Walk Out for the Great American Boycott for Immigrant Rights," a protest that began at the steps of the Student Union and ended at the Amherst Town Common.

The national protest is a result of the immigration bill, H.R. 4437, which was passed by Congress on Dec. 16, 2005. The bill, "The Border Protection, Antiterrorism, and Illegal Immigration Control Act of 2005," restricts immigrants' rights, enhances border security and criminalizes immigrant communities. People nation-wide have since been advocating for full amnesty and human rights for the millions of undocumented workers in the country since the bill was presented.

Over 150 advocates from the UMass campus and Amherst community gathered first at Student Union to hear the opening speeches from members of the Office of ALANA Affairs and the UMass faculty, including Nate Kupel, Tony Udell, Tom Coish, and Professor Enoch Page.

"Mexicans did not cross our border," said Nate Kupel. "We crossed their borders by taking Texas and New Mexico. Now, because of unjust immigration policies, they're not afforded the same rights as U.S. citizens ... Do people deserve to be treated poorly for wanting to provide for their families?"

Professor Enoch Page concluded the opening rally by explaining that minority groups need to work together to join forces and create stronger coalitions to weaken the power of white supremacy.

Moments later, the march began and chants like, "Ain't no power like the power of the people 'cause the power of the people don't stop!" and "No justice, no peace!" reverberated throughout Amherst. Several onlookers cheered for the demonstrators, while police guided the marching protestors from North Pleasant Street to Main Street.

During the march, Sai Madivala, a graduate assistant asked, "When was the last time there was a wave of immigrant protests like this? We are exploiting the Third World. We go in, take their wealth, and expect the people not to follow. Of course people will follow the money!"

The march, led by Stephen Mahood and UMass Student Government Association President Elvis Mendez, ended at the Amherst Town Common, where the UMass protestors met with supporters from Amherst College, Hampshire College, and Mt. Holyoke College. Several booths promoting voting rights for immigrants lined the Common and signs from the International Socialist Organization, reading "Ningun Ser Humano Es Ilegal (No Human Being is Illegal)" were displayed throughout the crowd.

The rally and vigil at the Common began with Native American community member, Sarah Little Crow stating, "Today... is not about silence."

The crowd cheered when Manny Castro of Hampshire College wore a Mexican flag on stage while shouting, "This fight is going around on all college campuses in the nation! It's a fight for human rights!"

Over 400 people stood at the Common for over two hours, listening to the speeches of various Amherst immigrants, professors and representatives from Amherst College, UMass, and Hampshire College, as well as local high school student advocates.

"This is the new civil rights movement, a movement of unity," said Agustin Lao-Montes, a Hispanic resident of Amherst. "This is about human rights, civil rights, labor rights. It is for racial justice and democracy to end criminalization of immigrants in the U.S. Let us stay alive! Keep marching, organizing, educating, and building coalitions. Turn the energy into a progressive movement to create a rainbow coalition."

Another local advocate said, "It isn't just about immigrants, but about who the scapegoats are. It's always the same logic: 'Latinos are the cause of America's problems.' But America's always been a dangerous place. Say no to totalitarianism!"

Members of Out Now, Inc., a youth organization for lesbians, gays, bisexuals, and transsexuals from Springfield also showed up at the rally to show their support.

Behind the music: the story of Bennie 'Motown Man' Johnson

NAFIS AZALVCA KLEKIAN

"Motown Man" Bennie Johnson performs for some passersby in downtown Amherst on Friday, May 12, 2006. After facing bouts of adversity, Motown often shares his house and food with the less fortunate.

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

It's 12:55 a.m. on a Saturday night - last call in the college bars in downtown Amherst. Hundreds of inebriated students crowd the sidewalks, screaming, laughing and gobbling slices of pizza. Dressed in a faded black sweatshirt and a sparkly blue cape, Bennie Johnson, known to most of the college town as Motown Bennie, leans against a tree outside Judie's Restaurant. He fidgets, tossing his instrument - a white construction bucket – in his hands, waiting until the bars empty out and the sidewalks are filled to maximum capacity.

"I have to stay out of the bars," he said. "When I try to go in and get a drink of tequila or a margarita, 15 or 20 drinks will appear because the people all want to buy me drinks."

A well-known street musician in Amherst, Motown Bennie has been performing Motown, jazz, and classic rock songs on the town's sidewalks for over three years. Armed only with his battered bucket and a kazoo for instruments, he says he sings because it makes people smile.

The sight of Motown Bennie renders nothing but stares. The 6-foot, 190-pound musician's performance costume involves a scrap of shimmery metallic cloth tied around his shoulders into a cape. His neck is often adorned with strings of fluorescent Mardi Gras beads and a bright orange kazoo. At first glance, the graying 59-year-old could be mistaken for an escapee from a local mental institution.

However, underneath his costume, Bennie looks like any other blue-collar worker, dressed in a collared sweatshirt, Dickies and a pair of work boots.

"Motown! Motown Man! I'm in love with this chick I just met," screams a student from the stoop of a nearby bar. "Make her love me back!"

With a smile and a wink, Bennie begins beating on his battered white construction bucket, singing an old rendition of The Temptations.

"Sugar pie, honey bunch
You know that I love you
I can't help myself
I love you and nobody else..."

Instantly captivated, the sidewalk crowd throngs to form a circle around Johnson. The cheers and clapping are deafening as shouts of "go Motown Man" echo across the street. Soon, half of the street is dancing.

Despite his age, Bennie is able to stay out in all kinds of weather, often performing until 2 a.m.

Several officers from the Amherst Police Department look on from across the street, more amused than concerned.

"They let me play because I work as a type of crowd control," said Johnson. "My music makes people feel good, so they are less apt to fight and get out of control after the bars. It makes my job easier and the cops' job easier."

The first time I met Motown Bennie was four years ago, while walking in downtown Northampton. I had just finished one of many fights with my then-boyfriend, and I sullenly held his hand, trying to look anywhere but his face.

"The blonde girl is mad at her boyfriend!" sang a voice from the street corner.

I turned to gawk at the tall black man in a sparkly red cape, singing and banging on a bucket.

"He won't be with us very long!"

Like anyone who has just heard Motown Bennie for the first time, all I could do was stop and laugh. While he is a cultural icon in the Five College Area, very few people know much about Motown Bennie other than his street performances. Like most, I also knew nothing about him, until I spent a day in the life of Motown Bennie.

A taste of the South

The smell of frying chicken and cigarette smoke saturates the dim, one-bedroom apartment in Colonial Village, Amherst. Under a single ceiling light sits Johnson's friend and housemate, Patricia Rose, lazily puffing at a cigarette. Rose moved in with Johnson three years ago after begging him to take her out of the nursing home where she lived.

Unable to work for years because of mental illness and diabetes, Rose spends much of the day in a drowsy state due to the side effects of the 32 prescription pills she is required to take. Instead, she functions as Bennie's private secretary, organizing the overwhelming number of requests for Bennie's appearance at private parties.

It's an unusually warm day in late March, but the apartment is chilly, and Bennie wears a knit hat and a faded sweatshirt as he peeks his head around the kitchen corner.

"I'm making fried chicken for you!" he exclaims. "You ain't never had southern fried chicken until you've had mine."

The three of us crowd around the tiny table on bar stools. Rose puffs silently at another cigarette, staring sleepily at the wall. I hungrily bite into a chicken leg, wiping my greasy fingers on a paper towel, sipping on a glass orange soda. Johnson watches eagerly.

"What do ya think? Good? Do you want more? Are you still hungry?"

Bennie will cook food for anyone who wants it. When he's not performing, he spends his time buying groceries, preparing meals, and delivering them to needy families nearby.

Today, Bennie has cooked enough for two additional families. He dishes the chicken out into containers and plastic bags to deliver to other friends in the complex. Johnson spends over $100 a week on food, and much of it he gives away. It's only 11 a.m. and already there are six hungry people from North Amherst who are scheduled to drop by his apartment for a hot meal.

"I can't just cook food for two people," said Bennie, looking at Rose. "I can't turn nobody away. Even if it's my last box of cereal, I can't say no. I'm always thinking about somebody else."

Although Bennie is supported almost solely by the money he earns as a musician, he won't talk directly about how much he makes. A good night might bring $125. A bad night can bring nothing more than a five-dollar bill.

Unemployed since he suffered a back injury several years ago, Johnson collects disability from the state, but refuses to go on welfare.

"I never wanted to take social security because it takes away your dignity," he said. "I totally support myself. I think I'm creative enough with that bucket to make a living with it. I ain't embarrassed if it makes people happy. My gift is making people laugh."

While Rose's Social Security checks help pay some of the bills, money is always tight for Bennie. An unused television sits in the living room, serving as a reminder of the things he can't have.

"We've had to cut down to 10 hours of regular TV a month," he said, shaking his head. "Rose sleeps a lot more now."

Bennie hasn't slept in his own bed in almost three years. After giving up his bedroom to Rose, he has permanently moved onto the main living room couch. The second couch is often taken by someone who needs a place to sleep.

There is a knock on the apartment door. Two women dressed in sweatshirts and jeans come in, and each hug Bennie. They sit on the apartment couch side by side, while Rose takes a recliner to talk to them.

One of the women is crying; her son's godfather has died, and she's seeking solace. The other is hungry, and in need of a place to rest her bad foot for an hour.

Bennie says although he has little himself, he still offers what he has to others, even if it's only a place to sit down.

"I do what I do because there was a time when I had nothing," he says.

Listen to the music

Born in 1947 in New Orleans and raised in Baton Rouge, Bennie was one of five brothers and a twin to his only sister. His father worked seven days a week as a digger in the local oil fields. When the acids from the mine tanks stung his father's eyes to the point of temporary blindness, Johnson would follow his father to work and hide in the woods. Behind the boss's back, Bennie would switch places with his father and dig while his father took a much-needed rest.

"My daddy worked so hard," said Bennie, wiping the tears streaming down his cheeks. "They worked him to death. I tried to work for him, but he was always so tired."

Although the family was poor, Bennie said his mother, Josephine Cooper, taught her children to appreciate the sounds of jazz and blues. All the children learned to play the piano, drum, and guitar. The jukebox was one of the family's most prized possessions. By age 11, Bennie was an advanced washboard player and singer.

On summer nights, Cooper would load the children into the family's old Desoto and take them to Alligator Buoy – a shack of a music bar in the middle of the Louisiana swamps, where alligators sat in the parking lots, and the greatest of the great musicians played.

It was here that Johnson first saw the performances of great legends, like Ray Charles, B.B. King, and Fats Domino.

"It stayed with me," he said. "And I came to love music more than anything else."

Despite his gift for music, Bennie was unable to concentrate much in school. "I couldn't stand the racial tension," he said.

Although he was one of the school's top athletes in track and baseball, Bennie dropped out his senior year after two white boys hit him over the head for accidentally drinking out of a white-only water fountain after practice.

"I was so thirsty, I forgot to read the sign," he said.

Determined to get out of the south, Bennie took a job as a movie theater usher. The job quickly ended after his boss caught him talking to a white girl. After being jumped by the manager and a coworker, Bennie said he was dragged to the back office, where the cops were already waiting. After several shift kicks in the ribs and a crack across the face, the police left him bleeding on the theater floor.

"They beat me up, but they didn't arrest me," said Bennie. "The manager needed me to work the rest of my shift."

Bennie's second job brought him to a steak house where he worked as a cook.

"All the white employees were allowed to eat the steak, but the black ones weren't," he said. After one particularly grueling night, Bennie broke down and ate two steaks during an evening shift. In response, the manager refused to pay Bennie for a month.

"After that, I couldn't wait any longer," said Bennie. "I had to leave Louisiana."

Bennie said he waited until the restaurant closed, broke open the cash register, and emptied the $250 into his pocket. He fled that night by bus to New York.

He later met his wife of 37 years, Margarita Johnson, and raised a family in the Florence Heights apartment complex in Northampton. Bennie's three children, Petey Johnson, 32; Joseph Johnson, 28; and daughter Margarita Johnson, 30, all live locally.

Family values

Despite his busy schedule, Bennie says his top priority is visiting his wife. Margarita Johnson, 57, resides in the Calvin Coolidge Nursing Home & Rehabilitation Center in Northampton.

After battling multiple sclerosis for 22 years, Johnson was admitted to the nursing home three years ago when her health care became impossible to continue at home.

Bennie says he spends his visits bathing his wife and cooking for her.

"For everything I do, I make her pay me in kisses," says Johnson. "She laughs a lot, just like I do. She tells me everyone in the nursing home is jealous."

There is another knock at the apartment door, and a tall bearded man jogs in, holding his jaw. Bennie greets the man with a smile and a hug. But the tall man is not smiling back.

"Bennie, look at my tooth," he said, pointing to a large swelling on his lower jaw. A bad tooth is causing a serious infection.

"It's freaking me out. I dunno what to do."

"We got to cut this short," Johnson says to me, eyeing the infected area. "We got to get him to a dentist."

As he turns to run out the door, Bennie tucks his blue cape and white bucket under his arm. He'll play his bucket and sing on the way to the dentist, hoping to soothe his friend's nerves.

"See. There's always people who are gonna need music and a smile," he shouts back to me.

Students 'Rock to Block Wal-mart'

Students assemble to listen to the sampling Chinese Nationalists, in protest of the proposed construction of a Wal-Mart Supercenter in Hadley.

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Students gathered Thursday night to "Rock to Block Wal-Mart" at a MassPIRG-sponsored event designed to inform students about the issues relating to the proposed Wal-Mart Supercenter.

Speakers from the Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development and Stop SprawlMart lectured between musical performances from Jay Mankita, the Ski Boot Mafia and Sampling Chinese Nationalists. Mike Pease, a senior history and economics major and a member of MassPIRG, opened the event by discussing MassPIRG's concerns with the Supercenter.

"What we are most concerned about is the impact it will have on our environment," said Pease.

The environmental factor is one that many residents of Hadley and surrounding areas have expressed concern about. The new Wal-Mart has been designed to cover land that has been petitioned to be regarded as a wetlands area. The local conservation commission upheld the petition and now developers and residents are waiting for a ruling from the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) before the plans can proceed.

If the EPA upholds the commission's ruling, Wal-Mart developers will have to make several changes to their plans to make them fit for the new regulations that will surround building on or near wetlands.

Concern for the environment, however, is only one reason that Wal-Mart would be bad for Hadley, according to Aaron Goldman, the founder of stopsprawlmart.com and the first guest speaker at the event. Goldman asked students how they felt about a variety of issues. He asked if they were for the preservation of wetlands and agricultural history, if they liked to keep open space and rare species. All of these things, he said, could be in jeopardy with the building of the Wal-Mart Supercenter. He also told students that the Supercenter would more than double traffic.

"You don't have to be a radical to protest, you just have to not want to sit in traffic all day," said Goldman.

However, Wal-Mart is not just a problem for Pioneer Valley, according to Goldman. "It's an international issue," he said. He explained that even people in other countries were affected by Wal-Mart's continued growth in the United States, citing examples of sweatshop workers in other countries working to make Wal-Mart's products.

Goldman then encouraged students to take action against Wal-Mart.

"It doesn't matter if everyone is opposed to Wal-Mart," he said, "If we don't actually do something about it, they'll just come in. We are not their pawns, we are not their victims. [The Wal-Mart developers] are counting on apathy."

David Elvin, a speaker from the Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development, also called on his audience to stand up against Wal-Mart. Elvin says that Wal-Mart has the power and resources to drag their case for a Supercenter on for a long time, and that they are likely hoping that eventually people will give up and allow the Supercenter without protest.

Elvin also defended protesters against accusations some have made of those opposed to the Supercenter being "environmentalist wackos."

"We're just asking this company to comply with the law, and they won't do it," Elvin said.

UMass graduate students survive brush with death

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Juan Jimenez and his wife Maria Lozano had no idea that their trip to Boston last Monday would turn into a traumatic and life-changing experience.

The two University of Massachusetts School of Education graduate students were in the city with their 4-year-old son and some friends doing errands and sight-seeing. The couple thought the day would be a relaxing break from their hectic schedules.

Jimenez, Lozano, and their friends - all native Columbians - had just registered to vote in Columbia's presidential elections at the Columbian consulate. The group was driving to an East Boston restaurant around 1 p.m. when their plans literally came to a crashing halt, Lozano said.

Jiminez was driving the couple's Nissan Sentra and following the car driven by friend and UMass graduate student Andres Ramirez when they turned onto Boylston St. At that moment, a gray Honda cut in between them.

That Honda would be crushed by a large piece of scaffolding only seconds later, killing the driver.

The construction equipment had been attached to a building owned by Emerson College, where there had been ongoing renovations for the past two years.

Police say that around 1:20 p.m., scaffolding fell from the building onto the street below. Three men were killed in the accident.

The driver of the Honda was identified as 28-year-old Michael Ty of Roslindale. Ty was a doctor at Brigham and Women's Hospital.

The other two people killed were construction workers who were standing on the scaffolding when it collapsed. They were identified as Robert Beane, 41, of Baldwinville, and Romildo Silva, 27, of Somerville.

Lozano said neither she nor her husband heard or saw anything out of the ordinary until the moment the Honda was crushed.

"The first second after that happened we couldn't believe it," Lozano said. "We were shocked. I couldn't move."

After realizing everyone in the car was uninjured, the family got out. They explained that after stepping over a body outside their vehicle, they tried to take their young son Nicolas as far away from the accident scene as possible.

"The first few minutes he was asking a lot of questions - 'What's going on, what happened.' I explained that it was an accident, something fell off, the person fell down, because that's the person that he saw," Lozano said. "I was trying to guide his attention towards other things, the ambulances, the fire trucks ...and he was very amazed by that."

Lozano says there was a moment of utter confusion just after the accident happened. She and Jimenez were unaware if their friends in the other car were okay.

"They got out of the car, yelling and screaming, and they thought the worst had happened to us," she said. "But when they saw us, they were just confused. They didn't know what happened, they started hugging us and crying. We were just telling them 'We're fine! We're fine!'"

Jimenez says his family and friends' survival through the ordeal could only be summed up in one phrase: "It's a miracle."

"We're very Catholic. It's the only word we have found for this," Jimenez said. "If you look at those pictures, our car is in between the debris... and where we were, almost nothing happened, the windshield isn't broken."

UMass student combat credit card fraud

Victims of fraud sound warnings to all

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

It was days after spring break when freshman University of Massachusetts student Joelle Sanford received a phone call from her bank notifying her of possible fraudulent activity with her credit card account.

Sanford went online to check her account and was stunned when she noticed that $600 was charged under her name. Later that day, Sanford realized that the thief had more than just her credit card information - the thief had her identity. Sanford is certain the suspect is a student living on campus.

Logging onto a networking Web site called iFriends.net, the thief used Sanford's credit card information to buy a subscription and create a profile. Included in that profile was enough information to give Sanford the chills.

"They had my phone number, my address, my name, my e-mail, my boyfriend's e-mail, and they even had my cell number - It was just kind of creepy," said Sanford, who says that the person ultimately charged about $1,000 on the Web site.

Sanford's incident does not stand alone. With identity theft and credit card fraud on the rise, the exposure of students to fraud has been displayed on campus and on the Internet, forcing one local company to change its business methods.

With seven full-blown credit card fraud cases dealt by the UMass Police Department between January 2005 and April 2006, the issue has been a frequent problem for Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald, who says that the cases that his department deals with often involve a victim and possibly a known suspect.

The problem, however, is prosecuting that suspect.

When Sanford realized someone had hacked into her life, she contacted iFriends, explaining to the Web site maintainers how she never logged onto iFriends.net – a site that contains live adult video chats.

The person she spoke with at iFriends described the profile that was registered under Sanford's credit card, and things became even more unsettling.

The thief had constructed an entire phony profile under Sanford's name – stating that she was single and an economics major. Every time the thief logged on to the site and added a new feature to his or her profile, Sanford's card was charged a fee. A steady stream of charges amounted until the grand total reached $920.

Bank of America nullified the charges under the bank's Total Security Protection policy, and iFriends cancelled the account while Sanford never contacted the police regarding this issue, she is adamant that the thief lives in a dorm on the UMass campus.

There was a phone number that the perpetrator had used to call iFriends, and that number was traced back to the UMass switchboard. The thief made a call from a phone on campus, but that's where the trail went cold.

"It was scary," said Sanford, who believes that the credit card information may have been breached because she did not properly shred all of her bills. "Luckily [the bank] cancelled the charges for me, and it kind of just ended there."

Archbald says the problem with local incidents is that it's hard to prosecute the suspect at hand. Often, the bank refunds the victim, and the other victim, the credit card company, isn't willing to prosecute, because the cases are not large enough in scale to justify costly legal counsel. There have been instances when a bank has lost up to $10,000 and not appeared in court.

"It's a great feeling to identify a suspect, but in the back of your mind you're thinking about two, three, or four months from now, things are probably going to peter out and not a whole lot's going to happen with it," said Archbald.

UMass sophomore Provan Slys experienced credit card fraud in cyberspace. She had her debit card information stolen through a fraudulent e-mail masked as an official solicitation from eBay on March 13 - about a week before Sanford realized her dilemma with iFriends.

This type of e-mail, commonly known as "phishing," has become notorious among regular eBay users and is one that has all of the markings of an eBay message - the logo, the PayPal symbol, the professional-looking e-mail address. The e-mail asks the recipient to reenter their credit card number, or username and password. According to eBay.com, the most effective defense against these types of e-mails is to ignore them, and not provide any sensitive information.

Slys, who had only recently begun using eBay and was not aware of protocol, entered her credit card data without thinking twice.

"I didn't know that there were fraud e-mails that went around," Slys said. "I'm usually really cautious about anything I do online with my debit card."

According to Slys, the thief bought merchandise, and attempted to spend $800 on another purchase. After Slys filled out paperwork at Sovereign Bank, she had her account frozen for a week, and had to wait days for her new charge card to come.

"I'm glad they caught it," said Slys. "I think a lot of people just throw [information] around and are a little bit less cautious."

One local delivery company altered its business practices to reduce the vulnerability of its customers to becoming victims of credit card fraud. Sugar Jones, an Amherst-based cookie-delivery company, staples a pink slip on the side of the box that the food is brought in.

Up until last week, the pink slip had the customer's credit card number, expiration date, 3-digit code found on the back of the card (also known as the CVC2 security code), and phone number written out in print, which American Bankers Association spokesman John Hall says should not happen.

"[Sugar Jones] is required by the card companies to protect [the consumer's] information," said Hall, who was shocked to hear that the 3-digit CVC2 security code was written on the pink slip.

Hall added that Visa and MasterCard passed a rule three years ago that all machines print out receipts and that the credit card number is truncated, only revealing the last four digits of a card number.

According to visa.com, Visa's Data Security Standard says that, "...all members, merchants, and service providers that store, process or transmit cardholder data...[are required] to protect cardholder data." If these standards are breached, the business, which does so, could be subject to penalties.

After questioned about the pink slip, Sugar Jones' owner Larry Severance acknowledged the problem and as of several days ago, employees have refrained from writing out the crucial information on the slip.

With the credit card number alone, a thief could commit fraud by several different means. The first is by making a counterfeit "white card," which is a blank credit card that has a magnetic strip on the back of it. The thief would then apply the stolen number to the blank magnetic strip, thus making a copy of the victim's card. All the thief needs is the credit card number. A thief could also exploit a card number by making purchases online with the 16-digit number.

Nevertheless, Hall says the real gold mine for thieves is not necessarily the 16-digit number on the front of the card, but rather the 3-digit CVC2 security code found on the back of a credit or debit card. This number, Hall says, is not easy for people to obtain, but if they do, bank investigators have a much tougher task in cracking the case.

"It's one thing for a card number to be out there - that's fairly easy to resolve," said Hall, who is based out of Washington, D.C. "The card company is going to wonder how the [3-digit CVC2 security code] got out to the crook."

Third drug bust in 8 days on campus

University of Massachusetts police arrested a student on Thursday night for charges stemming from the distribution of marijuana, according to Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

Adam R. Perry, 19, of 60 Twin Spring Drive in Boylston, was placed under arrest at approximately 9:51 p.m. on charges of possession of a Class D drug (marijuana) with intent to distribute. He posted a bail of $3,000 at the police station before appearing in court on Friday.

The arrest concluded an investigation into the use and distribution of marijuana on the UMass campus that Archbald said lasted less than a month, adding that it was a "quickly developing case." Archbald also said police worked with sources that provided information necessary to develop a search warrant for Perry's arrest.

Perry was arrested in his dorm room on the ninth floor of Kennedy Hall in Southwest Residential Area. Seized from his room were two pounds of marijuana - divvied up in 10-by-10-inch Ziploc bags, four one-gallon Ziploc bags, and various other small bags - a small number of plants, a bong, an electronic scale, transaction records (handwritten in a small notebook), and approximately $3,960 in cash.

Archbald said that this case was conducted completely by UMass Police "from beginning to end," using both detectives and uniformed members of UMPD to complete the investigation and make the appropriate arrest. Five officers were present at the scene of the arrest. No canine unit was used.

Perry is a full-time student at UMass. A search of People Finder on the UMass website found that he was an undeclared major.

Two photographs of the seized items released by UMPD indicate that issues of High Times magazine were also taken.

SGA aims to lower textbook costs

cerns about the financial impact revisions have on students.

Retailers explained that when they learn of a pending new edition, typically several months in advance of the release date, the buyback value drops rapidly to zero.

The GAO's concern is that more frequent revisions limit the opportunity students have to reduce their costs by purchasing used textbooks and selling their textbooks back to bookstores at the end of the term. While publishers generally agreed that the revision cycle for many books is 3 to 4 years, compared with the 4-to-5 year cycles that were the standard 10 to 20 years ago, they said revisions were necessary to keep the materials current for faculty and to recoup their investments.

Publishers claimed the revision cycle is mainly driven by instructors who want the most current material and may seek products from competitors if publishers are unable to meet the demand.

Publishers cited a recent poll of 1,029 college professors commissioned by the Association of American Publishers that found that 80 percent of those polled think it is important that the material in the textbook be as current as possible.

The GAO also examined the long-term cost implications for students that may result from publishers providing lower-cost alternatives to the traditional textbook. Among these alternatives are loose-leaf textbooks that are designed to be placed in a binder and electronic textbooks that are available for purchase online.

While these options may save students money initially, wholesalers and retailers are concerned about the long-term cost implications for students. For example, students may initially pay less for a loose-leaf textbook than they would for a textbook that is bound, but wholesalers and retailers said students would be unable to sell a loose-leaf book back because it is not possible to determine whether all the pages are intact.

Another alternative, proposed by the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts, is the "Textbook Rental" program.

Working together with a committee of students, faculty and administrators, the SGA drafted a proposal for a pilot rental program. However, according to the SGA, Follett, the parent company that bought out the Textbook Annex nearly five years ago, agreed to deliver little savings for students while locking participating faculty into the same textbook for six years.

"In addition, students would be charged 50 percent of the cover price of the rentals each semester, which would result in a profit of approximately 300 percent for Follett over those six semesters," said SGA leaders in a statement released to the Daily Collegian.

"We encourage students to buy their textbooks from the local stores in downtown Amherst. We also encourage students to buy their textbooks directly from other UMass students using online trading sites like zoomassbooks.com," the statement said.

"By encouraging students to shop elsewhere, we ultimately would like to build enough leverage to sit back down with Follett representatives and negotiate a textbook rental system that would truly improve textbook affordability. But this won't happen this semester."

Tutiton hikes felt across the nation closer to graduation, I am beginning to see the burden living off a teacher's salary would be. This does concern me."

Brian Boisvert, a teaching assistant in the Spanish and Portuguese Studies Department, who will face an approximately $40,000 debt upon graduation, said, "We're all slaves to the capitalist system in which we live. I'm not advocating free tuition for students, but I'd like to be paid for what I actually do, which is work more hours than what my paycheck says. I see myself as a graduate student who teaches the equivalent of a high school teacher, yet gets maybe a third of the pay." Boisvert acknowledged, however, that he himself "made the decision to be technically impoverished by being a graduate student."

"The low pay does cause me to question this career path, but overall, my career decision is going to be made by how happy I am at what I am doing," said Kenney.

"The loan burden for most students at most public institutions such as UMass is still within affordable ranges, but if the public continues to refuse to support higher public education, we may find it increasingly difficult to sustain the quality most students and parents expect from their public higher education institutions," said Lombardi.

"UMass is critically under funded," said Gilbert, "and state legislature needs to step up and fund it like it should."

The report poses possible solutions to prevent unmanageable student debt. "The federal Pell grant, which helps students with lower incomes, has been stagnant at $4050 a year for the past four years, while college cost has soared."

The report also cites fair and affordable loan repayment policies, limits on loan interest rates, and the establishment of incentives to colleges to keep tuition low as ways to decrease the prevalence of unmanageable debt. MassPIRG is a student organization which aims to "deliver persistent result-oriented public interest activism that protects our environment, encourages a fair, sustainable economy, and fosters responsive, democratic government," according to their mission statement.

The organization works with experts to lobby the state legislature and has won victories in such areas as student loan debt, the environment, and hunger and homelessness.

The "Reverse the Raid on Student Aid Act," a proposal to cut the interest rate on student loans in half and increase student aid, went before Congress on April 13, but was defeated by two votes. Students at UMass are taking action to see this bill passed, contacting their Congressmen and circulating petitions.

"Each time we lose an essential public service, the cost to the public rises because the problems previously addressed by a public service go unresolved," said Lombardi. "Failure to fund public services is usually a poor financial bargain, saving a small amount in the short term and costing the public large amounts in the long term."

Gilbert concluded, "For a country in which people are always saying how we need more teachers and we need more people working in government, they're not really putting their money where their mouth is."

Carroll finally released by captors

I just want to thank everyone who's prayed and given us support through this time, and we're obviously looking forward to some private time with Jill."

"I'm just happy to be free. I want to be with my family," Jill said in the interview.

Jill grew up in Ann Arbor, Mich., and graduated with a Bachelor of Arts in journalism from UMass Amherst in 1999, where she also worked as news editor of the Daily Collegian.

After graduation, she worked briefly for the Wall Street Journal. When she was laid off in 2002, she moved to Jordan and began working for the Jordan Times.

She immersed herself in the culture and learned Arabic. In an article published last year in the American Journalism Review, Carroll wrote that she wanted "to learn as much about the region as possible before the fighting began."

"There was bound to be plenty of parachute journalism once the war started, and I didn't want to be a part of that," she wrote.

Since she has been in the Middle East, Carroll's work has appeared in many publications, including the Monitor, AJR, U.S. News & World Report, and the Italian News Agency.

UMass journalism professor Norm Sims, who taught Carroll in two classes, said even when she was at UMass she "would take on stories that other people backed away from."

"She was undeterred by complications, very accurate. She could be empathetic with people," he said.

Unlike most Western reporters, who are unable leave the Green Zone in Iraq, Carroll moved through the streets of Baghdad, telling stories that were rarely covered by mainstream media. One article she wrote for the Monitor, titled "Ordinary Iraqis bear brunt of war," told the story of a family that was physically, emotionally and financially devastated by a car bomb 17 months earlier.

"Jill was going out and reporting on the streets and speaking Arabic to people. That's the right thing to do, and it got her abducted," Sims said. "Jill represents the reporting problem that has grown up in this war, where if you do the right thing you put yourself at tremendous risk."

Although Jill is free, Iraq remains the most dangerous place for journalists. As of Jan. 4, more reporters have been killed in the Iraq War than in 22 years of conflict in Vietnam, according to Reporters Without Borders. At least 86 journalists and media assistants have been killed in Iraq and 39 others have been kidnapped since the war started in 2003. Three Iraqi reporters are currently held hostage.

Karen List, another of Carroll's former journalism professors, said Jill's emphasis on the good treatment she received was unsurprising.

"Telling the reporter, 'This is what you need to emphasize,' that is so her," List said.

News of Carroll's release has been met with jubilation, relief, and gratitude.

"Jill is a courageous young journalist who embodies the highest ideals of her profession ... The entire University of Massachusetts community, including the faculty members who taught Jill, and the classmates who studied with her, are thankful for the efforts of all parties who worked so tirelessly to secure her release," said UMass president Jack Wilson.

A Pentagon spokesperson said the U.S. military did not pay a ransom or have any involvement in her release. The Monitor also said it was not aware of any monetary negotiations connected to her freedom.

"We're not shading. We're not hiding. We're just saying what we know. And to our knowledge, no one was paid by anyone," said David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief.

Instead, Jill's release has been attributed to the global outpouring of support, especially in the Middle East. The Jordan Times ran an editorial on Jan. 16 titled "Our Jill" that praised Carroll's "sincere admiration for Arab culture and utmost respect for the Arab people" and said her kidnappers "could not have chosen a more wrong target." Iraq's state television aired ads in February calling for her release.

A large photo of Carroll was hung outside the city hall in Rome, and Parisians held a rally at the Eiffel Tower for her release a month after she was captured. At UMass, students and faculty attended a rally on Feb. 16.

"This is something that people have across the world worked for and prayed for and I think we are all very pleased and happy to hear of her release," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a statement yesterday.

It remains to be seen how Carroll will react to the publicity.

"She's in an awkward situation. She went over there to cover this story, and then she became the story," Sims said. "My hope is that she had the opportunity to talk to her captors. I know if she did then she's got a story that can tell us a lot about them. She had the opportunity to talk with people that nobody else can interview."

List agreed that Carroll would not be comfortable with all the focus on her as an individual reporter.

"That really is going to become a big part of her story right now," List said. "My sense is that somehow she will take the spotlight off herself and somehow she'll use this experience to further illuminate what's happening to Iraqi people."

Jill Carroll, seen above in the Washington Post headquarters, was one of 39 journalists who had been kidnapped since the war started in 2003.

actual negotiating, but rather puts out an offer and the Department of Capitol Asset Management (DCAM) negotiates on UMass behalf. No one at DCAM was available for comment.

ATG Inc. treasurer James Mulcahy says that negotiations between his company and the University have been ongoing since January of 2003.

"There's a lot of talk, and that's all it is," said Mulcahy, who was hesitant to verify whether or not the University's offer was accepted by ATG Inc.

Michael Wiseman, director of the Office of Greek Affairs at UMass, also would not confirm a deal and Haynes declined to comment on the situation. The Massachusetts Hampshire County Registry of Deeds has no listing of any property sale of the fraternities and sorority, which means no purchase of the land has been finalized.

Both Moeung, who is the Sigma Psi Zeta president, and Levine say that it was made obvious to them that their houses will be sold to UMass, and that letters were sent to them from lawyers representing ATG Inc. confirming the details of the deal.

"We got the letter from their lawyers saying that we have to move out, because [Sigma Psi Zeta] is being sold," said Moeung. "[Haynes] told us we have to pack up by June 30, and that's when we have to move out."

According to Levine, Tran and Moeung, the letter from the ATG Inc. representatives and Haynes' comments to them are the only sources that have confirmed the completion of the real estate deal. Regardless, Levine cancelled his fraternity's inspections, which were scheduled for April 16, because he and his brothers are currently shopping for a new location to live.

"It's kind of frustrating because Susan [Haynes] told us [about the deal], but we haven't had official word from the school," said Tran. "We feel like no one really cares about us. They didn't even offer us any alternatives so basically, we're lost."

The lack of communication by the University and the late emergence of this potential situation have left the members of the fraternities and the sorority without many living options for next semester. Many of Levine's brothers had already cancelled their on-campus housing for the Fall 2006 semester prior to the news, leaving few choices for where they could live.

While Tran will be graduating in May, and Moeung will be spending the upcoming semester abroad in Australia, other members of the Greek community felt deserted on hearing about the possible circumstances.

"Me and 30 of my best friends [are] stranded for next semester," said Levine. "The University never called them and gave them other options."

Talk between ATG, Inc. and UMass has been ongoing for over three years, and in March of 2003 the five properties were posted on ebay.com after UMass officials did not make an offer. Town of Amherst records show that all five properties are assessed at a combined total of $2,045,000.

On July 13, 2005, UMass suspended two fraternities for safety violations - including fire, health and building violations - one of which was Sigma Alpha Mu of 395 North Pleasant St. Since that suspension, the house has been vacant.

"Right now, Frat Row's dead," said Tran. "I can't say that I disagree with the University, just because their arguments are legitimate. That's the entrance to the school; all of the houses are beat up and it just looks bad. I guess they want to appeal to the parents, because tuition is going up so much, they have to sell as much as possible."

Pedestrians take on traffic

Recently, a number of pedestrians have been hit by motor vehicles on campus — six, to be exact, within a month. However, it should come as no surprise, seeing as how the pedestrian population that shuffles around campus day after day is apparently impervious to motor vehicles.

Nick Belanger

Apparently all those kids crossing the street with iPods on are thinking to themselves, "Cars? Cars can't hurt me. I'm car-proof." Case in point, I've seen people cross the street at a busy intersection as if they thought they were Moses and traffic would part like the Red Sea. I guess what I'm getting at is that pedestrians are taking for granted that drivers will lean on their brakes for them, so how many more people need to get hit before people become more self-aware?

A BRIEF RANT

Anywhere else in the world, pedestrians yield for traffic. I mean, after all, getting hit by a car would probably suck. But, for some reason, here traffic comes to a screeching halt because little Ms. Ugg Boots needs to get to Psych 101 10 minutes early so she can save a seat for Susie Sweat Pants who is running 10 minutes late because she is putting on a pound of makeup (but is still wearing sweatpants, which I don't get). Most likely she's putting on the pound of makeup to impress Mr. iPod, who will probably get hit by a car driven by Joe Road Rage on his way to class as well.

THE REAL DANGER TO PUBLIC SAFETY

Pedestrians need to be more self-aware, and for the love of God, respect that 2000-pound car speeding down the street enough to not step in front of it. You really never know when a driver is checking him/herself out in the rearview mirror and not watching your dumb ass tempt fate and leap into the crosswalk.

For some reason, here traffic comes to a schreeching halt because little Ms. Ugg Boots needs to get to Psych101 10 minutes early so she can save a seat for Susie Sweat Pants who is running 10 minutes late because she is putting on a pound of makeup (but is still wearing sweatpants, which I don't get).

I know that pedestrians have the right of way, but it has gotten a bit ridiculous as of late. UMPD is out in full force cracking down on drivers who roll past crosswalks with pedestrians waiting on the sidewalk. Nothing beats getting a ticket for being a danger to public safety.

However, I'm curious to whether or not the UMPD is out in full force cracking down on the biggest threats to public safety, jaywalkers. You know who I'm talking about, those three dudes you always see (and they might as well be the same three guys) sprinting across the road from Boyden heading towards Southwest causing you to stop while making a turn thereby trapping other drivers in the intersection. But hey, those pedestrians can do no wrong. God forbid a driver force a person to stop walking for five seconds.

ROAD RAGE

I live off campus. Every day I drive onto campus and park in the garage (thank you Daily Collegian, one perk of being a manager here). While driving around campus during the day I have experienced some of the worst cases of road rage I've ever had.

I have this vein in my forehead that pops out, I start to sweat and eventually I roll down the window and start yelling at people. When that doesn't work I'm that guy stopped at a crosswalk sobbing in my SUV (I love gas). Needless to say, if I'm trying to cross campus in the middle of the day, I'm always late to class, but it's cool because Susie Sweat Pants will fill me in on what I missed.

SOLUTION

First off, in no way do I condone hitting people with your car, and in no way is this editorial taking all the blame off those drivers who have hit people. However, I do believe drivers are entitled to rights, just as well as pedestrians. We are in the midst of a semester-long pedestrian safety program designed by UMass officials to improve the attitudes and actions of pedestrians as well as drivers.

Needless to say, our administration understands the problem, but this pedestrian safety program is really just a small step towards fixing the problem as a whole. In order to improve pedestrian safety campus-wide, more traffic lights and crossing lights need to be put in. Crossing guards could be implemented at busy areas on campus, and pedestrians should be penalized for jaywalking.

It's important that UMass becomes a campus where drivers and pedestrians can coexist without any more accidents. The best way to do that is to force pedestrians to wait their turn before crossing and allow lights to regulate the flow of traffic through campus, not people crossing the street.

Real men of genius part deux

Matt Brochu

Ask anyone's parents, and they'll be the first to tell you how smart their kids are. Sure, the little tikes may have needed three tries to get through first grade, but it wasn't their fault. They're abstract thinkers (can't color inside the lines) who conceptualize concepts (pick their nose and eat it) rather than focusing their energies upon academic trivialities (peeing in some place other than their pants).

I've been at this University long enough to feel like one of those proud parents. Each and every one of you is a real man (or woman) of genius in some way, and don't let any professor, dean or letter of expulsion tell you any differently.

To celebrate the random strokes of genius that you collectively bless me with on a daily basis, I've decided, once again, to blatantly rip off those "Bud Light Presents: Real Men of Genius" ads that were so popular two years ago.

READER'S NOTE:

1) If you haven't seen or heard these commercials, then download them immediately.

2) Words within the parentheses indicate outbursts from that amazingly talented backup singer (who just so happens to be the lead singer of Survivor, the group that inspired us with "Eye of the Tiger").

UMass presents: Real Men of Genius (Real Men of Genius). Today we salute you, Mr. Caped Outside the Bars Singer and White Bucket Player (Mr. Caped Bucket Player). Through rain, sleet, and finger-numbing snow, you provide Bel Biv Devoe-quality entertainment to the poor kids waiting in line to pay way too much to get into the Monkey Bar (I'd rather wait in line at the DMV).

Armed with Super Grover's red cape and a set of pipes that could make doves cry, you spit hot fire to the tune of six Motown classics that simply scream, "I don't want to work." (You just want to bang on the drum all day). It truly seems as though God pressed the repeat button on your soul (Yeeeah, you're a soul survivor). So crack open an ice cold Bud Light, oh Sultan of the Slow Jam, because we heard it through the grapevine that you don't want to know our names. You just want to bang bang bang, and you know what? We're OK with that.

Today we salute you, Mrs. 48-year-old Dumb Question Asker (Mrs. 48-year-old Dumb Question Asker). Stationed in the front row with a sexy set of bifocals and a backpack sporting your initials, you figured the best way to get back at your husband for sleeping with a college student was to go back to college yourself (Midterm Momma). Like a vicious, pre-menopausal predator, you silently take hundreds of pages of verbatim notes, patiently waiting for your opportunity to strike. Your defenseless prey? The professor. Your weapon of choice? Pointless, irrelevant, time-wasting questions that excite you in some weird way (I'm so excited. I'm so excited. I'm so . . . scared).

So crack open an ice cold Bud Light as you sit down to watch "Fried Green Tomatoes" again, oh Queen of Questions, because without Curves members like yourself, our final exam wouldn't have a curve at all.

Today we salute you, Mrs. Library MySpace Updater (Mrs. Library MySpace Updater). While we run laps in the library basement searching for an empty computer to print out a trivial assignment worth 40 percent of our final grade, you bug a valuable PC cubicle with a much more important task at hand: your MySpace background is five days old, and good God, it needs to be changed (Louis Vuitton backgrounds are so last week). Sure, the real world is cool to live in every once in a while, but (cue up the Cheers theme song) sometimes you want to go where everybody knows your name, as well as your eight best friends' names, whether or not you're scared of thunderstorms, and if you happened to be a mixed drink, which one you would totally be (You're a fuzzy navel) . . . all without having to go through the hassle of actually meeting people. So send Tom a comment with a picture of an ice cold Bud Light, oh Wench of the Web log, because this isn't just anyone's space, it's your space damn it, and while we have no problem with you living for the nights you can't remember with the MySpace friends you'll never forget, we would appreciate it if you could do so in the privacy of your own dorm room.

Today we salute you, Mr. Dyslexic Beer Pong Consolidator (Mr. Dyslexic Beer Pong Consolidator). Through the magic of Natty Light and Constantine Gianacopolos (the 28-year-old Greek man you claim to be twice a week at Liquors44), you move those cups around with all the grace and efficiency of a thumbless man trying to unhook a bra (Set those babies free, yeah). While the rest of us rack our brains with calculus and chemistry, you find it impossible to rack three cups into the shape of a triangle in under 20 minutes (Corresponding Parts of Congruent Triangles are Congruent). So crack open an ice cold Bud Light, oh king of the Re-rack, and pass one to your friends, Mr. Compulsive Beer Pong Leaner and Mrs. Feeling Up My Teammate's Boobs Beer Pong Distracter, because even though those Solo cups may represent your own personal Rubik's Cube, they certainly aren't going to drink themselves.

Competition is not the answer

Andrew Freeman

Quiz question: what can you do better, in the eyes of a CEO, than a talented graduate from India or China? Take a couple of moments to think about it. Ready? The answer is nothing.

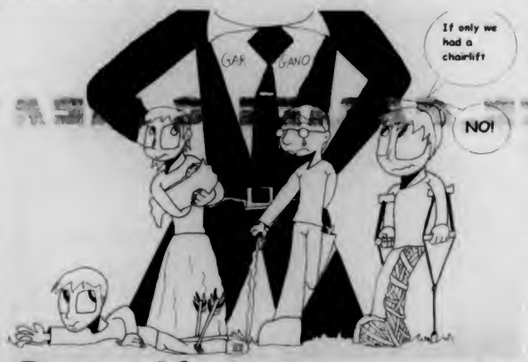
That's not meant to be an insult. It's just a reflection of different economic values, namely, your work costs more. As a college graduate in this country, you probably expect a minimum income of $30,000 at an entry-level position, and much more over the course of your career. Prices in America are set to our high standards of living, and, as a result, we cannot suddenly see our wages fall to the levels in third-world countries and hope to survive.

Now what if I told you that people with similar levels of education and skill would do your job for much less, say for $10,000 a year. What self-respecting businessman would hire you over the competitor? You can't hope to compete, unless you accept unacceptable wage decreases, or move to the country of your competitor.

America faced this first with deindustrialization. The decline of America's manufacturing industry. All around us are the shells of former industrial cities: Holyoke and Springfield provide two of the best examples, marked by corruption, high crime, and unemployment. What was once America's industry has deserted for Mexico, China, or wherever the wind blows, the wages are low and government is oppressive.

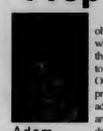
None of us are going to be working in industrial jobs. College students aim for work in areas like business, law and medicine, in professions where we expect only to compete with other Americans. However, increasingly any industry that can be exported or outsourced will be, because the new technology can support it. When you call for technical support on a product, oftentimes the person on the other end of the line will be in India. Medical tests such as MRI or CT scans can be interpreted in other countries. Outsourcing now occurs in healthcare, computers, law and research, and it will only grow, and there will be ever fewer good jobs.

Outsourcing and global competition are accepted, thanks to a little joke that's been running rampant in our society — trickle-down economics. This is the belief that by giving the rich people lower taxes, they will reinvest in the economy, propelling it to new heights. It isn't true. As a businessman, why would I invest in America, where the economy grows at 3 percent per year, when I can put my money in China, where economic growth tops 10 percent annually? The purveyors of this myth maintain that such efficiency keeps prices lower, but Americans without well-paying jobs will not be able to afford even slightly cheaper products.



Medical tests such as MRI or CT scans can be interpreted in other countries. Outsourcing now occurs in healthcare, computers, law and research, and it will only grow, and there will be ever fewer good jobs.

On a global scale, we will see a race to the bottom. Every industry that can be moved abroad to areas of cheaper labor will be. If wages should rise in an area, then companies can move on to the next cheap labor zone. This will play out idiotically. For example, China might become an economic powerhouse tomorrow, but the second wages rise too high there, or the government clamps down on business, the jobs will go elsewhere. Then if India tries to raise wages and better working conditions, companies will flee. Businesses will look out at the entire world and force everyone to compete against each other, while raking in enormous profits. The trends towards greater centralization of wealth will continue, until a few people scattered across the world will own most of it.



So how do we deal with global competition? There are two ways to approach this: protectionism on the national level, or rising above it. Protectionism is what we're used to — using tariffs and other governmental restrictions to encourage domestic business while keeping out foreign competition. However, this won't work, for a variety of reasons. The problem is not that American companies are being squeezed out — it's that most major companies have no loyalty to any country. All we can do to keep them here is try to lower standards, which doesn't work, or use the force of legislation.

As long as we try to compete, as long as we view workers in other parts of the world as enemies, we will be unable to succeed. A war of all against all will only line the pockets of the corporations, while sinking everyone — Chinese, Indians and Americans — into poverty. Instead, we need to rise above competition. We must cooperate across the oceans and across the world, to raise the value and standards of labor, and to limit corporate exploitation, because there is no viable alternative.

Proposal for incline commute

Adam Mcgillen

It is a melancholy object for those who walk through this great campus to have to climb up Orchard Hill. Its presence is a great additional grievance to those students who live at the apex of UMass. Those dorms found atop the earthen mountain that towers over our beautiful campus would certainly be considered among the best, if it were not for that one repugnant attribute of the daunting commute home.

Whoever could find a fair, cheap and easy method of getting around this hefty burden would deserve to have his statue set up as a preserver of the student body. I will now therefore humbly offer to the public opinion a modern proposal for a simple and effective solution: a full-fledged chair lift scaling the slopes of Orchard Hill, accompanied by a water slide, complete with highly durable tubes large enough to accommodate a party of four. I have turned my thoughts to this subject for many months and have found that the benefits of this proposal are boundless.

Perhaps the most obvious benefit is the simplified commute. No longer will residents of the four Orchard Hill dormitories be plagued by burning muscles, deflated self-esteems, bad grades and hill-related injuries. There is perhaps nothing more degrading to a person's character than the loss of motivation due to having just completed a near-vertical climb up the steep face of the hill.

It is not uncommon to hear the sound of text books set aflame or tossed in the circular file as students give up their drive for success after exerting so much effort just to get back from class. The climb itself is the most overwhelming part of the daily grind of homework, leaving actual work to be done for class in the dust. With the construction of a chair lift, this hindrance upon the abilities of great UMass students will be removed and grades will soar to new heights.

There is likewise a second great advantage to this proposal. Not only will grades improve, but those living atop the hill will have new incentive to go to the free gyms around campus, improving their lifestyle further. Many students justify their inactive and indolent afternoons by lamenting about that redundant struggle they must deal with every day. It is a detriment to their health, and without the hill tearing down their motivation, students will find it easier to get to a gym, where they can work out more than just their legs for free.

No longer will residents of the four Orchard Hill dormitories be plagued by burning muscles, deflated self-esteems, bad grades and hill-related injuries.

Health benefits do not end there, though. Hill-related injuries have caused bodily harm to many students over the years, whether it simply is associated with excessive physical activity while inebriated, or the result of dangerous ice patches stretching across the entire slope. Having spoken with several Orchard Hill residents, there is an all too common trend.

"My back always kills me after climbing the hill," stated Norman Earnest of Dickinson Hall.

"I was walking up the hill one day, and I got a rock in my shoe. Now I have gangrene," claims Gregory Kleciak of Field Hall.

The chair lift will reduce these dangers when climbing up the hill, and the water slide will allow for a controlled decent down the steep slopes. In the winter, the slide can be converted to a bobsleigh like course using the very same tubes as will be used in the summer.

It will no longer be necessary for students to feel the shame and embarrassment of falling while navigating the tricky slopes of Orchard Hill, a fall that will no doubt end in a 30-foot downward slide with friends laughing at your back. Injuries and illnesses that occur atop the hill will no longer be an issue either, as a trip to Health Services will be expedited by the slide.

As I mentioned, the benefits of this proposal are boundless, and they go beyond O-Hill residents. The rising cost of attending the University is no mystery, but the chair lift and accompanying water slide can help curb this problem. It will not only open the door for students to make use of the free gyms, but it will create jobs on campus, reduce the usage of cars (thus decreasing gas and maintenance expenses for students who have vehicles) and attract visitors to campus which will create revenue.

To put this proposal into effect would cost approximately $1.5 million (a chair lift built for the hill at $1.3 million, a water slide at $100,000 and an industrial snow maker at $5,000). A measly amount considering UMass is the fifth most expensive public university in the nation, according to a recent survey done by USA Today. If students must pay so much to attend a public university, why should they not reap luxurious benefits?

Oh, and don't forget the cup holders, or the climate controlled seats. And flat panel HDTVs installed into the back of each chair would be a nice touch.

MEAL PLAN NEWS

For Over 10 Years UMass Students Have Been Eating Off-Campus... And Loving Every Bite.

Off-Campus Meal Plan
By Dana Zucker

For over 10 years, the UMass born OCMP meal plan has virtually transformed campus dining, or should I say off-campus dining not only here, but nationwide. Since UMass Alumni David Diana started the Off-Campus Meal Plan over 11 years ago, it has been the primary form of payment off-campus for UMass and 5 college students alike.

The Off-Campus Meal Plan (OCMP) card enables students to eat at area restaurants so they do not have to worry about having cash on hand. Parents do not have to worry about where their money is being spent. More than 60 Amherst Area restaurants are signed up with OCMP including the Antonio's Pizza, The Loose Goose Cafe, Panera, Chili's, Subway, Judie's, and Ben & Jerry's.

"When Tanya calls me up and asks for OCMP meals I am delighted. At least I know where my money is going"

New incoming freshman Greg, who is moving into the dorms this upcoming fall, said he would most likely use the OCMP card as a supplement to his on-campus meal plan. "It would be more convenient than having to bug my parents for money," Greg said. "It would be nice not having to carry around cash and plus, I occasionally eat out or order delivery." Greg added he was somewhat worried about his food options in the dorms. "I think I will like the dorm food, it seems pretty accommodating, but I know I will be venturing out in town a few times a week," Greg said.

Michael Hauke, the Director of Marketing and also a UMass graduate states that OCMP is not only convenient for students but also easy for parents. They know exactly where the money is being spent. "Students don't have to worry about not having enough cash on them or afraid to use the credit card too much. Its very easy to use...and there is the added bonus for students of receiving tons of discounts from restaurants." One mother of a former UMass student and OCMP card holder reports "When Tanya calls me up and asks for OCMP meals I am delighted. At least I know where my money is going, whether it is to Chili's or Judie's. I know Tanya is eating well, not partying or buying clothes." Vivian Sami, mother of Tanya a former UMass student.

Sophomore Mike Hersey said he uses the OCMP card to keep track of money easier. "Food gets real expensive and cooking ... takes too much time," Hersey said. "I get sick of eating a lot of the same things so it's cool to diversify what I eat."

ARTS & LIVING

ORIENTATION EDITION 2006 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The best of new [illegible]lc 2006

"I like Beethoven, especially the poems." - Ringo Starr

40 years after forming The Kinks, Ray Davies released his first official full length solo album, "Other People's Lives."

Say Anything is a band that insists on originality in their music, but their new album features a style similar to Green Day.

Public Enemy member Chuck D is considered an MC who speaks the truth.

Say Anything 6.5/10

Say Anything... Is A Real Boy
J Records

The record industry continues to bite its own hand with re-releasing independent label albums when the artist signs with a major label. Instead of just pushing for the already released material, they have the newer version include some B-sides or extra tracks that current fans will enjoy, which will then force them to find a way to buy another copy of the album.

This time the re-release is Say Anything's album, "Say Anything...Is A Real Boy." Yes, the band stole their name from Cameron Crowe's Lloyd meets girl love story, but that doesn't matter.

What really matters is the music that fills up this album. The band insists that the original songs on this album make up a rock 'n' roll opera, similar to the idea Green Day, Armor For Sleep and Coheed and Cambria took with all of their latest albums. But when it boils down to it, the 13 songs don't sound much different from a non-themed album.

Now, in the re-released version of the album there are an additional seven songs, making the album long enough to be considered an opera. But even with the additional songs, the theme isn't really there.

Regardless of theme, the 20 songs are catchy, sloppy pop-punk with emo influences. Each one is lined with front man Max Bemis's tongue-in-cheek lyrics. Bemis is by no means a poet with a guitar, but his lyrics are enjoyable. They make you laugh at one point and nod your head along during another.

The instrumentation of Say Anything follows the typical chord structure of the underground pop-punk genre — for non-listeners of the genre, this means that nothing is too difficult to play. Drummer Coby Linder is no Keith Moon; in fact, his drumming is rather boring. The songs, as a whole, sound as if they intertwine into one another due to the lack of variety, which is why they're sloppy pop-punk in the first place.

MTV will definitely take notice of this album this time around, and they just might have enough energy to make it on "Total Request Live." Say Anything has vast potential to take Fall Out Boy down and become your 14-year-old sister's new favorite band.

Slow Runner 5/10

No Disossemble
Red Distribution

Slow Runner is exactly what their name implies: slow. Not that being slow is a bad thing; the band Low made a career for itself by being slow, and now it is credited with a genre birth.

But Slow Runner is different from Low; they are more instrumental and more radio friendly with their album "No Disassemble."

"No Disassemble" is without a doubt a well put together album. Each song varies from the one before it. Although some of the songs have too much use of the synthesizer, the rest of the album without it makes up the much better parts.

The lyrics are simple and straightforward, which is not a bad thing by any means. They are definitely the main focus of the album; the instrumentation compliments the lyrics, coating them in a poppy, Beatles-esque background, although they sound more like David Gray than the Beatles.

Even Flynn's vocals at times appear to sound like Gray, especially during the song "Streamlined," which is the album's ballad. After "Streamlined," the album goes back to its pop feeling with a hint of country twang, which is a throwback to the fact Flynn grew up in South Carolina and moved back there after going to college in Boston.

The biggest fault of "No Disassemble" is the fact that the album starts to drag when the filler songs start to come on. Unfortunately, this hurts the album's rating, despite the first half being free of any filler and actually a fun listen.

Like so many others, Slow Runner got carried away with the idea of making an entire album of material when they should have made an EP. The EP would have been close to perfect modern pop-rock. One can only hope that when the band attempts to record new material, they will know their limits and record only songs that are really needed. Only then the band will have a shot of being noticed in the depth of the mainstream pop world with other bands like the Goo Goo Dolls and Maroon 5.

Edan 8/10

Beauty and the Beat
Lewis Records

Boston-based psychedelic rapper/producer Edan has begun to make a name for himself based on the strength of "Beauty and the Beat," his second record. Even from the intro track, "Polite Meeting," it is clear that Edan has crafted a unique world, a mix of '60s psychedelia, late '80s/early '90s sunshine hip-hop and something that is purely 21st century. He clearly has a sense of hip-hop history, as well, intoning at the beginning of "I See Colours," "Prince Paul already used this loop But I'm gonna keep it moving and put you up on the scoop;" the impressive "Tumbling Over Words That Rhyme" cites myriad rap pioneers as Edan forges ahead on his own.

In a world where it seems that everyone is trying to latch on to whatever the latest trend is, posturing themselves as the greatest thing on earth, Edan is refreshing. While he occasionally falls into some hip-hop trappings (i.e. bravado, homophobia as a means of being manly), Edan serves as an antidote to much of what is wrong with many modern rappers. "Torture Chamber" is nowhere as scary as the title indicates; in fact, it is one of the album's trippiest songs, with a wavy beat and a dash of reverb on the vocals that makes the whole song float. "Rock and Roll" lives up to its title without even approaching the weary world of rap-rock. Edan uses a lot of guitars and rockist instrumentation while still keeping things distinctly hip-hop and completely fresh.

"Beauty and the Beat" is the type of cohesive, full album that seems very rare in the world of rap music. Not one note is a waste and not one song is filler. As a result, the album is brief, coming in at just over 30 minutes with 13 tracks. However, the album revels in its brevity, bouncing from song to song at a fervent pace, which matches Edan's rapping and production style to a tee.

What makes "Beauty and the Beat" even more exciting is the fact that is has an instant payoff as well as a sense of hidden subtleties. It is an album that sets out to impress immediately but has enough content that it simply just gets better and bet-

Graduate Art Student Association hosts reputable art critic in SOM

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Linda Weintraub, an internationally renowned art critic and overall authority on certain aspects of art, will be visiting the University of Massachusetts this week on Dec. 1. She will be stopping in at various studios around campus and holding a lecture at the Isenberg School of Management with a question and answer session at the end.

Who is this mystery woman? Why should anyone care? Art is dead, some might say. It is all a lost cause. Push her out of the lecture room where we could all learn more important things, like how to increase our already-bulging profits.

The answer is quite simple: art triumphs over all. And, by all means, it should. For this absolute expert of everything art, this entrepreneur of post-modern, contemporary, and avant-garde artwork, to come to UMass and teach one of at least the bare basics of the art framework, one should be grateful. Her lecture is aptly named, "Artists Who Innovate." She will no doubt cover a wide array of artists from our present times.

Miss Weintraub has quite a full reputation. She is the former director of the Emerging Arts Program at Oberlin College, the author of several textbooks in the area and future author of two more textbooks, soon to be released. She will, no doubt, address these future works in her lecture. Not only this, but she has taught classes on contemporary art history and has managed to fly through Rutgers University with a degree as a Master of Fine Arts. Let's just say this isn't Drawing 101. She knows her stuff. But step back for a moment; take this all in, one fact at a time.

In our society today, there are many bizarre instances of art all around. Bands such as Xiu Xiu and Deerhoof are floating by and people are not even blinking an eye. Art exhibitions are popping up just about everywhere and people simply disregard it all as background noise. Sometimes it is so overwhelming that people will just get flustered and forget it all. That is where Linda Weintraub, we hope, comes into play.

At UMass, students have their very own experts on just about every aspect of contemporary art in our current times. The student body simply cannot pass up this opportunity to question and find answers to art in either general or specific terms. If you are asking yourself why she is such a great expert on these things, how she got in her shoes, what makes her better or more knowledgeable than me, then this is your chance to find out. This is your chance to put her to the test; to ask her whatever it is that has got your scratching your head. She has been at this for quite some time - she has been lecturing around the country since 1996.

She will be waltzing around our campus Dec. 1. The lecture will be held in room 137, Isenberg School of Management, at 5:45 p.m.

It would be interesting to see what she says about the buildings around our campus, even; the beautiful, inspirational, colorful, bright, cheerful, bizarre, energetic buildings that we have decorating the university area.

AIDS advocate shares her harrowing story

BY JAKE MONTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

AIDS awareness advocate Vanessa Johnson shared her personal story to address why AIDS is the leading cause of death among African-American women on Thursday at the University of Massachusetts Everywoman's Center.

The speech was hosted by Sandra Mandel, the associate director of special events at the Everywoman's Center, an on-campus resource devoted to empowering and promoting equity for women.

Mandel said she noticed the statistic in September 2005, and immediately sought to find an expert on the subject. Her phone calls led her to Vanessa Johnson, who because of a busy schedule was unable to speak until recently. Johnson told Mandel that in the past she has found it effective to tell her story.

As a woman living with HIV and a longtime sufferer of sexual abuse, Johnson's story is intensely personal. Johnson said, "I use the personal story because a lot of people are afraid to talk about HIV, so it's really important to understand there are human beings who live with this disease — that it's more than what they see on the TV and read in the newspaper."

"Boundaries have always been an issue for me," Johnson said in her speech, "because they have never been properly set." She spoke of her father who left home at an early age and a teenage babysitter who molested her repeatedly while she wore a blindfold. When her father returned home he forced oral sex upon her. This sexual abuse went on until she was 21 years old.

She finally told her mother about it when she was in college.

Johnson said, "Bits and pieces of my life have led to my risk exposure. That's why I'm telling you this story."

She got involved with her friend's father, Wayne. They both had multiple partners and were using recreational drugs on a regular basis to deal with what she believes stemmed from a lot of childhood abuse. Johnson was diagnosed with AIDS in 1990.

"[The] sexual abuse and assaults that children and young adults suffer ... can lead them down a path to promiscuous sex and drug use. Sometimes it's because that's what you've known," she said.

The speech was co-sponsored by Amanda Collings from the Women's Health Project, Jacqui Tinn of Women of Color Leadership Network and Eboni Rafus of Graduate Women's Network.

"I was shocked to find out AIDS is the number one killer of African-American women," Rafus said. "By sharing what happened to her, she gave us all a sense as to why African American women are at risk for the disease. She did this in an organic, personal way that put a face to the problem instead of just bombarding the audience with numbers and statistics."

Johnson is the Deputy Director of the Capital District African American Coalition on AIDS (CDAACA) and Board Chair of the National Association of People With AIDS (NAPWA). She got her start as a volunteer for the Albany Medical Center as their HIV peer advocate.

When Johnson has talked to college students in the past, she's given out lollipops and told students to exchange the candy with their neighbor after having had it in their mouth. When they refused, she told them they'd be doing the same thing by having oral sex with someone they didn't know.

"HIV is preventable," she said. "If we just pay enough attention to ourselves and the people we're involved with we can prevent it."

Mandel said what she learned from the speech was that "it is possible to survive and have a meaningful life. I thought [Vanessa] was a shining example of that."

Johnson has a 22-year-old son named Brandon who is not HIV-positive. For a long time she was angry at God, but things are different now.

"I know God watches over me and I know I'm here for a reason," she said.

Reggae phenomenon graces the Calvin

BY MORGAN-ANN ROUSSEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Tuesday night the Calvin Theater featured a show by reggae's newest and Jewest phenomenon, Matisyahu. The Hasidic reggae superstar, as he is affectionately known, showed off his harmonious skills by fusing the art of rap, reggae and beat boxing, then topped it all of with an energy that electrified a mixed crowd of religious followers, college funk-a-holics, and music lovers of all ages.

One of the most enjoyable elements of Tuesday's show was its upbeat and soulful essence, displayed through Matisyahu's poignant connection with the audience.

Let's not beat around the fact that looking at this long bearded, black garbed character causes one significant question to rear its ugly head. "Should I be here? I'm not Jewish..." Honestly, the occasional emergence of Yiddish lyrics and spiritual chanting lends to the feeling that you are attending a religious ceremony of some kind. However with an open heart, and mind, the connection to Matisyahu's music quickly dissolves any feelings of displacement due to religious background.

With Matisyahu leading the way with vocals and beat-box, Jonah David hammered the drums while Aaron Dugan was on the guitar and Josh Werner played bass. The band started off on stage with no sign of the leading man.

After a few minutes of the band building up some instrumental feeling, Matisyahu appeared on stage and started the show off slow and easy, then livened it up with some buoyant reggae flavor with songs like "Youth," "Fire of Heaven," and other new and old songs. During the show the beat-boxing luminary enjoyed bopping around to the funky beats his band unleashed and even jumped from one step to the next with a lively fever of fresh sounds that could come only from his heart.

The eclectic artist was graced on stage twice by a talented musician who plucked a hefty reggae string instrument, to which Matisyahu beat boxed with rhythmic sounds and lip twisting fire that set the crowd into a tempest of tempo and shoulder jolting bops.

The Calvin wasn't the ideal place for a show of this nature, which inspires dancing and free movement. However the restraints of ticketed seating assignments didn't keep fans from jamming in the aisle when they could, or boogying right in front of their seats. The lucky others who enjoyed general admission were free to gallivant in front of the stage area right below Matisyahu's exquisite vocal cadence which echoed into the smoky lights.

However any venue is better than none at all, and fans of all seating arrangements felt free to "toke up" at their discretion, regardless of the blatant religious affiliation surrounding them. Surely it was an interesting mix of Orthodoxy and marijuana - doubtful that the two are mixed in many other contexts.

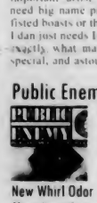
It seems the fans of this new music fusion find delight in not only the messages Matisyahu gives in his lyrics - in fact many of his fans don't share that religious common ground - but rather a unity through the feelings of peace and union delivered in each syllable of his sound. When the man chants, language is dissolved from English or Yiddish to a higher tongue of pure feeling and soul.

The band came to a close with an awakening performance of "King Without A Crown," one of the more popularized tracks on Matisyahu's 2005 album "Live at Stubbs." Finally, to wrap up the evening the crowd grooved to "Jerusalem," from his recent album "Youth," which debuted on March 7th.

Formerly known as Matthew Miller, the 26-year-old musician took on his Jewish Orthodox name, Matisyahu, after discovering a higher spiritual devotion to the Jewish Orthodox religion.

Matisyahu's upcoming tour dates include California for the Coachella Music and Arts Festival, Ireland, Finland, and Tennessee in June for the much awaited Bonaroo Music festival. Check out a full listing of the upcoming tour dates at his music website www.matismusic.com. You don't want to miss an opportunity to experience his performance, which was surely a pleasure.

In April Matthew Miller, the musical wonder known to most as Matisyahu, performed at the Calvin Theater in Northampton.



The Hasidic reggae superstar released a new album "Youth" on March 7th, 2006.

ter on repeat listens, as any good album does. On a cursory listen the album can seem a bit overwhelming; it is so big, colorful, druggy and energetic that each song seems to transport into a world of its own. The more and more spins it gets, though, "Beauty and the Beat" reveals each part of each beat, and each line in each song, and proves itself to be the kind of grand, thought-out work that signals the arrival of a new, important artist. Edan doesn't need big name producers, hamfisted boasts or the latest trends; Edan just needs Edan, and that's exactly what makes him such a special, and astounding talent.

Public Enemy 6/10

New Whirl Odor
Slam Jamz Records

As the intro track on "New Whirl Odor" proudly states, "Public Enemy made me realize that all rap is not the same ... they changed the perception of what hip-hop could be." Almost 20 years since PE released their first album, unleashing their furious sound and message on the world, one of the best acts in rap is still alive and kicking, if not in full force.

"New Whirl Odor" is the group's first release since 2002's "Revolverlution," an album that combined new songs with live cuts and remixes, and, like that release, is a mixed bag. Fans and critics alike argue about how long it's been since the band released an above average album; they haven't released a truly great album since 1990 or 1991, and while they have had flashes of brilliance to varying extents, the band has felt stale since at least 1999. Of course the reality of a "stale" Public Enemy is that the group is still more intelligent, interesting and vital than the majority of modern hip-hop and "New Whirl Odor" only emphasizes that, while not doing anything particularly excellent in the process.

Public Enemy gained fame and notoriety for being a unique, groundbreaking hip-hop group; they sounded like nothing else on earth and prided themselves on that. Perhaps it is a commentary on the state of the country that the band hasn't been able to change, evolve or move to the next level. No wonder Chuck D still rhymes about similar topics: the country has moved from one Bush to another while retaining almost all the same characteristics of the first administration. That being said, Chuck D is still one of the few MCs that speaks the truth, even if it's occasionally via clumsy metaphors, and is still one of the most commanding people to ever be recorded on tape.

On every track, from "New Whirl Odor" to "MKLVFKWR" to "Makes Ya Blind," Chuck D is filled with the type of righteous, vitriolic anger that inspires great artists of all forms. Chuck D might not be breaking new ground with his raps, and none of the verses on this album will probably rank among his best, but simply by being around and being himself he makes an important statement.

What damages "New Whirl Odor" more are the beats, or the lack thereof. Few songs are outright terrible, though the metal riffing of "What A Fool Believes" is simply bad, but there is nothing on here that even tries to compete with the legendary work of The Bomb Squad on the early PE records. Most of the beats are generic, 21st century hard-rap material. It certainly makes sense that it is harder for Chuck D, Flavor Flav and Professor Griff (who sounds generally sub par on the whole album, anyway) to excel when the music they are working with isn't as inspiring.

Regardless of the faults - and there are faults - it is always good to hear from Public Enemy, especially given the generally sad state of hip-hop, music and society as a whole. Even when the songs fall short of the high bar set by early PE records, they still have the stamp of a great artist, even if they aren't at the top of their game.

Ray Davies 6/10

Other People's Lives
V2 Records

As singer, guitarist and principal songwriter of The Kinks, Ray Davies has been the man behind some of rock's greatest songs. Over 40 years after starting one of the most influential, important and wonderful bands in the history of the genre, Davies has released his first official full-length solo album. "Other People's Lives" bears many of Davies trademarks, including his knack for witty and often humorous lyrics, but it doesn't quite match up to his storied legacy with The Kinks.

Of course, not many 61-year-old musical legends live up to their past and "Other People's Lives" is in no way a disappointment. In fact, it far surpasses the expectations set by other middle-aged and older musicians, in that it doesn't feel like a grab for past glories, nor does it reek of being out of touch. Davies, as always, seems confident and relaxed and it shows in his music.

The individual songs on "Other People's Lives" all follow a similar pattern - a form of adult-alternative that is loaded with subtle lead guitar lines and friendly chord progressions. Davies' formula cuts both ways; nothing on the record really stands out as a truly amazing song but the whole proceedings are entirely pleasant. No songs have the big hooks or memorable riffs that The Kinks' best songs were built around, but nothing flops. Likewise, Davies' lyrics often fit the mold of storytelling singer-songwriter, which lends itself to the folky sounding album title, and while they are often hit-or-miss, they all circle around a satisfying, if vaguely mediocre, center.

And that, in a brief summary, is "Other People's Lives." It won't be revolutionizing the form, nor will it take people by storm. However, it is of somewhat remarkable quality for a man who already has 40 years of great music under his belt. Davies may not offer anything to compete with his greatest songs on "Other People's Lives," but he doesn't sound like he's out of tricks, either. The opening number, "Things Are Going To Change (The Morning After)," kicks things off nicely, insuring the listener that this album is no stale veteran-rocker retread. The title track, a sly, winking attack on media coverage of celebrities, is another highlight.

Davies has not crafted an album that will probably stand as a career milestone, but it does serve an important purpose in his career, proving that not only can he go it alone, but that he still has some spice left in him. "Other People's Lives" is, if anything, an indicator that Davies should not be counted out of the pop/rock game. While moments of pure, unbridled genius are few and far between on this album, there are countless signs that he might still have some brewing for the future.

Country girl with Radiohead influences

BY ALLIE ROTH

"Honest, raw, and derivative," is how 23-year-old singer-songwriter Brandi Carlile describes her music: honest from her heart, raw through emotion-filled lyrics and creative guitar riffs, and derivatively influenced by some of her favorite artists, like Elton John, Patsy Cline, Bernie Taupin, and Radiohead. More specifically, Patsy Cline's style of vocals along with the lyrics of Bernie Taupin and Elton John find their way into her music. But her influences don't stop there.

Carlile embraces her roots and uses them to her advantage. "I grew up listening to country music because all of the adults around me were," she says. She was cited as one of the 10 Artists to Watch of 2005 in Rolling Stone, which wrote that her songs "have a spare heartache that reflects her love for old school country, but she loves new-school mopers, like Radiohead and Jeff Buckley, just as much. Her interpretation is right on track."

Hailing from rural Ravensdale, Washington, Brandi has been singing since she was eight years old. At 17, she taught herself how to play guitar. "Growing up in Ravensdale, there weren't a lot of people. There was a lot of time to write songs with my brother and my sister," says Brandi. This passion is what drew her into music.

She started performing anywhere she could get a show, even if it was as a back-up singer for an Elvis impersonator. She cites this unglamorous work as a rather positive experience because from it she was able to teach herself harmonies and how to layer her vocals. Both of these skills are apparent in her music. She spent years playing smoky bars, which further developed her ability to grab the audience, even if they seemed more interested in what their next drink would be. She spent years writing alone and collaborating with others. Most recently, she has partnered up with twin brothers Tim and Phil Hanseroth to tour and write songs.

Her zealous work ethic paid off in 2004 when she was signed by Colombia Records. Since being signed to Colombia, she put out her major label debut, "Brandi Carlile," which was recorded in various locations, including Carlile's home in Washington state. The effect of the rural atmosphere is quite apparent in the 10 tracks that showcase her songwriting skills, as is her collaboration with Phil and Tim. She has also gone on tour with Chris Isaac, an experience that she describes as her best touring experience so far because "he is such a nice guy and like a father figure to me."

With all of that said, Brandi is just a normal 23-year-old. She cites her favorite bands right now as Muse, Ray LaMontagne, and, of course, Radiohead. She has been known to cover "Creep" by Radiohead live, but she says that it requires a full band to avoid sounding like just another screaming girl singer, because "God knows there are enough of those right now." She admits, however, that her guilty pleasures include Rascal Flatts because of their "cute harmonies" and Third Eye Blind because "they are just fun." Her favorite place to play a show is Seattle, Washington because of the fans. She loves to tour and play shows, but misses her friends and family at home. She can't live without her dog Bailey, music, and green apple Blow Pops. She says the worst and best part about being on the road is the lack of good food.

Friday night Brandi opened up for Howie Day at the Fine Arts Center. She played a 6-song-set that included "Fall Apart Again" (her first single) and songs from her self-titled major label debut, "Throw It All Away," and ended with a charming cover of "Hallelujah" that brought out lighters and cell phones. She put on a great performance, and the crowd reacted accordingly with a standing ovation.

Visit her website http://www.brandicarlile.net for more information and tour dates, or pick up her new album "Brandi Carlile" on Colombia Records. It really is worth a listen or four.

Brandi Carlile is coming up in the Indie-music scene, and has spent much time on on-the-road.

David Copperfield makes Mullins Center more magical

By Monica Gleberman
Collegian Staff

David Copperfield has been mystifying audiences for years with his magical illusions. In addition to his live shows, Copperfield has been on numerous television networks, bringing magic into the lives of millions.

On Monday, Feb. 6, he will bring his acclaimed act to the University's very own Mullins Center with two performances, one at 5:30 p.m. and one at 8:30 p.m.

Renowned worldwide as an artist who has raised his art form, as well as many others, to new heights, lately it seems that Copperfield has performed nearly impossible tasks. For example, he made the Statue of Liberty disappear. In one show he even walked through the Great Wall of China.

During a live television special he made thirteen audience members stand together holding hands with a curtain raised. Once the curtain fell, the audience members had disappeared.

However, it hasn't always been this way. Born Sept. 16, 1956, David Kotkin started out as a young kid growing up in New Jersey. He first got interested in magic when his grandfather showed him a card trick. According to Copperfield's official website, he has been taking on these types of tricks and performing for his family since the age of 12.

He went on to be the youngest person ever to be admitted into the Society of American Magicians. Within a few years, still in his teens, he was teaching a class at New York University.

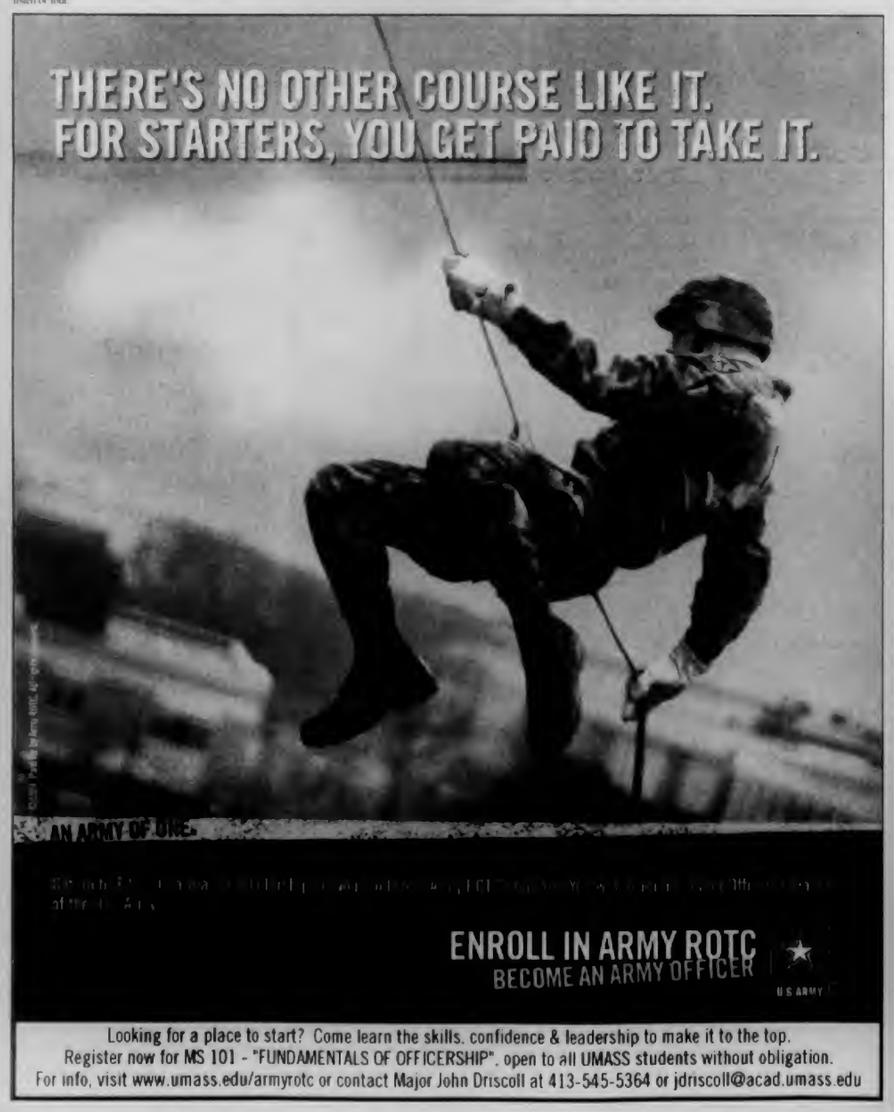
Over the years Copperfield helped to pave the way for fellow magicians and illusionists like David Blaine and Criss Angel, who has his own show, "MindFreak," on A&E.

In 1993, Copperfield was executing an onstage illusion in which he weightlessly flew with a lady from the audience in his arms. His flight illusion was considered by experts and historians of magic to be the greatest illusion ever performed on stage.

In the past decade Copperfield is said to have grossed about $1 billion and has reached over 20 million people around the world. He is currently the only magician to have a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

Copperfield holds the Broadway record for his show "Dreams and Nightmares," which sold more tickets and grossed more money per week than "The Lion King," "Cats," "Phantom of the Opera" and "Chicago" even during their highest selling weeks.

In 2000, Copperfield was named a living legend by the U.S. Library of Congress. Copperfield also has worldwide appeal, which is proven by the fact that he has appeared on stamps in four different countries.



Copperfield started a rehabilitative program called Project Magic. This program helps strengthen dexterity and motor use in disabled patients by using simple sleight of hand magic. Project Magic has been implemented in over 1,000 hospitals and over 30 countries throughout the world.

Even with time off, Copperfield has been constantly working on new illusions and now has a new show that he is performing around the world called "An Intimate Evening of Grand Illusion." This show has been said to bring dreams to reality using state-of-the-art wizardry.

Copperfield is and has always been a man of entertainment. He dabbles in the world of magic and illusions. He does the impossible and has constantly evolved over the years. This show will do nothing but impress and shock its viewers, and Copperfield will try to make his audiences believe in the unbelievable.

In February the Mullins Center at UMass featured acclaimed magician David Copperfield, who is famous for his outstanding illusions.

Sony Pictures released the 2004 documentary by Eugene Jarecki, which focuses on the military-industrial complex, a phrase coined by former president D. Eisenhower.

A human approach to "Why We Fight"

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Staff

Its title ironically lifted from Capra's series of World War II propaganda films, Eugene Jarecki's "Why We Fight" seems like a belated entry in the 2004 series of politically-oriented documentaries intended to sway the votes of its audience. Perhaps the reason such documentaries are so in vogue nowadays is their appeal as a motion picture. Recent polls have shown that over 40 percent of American adults believe the regime of Saddam Hussein had strong links to Al-Qaida. Political activists might have been seen to look upon such findings and adopt the strategy of sending information to voters via pop culture if they weren't paying attention to reputable news sources. Of course, the people who pay no attention to current events would have no interest in films such as "Why We Fight," either.

'Why We Fight'
Directed by Eugene Jarecki
Starring Ken Adelman Joseph Cirincione
Sony Pictures
98 mins.
Grade B

The principal focus of "Why We Fight" is the military-industrial complex, a phrase coined by Dwight Eisenhower to describe the side effects of the arms industry's collusion with the military present in a standing army, and the supposed presence of those side effects in the modern-day United States.

The film starts with Eisenhower's famous farewell speech that mostly consisted of his warning about his complex, with some parts more startlingly relevant than others ("We must never let the weight of [the complex] endanger our liberties or democratic processes").

The film features personal interviews with everyday citizens who were involved in the war-related events following September 11, 2001.

From there, we are shown interviews of political commentators ranging from Gore Vidal to William Kristol, as well as of everyday citizens that became entwined in the war-related events following September 11, 2001. The United States is compared to a modern-day Rome, which fell after adapting an overreaching philosophy in regards to what they are fated to conquer.

As the films share political viewpoints and footage, and they both follow up their opening title sequences with the reaction of New York natives to the attack on the World Trade Center, "Why We Fight" seems to wet its lips in anticipation of comparisons to "Fahrenheit 9/11." But while Moore focused primarily on the human aspect to the United States' current political climate with cold facts as a backdrop, Jarecki goes at the material with the manner of a forensic scientist, bringing statistics to the forefront with human stories as color commentary. Such a style of filmmaking certainly seems ill-advised, given that their target audience probably expects their entertainment adorned with Hollywood-style drama. But the film redeems itself by seamlessly interweaving the facts with their human consequences.

John S.D. Eisenhower, son of Dwight Eisenhower, is also featured in Jarecki's film "Why We Fight."

The most memorable portion of the movie, and the one most likely to sway right-wing viewers, is the story of Wilton Sekzer Sekzer, a retired NYPD officer, first got word of the twin towers' attack firsthand out the windows of the el train and immediately feared for the life of his son, who worked there and was later determined dead. Professing a "My country, right or wrong" faith in the government, he wholeheartedly supported the attack upon Iraq and even requested to have his son's name inscribed on a weapon used in the invasion. But he soon learned of the lack of evidence connecting Iraq to the terrorists who killed his son, and is disillusioned with his country and his faith in it. Sekzer seems too good (for lack of a better word) to be true as a poster boy of red-blooded Americans against the Bush administration. But while the viewer is subconsciously aware of her strings being pulled and twisted about as Sekzer is being interviewed, the film is redeemed by his compelling tale.

It is questionable whether conservative-leaning American voting citizens will pay to see "Why We Fight," much less be influenced by it. At best, it will supply more liberal audiences with information that can be used to support their own viewpoints. But it goes without saying that the film succeeds in documenting what can credibly be called Eisenhower's fears manifested in the present day.

Political commentators share their viewpoints on the events surrounding September 11th in "Why We Fight."

Lee brings down under to Noho

By Dave Pesah
Collegian Staff

At the age of 26, Ben Lee is a music industry veteran. Lee began his career in 1993 at age 14 as the front man for teen punk rockers, Noise Addict. Solo at 16 years-old, he has since released five unique albums varying in style from jazz, to acoustics, to electronica.

Born in Sydney, Australia, Lee is constantly shipping himself to overseas venues. On Tuesday, Nov. 8, Northampton's Iron Horse will be his destination.

Lee already has had a career worthy of a VH1 "Behind the Music" special. He received praise from critics, label heads, the Beastie Boys and Sonic Youth as a child prodigy. He also dated Claire Danes when she was the "it" girl. He lost both. He wrote the "breakup" album. He collaborated with Ben Folds and Ben Kweller as (how original) The Bens. Neither gained him back the praise he originally had. He started his own record label, Ten Fingers Records, and began an acting career in independent Australian films. He's back on the up-swing now with his 5th album, "Awake is the New Sleep," to prove that the once boy wonder became the man.

"Awake is the New Sleep" is an album "waking up," Lee says. Whatever that means, the songs on the album cover everything from desire to debt collectors. VH1 called it an album of "existential pop songs" and "the strongest album of his career." On "Apple Candy," he's the best friend who doesn't get the girl as he sings, "I want to know what he knows," and "I want to touch what he touched," to her.

"Close I've Come" finds him lamenting that he's still "far away." On songs like "Get Gotten" and "Begin," he seems to have found the girl of his dreams but she hasn't caught on yet, with lyrics like, "I want to get you. So get gotten." Every song is sung with an air of optimism and lightheartedness that differentiates his from many of his singer-songwriter peers. It's in this "no worries" attitude that you can feel his Australian roots.

In Australia, Lee is a local legend. "Awake is the New Sleep" won him three ARIAs - Australian Recording Industry Awards - for Single of the Year ("Catch My Disease"), Best Independent Release (on Ten Fingers Records) and Best Male Artist. Lee has yet to receive this type of notoriety here in states. This tour is his present attempt to attain it.

The Iron Horse crowd should expect many things come Tuesday. Lee tours often, and has been noted as a master of between song banter. He's been known to joke back and forth with crowds in intimate venues (like the Iron Horse) and play covers of the latest hit songs. He also has a wealth of material to draw upon. His five albums have produced such gems as "Cigarettes Will Kill You," "My Guitar" and "Dirty Mind." With more material than most recent bands, who knows what he will play, but it's sure to be good.

Aussie singer-songwriter Ben Lee sings with an air of optimism and lightheartedness, according to many of his musical peers, but has yet to win the same recognition in the U.S. as he has in Australia.

Reid is one of the greatest

Drive by filing through his gym list that perfectly suits his personality.

Reid begins to "Ante Up" with M.O.P. sings a familiar tune of his opposition with Metallica's "Unforgiven" and preludes his playing style with White Zombie's "More Human Than Human".

But as game time grows closer, his headphones blast out a different ring. Ten minutes before it's time to take the field, Reid makes the switch to The Derek Trucks Band and "Sahib Teri Bandi" – "Maki Madni".

"It's so anti what you think I would be listening to," he says. "It's not Metallica; it's a jam band with people clapping and moving along. I just like to hang out and listen to that by myself. I try not to be too overly intense of a guy." Reid has found that perfect medium, the exact mix he needs to bring out the appropriate frame of mind it takes for him to jump onto the field and dominate.

And "dominate" may serve as an understatement. He has been the best defenseman on the field for each of the 13 games the Minutemen have played in 2006, and he is being called the best defenseman in the country right now.

For Jack Reid, game days are a rite of passage.

When Reid takes the field for pregame warm-ups, he begins to remove himself from that early morning shell. He opens himself up to the rest of the world and takes notice of his surroundings, particularly to the team on the other side of the field.

"I usually before we stretch, I go off a little bit about what subject really ticks me off about the other team," Reid says. "There have been some good speeches that have come through that. Any chance I get to smash something, I usually take it."

It is this form of Jack Reid that those in the stands know best. This is the fiery competitor his teammates love and his opponents hate. It makes one wonder why anyone on the other sideline would give Reid any incentive to bring even an ounce more of motivation onto the field – why anyone would give him the bulletin-board material that becomes his lifeblood.

He remembers one instance vividly.

UMass went into its last game of the 2004 season against Rutgers with a disappointing 6-7 record. It was a season in which the Minutemen were marred by injuries, while Rutgers had it all moving perfectly in the right direction.

The Scarlet Knights were No. 10 in the country and rolling towards the NCAA Tournament. It was Senior Day at Garber Field, and the Rutgers players seemed more concerned with their own vanity than the upcoming game.

Though just a sophomore at the time, Reid saw the ideal opportunity to rally his troops.

When I went out for warm-ups, I saw a couple guys from Rutgers laying out on our field and sunning themselves with their shirts off on our benches," he recalls. "I asked the senior captains if I could speak before the game. We all came together after the stretch, and I just went off about how disrespectful it was for them to be out there taking us so lightly like that. That is one of my favorite ones. I was still a young guy at the time, but I had the respect of my teammates. The seniors let me speak on their Senior Day. It was their last chance to do it, and they gave it to me and let me run with it."

UMass upset Rutgers that day, 9-6.

Reid has always commanded respect by his actions on the field and his leadership capabilities off of it. His shtick isn't by any means unwarranted, and his teammates love that he has the ability to bring their games up a level as a result.

"Jack has been one of the most influential leaders in my life," freshman goalie Doc Schneider says. "He is always calming me down in the game. He talks to the team very well, but he is more of a leader by example. You follow his lead because he goes hard all the time and says the right things. You want to play for him because he plays so hard."

Jack Reid doesn't have any other gear. He is always moving full steam ahead, laying the wood like a linebacker in football – one of the many positions he played during his four-year high school career on the gridiron – and suffocating any attackman looking for a spare breath on the field. In the rare case he gets burned, his recovery speed has been merciless, and he has been known to go games at a time without letting his assignment score on him.

Reid jokes that no one remembers what defensemen do on the field, as playing good defense is expected and giving up a goal is looked upon as a mistake, even though that may not always be the case.

But he is a defenseman at heart. It's been the case since he was a sixth-grader looking for his lacrosse niche.

He split time with his best friend and current Maryland goaltender Teddy Murphy between the pipes, but he laughs when he remembers that he flinched every time someone took a shot on him.

He started a game in net one day, and his opponents ran up the score on him in the first half. When Reid's coach pulled him in favor of Murphy in the second half, Reid ran around relentlessly on defense, taking a hack at everyone within an arms length. "It worked really well, and we almost came back and won it," Reid says. "It felt great because I released all this anger from my days in net. After that, I didn't play any more goalie or any other position. It was just defense from there on out."

It was practically the perfect script. It took that one moment on the lacrosse field to change his mindset forever. He knew his purpose, and he engaged it wholeheartedly.

While most kids grow up wanting to be the one who scores the game-winning goal that crowns their team as national champions, Reid was the antithesis.

He wants his team to have the lead in that situation with the opposing attacker heading in his direction as the clock winds down to zero. And as the final buzzer sounds, Reid wants that attacker on his back, looking straight up at No. 18, the man who kept him from scoring.

"The tangible attraction to me is being able to deny somebody else of what they want to do," Reid says intently of his passion for playing defense. "There is something in my personality that says, 'You want to get to the goal? No way, you have to get past me.'

"In football, you want to score a touchdown, and I don't even want to let you gain a yard. For whatever reason growing up, that's always how it's been. I like denying people what they want to get on the field. It's just something that I've related well to."

It was that drive that helped the Minutemen squeak out a final-minute, thrilling win over Fairfield on April 25. The Stags' Greg Downing had the ball in his own end with 90 seconds left, but Reid and long-stick midfielder Dan Whipple didn't allow Downing to even sniff any free space, as they clamped down on him and stole the ball, which ultimately led to a three-goal outburst over a span of 29 seconds and a 7-6 victory.

Heading into last weekend's highly anticipated matchup with Syracuse at the Dome, Reid had set himself a lofty goal. He wanted to strip Joe Yevoli - Syracuse's third-highest scorer and one of the best stick handlers in the nation - of the ball, but not in any ordinary way. "As risky as it is for me, and it has cost me so many goals in the past, I love laying the over-the-head check on a guy," Reid says. "I told myself that I couldn't go over Yevoli's head because he has great stick protection. I watched him on film just fly right by like four or five different guys who tried going right over his head. During the game, I saw my shot and said I'm going to do it. I got him over the head and was just laughing all the way up the field because I told myself I couldn't do it."

Same story, different day.

Jack Reid's stock was soaring out of high school. He was a state champion and an All-American in Glastonbury, Conn., and he could have played at Yale – where he would have been a familial legacy – Syracuse, Penn State or Georgetown, which actually wanted him for both football and lacrosse.

But he wanted UMass – for its blue-collar attitude which best fit his personality, for its in-your-face atmosphere at Garber Field and for coach Greg Cannella, who has long had the reputation for being one of the best people in the lacrosse world.

Cannella and Reid have been able to play off one another masterfully over the last four years. Cannella has been driving his senior captain to constantly step up his game, but it has been Reid's willingness to bring his top-notch work ethic to the field everyday that has made that possible.

"He came in [to UMass] as a mature and well-adjusted man, and he has just gotten himself better," Cannella says. "It's hard for someone – if you're already there – to see that huge, huge jump. Jack was there when he got here, and he has pushed himself as a person and as a player each and every year. It was more that it was expected from him and certainly from us."

Cannella's expectations don't stop when his players step over the white lines at Garber Field. He holds his men to higher standards in social settings as well as game situations.

For Reid to be the player he is, he always has to play the game right along that infamous edge. He has to play with that acclaimed tenacity that puts fear in his opponents' eyes, but he can't let himself slip across that edge to the boundaries of becoming a "dirty" player. It's a natural struggle for any athlete, but Cannella has worked with his prodigy to keep him even-keeled.

"Cannella really builds great character," Reid says. "He has worked on things like weaknesses in my personality; controlling my temper, being able to handle losing, being able to handle and relate to people and understanding your situation in life. You've got to be able to understand your role and how to relate to people below you and above you. I think he has really helped me develop all that."

Reid laughs when he realizes some of the things that have rubbed off of Cannella and onto him.

"Three years ago when we lost in the Dome, I punched a dude in the face," he says with a wry smile. "This year I didn't accept [the loss] but realized that punching someone in the face wasn't going to help my cause any. That was all Cannella because I'm sure I wanted to do it, but he taught me better things than that. There are more graceful ways of handling a situation."

In no way is Cannella trying to take the physicality out of Reid's game. He has no desire to. He just wants to make sure all of the extra curricular stuff remains as just that – out of the curriculum of the game.

But with UMass holding a 10-6 fourth-quarter lead over Hobart on April 15, the two briefly butted heads after Reid picked up a one-minute illegal body checking penalty after drilling Patrick Meade from behind as he was catching a pass. Reid defends his actions but understands he may have crossed that line just a bit.

"At first when that happened, [Cannella] was pretty furious with me on the sidelines because it was a pretty bad hit and there was a penalty," Reid says. "It was definitely from behind, and I knew it. I felt justified because I knew if I didn't do that and I went for his stick and missed it, then he was going to score just from where he was going to catch the ball.

"When I saw [Meade], I thought there was a pretty decent chance he was going to turn into the hit, but he apparently saw me coming and turned away. I was handcuffed. I took the option of hitting him and took all the crap that came with it like everybody else saying it was a dirty shot. I wasn't intending to injure or hurt him, but I just wanted to make sure he didn't score." "Lacrosse is a physical game so if you're going to go out there and compete, you have to be physical," Cannella says. "Sometimes you're going to have to knock somebody down, and Jack is never afraid to do that. If he hits them too hard or too high, then we'll have to live with it. We'll send our man-down [unit] out there and kill it."

Reid is by no means a dirty player, but he has earned the reputation of being an intimidator. Every opposing offensive player wants to know exactly where he is at all times and for good reason. If they don't, they're liable to get a good view of the clouds that particular afternoon.

Reid's style of play fits the UMass lacrosse attitude to a "T". He chose to play in the Pioneer Valley because of the "it's us against the world mentality," and in a way, that is what he is going for when he ducks away from everything behind his headphones and sunglasses.

He doesn't underestimate a soul, so it takes that sort of pregame preparation to get his mind set for an afternoon slugfest, even after a week of hard work. Before he throws on his maroon and white, it's him against the world, but once he takes the field, everything he does is for the name on his chest.

It's that kind of senior leadership that everyone raves about, especially Cannella, who feels strongly that this is Reid's finest year, despite the daunting task of having to handle some tough senior obligations – not the least of which was having to groom a new set of starting defensemen.

Not surprisingly, Reid has taken it all in stride.

"With every senior, there is a challenge because it's your legacy. It's how you want to be remembered," Cannella says.

So how will Jack Reid be remembered in Amherst?

"As one of the best who has ever played here," Cannella says. "Undoubtedly."

I returned to Conte Forum on Jan. 20 to cover a hockey game between BC and Vermont. After the Eagles skated off the ice with a 2-0 victory and Jerry York finished addressing the media, I took one last stroll through the building and visited the trophy case that got this whole thing started.

Rouleau fired after tenure ends with drug allegations

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Justin Rouleau, head coach of the Massachusetts ski team, was fired Friday morning less than a year after he was hired for the position. Athletic director John McCutcheon announced the decision to both the men's and women's teams early Friday afternoon.

Men's captain Rush Hawkins said the meeting was brief. The team met with McCutcheon and Associate Athletic Director Jaime Seguin around 2 p.m. on Friday. McCutcheon told the skiers Rouleau, a 1998 UMass alum, was let go for reasons stemming from behavior that was "unacceptable for a representative of the University of Massachusetts," according to Hawkins.

Phone calls to both McCutcheon and Rouleau were not returned.

"[McCutcheon] just told us that he had let Justin go earlier in the day and he was on the hunt for a new coach," UMass skier Jason Small said.

The move was somewhat expected, as a number of coaches, parents and athletes were said to have noted suspect behavior.

One UMass skier, who requested to remain anonymous, said that several coaches and parents approached Seguin because they suspected Rouleau of smoking marijuana while he was with the team.

"Things were pretty disorganized. They were some rumors flying around about him that the administration wouldn't like, for sure," Hawkins said.

"A few times during the middle of the season, he [Rouleau] would come out reeking of [marijuana]," another source close to the team said. "And the parents would ask us, 'Is your coach high?' You can't have a coach suspected of that."

After hearing these allegations, McCutcheon spoke with team captains Hawkins and Erica Mains.

"Erica Mains and I went in to do an evaluation [of Rouleau]," Hawkins said. "They pretty much just wanted the truth about some things they had heard."

Rouleau was also involved in controversies regarding the United States Ski and Snowboard Association President, Paul Wojick.

"He lied to [Wojick] about some things and was going to be sanctioned next year anyway," Hawkins said. "If [Rouleau] was our coach next year, he wouldn't have been allowed on the hill. The president had already made a move to sanction him." Rouleau was also banned from Mt. Snow in Vermont for illegally setting up equipment on the resort's slopes.

"We had gone up there for our first day on snow," Hawkins said. "[Rouleau] asked if he could set gates up there. They told him no, and he did it anyway. He pretty much knew that he shouldn't and did it anyway."

Rouleau's struggles did not remain off the slopes. He also allegedly had problems with some of his athletes.

Hawkins was reportedly not happy with his coach for much of the season, and it reflected in his performance. Last year he was the team's top skier and the individual champion of the Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference. This season Small passed him in the standings.

"[Rouleau] did some great things for us in the off-season, like getting us rain gear and sneakers, but on the hill he was more of a distraction than a coach," Small said of his former coach.

"Before our runs, when mental preparation is all you need to worry about, he would try and talk to us and get us to tweak our techniques, which is a terrible thing to do," Small continued. "Before my run, I just want to be left alone and 'get into the zone' but he just wouldn't leave me alone."

According to some of the skiers, the team spoke to Rouleau to try to work out some of the issues, but it was to no avail.

"[Our communication problems] continued, and some of us found ways to deal with it," Small said. "Some people didn't and just got more and more angry about it, like Rush."

Rouleau led both the men's and women's teams to their second regional championship in two years, as well as strong performances at the USCSA nationals, but neither showing was as strong as the year before.

In 2005, Hawkins swept the slalom and giant slalom at the nationals – the first American skier to do so in 10 years – but struggled in 2006, finishing eighth in both events.

Rouleau was the third ski coach in four years since UMass legend Bill MacConnell retired after more than 40 years at the helm.

between the two sides have gone extremely well.

"The Red Sox management and players have done everything right," Hendricks said. "Our meetings have been outstanding. It is gratifying to me to see the outpouring of affection towards Roger from the Red Sox fans and management. At the very least, Roger should be back where he belongs in Red Sox lore. Roger was very happy when he played for the Red Sox, and loved the fans' passion. Roger's history with the Red Sox is the primary reason they are one of the four teams he would consider."

While winning is an important factor in Clemens' decision, he also pays full attention to what his family has to say. But for Red Sox Nation, that may not be a bad thing.

Koby being with the Astros is a long term factor in Roger's relationship with the Astros," Hendricks said. "It will have nothing to do with the decision he makes this year. The reason is that Koby is in [Single]-A ball and is one year removed from high school. They will not play in the big leagues together this year. Also, Koby has a dislocated finger right now, but that should be healed in the next few weeks."

"Roger listens carefully to his family," Hendricks said. "He also listens to my brother, Alan, and me. He then makes his own decision. [Clemens' wife] Debbie has very fond memories of Boston."

As of right now, he's just watching. But Red Sox management, players and fans are hoping that, come June 15, the Rocket will be launching his farewell tour right where he belongs: at Fenway Park.

Franczek mans the hot corner

Springfield Republican named him the Player of the Year in 2004. Just looking to play baseball at the collegiate level, Franczek initially meant to attend Elms College in his hometown. Though a twist of fate, a family friend led Franczek to Amherst and Stone. According to Ryan, originally the family friend was going to attend UMass and his wife mentioned Franczek's name to Stone. The coach had heard of the kid from Chicopee and knew all about him, but he couldn't contact him because an NCAA rule prohibited it.

But Franczek took the initiative and called Stone to set up a meeting. The two kept in touch and Stone went to go see him play a few times.

Finally, before it was too late, Franczek scrapped the Elms College plans and signed a letter of intent to play at UMass.

Stone couldn't be happier with his decision: "He's a real good ballplayer – not just a pretty good ballplayer – a real good ballplayer," the coach says.

In high school, Franczek was the ultimate utility player. In one game he played all nine positions on the baseball diamond. It wasn't until he got to Amherst that he settled in to the hot corner. Third base is now where he is most comfortable and enjoys playing.

"I like how hard the balls are hit to third, it's a reaction thing," Franczek says. "When you make a diving play to the left or right you get a pretty good feeling."

Franczek still has two more seasons to go and the Minutemen have two more seasons to watch those plays and see him change the school's errors one diving play at a time.

NBA scout gives insight during UMass-UConn matchup

Dan Duggan

This is a column that I planned on writing two months ago, after UMass played UConn, but shortly after the game the semester ended and the Collegian shut down production for winter break so it never came to fruition.

Seeing as how this story is not particularly timely, I figured I'd dust it off and break it out now, because I think readers who follow college basketball will find it interesting.

At the UConn game, which took place at a packed Hartford Civic Center on Dec. 8, I found myself seated in the nether regions of press row. Apparently with such media luminaries as Andy Katz, Sean McDonough, Bill Rafferty and Jay Bilas in the house, my Daily Collegian credential lost some of its luster.

The prime seats on press row at every game start at half court and work out down the sideline and occasionally to the baseline. For this game I was seated along the baseline, which can be bad or very bad – depending on which end of the court the band is on. Luckily for me I didn't have to withstand two hours of drums and trombones blaring in my ear as the UConn band was mercifully located on the opposite side of the floor.

The real benefit of my seating assignment is that I was seated next to the NBA scouts who were in attendance. Typically at games, I'm seated next to some fan who got a courtside seat from the athletic department or radio announcers – either way there isn't a whole lot of conversing.

But given the opportunity to sit next to an NBA scout for two hours, I figured it would be pretty interesting to pick his brain about the players on the floor that night, other top players in college basketball and just basketball in general.

While I don't think I'd be violating any confidentiality with the scout I spoke with by revealing what team he worked for, I'll just refer to him as a scout from an Eastern Conference team (and it wasn't the Celtics). As much as UMass fans may hope, the scouts were there exclusively to scout the Huskies. UConn has six players who are considered to be NBA-caliber (big surprise they're No. 1 in the country) and the scouts were there to help form their opinions which will play a major role in who gets selected in the NBA Draft in June.

Before getting to the scout's opinions on the UConn players, I want to put to rest any lingering concerns UMass fans have about junior Rashaun Freeman potentially leaving for the pros after this year. By no means am I knocking Freeman, who is having another typically solid season, but he isn't even on the radar of NBA scouts.

When I asked the scout before the game if he was looking at any UMass players, his response was, "This kid number one is supposed to be pretty good, right?"

While the scout clearly had heard something about Freeman, if he was seriously thinking that Freeman would get drafted, he probably would have at least known his name.

Interestingly, the scout was more impressed with Freeman's frontcourt mate, junior Stephane Lasme. While Lasme had a relatively quiet game (six points, five rebounds and three blocks) the scout was impressed with his block totals from earlier in the season, and felt that he had the athleticism to play in the league if he got stronger and developed his offensive game more.

The other Minuteman that caught the scout's eye was senior Jeff Viggiano. The scout liked the toughness that Viggiano played with and the surprising athleticism he displayed on a few plays en route to 17 points. That said, the scout wasn't encouraging Viggiano to put down the books in the last semester of his college career in anticipation of an NBA career, but as a basketball enthusiast he appreciated the way Viggiano played.

While it's safe to say that no UMass player will hear his name called on Draft night, there were still plenty of players on the floor at the Civic Center who will (if you're a diehard Minuteman fan and hate everything and anything related to UConn, this would be the place to stop reading.) The biggest draw to the game for the scouts was UConn sophomore forward Rudy Gay. While Gay's freakish athletic ability is unquestioned, the main concern the scout had with Gay's play was that he seemed to turn it on and off too frequently, satisfied to coast through the game for stretches rather than playing with a killer instinct from start to finish.

The scout compared Gay to last year's second pick Marvin Williams, who is having an underwhelming rookie campaign with the Atlanta Hawks. Like Williams with North Carolina last year, the scout wasn't convinced that Gay has what it takes to be the go-to guy because he is surrounded by so much talent.

That said, by the end of the game, the scout gave Gay his due, as he took over the game midway through the second half. "I didn't want to like him," the scout said, "but this kid is good."

The other Husky that the scout pegged as a lottery pick was junior forward Josh Boone. Boone finished the game with 13 points and 10 rebounds, all of which came in the second half, as he played just three minutes in the first half after picking up two early fouls.

The scout believes that Boone could blossom in the NBA in the same way that former Husky Charlie Villanueva has in his rookie season this year with the Toronto Raptors. The scout said that UConn coach Jim Calhoun makes scouting his players difficult because of his frequent substitutions and his "my way or the highway style."

A player who has increased his draft stock since that December meeting is senior Hilton Armstrong. Against UMass, Armstrong was limited to just three points, as he too was subject to Calhoun's strict policy of benching players with two fouls in the first half.

While the scout was unimpressed that night, Armstrong has played well recently, and his 4.0 blocks per game are in the top 10 in the nation (though he is still behind Lasme's 4.4 per game).

The standout for UConn against UMass was senior guard Rashad Anderson. Anderson scored 15 points, on a scorching 6-of-8 shooting, including 3-of-4 from downtown. While Anderson's game is somewhat limited, the scout predicted that Anderson would be a second round pick, saying that with shooters being so hard to come by Anderson would not be passed up. The other NBA prospects for UConn were non-factors in the UMass game. Senior guard Denham Brown had a poor shooting night and his NBA hopes are dimming after a promising start to his career.

Junior point guard Marcus Williams did not play in the game as he was still serving his suspension for his involvement in laptop-gate. The scout said Williams has NBA ability, but clearly after his off-court issues there are character questions.

While we touched on a number of the top players in the country, the most noteworthy was J.J. Redick from Duke. The very mention of Redick's name invariably sparks debates between NBA basketball fans about his NBA potential. Apparently scouts are no different, as he has been forecasted to go anywhere from the lottery to the draft to the middle of the first round.

The scout said that he was skeptical of Redick because of some of his shortcomings – not a strong defensive player, lack of size, etc. – but came away from watching him feeling that he would be a good NBA player.

No one can deny Redick's shooting ability, and while he certainly won't be scoring 30 points per game in the NBA, the fact that he has put up incredible numbers this year against top competition night-in and night-out makes the scout believe that he will be able to score at the next level. The scout also said that Redick's competitiveness will help him apart from other players, such as Gay.

The scout said that he does believe Redick will be a solid NBA player, but it he could find the right situation he could be a very good pro.

So that's the view from one college basketball scout. Whether one scout's eyes are trustworthy or was way off – and Redick, Gay and Armstrong all go on to be the head of NBA franchises – is still pretty cool.

If nothing else, it has given the UConn fight song stuck in my ears all night.

Tempesta finds niche at second base second, then to third in the order, making him - as his teammates joke - one of the shortest No. 3 hitters in Division I baseball.

"People make jokes about it," Adam says. "Even my friends from home. Everybody's like, 'He must be the smallest kid in the country batting third.' There are little jokes here and there."

"Adam is solid as a rock," Fred says. "And I had the feeling he was going to be short. But you know what? He can play with anybody, including his older brothers." Adam is about nine inches closer to the earth than UMass' No. 4 hitter, Bryan Adamski, who stands at 6-foot-4. Fred got a chuckle out of seeing them back-to-back in the order.

"It's kind of funny, isn't it?" Fred says. "It's hysterical watching those two. Nowadays, baseball players come in all shapes and sizes. It doesn't matter anymore."

Not many underclassmen could handle being tossed into the No. 3 spot so abruptly. Things are different for the No. 3 and No. 4 hitters: fewer fastballs, more offspeed stuff, nothing over the heart of the plate. But Stone had a read on Adam, and knew that he had the right mentality for the job.

"He's a mature hitter," Stone says. "He sees the ball well, he stays back and he's a confident enough kid in his own ability to be able to bat in the No. 3 spot, no matter how old he is. And that's why he is there.

"We had to put somebody there who was tough enough and had an efficient swing, a balanced swing, somebody who stays back on the ball."

"[Stone] said that I was a mature hitter and that I could do it," Adam says. "I don't doubt myself at all. I knew I could do it because I've basically hit third my whole life. It's just a little different here."

How so?

"Pitchers have different ways of throwing to you," he says. "You don't see first-pitch fastballs much. Usually the first pitch will be a curveball and I like to swing early in the count and it's a little difficult when you're getting a curveball instead of a fastball."

Adam has a compact swing. His stance is slightly open. His knees are bent comfortably. The bat rests lightly in his hands as he twirls it during the pitchers' windup. His step is short and purposeful, and he extends his arms through the zone with ease, finishing his swing with one arm, a la Mark McGwire.

And the McGwire comparison isn't a bad one: the Cardinals star didn't have a lot of movement in his swing — no rapid, jerky movements to throw off his timing or cloud his vision. The difference? Adam doesn't strike out. He has only 10 strikeouts on the season in 155 at-bats. Of the players who take the field every day, that total is by far the lowest.

Family Ties

The Tempesta's are bound together by the seams.

Fred Tempesta – father of Bryon, Nick and Adam – grew up in Brockton and rooted for Sox legends Yastremski and Conigliaro. It was a unique time in Boston baseball history. The Impossible Dream season of 1968 had reinvigorated Red Sox fans, rescuing them from the mediocrity of the 1950s and early 60s teams. Fred was a junior in high school in 1967 and grew up in with a generation of ebullient Red Sox lovers.

Bryon was born in 1977 - a year before Bucky Dent tore the heart out of Boston with one swing. Nick came along two years later. Fred made sure that both of them were playing ball.

"When [Bryon and Nick] were little kids we'd play ball," Fred says. "We had them out front hitting the ball. And they could hit the ball when they were two or three years old. You should have seen them. It was an amazing thing. The neighborhood kids were much older and these kids could hang right with them."

Bryon and Nick are baseball guys. Bryon pitched for a private high school and is now an assistant coach for the Curry College baseball team. Nick started for the Brockton High School Nine as a freshman. (He was the only one to do so in the school's history until his younger brother Adam came along.)

Nick played shortstop on Brockton's first state championship baseball team in his senior year. After high school he played for Eastern Connecticut College (his team won the Division III World Series in his first year) and went on to play four years as a professional in the minor league system.

That was Adam's family – born-and-bred baseball lifers. He was influenced heavily by his older brothers, who kept track of Adam throughout his little league days (Bryon was in college then) and helped him with his game as much as they could.

"I saw what my brothers did and I wanted to do that," Adam says. "I was a bat boy for the Brockton High School when they won the state championship on Nick's team. I was a bat boy when Nick went to college. I just saw everything that they did and I wanted to do it." "My senior year in high school, in 1997, [Adam] was the bat boy on our Massachusetts state tournament team," Nick recalls. "We won the title. And it's fun because I look back at the pictures and he was so small. Then I went off to college and in my freshman year we won the [Division III] World Series and he was there for that. So I thought that was pretty cool.

"I think he learned a lot from that experience," Nick continues. "He was young, but I still think he learned a lot about teamwork and what you have to do to win and work hard. We're not blessed with the biggest size in the family so we have to work a little harder."

"Adam's been playing ever since he watched his older brothers play," Fred says. "He started in little league and you could tell that he was pretty good. As he got older he started getting better and better.

"I think Adam looked up to Nick a lot. When Nick was at Eastern Connecticut, Adam was the bat boy and it kind of started from that point on. He got to know how they played and how his brothers grew up, and he got to be a real good ballplayer himself."

"We used to get him on the street and throw ground balls at him," Bryon remembers fondly. "Baseball was huge. It kept the family together. We went to the park to play all of the time."

Everyone keeps in touch. Bryon can't make it to many games because of the demands of coaching, and Nick has ventured to Lorden Field a couple of times this season – both still feed their younger brother some tips.

"Nick taught me to backleg it," Adam says. "It's a little model when you're hitting to make sure you keep your weight back. Bryon helps me out a lot actually. He'll call me and ask me how I'm doing. He'll call me and help me."

"Back-legging is just getting through the baseball," Nick says. "Before, I didn't get to see [Adam]. Now I can show him and I think it is helping. He's tearing the cover off of the ball and he's doing really well." Stone moved Adam to No. 3 in the order after he began the year on a .313 clip. But Adam began to see first-pitch curveballs and heaters painting both corners of the plate. Inexperience could have gotten the better of him, but he, despite some recent struggles at the plate, handled the move to the meat of the order with relative ease.

He's totally different from [Bryon and Nick]," Fred says. "It's the most amazing thing. Nick was hyper. Bryon was laid back and Adam has both of those characteristics. He's very calm at the plate."

You have to be if you want to have any chance of hitting Division I pitching. Thinking is the enemy. Thinking hurts the ball club. But Stone doesn't want his players daydreaming through nine innings of baseball, either. It takes selective intensity to play baseball at the highest level, with a touch of happy-go-lucky to shake off those 0-fers.

"I've been struggling lately," Adam concedes. "I try to play defense when I'm not hitting and it just works out that way. When I go up there I'm trying not to think. I think that's been my problem lately. I'm just thinking a little bit too much. When I get up there I say to myself, 'See the ball. Hit the ball.' That's all I'm thinking. Sometimes it works, sometimes it doesn't."

Not too high. Not too low. That's a baseball player.

No sophomore slump: Franczek sets the table for teammates

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

After the long doubleheader with Saint Joseph's, Ryan Franczek is probably the dirtiest player on the field. There isn't one spot on his maroon jersey and white pants that doesn't have a trace of brown on it. The "UMass" lettering scripted across his chest is barely legible.

The fact that he took it upon himself to change the school colors from "Maroon and White" to "Maroon, White and Brown" showcases the type of player he is. The Chicopee native is what is known in the Boston area as a "dirt dog."

Franczek is a 5-foot-11, 180-pound third baseman who is the type of player that avoids the spotlight. People talk about the versatility of first baseman/reliever Bryan Adamski and the budding star in Adam Tempesta, but Franczek has quietly avoided the so-called "sophomore slump" to have a very successful 2006 season.

With just four games left in the regular season, he's second on the team in batting average posting a .318 mark. He's also tied with Adamski for second on the team in extra base hits with 14 – eight doubles, four triples and two home runs. Add to the fact that no one on the team gets on base more than Franczek (.417 on-base percentage), and you have a pretty good lead-off hitter.

Yesterday against St. Joe's, Franczek demonstrated what a lead-off hitter is supposed to do. In yesterday's doubleheader he reached base a combined five times and scored three runs with an RBI. On two consecutive plate appearances in Game 2 Franczek was hit by a pitch. In the sixth – after being hit the second time – he took third on a perfectly executed double steal and ended up crossing the plate for the third UMass run of the inning.

Since late last season he has held down the No. 1 spot in the order. Franczek has turned out to be the perfect table setter for the Minutemen. Not only does he get on base, but he makes things happen on the basepaths. Stone says not only can he steal a base here and there but he has great base running ability in general.

"He's a good base stealer and a good base runner, not necessarily a straight out base stealer," Stone says. "I wish we had more guys like that. If you had nine guys like Ryan Franczek then you'd be in good shape."

Franczek enjoys every minute that he's up at the plate. He sees it as his personal responsibility to get the rest of the team up and running out of the gates. If he gets on base and then the rest of the team is that much more excited to step up and try to drive him in.

"I feel like if we get out early everybody wants to hit and get back in the box and keep swinging," Franczek says. "I feel like if we score in the first inning then everybody is clawing at the bat to get right back up there and hit again."

Just like most ballplayers, he has a special routine he goes through each time he steps into the box. Before the first pitch of each at-bat, Franczek holds the bat with two hands out in front of him and takes a deep breath. When he steps into the batters box, he hits the same spots on the plate each time and blows a kiss to his mother. The final part is a special tribute because his mother died when he was just 11 years old.

After he had a monster game against Northeastern in the Beanpot Tournament back in April, Stone said how valuable Franczek was because he could bat just about anywhere in the UMass order – and he'd be just as effective. Getting the most out of his bat is the reason he steps to the plate before anybody else wearing a maroon uniform. The more at-bats he gets, the more chances guys like Tempesta and Adamski have to drive him in.

"He's a battler and a competitor," Stone says. "He's our best contact hitter and he's probably our best hitter. He's just a real pleasure to have on our team."

Stone is actually lucky to have Franczek in the lineup. After he had a break out senior year in high school, the Sophomore third baseman Ryan Franczek proved to be a worthy table-setter for the middle of the UMass lineup this season, pacing the Minutemen with a .327 batting average.

'You have to get past me'

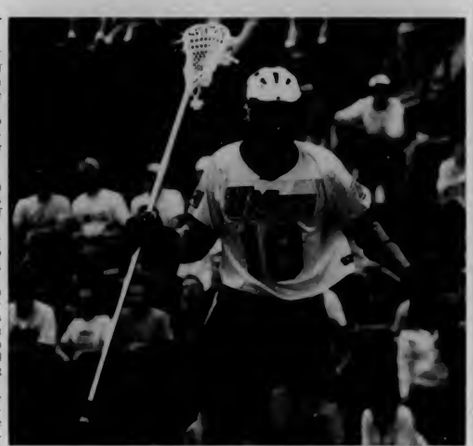
He sits in his own little world – in the midst of a crowd but completely by himself – away from his teammates, his coaches and anything on the outside that may cause distraction.

The drums of Lars Ulrich, vocals of Rob Zombie and guitar solos of Tom Morello reverberate through his head while he hides behind a pair of silver Oakleys.



It's almost game time.

Jack Reid stays intensely focused seven days a week. But this is different. This is the day he takes it to another level. This day is the culmination of the six others that preceded it.

Lacrosse is the ultimate team game, especially at UMass. But during the morning leading up to the 60-minute battle that is about to take place, Reid prefers to do things his own way.

"I usually have my headphones and glasses on because I don't want to interact with too many people," he says. "I just hide behind the glasses and stay in my own little world. The guys bust [me] all the time for wearing my glasses, like in Georgetown where it was pouring rain and I had my glasses on all day. I just like kind of sitting behind those until I start getting dressed up."

He has yet to see the field, but he readies himself for that first sight – whether it is the hill adjacent to Garber, the metallic glow that surrounds the field turf at the Carrier Dome or the Harvard playing surface that fits comfortably next to Storrow

Clemens : almost a Red Sox

He's just watching . . . for now.

At least that is what Roger Clemens' agent, Randy Hendricks, implied in an e-mail on Tuesday night. Much has been said about the future of the seven-time Cy Young Award winner, but for the time being, the Rocket is still undecided.

Clemens is currently juggling the options of retirement, re-signing with the Houston Astros or testing the free-agent market. Clemens has set a mid-June deadline to let everyone know what he will be doing in 2006.

"It is 50/50 in terms of his returning this year or retiring," Randy Hendricks said on Tuesday via e-mail. "He will make his decision on or before June 15. Right now, he is testing himself by accelerating his workout program. He has been working out and throwing all along. He will have a better idea of what he thinks he can or should do by the end of May."

It is hard to believe that Clemens would opt to hang up his cleats, especially after what happened in the World Baseball Classic. One would have to be on their way to the loony bin to think that a competitor like the Rocket would walk away from baseball and end his career with a loss to Mexico.

Clemens allowed his only two runs of the tournament in the 2-1 loss, as he watched his offense struggle mightily in the final game of the second round.

Speaking of struggling offenses, Clemens had a 1.87 ERA last season with the Astros, but finished the season with a mediocre 13-8 record. Those down in Houston are hoping that Clemens isn't looking to join a club with a powerhouse offense. Mainly because the three other teams that have shown interest in signing the Rocket are just that.

Never the less, Hendricks believes that all four teams have an equal opportunity of obtaining Clemens. And while he won't be going to the highest bidder, it should also be noted that he is not going to play for free.

"The Astros dealt themselves into the hunt with the Red Sox, Yankees and Rangers by making a good offer on May 1," Hendricks said. "But since Roger has said he won't play in May, nothing has really changed. I always expected the Astros to make a good offer in May. None is a clear front runner and none has been ruled out." "There will not be a bidding war, contrary to media speculation," Hendricks said. "Once Roger decides, it will go like this: if he decides to retire, I will let everyone know; if he selects a particular team, I believe I will reach an agreement with that team within 24 hours. While I have said he will not play for a discount, I have never said it will be a bidding war."

So now what?

May 1 (the first day that Houston was eligible to resign Clemens) has come and gone. No bidding wars and no hometown discounts. It would only seem logical that Clemens isn't retiring. In fact, he's just waiting to see how the standings play out. The guy is 43 years old, and he can still dominate. He's just looking for a winner.

Roger, there's a call for you on line one.

It's Theo Epstein.

Most fans, at first, were too stubborn to believe that Clemens would even consider finishing his career in Boston. But as of late, the WWE-like, dream scenario of the Rocket wearing No. 21 and upending the Evil Empire at Fenway Park seems ever so realistic.

It is no secret that the Red Sox brass is ready to do everything they can to put Clemens back in a Red Sox uniform. Their "big push" for the Rocket began with a personal visit to Houston, followed by sending him a video of Red Sox fans pleading for Roger to come back home. Clemens repaid them by making a visit to the Red Sox clubhouse on opening day to say hello to the players, coaches and management.

You sure as hell would not see Clemens having a joyous conversation with Dan Duquette if he were still around. And that is why this is so special. Not only are the Red Sox showing interest in Clemens, but Clemens is showing interest right back.

And why wouldn't he?

The scene on Yawkey Way is much different from the last time he left. There is new ownership, new management and a fan-base that would give its right arm to see No. 21 take the hill at the Fens. Those are just a few reasons why it makes perfect sense for a Rocket return to Beantown. Clemens is tied with Cy Young for franchise wins (192), and one more victory in a Sox uniform would make him arguably the greatest pitcher in Red Sox history. Did I mention that Al Nipper, the Red Sox pitching coach, is one of Roger's best friends?

While the potential storyline of Roger Clemens finishing his career with the Red Sox and riding out of Fenway on his White Horse may seem too good to be true, talks

Tempesta in long line of baseball lifers

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Here's a hypothetical: if you saw Adam Tempesta minus the baseball uniform, would you think he was a No. 3 hitter on a Division I baseball team?

"Probably not," says UMass coach Mike Stone.

Adam is 5-foot-7 and hitting third for the Minutemen. He is batting .327 (second on the team), has 67 total bases (first on the team) and has whiffed only 10 times in 155 at-bats. And he's just a freshman.

The Brockton native made the switch to second base this year after playing shortstop since little league. He talked with his high school coach about moving to second base because of - of course - his size.

"Usually the shortstops are the bigger guys," Adam says, donning a frown after an 0-for-3 performance against Siena. "I have no problem with [moving to second.] Since my freshman year in high school I've played shortstop and second base. There are still things to learn but as long as I'm playing that's fine with me."

The middle infield is the middle infield, right?

You can't tell that he's inexperienced. Just watch him play the position. He is agile, has a cannon for an arm and attacks the baseball.

Against Connecticut on Tuesday, a Huskies hitter chopped a ground ball up the middle. It was hit straight down and took a big hop over the pitcher's head. Adam moved to his right, near the second base bag, and tried to trap the ball before it caught him with an in-between hop.

He scurried in and caught the ball off of a quick bounce. His momentum carried him forward and he used his body as a backboard to make sure that the ball didn't scoot into the outfield.

The ball popped into his glove and he fell forward, but scrambled to his feet and threw the runner out. It was a play that infielders dread: a bounding ball with a lot spin that tends not to agree with leather. But Adam smothered it and threw out the UConn runner with time to spare.

So is there anything that he's had trouble with? "I was just getting used to playing shortstop for three years," Adam says. "There are a lot of different things about second base, like turning double plays. You turn double plays differently and you react to the ball differently."

According to junior shortstop Lou Proietti, Adam's closest associate in the field, the rook is doing just fine.

"I think he's doing an incredible job this year," Proietti says. "He's not playing like a freshman, but like an upperclassman with several years of experience. The best part is he just keeps getting better and better with each game.

"I feel very comfortable playing with him out there. It's like we've been playing together for a couple of years now. We've got a great line of communication on the field."

KARYN WINGERSON/COLLEGIAN

Freshman second baseman Adam Tempesta has jumped into the No. 3 spot in the UMass batting order after a fast start to the 2006 season.

Adam's father, Fred, watched his son from the little league fields to Division I baseball, and the proud dad knows that his son is something special in the field.

"It was unbelievable the plays he could make at shortstop," Fred says. "He's handled the switch pretty well. If you ever watch him try to turn a double play, he's really great. He has a shortstop's arm, so that really helps."

Adam's versatility surely made things easier for Stone, who had him and Proietti overbooked at shortstop. Stone found a place for Adam in the field, and the coach got a bonus deal out of the initial package: his hitting.

Adam began the year batting six-through-nine in the lineup, but it quickly became a no-brainer to move him up. He jumped to

Finding the truth behind the Flutie Ball

Jeff Howe

This is a story that began about 16 months ago, but it came to an apex last February.

I've sat on it for a little more than a year now, knowing the story I'm about to tell is one that people would want to hear, but I never printed it. I just couldn't figure out why.

I'm a sports writer, so it's my responsibility to the reader to share any sports related story I happen to stumble across, regardless of who I might anger.

So here it is, straight down the middle, exactly how it happened.

On Nov. 12, 2004, I sat in the Conte Forum press box for a hockey game between UMass and Boston College, the top-ranked team in the country at the time. At one point during the night, a fellow Collegian writer told me about the BC trophy case sitting behind one of the student sections. He mentioned something interesting about a certain football in the case.

You know the football. Doug Flutie chucked it 48 yards to Gerard Phelan during the last play of the game between BC and No. 1 Miami on Nov. 23, 1984. It was a historic upset, and that play is considered by many to be the all-time greatest six seconds in college football history.

But maybe you don't know the football.

There was something strange about that ball as it sat there in the Conte Forum case. For one, I didn't understand why this ball, which would have been used in a collegiate game, would have an "NFL" insignia on it. To say the least, it peaked my curiosity.

I grew up about a half-hour north of Boston so I'm very aware of Flutie and what his name means to Boston College, the school's fans and the school's alumni. I know what he means to the people in the Boston area who were just simply in front of their television sets for that 47-45 Miracle in Miami. I even have friends whose parents have shrines of Flutie in their homes. In the words of Ron Burgundy, Doug Flutie was kind of a big deal.

I needed some kind of an answer; as a journalist and as a sports fan in general. So I started to make some phone calls - first to the NCAA and then to Wilson Sporting Goods, the company that manufactured the ball in question. I spoke with Lisa Douglass, who worked in the NCAA archives department, on several occasions. She couldn't prove to me whether or not the NCAA used that type of ball during that particular game or even in the 1984 season in general.

When I talked to her the last time, I asked her straight forward if she thought an NFL ball would have been used in that game, and she gave me a straightforward answer.

"I doubt it," Douglass said.

OK, so the NCAA couldn't give me a definitive answer, but I still had Wilson to go to. I spoke with a company executive, Ted Kochowicz, several different times over the course of a few weeks. He tried tracking down shipping receipts from 1984, but later told me that Wilson's records didn't date back that far.

Kochowicz, like Andrews, couldn't offer me any solid evidence to prove one way or the other if the ball could have been used in that game, but he did provide one very good point.

"I'm almost 100 percent certain they wouldn't use the NFL ball," Kochowicz said. "I spoke to the football marketing director, and he strongly doubts it because the NCAA ball is smaller than the NFL ball. The pebble pattern is different. The science is different. The collegiate ball is narrower and thinner around the middle."

With that, I had two calls left to make; first, to the University of Miami, which gave me absolutely no help at all, and then to Boston College to hear its side of the story.

All I wanted was a simple statement from that end, but I guess I was a little too naive to know what would happen.

BC athletic director Gene DeFillipo simply stated, "I don't know anything about that," but it was sports information director Chris Cameron who seemed to take the most offense to my allegations that the ball may not be the real one from Nov. 23, 1984.

He argued with me, insulted my integrity as a journalist and seemed completely unwilling to present his side of the case in a level-headed manner. After explaining to him that all I was looking for was a simple statement, he provided me with this. "Your story is totally, 100 percent erroneous," Cameron began. "The ball in the trophy case was donated by Gerard Phelan, who kept the ball after the game and donated it to BC. ... We have many action photos from that season in our archives that show the Wilson NFL insignia on the side of the ball."

After that, I told Cameron all he needed to do was provide me with a photo from the game in Miami that would show the NFL logo on the ball, and the story would be squashed completely.

But he couldn't.

Instead, he sent an e-mail to my editor-in-chief, managing editor and sports editor – in short, all three of my bosses. The e-mail, which was also carbon copied to UMass athletic director John McCutcheon and Chancellor John Lombardi, among others, contained a photo of Darren Flutie – Doug's brother – carrying a football that was indeed made by Wilson and also had the NFL insignia on it.

But it wasn't a photo from the game in Miami, and it is difficult to tell if the photo was even taken during a game at all. Darren Flutie was wearing his home jersey, but with two visible fans in the stands behind him. It looked very much like it was taken during practice.

Also in the e-mail, Cameron stated, "Mr. Howe apparently noticed the ball in our trophy case while attending BC's 29-7 win over UMass this past October. While I'm sure he was disappointed in the outcome of the game, I'm not sure what Mr. Howe's personal motivation is for pursuing this story. ... I'm sure Mr. Howe's first priority, though, is to report truthful and accurate information."

In fact, I saw the ball after UMass tied BC 3-3 in hockey, not following a football game – though I did indeed cover that football game earlier in the year.

Also, my motivation behind this story was to peak the interest of those who decided to read it, and here were the facts I reported: I saw the ball at Conte Forum, and I got statements from Wilson and the NCAA, which both believed – but could not positively confirm – the NFL ball wouldn't have been used in a collegiate game. At no time did I accuse the Boston College athletic department – which is of the most highly respected athletic departments in the country – of displaying a fake ball, though Cameron was overly defensive when I attempted to give him an opportunity to give his side, which was one of the first things that struck me during our conversations.

If I were to present a one-sided story, I wouldn't have gone to such measures to get a statement from Boston College and would have hung up the phone once Cameron began to harass me. But a story without both sides isn't a good story, so I kept plugging away, regardless of the verbal assault I continued to endure.

Cameron also made this request in the email to my superiors.

"Frankly, instead of a newspaper story, I feel he should be writing us an apology," Cameron wrote.

I didn't feel as though I owed anyone an apology, but I didn't run the story for the sole purpose of escaping from the harassment I continued to receive from these multiple angles.

It's been eating away at me for the last year, though. I knew I had a story to tell, but it was a
